The treaties of Hanover and of Vienna being laid before the commons, they were debated by a full houſe of 420 members. No ſtranger was admitted except the earl of Marchmont, who had been a plenipotentary at Cambray. Mr Horace Walpole, ambaſſador at the court of France, opened the debate with a long ſpeech, ſetting forth the ſtate of affairs in Europe from the peace of Utrecht to the preſent time. He took notice, 'that, ſince his majeſty's acceſſion to the throne, his conſtant care and endeavours had been to ſettle the balance of power on a ſolid foundation, and to preſerve and ſecure the tranquility of Chriſtendom; to protect and defend the proteſtant cauſe, and promote the honour and intereſt of his Britiſh ſubjects. That with theſe great views, his majeſty was become mediator and guarantee, both of the Barrier treaty, concluded in 1715, and of the convention made in 1718, for the execution of that treaty, between the emperor and the ſtates-general of the united provinces. In the year 1716, his majeſty concluded a defenſive alliance with the emperor; and, in 1717, another with the moſt chriſtian king and the ſtates-general; the genuine deſign of both which treaties was only to preſerve the public repoſe of Chriſtendom, eſtabliſhed by the peace of Utrecht, to guarantee the ſucceſſion to the crown of Great-Britain in the proteſtant line. In order to fortify all theſe treaties, and to extinguiſh the war, the Spaniards had kindled in Italy, his majeſty, in 1718, made a convention with the moſt chriſtian king, for propoſing ultimate conditions of peace between the emperor and the king of Spain, and between his imperial majeſty and the (then) king of Sicily. This convention was, a few days after, followed by a treaty of alliance between the emperor, the king of Great-Britain, and the moſt chriſtian king, which, by their miniſters, was concluded at London, and ſigned on the 22d of July, 1718, and in which the ſtates-general were named as one of the contracting parties (upon a ſuppoſition that they would come into it) from whence this treaty was named the Quadruple Alliance. A few months after the king of Sicily was admitted into this treaty; and at length the king of Spain himſelf was forced to accede to it, which was mainly owing to the generous aſſiſtance, which his Britannic majeſty gave the emperor in the Mediterranean. There remaining ſome points ſtill controverted between the emperor and king of Spain, the ſame was referred to be amicably determined in a congreſs, which was afterwards opened at Cambray, under the mediation of his Britannic majeſty and the moſt chriſtian king. By reaſon of ſeveral difficulties induſtriouſly raiſed by the courts of Vienna and Madrid, the great pains taken for three years by the miniſters mediators proved unſucceſsful, and at laſt the congreſs was ſuddenly diſſolved, upon advice, that the emperor and the king of Spain had ſecretly adjuſted the differences between them, and concluded a treaty of peace at Vienna. This unexpected event occaſioned no ſmall ſurprize, and raiſed jealouſies, which appeared to be better grounded, when it was known, that the treaty of peace was ſoon followed by a treaty of commerce, the main deſign of which was to ſupport and countenance the Eaſt-India company, ſome years before eſtabliſhed at Oſtend, by granting to the inhabitants of the Auſtrian Netherlands greater privileges, both in the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies, than were ever granted either to the Engliſh or Dutch, which viſibly tended the intire ruin of many valuable branches of our trade, and was contrary to ſeveral ſolemn treaties ſtill in force. His majeſty, ever watchful for the intereſt of his Britiſh ſubjects, had cauſed lively repreſentations to be made againſt the treaty of commerce, both to the emperor and king of Spain. At the court of Madrid, theſe complaints were received with coldneſs; and that at Vienna, with ſtiffneſs and haughtineſs, even to ſuch a degree, that the imperial miniſters did not ſtic to inſinuate, that, if his Britannic majeſty perſiſted in this reſolution to take meaſures in oppoſition to the treaties of Vienna, his imperial majeſty would not only think himſelf diſengaged from the guarantee of the proteſtant ſucceſſion to the crown of Great-Britain, but that the ſame might be attended with conſequences in relation to his majeſty's dominions in Germany. Theſe inſulting menaces made no impreſſion on his majeſty's firmneſs, nor deterred him from his fixed reſolution of concerting with other powers ſuch meaſures, as might give a chec to the ambitious views of thoſe, who endeavoured to render themſelves formidable. Theſe meaſures ſeemed to be more neceſſary, becauſe there were juſt grounds to believe, that the unforeſeen reconciliation of the emperor and king of Spain was owing to the conſtant view of the houſe of Auſtria, of rendering the imperial dignity hereditary in their family. In order to that, it might reaſonably be ſuppoſed, that the treaties of Vienna were to be cemented by a match between the emperor's eldeſt daughter and the infant don Carlos. It was eaſy to foreſee the conſequences of ſuch a marriage. For the iſſue male, that might come from it, might, in time, be poſſeſſed not only of all the hereditary dominions belonging to the houſe of Auſtria, and of the imperial dignity, but alſo of all the dominions of the Spaniſh monarchy; which would intirely overthrow the balance of power, and render the liberties of all the reſt of Europe very precarious. This ſuppoſition would appear more than probable to any one, who conſidered that there was ſcarce any other way of accounting either for the king of Spain's breaking through ſolemn treaties with Great-Britain, in favour of the emperor's ſubjects in the Netherlands; or for the emperors's forgeting ſo far the obligations he had to Great-Britain and Holland, as to enter into engagements to aſſiſt Spain towards the recovery of Gibralter and Minorca, and to perſiſt in ſupporting and countenancing the Oſtend company, eſtabliſhed with no other view, than to deprive the ſubjects of the maritime powers of ſeveral of the moſt advantageous branches of their trade. In order to give a timely chec to the further progreſs of ſuch dangerous deſigns, his majeſty, in his great wiſdom, had entered into a defenſive alliance with the moſt chriſtian king, and the king of Pruſſia to which ſeveral other powers, and particular the ſtates-general, had been invited to accede. The ſtates of Holland had already done it: and it was not to be doubted, but their example would ſoon be followed by the other united provinces. The main view of this alliance was to maintain and preſerve the public repoſe and tranquility of Chriſtendom, and to ſecure to each contracting party the poſſeſſion of their reſpective dominions and territories, with the rights, immunities, and advantages, particularly thoſe relating to trade, which their ſubjects enjoyed, or ought, by treaties, to enjoy. And, as his majeſty ever had a particular concern for the proteſtant intereſt, ſo, out of his royal and tender compaſſion for the diſtreſſed condition of ſome of our proteſtant brethren in Poland, his majeſty had not only interpoſed his good offices in the moſt preſſing manner in their favour, but had taken the occaſion of the defenſive alliance made at Hanover, to engage, by a ſeparate article, the moſt chriſtian king and the king of Pruſſia, who, together with his majeſty, are guarantees of the treaty of Oliva, to ſee it maintained and obſerved in its full extent, and to cauſe reparation to be made for what may have been done at Thorn, contrary to that treaty. He concluded with an encomium upon his majeſty's wiſdom, care, vigilance, ſteadineſs, and reſolution in the conduct of all theſe weighty and important affairs.'

Mr Walpole's ſpeech occaſioned a great debate. A member having ſuggeſted, that it was to be ſuppoſed, the king of Spain did not ſeem to grant any further privileges to the emperor's ſubjects in the Netherlands, than what had been granted to the Engliſh, and other moſt favoured nations; he was anſwered by colonel Bladen, who pointed to the ſecond article of the treaty of commerce of Vienna, whereby it was expreſsly ſtipulated, 'that the ſhips of war, and merchant-ſhips belonging to the contracting parties, or their ſubjects, ſhould be allowed full liberty to frequent the harbours, coaſts, and provinces of each other;' naming particularly the Eaſt-Indies, and without any exception as to the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies, or any reſtraint on the ſhips of war and merchant-ſhips, than not 'to buy any thing beſides victuals and materials for repairing of ſhips;' which implied a permiſſion to vend their merchandizes for ready money; ſo it was manifeſt, that the ſubjects of the Auſtrian Low-countries were allowed more extenſive privileges than ever had been granted to any other nation, contrary to ſeveral treaties in force between the crowns of Great-Britain and Spain

Colonel Bladen having cleared this important point, mr. Daniel Pulteney made a long ſpeech, wherein having made his obſervations on moſt of the points mentioned by mr. Horace Walpole, he inſinuated, that the ſubject matter of this day's debate was of the greateſt importance, and therefore they ought maturely to conſider of it, before they came to any reſolution upon it. He was ſupported by mr. Shippen, who raiſed the main objection to the treaty of Hanover, that it would engage the Britiſh nation in a war for the defence of his majeſty's dominions in Germany, contrary to an expreſs proviſion made for the ſecuring our religion, laws, and liberties, in the act for further limitation and ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line: which being the baſis and foundation of the preſent ſettlement, was become part of our conſtitution, and therefore ought to be ſacred and inviolable. They were anſwered by mr. Pelham, who urged, that the true meaning and intent of that limitation was not wholly and for ever to deprive his majeſty's foreign dominions of any aſſiſtance from this nation; for, if ſo, his majeſty, in that reſpect, would be in a worſe condition upon his acceſſion to the Britiſh throne than he was before; but only to reſtrain the ſovereign, for the future, from engaging the nation, at his pleaſure, in a war for the defence of any dominions not belonging to the crown of England, without the conſent of parliament; to whom the legiſlature wiſely left to judge and determine, whether ſuch war was juſt and neceſſary or no? concluding, that, for his own part, he was fully of opinion, that, if, in the preſent juncture and circumſtances of affairs, his majeſty's foreign dominions ſhould be attacked or inſulted, this nation ought to ſtand by and ſupport his majeſty againſt all his enemies whatſoever. And therefore he moved, 'that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to return his majeſty the thanks of this houſe for the great goodneſs in communicating the treaties of peace and commerce concluded between the emperor and the king of Spain, and the defenſive alliance between his majeſty, the moſt chriſtian king, and the king of Pruſſia. To expreſs our juſt ſenſe of his majeſty's concern for the balance of power in Europe, and of the proteſtant religion; and above all our unfeigned gratitude for his earneſt and ſeaſonable care of the particular intereſts of his Britiſh ſubjects, by forming and entering into the defenſive alliance with the moſt chriſtian king, and the king of Pruſſia, in order to obviate and diſappoint the dangerous views and conſequences of the treaty of peace betwixt the emperor and the king of Spain; and to preſerve the many valuable rights and privileges of this nation againſt the fatal tendency of the ſaid treaty of commerce, calculated for the entire deſtruction of the Britiſh trade, in breach of ſeveral ſolemn treaties now in force. To acknowledge his majeſty's prudence and reſolution, in not letting any attempts or inſinuations whatſoever divert his majeſty from conſulting and ſteadily purſuing the true intereſt of theſe his kingdoms; and to aſſure his majeſty, that, in juſtice and vindication of the honour and dignity of the Britiſh crown, this houſe will effectually ſtand by and ſupport his majeſty againſt all inſults and attacks, that any prince, or power, in reſentment of the juſt meaſures, which his majeſty has ſo wiſely taken, ſhall make upon any of his majeſty's territories and dominions, though not belonging to the crown of Great Britain.' [m]

This motion being at laſt approved by a majority of 285 againſt 107, the addreſs was preſented on the 19th of February, to which the king returned this anſwer:

Gentlemen,

'I return you my thanks for this particular mark of your duty, affection, and confidence in me. Your aſſurances not to ſuffer my foreign dominions to be expoſed or inſulted, on account of the meaſures I have taken for the intereſt of theſe kingdoms, will, I hope, be a means to preſerve the peace and tranquility of Europe. I have no views of ambition to gratify; I have no thought of aggrandizing myſelf, or extending any part of my dominions at the hazard and expence of the other; and, as my honour is the common cauſe and concern of my ſubjects, their particular intereſts, ſhall, upon all occaſions, be my conſtant care.'

The lords took likewiſe into conſideration the three treaties, which had been laid before them: the lord Townſhend opened the debate, and concluded with a motion much to the ſame purpoſe with that of mr. Pelham in the houſe of commons. He was ſeconded by the duke of Newcaſtle, who acquainted the houſe with a remarkable paſſage out of a letter from mr. Stanhope, his majeſty's miniſter in Spain, 'that, in a private converſation, the duke of Ripperda had not ſcrupled to own, that, beſides what had already been communicated to him about the late treaties in Vienna, there were ſtill ſome other ſecret articles, which in due time ſhould be made public, whereby the contracting parties mutually engaged to aſſiſt each other with a certain number of troops, in order to ſupport the Oſtend company, and to recover Gibraltar.' The duke being aſked, Whether he would produce that letter? he ſaid, he had not the king's commands for it, but was only left at liberty to take notice of what he had mentioned. Upon this the lord Lechmere obſerved, that no ſtreſs could be laid on an information, that did not come regularly and in form before the houſe: that beſides it was uſual with miniſters of ſtate ſometimes to drop things, that have no reality, in common converſation, only to ſound thoſe, with whom they negotiate. That, the treaties, that had been communicated to them, being a matter of the greateſt importance, they ought to proceed in it with the utmoſt caution and matureſt deliberation; and therefore he was of opinion, they ought to take ſome time to conſider of it, and adjourn the debate to another day. He was anſwered by the earl of Scarborough; and the queſtion being put upon the motion for an addreſs, it was carried in the affirmative, by a majority of one.

After this the lord Lechmere ſtood up, and declared, 'that he would go as far as any member of that illuſtrious aſſembly, in vindicating the honour and dignity of the Britiſh crown, and in ſupporting and defending his majeſty's perſon and government. That, as their preſent and future happineſs depended, next under God, on the ſettlement of the crown of theſe realms on his majeſty and his royal iſſue, they ought to be extremely cautious of any the leaſt derogation from the act of parliament, by which that happy ſettlement was made; and therefore he was of opinion, and moved, that to the reſolution for an addreſs the following words be added:

[m] Mr Pulteney ſpoke againſt this motion, and among other things, ſaid, 'that the imperial court's backwardneſs in granting the inveſtiture for Bremen and Verden, might have been one of the motives to ſome late meaſures.' Upon this ſir Robert Walpole aſſured the houſe, that the king might long ago have had the inveſtiture, if he would have paid the exorbitant fees that were demanded for it.

'This houſe not doubting but your majeſty, in your great wiſdom and juſtice to theſe your kingdoms, will always preſerve to them the full and intire benefit of the proviſion made for the further ſecuring our religion, laws and liberties, by an act paſſed in the 12th and 13th years of the reign of his late majeſty king William III. of glorious memory, whereby it is enacted, That, in caſe the crown and imperial dignity of this realm ſhall hereafter come to any perſon, not being a native of this kingdom of England, this nation be not obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories, which do not belong to the crown of England, without the conſent of parliament.' But this motion was rejected.

The addreſs, in ſubſtance the ſame with that of the commons, was preſented by the houſe of lords in a body, on the 18th of February, and received the like anſwer.

On the 2d of March, a petition from Richard Hampden, late treaſurer of the navy, and knight of the ſhire for the county of Bucks, was preſented to the commons by ſir William Yonge, for leave to bring in a bill, to impower the commiſſioners of the treaſury to compound with the petitioner for his debt to the crown.[n] Sir Robert Walpole having acquainted the houſe, that the king had given his conſent that they might do as they thought fit, the petition was taken into conſideration. It was ſaid by mr. Onſlow, the ſpeaker, and ſome others, 'that out of regard to his ancient family, and, in particular, in conſideration of his great-grandfather, John Hampden, who made a moſt noble and courageous ſtand againſt arbitrary power, in oppoſing ſhip-money, and fell the firſt victim in the glorious cauſe of liberty, they were for having ſomething done for his relations.' His wife and brother preſented petitions, ſetting forth the diſtreſs they would be reduced to, by the deficiency mr. Hampden was charged, without relief from the houſe. Theſe petitions occaſioning a debate, ſir William Yonge took notice, 'that mr. Hampden's deficiency had, in ſome meaſure, been occaſioned by a general calamity: that he had already done all that lay in his power to make it up; that, however, ſince neither his lady, nor his brother, had any ways been acceſſary to his misfortunes, it was unreaſonable and unjuſt to involve them in his offence and its puniſhment: that his real and patrimonal eſtate amounted to about 2200l. a year, one full half of which was ſettled for a jointure to his wife, who brought him near 11,000l. in marriage, beſides an annuity of 200l. per annum during her life, for her ſeparate uſe; all which ſettlements ought to be ſecured to her; that either mr. Richard Hampden, or his brother, may have iſſue male; and in conſideration of the ſignal ſervices, at divers times performed by their illuſtrious anceſtors, ſome proviſion ſhould be made for their poſterity out of the family eſtate.' And therefore he moved, that a bill be brought in for 'veſting the real and perſonal eſtates of Richard Hampden in truſtees, for making ſome proviſion for his wife and family, and for the better ſecuring the debt due from him to the crown.' But mr. Clayton and ſome other gentlemen repreſented, that, if this affair went through the uſual tedious courſe of extents in the Exchequer, great part of mr. Hampden's eſtate would be conſumed in law expences, ſo that the crown would not get 200l. a year out of it. And therefore they propoſed, that the eſtate ſhould be divided into two equal parts, one of which ſhould be allotted as a proviſion for his wife and family, and the other half immediately ſold off, towards ſatisfying the debt due from him to the crown. Many members ſhewed their approbation of this propoſal; but the majority were for ſir William Yonge's motion; and a bill was ordered to be brought in, which afterwards paſſed into a law.

Upon the petition of Daniel Campbel, member of parliament for Glaſgow, for ſatisfaction for his damages, by the rioters into that city, a bill paſſed in his favour; and the ſatisfaction given him was laid upon the place, where the crime was committed, by an act for an impoſition of two pennies Scots, upon all the ale and beer brewed in the city of Glaſgow. However the malt-tax was thought ſo great a grievance in Scotland, that the convention of the royal boroughs preſented an addreſs by John Campbel, member for Edinburgh, in which, though they diſavowed the conduct of the Glaſgow men, they remonſtrated againſt that tax, as a burthen too heavy for their country to bear; and afterwards petitioned the commons concerning it; as did likewiſe the ſhires of Renfrew, Banff, &c.

On the 24th of March, ſir Paul Methuen, knight of the Bath, delivered the following meſſage from the king to the houſe of commons:

'His majeſty having nothing more at heart, than an earneſt deſire to ſecure to his own ſubjects the full and free enjoyment of their trade and navigation, and in the beſt manner to prevent and fruſtrate ſuch deſigns, as have been formed againſt the particular intereſt of this nation, and the general peace of Europe, has found it neceſſary, not only to augment his maritime force, but to concert ſuch other meaſures, as may moſt effectually conduce to theſe deſirable ends: and, as theſe ſervices will require ſome extraordinary expences, his majeſty hopes he ſhall be enabled, by the aſſiſtance of parliament, to increaſe the number of ſeamen already voted and granted for the ſervice of this year, and to enter into, and make good ſuch engagements, as the circumſtances and exigencies of affairs may require.'

This meſſage occaſioned a debate of ſix hours; but it was at laſt agreed to comply with it, by a majority of 270 againſt 89, and an addreſs to that purpoſe was preſented to the king.

[1725] This meſſage had not been communicated to the houſe of lords, though the king ſaid in it, that he hoped he ſhould be enabled, by the aſſiſtance of his parliament, to increaſe the number of ſeamen already voted. Notice was taken of it, and the earl of Strafford aſſerted, 'that the meſſage was unprecedented, and ſtruc at the ancient privileges of the houſe of peers, who are the grand ſtanding council of the ſovereign, the hereditary and perpetual guardians of the liberties and properties of the people, and, next the king, the principal part of the legiſlature, and who therefore have a right to be conſulted in all matters of public concern.' He moved, therefore, 'that an addreſs be preſented to know, who adviſed his majeſty not to ſend the ſame meſſage to the houſe of peees, as was ſent to the houſe of commons.' The lord Trevor (who had been made lord privy-ſeal on the 6th of March, in the room of the duke of Kingſton) moved, that the further conſideration of that matter might be adjourned for a month. But the lord Lechmere repreſented, 'that the ſubject-matter of this debate was of ſo great conſequence to his majeſty's ſervice, to the honour of that noble and illuſtrious aſſembly, to the ancient conſtitution of parliament, and to the proſperity and welfare of the kingdom, that it ought not to be poſtponed at all, much leſs for ſuch a length of time, as amounted to a laying it entirely aſide. That it muſt be for the ſervice and ſupport of the crown, upon all occaſions, to have the advice of both houſes of parliament; and as the meſſage in queſtion was only ſent to the houſe of commons, and there had not yet been any communication with their lordſhips upon it, though it contained matters of the higheſt importance, it tended to undermine the very foundation of the houſe of peers, and of the ancient conſtitution of the kingdom. That the rights of the people of England were, in ſome meaſure invaded, whenever they were deprived of the aſſiſtance of that houſe of parliament, without whom no aid can be given to the crown, nor any taxes laid upon the ſubjects. And therefore, if this debate ſhould be adjourned to ſo long a day, it might be inferred from ſuch a dilatory proceeding, that their lordſhips were not as jealous of their own privileges, and of their rights and properties of the people, at this time, and as much determined to ſupport and defend them both, as any of their anceſtors and predeceſſors had formerly been. That it was the undoubted, inherent and fundamental right of the houſe of peers to alter and amend all money-bills, which came from the commons; and, though in ſome laſt inſtances the commons had diſputed that right, yet the lords had never failed to maintain and aſſert it. That, according to ancient uſage, all demands of ſupply ſhould come from the throne in the houſe of peers; and therefore all other methods are unparliamentary, new, and dangerous to the conſtitution.' All theſe aſſertions were corroborated with ſeveral precedents upon record, which he cauſed to be read. He was anſwered by the lords Onſlow and Townſhend; who were replied to by the lord Bathurſt, who took notice, 'that the appellation of parliament being given to the commons, and ſeparately from the lords, was entirely new and unprecedented. That this was ſo far from being the language of former times, that, though of late the commons took upon them to begin all money-bills, yet there was a time, when they were ſo inconſiderable, as to apply to the lords, to deſire them to provide money for the public ſervice. That, if, at this time, the lords ſuffered themſelves to be overlooked in this manner, they might come at laſt to be voted uſeleſs, as they had formerly been. And therefore, leſt any miſtake of this kind ſhould be attended with ſuch ill conſequence as to encourage evil miniſters hereafter to a total neglect of the houſe of peers, he was of opinion, that proper notice ſhould be taken of it immediately, inſtead of deferring the further conſideration of it for a month.' The earl of Scarborough ſaid, 'he did not deny, that the peers have a right to be adviſed with in all matters of importance, and to give their conſent to money-bills. But, in the caſe before them, it ſeemed needleſs to ſend the meſſage in queſtion to their houſe, becauſe their lordſhips had implicitly given their conſent to the augmenting the number of ſeamen, in their addreſs of thanks, wherein the augmentation was hinted at. As to what had been ſuggeſted, that formerly the commons applied to the lords to provide money for the public ſervice, the reaſon of it was, becauſe, at that time, none had any money to give but the lords, moſt of the lands being then in their hands; whereas ſince the reigns of Henry VII. and Henry VIII. the caſe is very much altered; and therefore they ought not to conſider, how things were formerly, but how they are at preſent, and ſo act as they find them.' After ſeveral other ſpeeches the affair was put off for a month, by 69 voices againſt 31. When the month was expired, it was again adjourned for a fortnight, and the houſe was moved, 'that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, repreſenting the fatal conſequences which muſt happen to this kingdom, when any advice ſhall be given to the crown, whereby the counſel and aſſiſtance of this houſe ſhall not be aſked, at the ſame time that the counſel and aſſiſtance of the houſe of commons ſhall be aſked, in matters which concern the peace and ſafety of this kingdom; and moſt earneſtly to beſeech his majeſty, that he will for the future diſcourage all ſuch counſels as ſhall tend, in ſo unwarrantable and dangerous a manner, to the deſtruction of the rights of this houſe.' But this addreſs was rejected.

[n] His debt was at firſt 95,256l. but he had delivered in, by South-ſea ſtoc, ſubſcriptions and other ſecurities, about half the debt, ſo the remainder was about 48,000l. His paternal eſtate was about 2000l. a year.

Among the bills paſſed this ſeſſions were theſe two: an act for building a bridge over the Thames, from the town of Fulham in Middleſex, to the town of Putney in Surry.

An act for preventing frivolous and vexatious arreſts. By this act, no perſon ſhall be held to ſpecial bail on any proceſs from a ſuperior court where the cauſe of action ſhall not amount to 10l. nor from any inferior court under 40s. In ſuch caſes the plantiff ſhall not arreſt the body of the defendant, but ſhall ſerve him perſonally with a copy of the proceſs.

The buſineſs of the ſeſſion being over, the king diſmiſſed the parliament with the following ſpeech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I cannot in juſtice put an end to this ſeſſion, without returning you my hearty thanks for the many inſtances you have given me of your duty and affection to my perſon and government, and of your zeal to maintain the honour and true intereſt of this kingdom.

'The ſpirit and reſolution you have ſhewn on this important occaſion, when our moſt valuable rights and privileges have been ſtruc at, are highly becoming the weight and authority of a Britiſh parliament: and the ſteps that have been taken abroad, in ſupport of the meaſures entered into againſt this nation, muſt convince every body of your wiſdom and prudence in endeavouring to put an early ſtop to the further progreſs of them. I hope the precautions, you have enabled me to take, will be ſufficient, in conjunction with my allies, to defeat the deſigns, which have been formed againſt us; and that the promoters of them, when they have fully weighed their own circumſtances, and better conſidered thoſe of the ſeveral powers united in defence of the tranquility and liberties of Europe, will find it there own intereſt to preſerve the peace, and think it moſt ſafe and prudent to deſiſt from their dangerous ſchemes.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'I return you my particular thanks for the ſupplies, which you have ſo chearfully and effectually raiſed; and you may be aſſured, that they ſhall be faithfully applied to the uſes, for which you intended them.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'The conſtant employment of my thoughts, and the moſt earneſt wiſhes of my heart, tend wholly to the ſecuring to my ſubjects their juſt rights and advantages, and to the preſerving to them, and to all Europe, the enjoyment of a ſafe and honourable peace. And I muſt not conclude, without giving you the ſtrongeſt aſſurances, that the particular confidence you have placed in me, ſhall be made uſe of in ſuch manner only, as may moſt effectually conduce to the attaining thoſe good and great purpoſes.'

The ſupplies, raiſed during this ſeſſion of parliament, were immediately employed in fitting out three different ſquadrons; one of ſeven men of war, deſigned for the Weſt-Indies, under the command of vice-admiral Hoſier; another of twelve or more ſhips of the line, for the Mediterranean, under the command of ſir John Jennings, admiral of the white; and a third, deſigned for the Baltic, under the command of ſir Charles Wager, vice-admiral of the red, and ſir George Walton, rear-admiral of the blue, conſiſting of twenty-one ſhips and two fire-ſhips.

The court of Great-Britain had evident proofs, that nothing could influence the emperor and king of Spain to terms of reaſon, but to ſhew a vigorus ſpirit againſt a very pernicious or ſuſpicious part of the treaty of Vienna. And as all appearances convinced the miniſtry, that nothing could ſo effectually guard againſt approaching evils, as the diſpatching ſufficient ſquadrons of ſhips to ſeveral places, they did with all poſſible diligence fit out the forementioned ſquadrons.

The ſquadron ſent to the Baltic was to prevent very great evils in thoſe parts, there being no room to doubt, that the czarina's real view was to go with a fleet to Stockholm, and, under a pretence of demanding the uſe of the ports, and the aſſiſtance of Sweden for the recovery of Sleſwick to the duke of Holſtein, actually to dethrone the king of Sweden, and make that nation dependent on Muſcovy. It was therefore judged of the utmoſt importance to prevent this. Accordingly, about the end of April, ſir Charles Wager, with his ſquadron, came to an anchor in the road of Copenhagen; and, on the 25th of that month, had an audience of the king of Denmark. On the 2d of May he ſailed to Stockholm, where, eight days after, he had an audience of the king of Sweden, being introduced by mr. Poyntz, the Britiſh envoy extraordinary. A ſquadron of Daniſh men of war having joined the Britiſh ſquadron, the united fleet became ſo formidable, that the court of Ruſſia thought proper to ſuſpend the fitting out their large ſhips, and only to equip ſome frigates; and the land-forces, which had been drawn together near Peterſburgh, in order to be put on board the Ruſſian fleet, were ſent to work on the Ludoga canal, and the fortifications at Cronſlot. That court was under the greateſt uneaſineſs, and immediately gave orders for reinforcing the garriſons of Wybourg, Cronſlot, Revel, and Riga. Mean while, ſir Charles Wager, having been joined by the Naſſau and Port-Mahon on the 20th of May, ſailed from Elſenal near Stockholm the 25th, and arrived, the 29th, near the iſland of Nargen, three leagues from Revel, and, the next morning, ſent an officer with a letter to lieutenant-general Wulcoffe, who commanded at Revel, and ordered the Port-Mahon to ſail to Cronſlot, having on board mr. Barnet, one of his lieutenants, by whom he ſent his majeſty's letter to the czarina, incloſed in a packet to admiral Apraxin.* In this letter, which was dated the 11th of April, his majeſty obſerved, 'that as the czarina's great preparations both by ſea and land for war, in a time of peace, could not fail of giving him, as well as his allies in thoſe parts, great and juſt cauſe to be alarmed; ſhe would not be ſurprized, that he had ſent a ſtrong ſquadron into the Baltic, to obviate any danger, that might enſue from ſo extraordinary an armament.' He laid before her the ſeveral inſtances he had given of a ſincere diſpoſition to eſtabliſh a firm and laſting friendſhip with the crown of Ruſſia; but that his intentions had been diſappointed by the delays of that court; and he expreſſed his ſurprize, that, while he was carrying on amicable negotiations, and had not given the leaſt provocations on his part, meaſures were taken at her court in favour of the pretender, and great encouragement to his adherents. 'After what (ſays he) we have now ſet forth, your majeſty will not be ſurprized, that we, being indiſpenſably obliged to provide for the ſecurity of our dominions, to perform our engagements with our allies, and to maintain the public tranquility in the North, which ſeems to be very much in danger from your majeſty's late preparations, and have thought it neceſſary to ſend a ſtrong fleet of our men of war into the Baltic, and that we have given orders to our admiral, who commands it, to endeavour to prevent freſh troubles in thoſe parts, by hindering your majeſty's ſhip from coming out, in caſe that you perſiſt in your reſolution to put your fleet to ſea, to execute the deſigns which you may have in view. But, as it is our firm intention to live in peace and friendſhip with your majeſty, we wiſh, from the bottom of our heart, that your majeſty, ſeriouſly reflecting upon the true intereſt of your ſubjects, would permit them to enjoy the bleſſings of that peace, which they purchaſed at the expence of ſo much blood and treaſure, under the conduct of his late majeſty; and that, rather than enter into meaſures, which muſt inevitably plunge Ruſſia into a war, and the whole north into confuſion, your majeſty would pleaſe to give your people and all mankind convincing proofs of your inclination for peace, and of your good diſpoſition to live in quiet with your neighbours.' The czarina, in her anſwer dated June 15, declared her ſurprize at not receiving the kings letter till the very inſtant the fleet appeared on her coaſts, and after it had caſt anchor before Revel, 'ſince it had been more agreeable to the cuſtom eſtabliſhed among ſovereigns, and more conſiſtent with the amity, that had ſo long ſubſiſted between her kingdoms and the crown of Great-Britain, had his majeſty thought fit to expoſtulate with her about the umbrage he might have conceived from her armament; and to expect her anſwer thereupon, before he advanced to ſo offenſive a ſtep. That then his majeſty might have been aſſured by her, that it was ſo far from her thoughts to diſturb the repoſe of the north, that, on the contrary, all her cares and attention were wholly bent on the ſecurity and preſervation of it, both for the time preſent, and time to come, as being more concerned than his majeſty, in preventing whatever might indanger that tranquility.' That, with regard to what was charged upon her, in relation to the pretender, it 'was a frivolous and falſe accuſation, made uſe of as it had heretofore been, as the main pretence for all the unkind ſteps taken againſt her.'

Sir Charles Wager remained in his ſtation near Revel till October, when, the year being ſo far advanced, and he having intelligence from Peterſburgh and Cronſlot, that the Ruſſian gallies were laid up in their winter harbour, and their fleet not in a condition to put to ſea, he ſailed from the bay of Revel for the coaſt of Denmark, and arrived at Copenhagen the ſame month. From thence, after a ſtay of a few days, he ſailed for England, where he ſafely arrived in November.

Sir John Jennings, with his ſquadron, which was furniſhed with a conſiderable number of land-forces and artillery, viſited the coaſts of Spain, and ſhut up the ports of that kingdom. His orders were to cruiſe between Cadiz and cape St. Vincent, to intercept the galleons, and to aſſiſt Gibraltar, in caſe of a ſiege, with the land-forces on board his fleet, and to annoy the enemy to the utmoſt. But he did no damage on the coaſt of Spain, and only cauſed alarms, and protected the trade of Great-Britain.

Vice-admiral Hoſier's ſquadron was inferior to thoſe of ſir Charles Wager and ſir John Jennings; but he was authorized to join to his fleet all the ſhips he could meet with in the Weſt-Indies; and his orders were to prevent the galleons from ſailing out of the Spaniſh ports there; or, if they ſhould come out, to ſeize them, and bring their cargoes untouched to England. He arrived at the Baſtimento's off Porto-Bello, in the beginning of June; but, ten days before his arrival, an advice-boat from Spain brought orders for putting on ſhore the money on board the galleons, ſaid to be twenty-ſix millions of pieces of eight, and ſending it bac to Panama.

Theſe meaſures were taken againſt Spain, in reſentment of the engagements, which that court had entered into with the court of Vienna, to the prejudice of Great-Britain, and the deſigns formed in favour of the pretender, by the inſtigation of the dukes of Ormond and Wharton, and earl Mariſchal, who were then at Madrid. But the duke de Ripperda, who had been the principal agent in forming and concluding the treaty of Vienna, and the author of the violent counſels againſt Great-Britain, was of a ſudden diſmiſſed, on the 14th of May, from all his employments, though allowed a penſion of 3000 piſtoles for his ſubſiſtence. The pretended cauſe of his diſgrace was the embezzlement of the finaces (of which he was ſuperintendant) to the value of four millions. The duke, upon his receiving the king of Spain's decree for diſmiſſing him from his poſts, went immediately to the houſe of monſieur Vandermeer, the Dutch ambaſſador; but, not thinking himſelf ſafe there, Vandermeer carried him in his coach to the houſe of colonel Stanhope, the Britiſh ambaſſador, whoſe protection he begged and obtained. The king being informed of this, cauſed the ambaſſador's houſe to be ſurrounded by two hundred grenadiers. The next day colonel Stanhope had an audience of the king, and gave him an account of what had happened in relation to the diſcarded miniſter, which the king did not ſeem to diſapprove; and the grenadiers were called off from his houſe, on a promiſe from him, that the duke de Ripperda's perſon ſhould be forth-coming; and ſixty guards were poſted in the ſtreets leading to colonel Stanhope's houſe, to take him, if he ſhould attempt to make his eſcape. But on the 25th of May, N. S. the king appointed don Lewis Cuellar, one of the alciades of his court, aſſiſted by don Francis Valanſa, adjutant-general of the life-guards, to enter colonel Stanhope's houſe, and take from thence the duke de Ripperda, and convey him to the caſtle of Segovia, with a ſufficient guard; which was done. But this violation of the law of nations, in forcibly entering the houſe of an ambaſſador, was juſtly complained of by the court of Great-Britain, who ordered the letters and papers, which paſſed between the miniſters and ambaſſadors of both courts upon this occaſion, and upon ſir John Jennings's coming with his fleet on the coaſt of Spain, to be publiſhed. Among theſe papers is a memorial of colonel Stanhope to the king of Spain, dated Sept. 24, 1726, in which he obſerves, that the king his maſter was ſurprized, that the king of Spain ſhould not know the reaſons, and be ſenſible of the neceſſity, which obliged his majeſty to ſend the fleet under ſir John Jennings to the coaſt of Spain; 'conſidering (ſays he) the engagements, into which ſome of the moſt conſiderable powers of Europe have of late entered, and of which his majeſty has complained ſo often and ſo loudly. The naval armaments and equipments, which have been made in moſt of the ports of Spain; the preparations of war, and the motions of a conſiderable number of Spaniſh troops towards that part of the coaſt, which lies neareſt and moſt convenient for executing an enterprize on his majeſty's dominions; the great hopes of the emiſſaries and adherents of the pretender, who have publicly boaſted of the aſſiſtance they ſhould receive from thoſe parts; the confidence they had in it, and which has appeared clearly in the pernicious and indiſcreet conduct of ſome among them, who have been lately received and favoured at Madrid: this, joined with the intrigues, which have been carried on with the Muſcovites, and the reaſons his majeſty has to ſuſpect the ill deſigns upon which the three ſhips were ſent laſt year from Peterſburgh to Cadiz, and thence to St. Andero; the knowledge his majeſty had laſt winter, by the avowal of the miniſter of Spain, that there was an offenſive alliance between the courts of Madrid and Vienna, and that, by one of the articles of that alliance, it was ſtipulated to uſe open force to get Gibraltar reſtored to the king of Spain, a place, which his majeſty poſſeſſes by virtue of ſo juſt a right: the great ſubſidies, which have been furniſhed to the imperial court, and which are not ſeen to be ſettled by an alliance, that has yet been made public; the notorious infractions, which the Spaniſh Guarda Coſtes have for a long time made, with reſpect to the commerce and navigation of his majeſty's ſubjects in the Weſt-Indies, infractions, which have been ſo often complained of without the leaſt appearance of ſatisfaction or reparation: theſe things, joined together, are ſufficient to exhibit clearly the reaſons, which have induced his majeſty to take the meaſures he judged proper, and to equip the ſeveral fleets, which have put to ſea; and his majeſty's ſubjects would have had juſt cauſe to complain, had not care been taken for the ſecurity of the kingdom, and of their rights and properties, which they ſaw threatened and in danger.'

In Auguſt, the ſtates-general ſigned their acceſſion to the treaty of Hanover, after having been diſſuaded by the imperial and Spaniſh miniſters not to do it, and preſſed to come into that of Vienna. Though the emperor had not ſucceeded with the ſtates, he found means to detach, in great meaſure, the king of Pruſſia from his engagements with the allies of Hanover. The conduct of his Pruſſian majeſty, in this inſtance, as a proteſtant and ſon-in-law of king George, could hardly be defended. It was thought he propoſed ſome extraordinary advantages from his deſertion of the allies of Hanover, and cloſing with thoſe of Vienna; one part of which advantages was probably to be ſupported by the emperor, in making ſome conqueſt upon the dominions of Hanover. However that be, he made a treaty with the emperor, which gave great jealouſy to the friends of the treaty of Hanover. By this treaty the king of Pruſſia engaged in a new contract, not very conſiſtent with the apprehenſions of the Hanover allies, of the emperor's power and project: ſince the king of Pruſſia was to guarantee the order of ſucceſſion in the hereditary dominions in the heirs female, in default of male iſſue; while on the other hand, the emperor obliged himſelf to uſe his endeavours to obtain from all thoſe, who had pretenſions to the duchies of Juliers and Bergues, a ceſſion of their rights in favour of his Pruſſian majeſty.

The treaty of Hanover was attended with the greateſt difficulties, and a prodigious but unavoidable expence. Of this Sweden was an inſtance. All the ſummer preſſing and repeated applications were made by the Britiſh and French miniſters at Stockholm, to induce the court of Sweden to accede to the treaty of Hanover. And no leſs pains were taken by the Ruſſian and Auſtrian miniſters, to procure his Swediſh majeſty's acceſſion to the treaty of Vienna. But that wiſe prince reſolved to leave the determination of ſo important an affair to the general dyet of the ſtates of Sweden. The Holſtein faction in Sweden were ſpirited in their oppoſition to this acceſſion, by count Freytag, the imperial ambaſſador, and the ambaſſador of Ruſſia; but that did not hinder the ſtates ſigning it, as well as the king of Sweden.

During theſe negotiations, Spain incenſed to the laſt degree, made great preparations for war. A camp of about twenty thouſand men was formed at St. Roch near Gibraltar, and all the neceſſaries for a ſiege were provided. Preparations were likewiſe made at ſea; four thouſand ſailors were landed; ſeveral men of war were come to Cadiz, and as many more, as could be, were bought. The pretence was, to rebuild the caſtle of Old Gibraltar, though ſome greater deſign was very viſible.

[1726-27] In theſe circumſtances the parliament of Great-Britain met, on the 17th of January. The king opened the ſeſſions with a very long, lively, and pathetic ſpeech, but, at the ſame time, extremely offenſive to the princes of whom mention was made. The ſpeech was as follows:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I acquainted you laſt year with the treaties of peace and commerce concluded between the emperor and the king of Spain. As that ſudden and unaccountable conjunction gave, at the firſt appearance, juſt grounds of jealouſy and apprehenſion to the neighbouring powers of Europe, and the ſubſequent proceedings and tranſactions in thoſe two courts, and the ſecret and offenſive alliences concluded between them about the ſame time, have laid the foundations of a moſt exorbitant and formidable power, and are ſo directly levelled againſt the moſt valuable and darling intereſts and privileges of this nation, that we muſt determine either tamely to ſubmit to the peremptory and unjuſt demands of the king of Spain in giving up Gibraltar, and patiently to acquieſce in the emperor's uſurped and extended exerciſe of trade and commerce, or muſt reſolve to be in a condition to do ourſelves juſtice, and to defend our undoubted rights againſt thoſe reciprocal engagements, entered into in defiance and violation of all the national faith and the moſt ſolemn treaties.

'I have likewiſe received information from different parts, on which I can intirely depend, that the placing the pretender upon the throne of this kingdom is one of the articles of the ſecret engagements: and if time ſhall evince, that the giving up the trade of this nation to one power, and Gibraltar and Port-Mahon to another, is made the price and reward of impoſing upon this kingdom a popiſh pretender: what an indignation muſt this raiſe in the breaſt of every proteſtant Briton!

'Nor were theſe fatal combinations confined to thoſe parts of the world alone, but they extended themſelves into Ruſſia; and, had not the deſigns of that court againſt ſome of their neighbours been prevented, by the ſeaſonable arrival of our fleet in thoſe ſeas, a way had been opened for invading thoſe kindoms, and giving a powerful aſſiſtance to any attempt to be made from other quarters.

'Such circumſtances would not ſuffer me and my allies, among whom there has been and is the moſt perfect harmony, union, and concert, to be idle ſpectators, and regardleſs of our own ſafety, and the common cauſe of Europe; for which purpoſe his moſt chriſtian majeſty has been at a great expence, this laſt year, in augmenting his forces; and the ſtates-general, ſenſible of the imminent danger, have not only acceded to the defenſive alliance concluded at Hanover, but have come to ſtrong and ſeaſonable reſolutions for an extraordinary augmentation of their forces both by ſea and land. The acceſſion of the crown of Sweden is in ſuch a forwardneſs, and the negotiations with the crown of Denmark are ſo far advanced, that we may reaſonably depend upon the ſucceſs and good effect of them.

'This ſhort view of the preſent poſture of affairs, will, I am confident, not only ſecure to me the ſupport and aſſiſtance of my parliament, in carrying on this great and neceſſary work, in conjunction with my allies, but juſtify the meaſures hitherto taken, and the expences already made.

'The confidence, you repoſed in me laſt year, has been made uſe of for the benefit of the public: and as the chief article of exceeding has by my equipping and ſending to ſea three conſiderable ſquadrons, fallen upon the head of the navy, I am perſuaded the neceſſity of the ſervices, and the ſecurity, advantage, and glory, that has accrued to this nation from thoſe ſquadrons, will ſufficiently ſpeak for themſelves, as long as both friends and foes, with joy and concern, confeſs they have ſeen and felt the effects of the naval power of Great-Britain.

'It is not to be wondered at, that the princes engaged in theſe enterprizes are very much diſturbed to ſee their projects rendered abortive. The king of Spain, impatient of the diſappointments he has met with, can no longer diſguiſe that enmity to us, which for ſome time he has only waited for a favourable opportunity to declare. He has now ordered his miniſter, reſiding here, to depart immediately from this country, leaving a memorial, that is little ſhort of a declaration of war, wherein he again demands and inſiſts upon the reſtitution of Gibraltar. He does not himſelf deny the offenſive alliance, nor his engagements to ſupport the Oſtend company. He makes my recalling thoſe ſquadrons, which his conduct has put me under a neceſſity of ſending to the Weſt-Indies, and the coaſt of Spain, the condition of any further correſpondence between the two crowns; and ſuppoſing the continuance of my fleets abroad to be actual hoſtilities, threatens to repel them with force, to the utmoſt of his power.

'But not content with theſe menaces, inſults and infractions of treaties, his catholic majeſty is now making preparations to attac and beſiege Gibraltar; and in order to carry on that ſervice, or to cover another deſign, has aſſembled a great body of troops in that neighbourhood. But as the preſent ſtate and condition of that garriſon, with the reinforcement I have ordered thither, give me little cauſe to apprehend, or my enemies to hope for ſucceſs in that undertaking, the certain and undoubted intelligence I have, that it is now reſolved to attempt an invaſion upon theſe kingdoms in favour of the pretender, by an imbarkation from the coaſts of Spain, gives me reaſon to believe, that, though the ſiege of Gibraltar may probably be undertaken, the public, avowed, and immenſe preparations made for that purpoſe are chiefly calculated to amuſe the world and to diſguiſe the intended invaſion, which I am ſurely informed has been for ſome time agreed to be the firſt ſtep and beginning of the long premeditated rupture.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'Theſe conſiderations muſt awaken in you all ſuch a ſenſe of our common, and immediate danger, as will, I doubt not, inſpire you with a zeal and chearfulneſs in raiſing the ſupplies neceſſary for the defence of your country, and for making good our engagements with our allies.

'I received too much ſatisfaction from the happineſs of my people in their full enjoyment and future proſpect of peace, eaſe, and proſperity, not to be ſenſibly affected with theſe new convulſions, and the unavoidable neceſſity I am under of aſking larger ſupplies of my people, and of deſiring to be enabled to make ſuch an augmentation of my forces by ſea and land, as the preſent exigency of my affairs requires.

'I will order the proper eſtimates to be laid before you, and ſuch treaties as I have made with foreign princes for the hire of foreign troops: and as the expence, I was laſt year in a particular manner intruſted to make, has amounted to no inconſiderable ſum, and the public utility may again require the like ſervices to be performed, I hope you will again repoſe the ſame truſt and confidence in me.

'It is with great pleaſure that I ſee the time ſo near approaching, when ſuch a conſiderable addition will be made to the ſinking fund. Let all, that wiſh well to the peace and quiet of my government, have the ſatisfaction to ſee, that our preſent neceſſities ſhall make no interruption in the progreſs of that deſirable work of gradually diſcharging the national debt. I hope therefore you will make a proviſion for the immediate application of the produce of the ſinking fund to the uſes for which it was ſo wiſely contrived, and to which it ſtands now appropriated.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I have had no thoughts of making any acquiſition to any part of my dominions. My whole care and concern has been to preſerve and maintain the undoubted rights and privileges of my people; and therefore all my meaſures have been preventive and defenſive. But, ſuch endeavours being now rendered impracticable, vigorous reſolutions, and a ſpeedy execution of them, can alone put an effectual end to the dangers that ſurround us. However hazardous and deſperate the enterprizes formed againſt us may appear to be, your being aſſured that they are reſolved upon, will, I am perſuaded, be ſufficient to prevail upon you, to put yourſelves in a condition to reſiſt and defeat them.

'If preſerving a due balance of power in Europe; if defending the poſſeſſions of the crown of Great-Britain, of infinite advantage and ſecurity to our trade and commerce; if ſupporting that trade and commerce againſt dangerous and unlawful incroachments; and if the preſent eſtabliſhment, the religion, liberties, and properties of a proteſtant people, are any longer conſiderations worthy of the care and attention of a Britiſh parliament, I need ſay no more to incite my loyal and faithful houſes of parliament to exert themſelves in the defence of all that is dear and valuable to them.'

The zeal and indignation raiſed by this ſpeech was ſo great, that in the addreſſes of thanks, words were wanted to expreſs the deep reſentment at the inſults offered the king, at the invaſions of the moſt valuable branches of trade, at the deſigns formed againſt the nation, and to applaud the wiſe meaſures taken by the king, to prevent the deſtructive deſigns againſt the liberties of Europe. However, when the addreſs was moved for in the houſe of commons, it was oppoſed by mr. Pulteney and others. They urged, 'that the matter of peace and war is of the greateſt weight that can fall under their conſideration: that, as his majeſty's ſpeech contained many points of the higheſt moment and importance, ſo no doubt his majeſty, in his great wiſdom and goodneſs towards his people, expected, on this occaſion, not only the ſupport, but likewiſe the advice of that houſe: that in order thereto, they ought maturely to deliberate on thoſe ſeveral heads, which could not be done, before ſeveral papers were communicated to them, that ſeemed abſolutely neceſſary to ſtate ſome facts relating to thoſe weighty matters: that the motion, as it was drawn up, implied an approbation of meaſures taken to prevent dangers; which ſeemed prepoſterous, before they new either what thoſe meaſures were, or whether thoſe dangers were real: that therefore they ought, for the preſent to content themſelves with returning his majeſty the moſt humble thanks of the houſe, for his moſt gracious ſpeech, with aſſurances of ſupporting his majeſty in all juſt and neceſſary meaſures; and appoint a day for taking the ſpeech into conſideration.' To this it was anſwered in general, 'that delays were often dangerous, and might be fatal in the preſent ſituation of affairs, which required vigorous and ſpeedy reſolutions, both for the encouragement of our friends, and the perfecting ſome alliances, that were already in great forwardneſs, and for the diſcouragement of our enemies, who had already blocked up Gibraltar, and threatened it with a ſiege: that the meaſures, that had been taken, were but a conſequence of the laſt year's reſolution, which the houſe had come to, after a full examination and mature conſideration of the ſtate of affairs, then laid before both houſes by his majeſty: but that, however ſuch an addreſs, as was propoſed, did not preclude a further enquiry into thoſe matters.' As the promiſe of reſtoring Gibraltar was mentioned in ſome of the ſpeeches, ſir Robert Walpole ſaid, 'that, ſuch a promiſe not having been made, while he had the honour to be in the adminiſtration, he could ſay nothing to it: that, if ſuch a promiſe was ever made, he durſt aver, that it was conditional, and made void and invalid by the king of Spain's refuſing to comply with the conditions on which it was made; and that, whenever the performance of that promiſe was mentioned to him, as inſiſted on by the king of Spain, he always delivered it at his fixed and poſitive opinion, That Gibraltar could not be given up without the conſent of parliament.' After the debate, the addreſs was carried by 251 againſt 81.

The commons, purſuant to the king's deſire in his ſpeech, applied themſelves to the affair of the ſupplies. It was unanimouſly reſolved to grant 20,000 ſeamen, and to augment the land-forces to 26,383 men. To defray the expence of the fleet and army, ſir Robert Walpole propoſed a tax of four ſhillings in the pound on land. This was oppoſed by ſome members who alledged, That it was more eligible to apply the produce of the ſinking fund towards the preſent occaſion; but the land-tax was voted. [p]

The warmeſt debate this ſeſſion was in the houſe of lords, on the 24th of January, all the peers in London having been ſummoned to attend. In a grand committee, of which the lord de la War was chairman, the clerk was directed to read the titles of the papers that had been laid before the houſe, conſiſting chiefly of letters and memorials between the miniſters of Great-Britain, France, and Spain, and the act of acceſſion of the ſtates to the Hanover treaty. This done, the debate was opened by the lord Bathurſt, whoſe ſpeech, and the lord Townſhend's anſwer, were as follow: the lord Bathurſt began with taking notice, 'with what caution and circumſpection the ſtates-general had acted in this whole affair. That they had not fully and intirely acceded to the treaty of Hanover, ſince they had formally and expreſsly excuſed and diſcharged themſelves from the general guarantee of the treaties of Weſtphalia and Oliva, in which, they ſaid, they were never engaged. And, as to the buſineſs of Thorn, they had only promiſed to employ their friendly offices for obtaining a reaſonable ſatisfaction. So that they acceded only upon account of the 5th and 6th articles of the treaty of Munſter, for preſerving and maintaining their rights with reſpect to commerce; whereas, by the treaty of Hanover, Great-Britain and France ſtood engaged to guarantee to the Dutch, not only the 5th and 6th articles of the peace of Weſtphalia, but likewiſe the barrier treaty, and the treaty of Oliva, in favour of the proteſtants of Germany. And thus, in ſhort, the Dutch having engaged themſelves to nothing, what they had done, did not deſerve the name of acceſſion, the rather becauſe they had made it an expreſs condition, that their act of acceſſion ſhould be approved and ratified by the king of Great-Britain, the moſt chriſtian king, and the king of Pruſſia. But, though this laſt potentate was one of the principal contractors in the treaty of Hanover, yet, no mention being now made of him, he could not tell what to make of it. That it ſeems his miniſter had refuſed ſigning the act of acceſſion, propably upon account of the Dutch excuſing themſelves from the general guarantee. But, let his reaſons for receding from his engagements be what they would, his example might be of dangerous conſequence; for by a letter from the duke de Bournonville, the Spaniſh miniſter at Vienna, it appeared, that they were not without hopes at the imperial court, that France might thereby think herſelf diſengaged from the Hanover alliance; in which event Great-Britain alone muſt bear the burthen of an expenſive war with two of the greateſt potentates in Europe. That, the Dutch receiving far greater advantages than Great-Britain, from the Eaſt-India trade, and conſequently being more concerned than we in the ſuppreſſion of the Oſtend company, they ought, at leaſt, to bear an equal ſhare with us in the expences of this war, and guarantee to us the poſſeſſion of Gibraltar, in the ſame manner as Great-Britain guarantees to them their barrier. That, after all, he did not ſee any juſt reaſon for a rupture with Spain. That indeed the duke de Ripperda might have dropped ſome indecent and indiſcreet expreſſions; but he was known to be a hot-headed man; and princes have a right to diſavow the indiſcretions of their miniſters, which the king of Spain had done in a moſt ſolemn manner, with relation to Ripperda. That it was well known, that violent miniſters do many unaccountable things. And, if their idle talk and fooliſh expreſſions were a juſt foundation for war, nations would ever be at daggers drawing. That, for ſome time paſt, the emperor had been treated here very cavalierly by ſome perſons; and that, in the memorial the marquis de Pozzobueno left behind him, at his departure, it was ſuggeſted, That the violent ſtate, to which affairs are now reduced, is owing to the miniſters of England. That, in the ſame memorial, mention is made of a poſitive promiſe made by the king of Great-Britain for the reſtitution of Gibraltar; which could not be ſuppoſed to be ſaid without any foundation: and therefore it would be highly neceſſary to enquire, whether, in reality, ſuch a promiſe was ever made; and whether any thing like it was mentioned in the treaty concluded at Madrid? That, let that matter ſtand how it would, all poſſible methods of an amicable accommodation ought, in his opinion, to be tried before they engaged in a war, which in our preſent circumſtances, might be attended with very dangerous conſequences. That the nation is loaded with a debt of above fifty millions. But, though they are told of a ſinking fund applied to the gradual diſcharge of that heavy burden, yet it was more to be wiſhed than expected, that the operation of that wiſe contrivance ſhould ſuffer no interruption by the exigences inſeparable from a war. That one of our beſt mathematicians has foretold, that, if ever England raiſes above five millions in a year, it will infallibly be exhauſted and ruined in a few years. Now if, at this juncture, we ſhould enter upon a war, and not meddle with the ſinking fund, according to the ſcheme of thoſe in adminiſtration, they muſt be obliged to raiſe, at leaſt, ſeven millions a year upon the people of England; the conſequence of which was obvious and glaring to any one, who admitted the principle of that mathematician. That, in ſome of the papers laid before the houſe, mention was made of great ſums of money diſtributed in divers places, to bring ſome meaſures to bear. That, for his own part, he had touched neither Spaniſh nor Engliſh gold. He was neither a Spaniard, nor a Frenchman, but a true Engliſhman, and, as long as he had the honour to ſit in that houſe, he would ſpeak and act for the good of his country. That therefore he would ſum up all he had ſaid, with earneſtly deſiring their lordſhips ſeriouſly to conſider the matter before them, which was of the laſt conſequence and importance to the whole nation. What (ſaid he) can we get by a war, if it be a ſucceſsful one? I will ſay it in one word, Nothing. What can we loſe, if it be unproſperous? I will ſay in one word, in a ſyllable, All.'

This ſpeech was anſwered by the lord Townſhend, who ſaid, 'that the treaty of Hanover, being purely defenſive, had made no alteration in the treaties ſubſiſting before, either between the contracting powers, or other princes and ſtates. That the true aim and intention of this alliance was a reciprocal guarantee for the protecting and maintaining the dominions and countries, both in and out of Europe, whereof each of the allies was actually poſſeſſed at the time of the ſigning this alliance. So that, by acceding thereto, the crowns of Great-Britain and France became guarantees of the 5th and 6th articles of the treaty of Munſter, by which the Dutch are intitled to excluſive rights and privileges of trade in the Eaſt-Indies. But that this gurantee was reciprocal between Great-Britain and the ſtates-general, ſince, by the treaty of 1667, Spain had granted to England the ſame rights and privileges, which the Dutch enjoyed by the 5th and 6th articles of the treaty of Weſtphalia. That therefore the ſuppreſſing of the Oſtend company, which manifeſtly invaded thoſe excluſive rights and privileges, was become a common cauſe between us and the Dutch. That our concern therein is almoſt equal to theirs; ſince our Eaſt-India trade brings about 300,000l. a year into the cuſtoms; which being part of the general mortgage, if ſo conſiderable a branch of trade ſhould be loſt, that yearly ſum would be taken from the ſinking fund. That by former treaties Great-Britain was guarantee to the Dutch for their barrier in the Netherlands as reciprocally, by the ſame treaties, they were guarantees to Great-Britain for the proteſtant ſucceſſion. So that, in thoſe reſpects, we ſtood no more engaged to them, than they to us. That, indeed, by their act of acceſſion to the Hanover alliance, the ſtates-general exempt themſelves from the general guarantee of the treaties of Weſtphalia, and Oliva, to whtch they never ſtood engaged; but, nevertheleſs, by the ſame act, they engage themſelves to employ, jointly with Great-Britain and France, their friendly offices for obtaining a reaſonable ſatisfaction and reparation as to the infractions, which might have been made in the treaty of Oliva; which is as much as the contracting powers have engaged themſelves to be the firſt ſecret article of the treaty of Hanover, and is indeed as little, as the proteſtant potentates could do, in commiſeration of the ſeverities lately exerciſed againſt the proteſtants of Thorn. That as to the idle talk and indecent expreſſions of duke de Repperda, they were not alledged as a juſt foundation for a rupture with Spain, but only as pregnant and corroborating indication of an offenſive alliance between that prince and the emperor, of which there were ſuch convincing proofs as left no room to doubt it. That, as to the ſecret article of that alliance in favour of the pretender, his majeſty had received from ſeveral parts ſuch poſitive and concurring informations, that, if the ſafety of the ſtate permitted to lay thoſe adviſes before the houſe, they would no more queſtion the certainty of ſuch article, than if they had been preſent at the ſigning of it. But he hoped that illuſtrious aſſembly would not think any of his majeſty's ſervants, who had the honour to ſit among them, ſo audatious, as to tell them downright untruths, or to preſume to impoſe upon their lordſhips, by alledging facts of ſo geat importance, without ſufficient vouchers. That, as to the other articles of the ſecret offenſive alliance, relating to the ſupporting of the Oſtend company, and the reſtitution of Gibraltar, the king of Spain and his miniſters were ſo far from denying them, that, on the contrary, they did not ſcruple publicly to avow and juſtify them. That therefore his majeſty could not, in prudence, but take early and proper meaſures to oppoſe an alliance, ſo directly levelled againſt his crown and dignity, and invaſive of the moſt valuable rights and privileges acquired to his ſubjects by the moſt ſolemn treaties. That, at the ſame time, notwithſtanding theſe high provocations, his majeſty ſhewed his inclination and diſpoſition to an amicable accommodation; and with this view, it was intimated to the courts of Vienna and Madrid, that if the emperor would remove the Oſtend company to Trieſte, or any other place in his dominions, which did not heretofore belong to the Spaniſh monarchy, Great-Britain would quietly acquieſce. But inſtead of accepting this propoſal, thoſe two courts not only ſeemed reſolved to ſupport the Oſtend trade, but Spain, in the memorial lately preſented by the marquis de Pozzobueno inſiſted on the ſpeedy reſtitution of Gibraltar, by virtue of a pretended poſitive promiſe, that exiſts no where; which put his majeſty and the whole nation under the neceſſity of a vigorous ſelf-defence.'

After theſe and ſeveral other ſpeeches, particularly by the lord Bingley, who was anſwered by the lord Carteret, it was reſolved (by 98 againſt 25) that it fully appears to this committee, upon conſideration of his majeſty's ſpeech, and the letters and memorials laid before the houſe, by his majeſty's order, That the meaſures his majeſty had thought fit to take, were honourable, juſt, and neceſſary, for preventing the execution of the dangerous engagements, entered into in favour of the pretender; for preſerving the dominions belonging to the crown of Great-Britain, by ſolemn treaties, and, particularly, thoſe of Gibraltar, and the iſland of Minorca; and for maintaining to his people their moſt valuable rights and privileges of commerce, and the peace and tranquility of Europe.'

Againſt this reſolution, a proteſt was entered by ſeventeen lords; and the lord Lechmere moved for an addreſs to the king, 'to make new and preſſing inſtances with his Pruſſian majeſty, and his other allies, in ſuch manner as the preſent critical and dangerous juncture requires.' But this motion was rejected, which occaſioned another proteſt.

Mean time the commons addreſſed the king for the acceſſion of the ſtates to the treaty of Hanover, and for copies of the memorials, letters, anſwers between the Britiſh miniſters and the courts of Vienna and Madrid. Some puſhed matters farther, and moved for a copy of the memorial preſented by mr. Pointz to the king of Sweden, the 4th of June 1726, and alſo for the ſecret offenſive article between the emperor and the king of Spain; but both theſe motions were rejected. As the court of Spain had perſiſted in the reſtitution of Gibraltar, purſuant to a promiſe made to that purpoſe, it was moved for an addreſs for the declaration,* letters, or engagements, which, in the marquis de Pozzobueno's letter to the duke of Newcaſtle, of the 21ſt of December laſt, is aſſerted to be a poſitive promiſe. ¶

¶ The paragraph in the letter relating to Gibraltar was as follows:

'But as to what was then declared to mr. Stanhope by word of mouth, and in writing, that the good correſpondence and friendſhip with England depended abſolutely on the ſpeedy reſtitution of Gibraltar; I cannot avoid confirming it anew to your excellency, by order from the king my maſter, as a declaration moſt juſtly founded, inſiſting on that reſtitution, after the king of Great-Britain, had on this point given, as he did give, a poſitive promiſe; beſides that, on the other hand, the ceſſion, which his majeſty made precedently of that place, is become null, becauſe of the infractions made in the conditions on which it was permitted that the Engliſh garriſon

This motion was ſupported by mr. Pulteney, and oppoſed by ſir Robert Walpole, who did not diſown, 'that ſuch a promiſe might indeed have been made in a former adminiſtration; but this he was ſure of, that, if there was ſuch a promiſe, it was upon certain conditions which not having been performed within the limited time, it was thereby become invalid: and as for the declaration, or letter, the communication of which was inſiſted on, the ſame was altogether impracticable and unprecedented, the private letters of princes being almoſt as ſacred as their very perſons.' After a debate, this motion was alſo rejected by a majority of 204 againſt 97. After this, the lord Morpeth moved 'for an addreſs for copies of all ſuch memorials or repreſentations to his majeſty from the crowns of Sweden and Denmark, as did induce him to ſend the ſquadron the laſt year into the Baltic.' This motion was oppoſed by mr. Horace Walpole, who, in a long ſpeech, juſtified all the ſteps that had been taken by Great-Britain, ſince his majeſty's acceſſion (particularly from the opening of the congreſs at Cambray) to preſerve the balance of power, the peace of Europe, and the tranquility of the north; and with this laſt view to prevent the czarina's deſigns againſt Sweden and Denmark, in favour of the duke of Holſtein. mr. William Pulteney anſwered his ſpeech; but, the queſtion being put upon the lord Morpeth's motion, it paſſed in the negative by a majority of 196 voices againſt 79.

In the account how the money given for the ſervice of the laſt year was diſpoſed of, there was an article of the ſum of 125,000l. charged in general terms, as iſſued out for other engagements and expences, over and above ſuch as were therein ſpecified. Upon this it was reſolved to addreſs the king for an account of the diſpoſition of that money; in anſwer to which the houſe was told, 'that the ſum mentioned in the addreſs was iſſued and diſburſed, purſuant to the power given to his majeſty by parliament, for neceſſary ſervices and engagements, of the utmoſt importance to the trade and navigation of this kingdom, and the tranquility of Europe; and which require the greateſt ſecrecy, and therefore a particular account of the diſtribution of it cannot poſſibly be given, without a manifeſt prejudice to the public.'

Mr Pulteney, not ſatisfied with this anſwer, ſaid, 'that, when the commons, in the laſt ſeſſion, reſolved to make good all ſuch expences, as ſhould be for the ſecurity of trade and navigation, and for the preſervation of the peace of Europe, they did not diveſt themſelves of their undoubted right of being acquainted with the diſpoſition of public money: that, if they gave up ſo eſſential a right, that houſe would become altogether uſeleſs, to ſerve only blindly to approve of and regiſter the acts and deeds of the miniſters; that he did not, in the leaſt, doubt the diſburſement of the 125,000l. for neceſſary ſervices: but that, if they were ſatisfied with ſuch a general account, the ſame might in future reigns prove a very dangerous precedent, and ſerve to cover embezzlements of the public treaſure.' Then he moved for a further addreſs for an account of that ſum. But the queſtion was carried againſt addreſſing, by 235 againſt 110; and inſtead of it, it was reſolved without a diviſion, 'that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to return his majeſty the thanks of this houſe, for his great care and wiſdom, in taking ſuch ſteps, and entering into ſuch engagements, as his majeſty thought would beſt conduce to the ſecuring of the trade and navigation of this kingdom, and to the preſervation of the peace of Europe; and to aſſure his majeſty, that this houſe, placing an entire confidence in his majeſty's goodneſs and regard for the true intereſt of his people, will ſtand by and ſupport his majeſty in all ſuch further meaſures, as his majeſty ſhall find neceſſary and expedient for preventing a rupture for the honour and advantage of theſe kingdoms.'

The king's ſpeech was examined in other places as well as in the parliament. The court of Vienna took great offence, and paſſed ſevere cenſures upon it. The imperial reſident at London was ordered to preſent a bold memorial to the king, and afterwards to publiſh it to the whole nation, as an appeal to the people againſt their ſovereign. With it was publiſhed count Zinzendorff's letter to Palms, which was ſtill more injurious than the memorial.[r]

The king had the ſatisfaction to ſee this memorial highly reſented by the parliament. Both houſes joined in an addreſs, expreſſing their indignation at the affront offered to his majeſty, by the memorial of mr. Palms, and at his inſolence in diſperſing the ſame throughout the kingdom: aſſuring, that this audacious manner of appealing to the people, and turning a memorial into a ſeditious libel, was a proceeding that created in them the utmoſt abhorrence and deteſtation.

'The endeavouring (ſays the addreſs) to inſtil into the minds of any of your faithful ſubjects the leaſt diſtruſt or diffidence in your majeſty's moſt ſacred royal word, or to ſhould remain in poſſeſſion of Gibraltar; ſeeing that, contrary to all the proteſtations made, they have not only extended their fortifications, by exceeding the limits preſcribed and ſtipulated, but what is more, contrary to the expreſs and literal tenor of the treaties, they receive and admit the Jews and Moors, in the ſame manner as the Spaniards, and other nations confounded and mixed, contrary to our holy religion; not to mention the frauds and continual contrabands which are carried on there, to the prejudice of his majeſty's revenues.'

Moſt Serene and Potent King,

'As ſoon as the ſpeech, made by your majeſty to the parliament of Great-Britain now aſſembled, came to the knowledge of his imperial and catholic majeſty, my moſt gracious maſter, he was ſtruc with the utmoſt aſtoniſhment, that your majeſty could ſuffer yourſelf to be prevailed upon to declare from the royal throne, to that moſt renowned nation, in a manner hitherto unheard-of, as certain and undoubted facts, ſeveral things, ſome of which are ſtrained in that ſpeech to a wrong ſenſe, ſome are intirely diſtant from the intentions of his imperial and catholic majeſty; and laſtly (which affect much more ſenſibly than all the reſt) ſome things abſolutely void of all foundation.

For as to what regards the peace, concluded at Vienna, with the moſt ſerene king of Spain, who can forbear being aſtoniſhed, that this very peace, which is built on the quadruple alliance, ſigned at London, and other treaties contracted with your majeſty, as its ſolid foundation; and, for the obtaining of which peace, your majeſty, together with your allies, waged ſo bloody, ſo long, and ſo glorious a war, and took yourſelf ſo much pains to procure, ſhould now be alledged by your majeſty as a juſt ground of complaint, and ſhould be made uſe of as a pretence for theſe things, which hitherto your miniſters have been doing in all parts, to the great detriment of the emperor and the empire, and the public tranquility, and ſhould be repreſented by your majeſty to the Britiſh nation, with ſo much animoſity againſt the emperor and king of Spain, as a violation of treaties.

After complaining of the peace made at Vienna, complaint is likewiſe made of the treaty of commerce entered into with Spain, which is calculated to promote the mutual and lawful advantages of the ſubjects of both parties, which is agreeable to the law of nations, and to the cuſtoms of all people in amity with each other; which can in no reſpect be of any prejudice to the Britiſh nation, whether we regard the ſituation of the countries, or the particular nature of the trade, and which is not in the leaſt repugnant to the treaties made with Great-Britain. So that, if this treaty be conſidered with a mind free from prejudice, and from all deſign of inflaming the nation, there will remain no pretence to ſay, that this treaty can be grievous or hurtful to a nation for which his imperial majeſty has the greateſt affection and eſteem, and whoſe glorious exploits and important ſuccours no time will efface out of his memory.

The other head of complaint, which contains ſuch things as are void of all foundation, relates principally to that imaginary alliance, which in the ſpeech is called offenſive, and is there ſuppoſed to have been made againſt your majeſty, between the emperor and king of Spain. But it will not only appear how groundleſs and frivolous this ſuppoſition is, from the offer lately made by his imperial and catholic majeſty, of entering into a convention, De ſe mutuo non Offendendo, but will be entirely refuted by the conſideration of the tenor of the treaty of alliance and friendſhip itſelf made with the crown of Spain, and communicated in its whole extent to your majeſty when it was proper; from the words of which, whether the leaſt ſhadow or appearance of an offenſive alliance can be drawn, is ſubmitted to the judgment of the whole world.

Another part of the complaint relates to the ſecret articles made in favour of the pretender, whereof your majeſty aſſerts that you have certain and undoubted informations, by which articles it ſhould have been agreed to ſet the pretender on the throne of Great-Britain. With what view, on what motive, and to what purpoſe, theſe informations, founded on the falſeſt reports, were repreſented to the people of Great-Britain, is not only eaſy to be underſtood by his imperial catholic majeſty, but is obvious to the meaneſt capacity. But ſince the inviolable dignity and honour of ſuch great princes cannot ſuffer, that aſſertions of this nature, intirely unſupported by truth, ſhould be advanced from the royal throne to the whole nation, and to all mankind; his ſacred imperial and catholic majeſty has expreſsly commanded me, that I ſhould declare to your majeſty, and to the whole kingdom of Great-Britain, how highly he thinks himſelf affronted thereby, ſolemnly affirming, upon his imperial word, that there exiſts no ſecret article nor convention whatſoever, which contains, or can tend to prove the leaſt tittle of what has been alledged.

But that the ſecret deſigns, which lie concealed under a conduct till this time unheard of, may more manifeſtly appear, it muſt be obſerved, that the time is purpoſely taken for doing this, when a negotiation is on foot at Paris, for compoſing the differences which have ariſen without any fault of his imperial and catholic majeſty; which negotiation ſufficiently ſhews how much his imperial and catholic majeſty is at all times inclined to peace, and to the religious obſervation of his treaties.

As to what is ſaid of Gibraltar, and concerning the ſiege thereof, under which in the ſpeech it is inſinuated, as if ſome other deſign was concealed; the hoſtilities notoriouſly committed in the Indies, and elſwhere, againſt the king of Spain, in violation of treaties, ſeem to have given a very juſt occaſion to the king of Spain for attempting that ſiege. But, as to the intentions and engagements of the emperor upon that article, it is eaſy to ſee what they are, by the treaty above-mentioned, which has been communicated.

As to what is ſaid in the laſt place, concerning the Oſtend trade, which the goodneſs of the catholic king induced him to favour (being bound by no treaty) after he had been apprized of the juſt reaſons for the eſtabliſhment of it, various expedients for a compoſition have been propoſed, not only at the Hague, but even lately at Paris, leſt this harmleſs method of providing for the ſecurity of the barrier ſhould prove an obſtacle to the common friendſhip of neighbouring powers.

Which things being thus, the injury offered to truth, the honour and dignity of his ſacred imperial and catholic majeſty require, that they ſhould be expoſed to your majeſty, to the kingdom of Great-Britain, and to the whole world. And his ſacred imperial majeſty demands that reparation which is due to him by all manner of right, for the great injuries which have been done him by theſe many imputations.'

make a diſtinction between your majeſty and your people, is an attempt as vain as preſumptuous. If time has not effaced the memory of the glorious exploits, and important ſuccours (confeſſed to have been received from Great-Britain) gratitude, affection, and eſteem for this nation, will be beſt manifeſted, by doing honour to the king, whom the people honour, and juſtice to the people, whoſe rights and privileges the beſt of kings is now defending, againſt the invaſions and incroachments made upon them.' Beſides this addreſs, the lord Townſhend ſent a letter in the king's name to the emperor's reſident, ordering him forthwith to depart the kingdom.

About the ſame time monſieur de Chavigny, the French miniſter at the general diet of Ratiſbon, preſented a declaration to the diet, affirming that the preparations, which were making in France, were only for the preſervation of peace: that the guarantee of the treaty of Munſter, in favour of the ſtates, did not any way concern the Germanic body: that, far from deſigning to invade the territories of Germany, the king of France on the contrary would exert himſelf to preſerve their rights and privileges: that the report, as if his ambaſſador at the port had ſollicited the Turks to come to reſolutions againſt the peace of the empire, was a calumny: that he would faithfully obſerve the treaty of Weſtphalia: and hoped for a ſuitable return by the like ſentiments and diſpoſitions.

The imperial commiſſioners at the diet were highly offended at this declaration, which was not regiſtered according to cuſtom, and they publiſhed a few days after an imperial decree, full of invectives againſt the ſteps taken by the courts of Great-Britain and France, particularly againſt his Britannic majeſty's ſpeech to his parliament. Mr Le Heup, the Britiſh miniſter at Ratiſbon, delivered the next day to the diet a declaration of the ſame import with Chavigny's, which raiſed a great ferment among the imperialiſts, who loudly complained, 'that this ſecond declaration was manifeſtly intended as a perſonal inſult to his imperial majeſty, ſince it was preſented in open defiance of his decree againſt the firſt.' But to this it was anſwered, in behalf of the Britiſh miniſter, 'that he was not to take any public notice of his imperial majeſty's decree; and that ſuch decrees, in what form or ſtile ſoever, cannot divert or interrupt foreign miniſters in the exerciſe of their functions, directed to the ſtates of the empire, and not to the emperor; nor in the execution of the orders they may, at any time, receive from their reſpective maſters.' The imperial miniſters at Ratiſbon made alſo a terrible outcry againſt an expreſſion in the Engliſh and French envoy's memorials, wherein they call the charge againſt the kings their maſters, as if they had endeavoured to excite the Ottoman port againſt the emperor, by no ſofter a name than that of calumny; which was ſo warmly reſented, that the imperialiſts gave out, there could be no reconciliation between the emperor and the king of Great-Britain, till ſatisfaction was made for that affront.

The king at this time had the ſatisfaction of hearing the king of Sweden's acceſſion to the treaty of Hanover. This acceſſion was ſigned the 14th of March, at Stockholm. The king of Sweden was to furniſh, when the caſe of the alliance ſhould happen, three thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe: his guarantee was not to reach beyond the limits of Europe; the ſtipulated troops were not to be employed in Italy or Spain: his engagement was only with Great-Britain and France. The main point was the ſecret article, by virtue of which the two kings, to ſhew their friendſhip to his Swediſh majeſty, were to pay at Hamburgh, Amſterdam, or London, as Sweden ſhould direct, the ſum of 50,000l. ſterling for three years, or the value thereof, according to the exchange, in half-yearly payments. In return for this mark of their friendſhip, the king of Sweden was to hold in readineſs another body of 7,000 foot, and 3,000 horſe to be employed where the caſes of the alliance ſhould render it neceſſary. Provided however, that, when their Britannic and moſt chriſtian majeſties ſhould require the ſervice of theſe 10,000 men, they ſhould be in their pay, and liable to be recalled when Sweden ſhould be in any real or imminent danger.

The king of Denmark did not accede in form to the treaty of Hanover, but ſigned an alliance the 16th of April. The king of Denmark promiſed to keep on foot 24,000 men, ready to march upon the firſt advice of the motion of the Muſcovites, or of any other troops that ſhould come to attack Sleſwick, and diſturb the peace of Lower Saxony: the French king promiſed to pay to his Daniſh majeſty 350,000 rix-dollars for four years, payable quarterly at Hamburgh. As ſoon as the Daniſh army ſhould march, the king of France was to take 12,000 men into his pay: his Britannic majeſty was to hold in readineſs 12,000 men to join the 24,000 Danes, when they began to march and to ſend a ſquadron of ſhips to cover the Daniſh coaſts upon the firſt advice of the motions of the Muſcovite fleet. The French king was to hold in readineſs at leaſt 30,000 men to march or make diverſions where it ſhoud be needful, and his Britannic majeſty engaged to have likewiſe in readineſs another body of at leaſt 12,000 men for the ſame purpoſes. If the king of Pruſſia ſhould be attacked for refuſing paſſage to the Muſcovites, the contracting kings were to join their armies in his defence. By the ſecret articles, the king of Denmark was not to diſpoſe of any troops contrary to the intereſt of the two kings. If the French king ſhould deſire to employ the 12,000 men in his pay, for affairs not relating to Denmark, but only to his own ſervice, or that of the treaty of Hanover, in ſuch caſes they ſhould be allowed for the ſervice of his moſt chriſtian majeſty. As the Muſcovites, in order to trouble the peace of the empire, muſt penetrate through Poland, his Poliſh majeſty was to be acquainted with the meaſures taken to hinder their coming into the empire and invited to ſtop the paſſes the Muſcovites would take in his territories.

A convention had likewiſe been made the laſt year with the prince of Heſſe by which he was to hold in readineſs, for the ſervice of Great-Britain, eight thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe. He was to maintain theſe troops at his own charge for two years. As the Landgrave had not ſo many troops on foot, and was to be at a great expence in levying what was wanted, as well as in remounting the cavalry, the king promiſed to pay him 75,000l. ſterling after the ratification of the convention, and 50,000l. in the February following, or before, in caſe the troops ſhould be required. For the ſubſidies, pay, and ſubſiſtance of theſe forces when they ſhould ſerve, they were to be ſettled according to the treaty made at London in 1722. France came not into this treaty, ſo the whole expence fell upon England.

As theſe treaties were very expenſive, an opportunity was taken, when the commons were debating, on the malt-bill, to have it moved by mr. Scroope, ſecretary of the treaſury, 'that a clauſe of appropriation ſhould be received, impowering the king to apply ſuch ſums as ſhould be neceſſary for defraying the expences and engagements as had been, or ſhould be made before the 25th of December next, in concerting ſuch meaſures as he ſhould think moſt conducive to the ſecurity of the trade and navigation, and reſtoring peace of Europe.' Upon this aroſe a very long and warm debate. It was ſaid, in ſupport of the motion, 'that his majeſty was ſo unwilling to put his ſubjects to any extraordinary expences, that he had demanded no more ſupplies this ſeſſion, than what he thought abſolutely neceſſary for the ſervice of the year: but in the preſent poſture of affairs, ſome unforeſeen accidents might require a further expence, for which no eſtimate could now be made, becauſe ſome treaties, his majeſty thought fit to enter into, were not yet finiſhed. Therefore they ought to enable him to anſwer ſuch contigences. That the houſe had ſeveral times repoſed the ſame confidence in him, which he had never abuſed: and what was now aſked was only for a ſhort time. On the the other hand, it was urged, 'that the aſking and granting ſupplies without an eſtimate was unparliamentary: that the clauſe moved for was inconſiſtent with that part of the bill, which forbids the iſſuing of the ſupplies thereby granted to any other purpoſes than thoſe ſpecified, and rendered ineffectual that appropriation of the public money, which the wiſdom of all parliaments had thought a neceſſary ſecurity againſt the miſapplication of it; which was the more to be feared, becauſe no proviſion was made to oblige any perſon to account for any money, that ſhall be diſpoſed of, by virtue of the power in this clauſe. That vaſt ſums had already been granted, which appeared ſufficient to anſwer any occaſions, as far as their preſent views could reach; and if any unexpected emergency ſhould demand a further ſupply, they might be provided for in the uſual manner, when neceſſity required. That this might be done with no leſs inconvenience, and with leſs danger of miſapplication, than by ſuch a delegation of almoſt a dictatorial authority to the miniſters. That this parliament had already given ſo many inſtances of their zeal and affection for his majeſty, that there could be no room to doubt of their readineſs to make good whatever he ſhould expend in concerting ſuch meaſures, as he ſhould think moſt conducive to the advantage and intereſt of his people. That ſuch an unlimited and abſolute power ought never to be given in a free government, but upon occaſions of evident neceſſity, when the very being of the government is in eminent danger. That the repoſing a confidence in the crown in the diſpoſition of ſuch immenſe ſums of money, as by the advice of unthrifty miniſters may be expended, might be attended with great prejudice to the properties of the ſubjects, and great danger to our moſt excellent conſtitution, which cannot be preſerved but by a ſtrict adherence to thoſe eſſential parliamantary forms of granting ſupplies only upon eſtimates, and of appropriating the ſame to ſervices and occaſions publicly avowed and judged neceſſary. That the departing from theſe excellent methods would by degrees render parliaments altogether uſeleſs. That the precedents alledged to juſtify this clauſe were far from being full to the point, and ſatisfactory; and if they were, ought not to be followed, leſt cauſes of the ſame nature might become ſo frequent, as in time to lodge in the crown, and in the miniſters, an abſolute and uncontroulable power of raiſing money upon the people, which by our wiſe conſtitution is, and with ſafety can only be, lodged in the whole legiſlature.' The debate being ended, mr. Scroop's motion was carried by a majority of 225 againſt 109; and the clauſe was added to the malt-bill; which being ſent up to the lords, occaſioned the like debate there as in the houſe of commons, but was at laſt carried by a majority of 76 againſt 20.[s]

Two days after it was moved by ſir William Yonge, 'that, towards the ſupply granted to the king, the ſum of 370,000l. ſhould be raiſed by loans on exchequer bills, to be charged on the ſurplus of the duties on coal and culm, which was reſerved for the diſpoſition of the parliament.' This motion was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed; and particularly by mr. Pulteney and ſir Joſeph Jekyll. They objected, 'that, by ſeveral votes and acts of parliament, all the exceedings or ſurpluſes of public funds were to be applied towards the leſſening of the public debts, or to the increaſe of the ſinking fund. That this diſpoſition could not be altered without wounding public credit, which was already very low, ſince the taking off any part of the mortgage could not but leſſen the ſecurity of the debt. That it was ſomewhat ſtrange, ſuch a motion ſhould be made by thoſe very perſons, who had the honour of being in the adminiſtration, who could not have forgot, what his majeſty had ſo ſtrongly recommended from the throne at the opening of this ſeſſion, That the produce of the ſinking fund might be immediately applied to the uſes, for which it was ſo wiſely contrived, and to which it now ſtands appropriated. And that this motion was ſtill the more ſurpriſing, after the large vote of credit, the houſe had ſo lately come to.' To all this it was anſwered, that the ſurpluſes in coals could not be deemed a part of the ſinking fund, ſince they had never been appropriated, but were reſerved for the diſpoſition of parliament. Upon which the motion was carried by a majority of 209 againſt 82.[t]

On the 15th of May, the king put an end to the ſeſſion, with this his laſt ſpeech to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'I acquainted you at the opening of this ſeſſion, with the dangers which threatened this kingdom, and the peace and liberties of Europe. I am now to return you my thanks for the zeal and diſpatch, with which you have proceeded upon the ſeveral points I then recommended to your care; for the confidence you have repoſed in me; and for the aſſurance you have given me of your ſupport and aſſiſtance, in vindication of my honour, and in the maintenance and defence of the undoubted rights and privileges of this nation, ſo openly and notoriouſly invaded and attacked.

'The ſiege of Gibraltar proves, beyond all diſpute, the end and deſign of the engagements entered into by the emperor and the king of Spain; but the preparations I had made for the defence of that place, and the bravery of my troops, will, I doubt not, convince them of the raſhneſs and folly of that undertaking. However, the love of peace has hitherto prevailed upon me, even under this high provocation, to ſuſpend, in ſome meaſure, my reſentments; and inſtead of having immediate recourſe to arms, and demanding of my allies that aſſiſtance, which they are engaged and ready to give me, I have concurred with the moſt chriſtian king and the ſtates-general, in making ſuch overtures of accommodation, as muſt convince all the world of the uprightneſs of our intentions, and of our ſincere diſpoſition to peace, and demonſtrate to whoſe ambition and thirſt of power the calamities of a war are to be imputed, if theſe juſt and reaſonable propoſitions are rejected. In the mean time, I have the pleaſure to acquaint you, that the crown of Sweden has acceded to the treaty of Hanover, and that the convention between me, his moſt chriſtian majeſty, and the king of Denmark, is actually ſigned.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

'The vigour and chearfulneſs you have ſhewn in raiſing ſo effectually, and upon ſuch eaſy terms, the neceſſary ſupplies for the ſervice of the current year, are not only inſtances of your zeal and affection to me, but demonſtrate the eſtabliſhed credit, power, and ſtrength of this kingdom.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'It would have been a great ſatisfaction to me, if, before your ſeparation, I had been able to ſpeak to you more

[s] It may here be obſerved, that theſe clauſes of appropriation have been by ſome late writers confounded with votes of credit, which are of very different nature. Votes of credit were frequent in king William's firſt war, and when, at the beginning of a ſeſſion, money was wanting, for providing for the ſervice of the next year, before the ſupplies were granted, or any money-bills could paſs, the commons came to votes that gave the crown a power to borrow money to a certain ſum, and at a certain rate, to be repaid out of the firſt ſupplies to be granted that ſeſſion: theſe were properly votes of credit, upon which money was advanced before the ſupplies were granted or raiſed by act of parliament.

But a clauſe of appropriation is not a power given to borrow or raiſe money by a vote of the houſe of commons, but a power given, by authority of the legiſlature, and by act of parliament, to apply or diſpoſe of ſome part of the ſupplies (raiſed by law) to particular uſes or ſerviſes, not ſpecified in the eſtimates or reſolutions of ſupplies, at the diſcretion of the crown, upon future emergencies, or ſuch ſervices, as, by the nature of them, cannot properly, or without danger of rendering them ineffectual, be explained or laid before a houſe of commons.

There are many inſtances of this method of granting money; particularly in the year 1706, a latitude is given in the clauſe of appropriation of the ſupplies of that year, 'to pay ſums due upon treaties made or to be made, and other charges of the war, for any time before, or till the 25th of December 1706. which method was continued ſeveral years ſucceſſively.'

This is a method, no doubt, that ought not to be wantonly or frequently practiſed. The grounds and foundation, upon which ſuch a confidence ſhould be allowed, ought to ariſe from a ſuppoſition, that ſervices may occur that are unforeſeen, and therefore could not be provided for; that opportunities may offer which may be unexpected and ſudden, but very eſſential and deciſive; that there are ſervices, which, by the nature of them, muſt be kept ſecret, becauſe, by being divulged, they would be diſappointed; and that there are ſervices which equally require the greateſt ſecrecy, from the circumſtances and ſituation of the perſons with whom you tranſact, and this ſecrecy muſt equally extend to future times, as well as preceding times. There are, for inſtance, princes, whoſe ſituation will not permit them to enter at once into offenſive engagements, till a ſafe opportunity ſhall preſent, who will, in the mean time, be induced to accept private ſubſidies and ſupplies, to put themſelves in a condition to declare, when called upon.

[t] As the affair of the coal-tax has been miſunderſtood and miſrepreſented, it may not be improper to put it in a clear light. In order to this it muſt be obſerved, that the ſinking fund conſiſts of the ſurpluſes of the aggregate fund, the South-ſea fund, and the general fund, and of theſe only. (See page 91.) In the act of 1 Geo. I. which eſtabliſhes the aggregate fund, it is enacted, 'That all other public monies which after Michaelmas, 1715, ſhall come into the Exchequer, not being appropriated or appointed to any uſe by any act of parliament made, or to be made, ſhall be ſet apart and applied to, and for the uſes by the preſent act declared, as likewiſe the overplus monies of the yearly ſum of 700,000l. per ann. eſtabliſhed for the king's civil liſt.' By virtue of theſe clauſes, the ſurplus of the civil-liſt revenues, and all public monies remaining in the Exchequer, not appropriated by any act made or to be made, were part of the aggregate fund; but, as they were left to be appropriated by any acts to be made, as well as made, and any ſurplus, at that time ariſing from the aggregate fund, was made diſpoſable for the public uſe by parliament, it is evident that any public debts and revenues which were not in themſelves part of any of the three capital funds, the ſurpluſes whereof conſtitute the ſinking fund, as they might be carried to the ſinking fund, as long as they remained unappropriated, ſo they might be diſpoſed of to any other uſe or ſervice by authority of parliament. Now it will appear upon examination, that the coal-duty made no part of the ſinking fund. By the 9th of queen Anne, the coal-duty was granted from September 28, 1716, to September 28, 1724, and made a fund for building fifty new churches, &c. By 1 George I. the duty is continued for another year, to provide for the miniſters of the fifty new churches. By 5 George I. the duty is farther continued, and a fund of 21,000l. is granted for thirty-two years, for raiſing 360,000l. for building churches, &c. with an intereſt of 4l. per cent. and another fund of 30,559l. was created, for raiſing 500,000l. by a lottery; and the further ſum of 21,325l. was applied, for compleating the ſupplies granted that ſeſſion. It is there enacted, 'that all the ſurplus money of the coal-duty, which ſhould at the end of any quarter, remain, during the ſaid thirty-two years, after the aforeſaid ſum ſhould be diſcharged, Should be reſerved for the diſpoſition of parliament, and ſhould not be diſpoſed of to any uſe, but by authority of parliament, and according to ſuch future acts, as ſhould be paſſed for that purpoſe.' This then was the ſtate of the coal-duty in the year 1719: it was charged with two funds of 21,000l. per ann. and 30,559l. 14s. per ann. when the produce of it was eſtimated at 70,000l. per ann. which made a proviſion for the diſpoſing the ſurplus neceſſary. This tranſaction was in 1719: the ſinking fund was eſtabliſhed in 1716; but if it had been the ſenſe of the parliament, that the coal-duty, or any ſurplus of it, had belonged to the ſinking fund, the proviſion for the diſpoſition of the ſurplus had been unneceſſary, or the direction, that is given by the act of parliament, had been an invaſion of the ſinking fund; but we ſee in 1719 (in the infancy of the ſinking fund, when it wanted aſſiſtance) 521,325l. taken out of the coal-duty for the ſervice of the year, and the ſurplus reſerved for the future diſpoſition of parliament, which is an expreſs exception of the ſurplus out of the ſinking fund, becauſe, by the act eſtabliſhing the aggregate fund, this ſurplus might have been carried to that fund, and conſequently into the ſinking fund, which it is plain this reſtriction was purpoſely inſerted to prevent, and to leave it to the diſcretion of future parliaments, to make ſuch uſe of this ſurplus, as they ſhould from time to time think moſt conducive to the public good. Thus mr. Pulteney and ſir Joſeph Jekyll's objections founded on the coal-duty's being part of the ſinking fund, and thoſe of others ſince, are entirely groundleſs.

positively, and with great certainty, upon the present posture and state of affairs. But, as you have now dispatched the public business, and as the season of the year requires your going into your respective countries, I chuse rather to put an end to this session, than to keep you any longer together unnecessarily. The provisions you have made, and the perfect union and harmony between me and my allies, will, I hope, enable me, by the divine assistance, either to withstand and defeat the designs of our enemies, if their conduct shall bring upon us the necessity of a war; or to improve the blessings of peace, if peace can, with justice, honour, and security, be obtained.'

By this speech it appears that, notwithstanding the preparations for war, as well by the allies of Hanover, as by those of Vienna, overtures of accommodation had been made. All had declared, that the preservation of the tranquility of Europe was the end of their armaments. This the court of Spain did, at the same time that the siege of Gibraltar was ordered. The Condé de las Torres, captain-general of the king of Spain's forces in Andalusia, opened the trenches before Gibraltar the 11th of February. He had an army of about twenty thousand men, and was well provided with artillery of all sorts; with ammunition, and warlike stores, proportioned to the strength of the place, and the bravery of the garrison, which the Spaniards expected would lengthen the siege. Colonel Clayton, lieutenant-governor of the place, had troops and necessaries sufficient for defence, till supplies could come from England, for which due preparations had been made. Upon the repeated advices, that the Spaniards were preparing for the siege of Gibraltar, six men of war, the Kent, Lenox, Berwick, Royal Oak, Portland, and Tyger, were fitted out with all expedition. With these ships, and three regiments, (Newton's, Disney's, and Anstruther's,) sir Charles Wager sailed in January. When the siege was begun, colonel Stanhope, the British ambassador in Spain, having received the passports, he had demanded of king Philip, set out from Madrid for Bayonne, in his way to England, having given the British merchants in that kingdom such timely notice to take necessary precautions for securing their effects, that, when orders came to the Spanish governors to seize them, these merchants suffered no considerable loss by that seizure. In the beginning of March, colonel Hayes and colonel Middleton's regiment of foot were put on board the transports at Portsmouth, and sailed for Gibraltar, under convoy of the Torbay, captain Haddock, and the Poole fire-ship. Colonel Clayton's regiment was about the same time ordered to imbark in the river Thames, and a draught of ten companies out of the first regiment of foot-guards was made by lot. [u]

The earl of Portmore, governor of Gibraltar, notwithstanding his advanced age, having been a colonel near forty years, resolved to repair to his government, and embarked at Portsmouth, on board the pince Frederick, appointed with the Falmouth (two seventy-gun ships) to convoy the transports, on which the detachment of the guards and Clayton's regiment were embarked. All these forces arrived at Gibraltar, the beginning of April, as did likewise five hundred men from Minorca, who with the garrison formed a body of six thousand men, the greatest part of whom incamped on the south point without the town, while the rest did duty within, and were relieved from the camp. The besiegers threw a great quantity of bombs into the place, which did the less damage, as most of the houses were empty by the desertion of the old inhabitants. The garrison had store of salt provisions from England and Ireland, and of fresh from Barbary; for which purpose a frigate was ordered to be continually going to and from Tetuan and Tangier. Sir Charles Wager, having caused the ammunition and warlike stores, with twenty-four pieces of cannon, to be put on shore, sailed from Gibraltar to cruize with the Torbay, Sterling-Castle, Burford, Kent, Royal Oak, Canterbury, York, and Poole fire-ship, leaving there the Tyger, Winchester, Lyme, Solebay bomb-ship, Thunder bomb-ship, Cruizer and Hawk sloops; which were joined by the Portland and Dursley galley; the Colchester and Swallow being ordered to Port-Mahon to be cleaned. In this disposition of defence the siege of Gibraltar gave little pain to the English, either at home or abroad; while the Spaniards, in the prosecution of it, for four months lost above half their army by slaughter, sickness, and desertion.

About the same time the court of Vienna having shewn a disposition to begin the war in the Netherlands, by attacking the Dutch barrier, the king ordered an augmentation of thirty companies of foot, and that the ten thousand auxiliaries, which England was obliged by treaty to send to the assistance of the states, should hold themselves in readiness for embarkation. [w]

As the king of Sweden had acceded to the treaty of Hanover, sir John Norris was sent with a considerable fleet to the Baltick, to support him in this new alliance, so disagreeable to the courts of Vienna and Russia. The English being joined by a Danish squadron, the Russian court thought fit to put a stop to the equipment of their fleet, which was no more talked of after the death of the czarina, on the 17th of May, about the time of sir John Norris's arrival in the Baltick.

The court of France, being equally concerned with England to prevent a war, augmented their troops, and formed incampments for the exercise of their militia. But, as the Hanover alliance was only defensive, it did not exclude France from a mediation, which tended to adjust all the differences of the several parties. Accordingly, his most christian majesty undertook that office, which was conducted by the duke of Richlieu, his ambassador at Vienna. The duke, in concert with the British and Dutch ministers, drew up a project of accommodation, which was sent to the emperor and the king of Spain. This scheme consisted of eight articles, which were to serve as preliminaries for a general congress. The emperor did not think proper to reject it, but formed a counter-project, which he sent to the allies of Hanover. The allies, judging it not satisfactory, formed their last resolution, in which they declared, they could make no alteration. The emperor, pressed by the duke of Richlieu, accepted, at last of the scheme, consisting of the twelve following articles:

I. His imperial and catholic majesty having no other view, than to contribute to the public tranquility of Europe, and observing, that the commerce of Ostend has given birth to jealousy and uneasiness, consents, that there shall be a suspension of the charter of the Ostend company, and of all traffic between the Austrian Netherlands and the Indies, during the term of seven years.

II. All rights or possessions shall remain intire to such of the contracting powers, as enjoyed them by virtue of the treaties of Utrecht, Baden, and the quadruple alliance, or the treaties and conventions made before the year 1725, which regard neither the emperor nor the states-general. But if any change has been made with relation to the said possessions; or if, in consequence of those conventions, somewhat has not been executed, the change that has happened, or the points, which have not been executed, shall be discussed and decided in the future congress, according to the tenor of the treaties and conventions.

III. Consequently all the privileges of commerce in Europe, Spain, and the Indies, grounded upon treaties, and formerly enjoyed by the English and French nations, and by the subjects of the states-general, shall be restored upon the same foot, and settled in the same manner they were, particularly by the treaties preceding the year 1725.

IV. The powers of the North shall be invited and desired by their respective allies, not to have recourse to hostilities; but, on the contrary, to embrace all reasonable methods of accommadation; and that, until the opening of the congress hereafter mentioned, wherein all the respective differences shall be discussed, the contracting powers shall not contribute to any hostilities directly or indirectly, under

Colonel Hastings,
Colonel Pearson,
Colonel Meyrick,
Colonel Duncombe,
Colonel Inwood,
Colonel Treby,
Colonel Brown,
Colonel Oughton,
Colonel Williamson.

The whole detachment to be under the command of colonel Guise, major in the said regiment.

Of these, colonel Treby resigned his commission, and was succeeded by colonel Onslow; captain Stanhope, of the said regiment, also laid down his commission, and was succeeded in it by mr. Parker.

[w] Of this number were colonel Campbell's, major-general Gore's, brigadier Churchill's, and major-general Honeywood's dragoons; and two battallions of guards commanded by colonel Robinson; and colonel Robinson's, colonel Kirke's, colonel Harrison's, earl of Delorain's, sir James Wood's, lord Tyrawley's, colonel Pocock's, colonel Murray's, and colonel Grove's regiments of foot. This body of forces were to be commanded by the earl of Orkney, commander in chief, the duke of Argyle, general of the foot, the lord Cobham and the earl of Stair, lieutenants-general. The earl of Deloraine and Philip Honeywood, majors-general; sir James Wood, colonel Pocock, colonel Kirke, colonel Kerr, and the earl of Scarborough, brigadiers-general.

any colour or pretence whatever, which may disturb the present state of affairs in the north; but, on the contrary, they shall engage to act in concert, to put an end to hostilities, if any should be commenced.

V. All hostilities whatsoever, if any should happen, shall instantly cease after the signing of the present articles; and with respect to Spain, eight days after his catholic majesty shall have received the articles signed. The ships, which sailed from Ostend to the Indies before this convention, the names whereof shall be given in a list on the part of his imperial majesty, may return freely and safely from the Indies to Ostend; and, if any of these ships be detained or taken, they shall be restored, bona fide, with their cargoes. The galleons also shall be permitted to return to Spain unmolested, in firm confidence, that his catholic majesty will, with regard to the effects on board the galleons and the flotilla, deal in the same manner as usual in all times of liberty. In consequence of this, the English squadron commanded by admiral Hosier, shall depart as soon as possible from Porto-Bello, and all other ports of America belonging to the king of Spain: he shall even return with his squadron into Europe, that the subjects of his catholic majesty in the Indies may be free from all further apprehensions and uneasiness. The commerce of the English in America shall be carried on as formerly, according to the treaties. Moreover, the English, French, and Dutch squadrons, which may appear upon the coasts of Spain, or on those of the states of his imperial majesty, at the time when this present cessation of hostilities commence, shall depart thence as soon as possible, that the inhabitants of those coasts may henceforth be rid of all disturbance and fear. Neither shall those ships be permitted to undertake any thing directly or indirectly against the said port.

VI. This cessation of hostilities shall continue as long as the suspension of the charter granted to the Ostend company, viz. seven years, that the jarring interests may be reconciled in that time, and peace settled on a more firm foundation.

VII. If, after the signing of these preliminaries, any troubles or hostilities should happen between the subjects of the contracting powers, whether in Europe or the Indies, under what pretence soever it may be, they shall join together to get reparation of the damage or prejudice their respective subjects have sustained.

VIII. If these articles are accepted and signed, a congress shall be opened in four months, reckoning from the day of signing at Aix la Chapelle, wherein the respective rights of all the contracting powers, and those invited to it shall be examined, discussed, and settled.

IX. The plenipotentiaries, that shall be named, shall have in their retinue no more than two gentlemen, two pages, and six footmen, that they may be sooner ready for their journey, and to avoid pomp and expence.

X. The plenipotentiories shall insist on no ceremonial, but follow the regulations settled at the congress of Cambray, to obviate all disputes relating to rank: however, each shall have liberty left to protest.

XI. The several powers shall earnestly recommend to their respective plenipotentiaries, to avoid any thing trifling, that may in any wise retard the congress.

XII. The ratification of these preliminary articles shall be exchanged in the space of two months, or sooner, if possible, reckoning from the day of signing.

These articles were first signed at Paris, the 20th of May, by the minister of the Hanover alliance, and afterwards at Vienna, by the ministers of the emperor and the king of Spain.

The emperor punctually executed the first of these articles, and ratified the preliminaries within the time agreed on. Though Aix la Chapelle was appointed for the place of congress, it was afterwards transfered to Cambray for the conveniency of the minister of France, whose presence was necessary at that court. The king of Spain also executed in part what concerned him; he gave orders for suspending all further attacks against Gibraltar, and all hostilities against the English elsewhere. This was an honourable way of abandoning a siege, which lasted four months without success; nor had it done much execution among the English, for they lost in all but three hundred and seventy-three men. The suspension of arms was signed the 23d of June, N. S. But, when the siege was on the point of being entirely raised, and the preliminaries to be ratified in form, Spain started new difficulties, and urged new pretensions. The Spaniards insisted, that a temporary suspension of arms did not imply an actual raising of the siege of Gibraltar; and that the restitution of the prince Frederick, the South-sea ship (taken at la vera Cruz, before Spain was in war with England) was not mentioned or included in the articles, whereas the English demanded both, by virtue of the preliminaris. Upon this hostilities began between the ships of the two nations, and sir Charles Wager continued to cruize on the coasts of Spain, after the cessation of arms at Gibraltar. And what was very remarkable, whilst he was looking out with seven ships for the Spanish galleons (which were said to be coming home) thirteen French men of war (six from Brest, and seven from Toulon) suddenly came and anchored before Cadiz, of which squadron admiral Wager had received no intelligence either from London or Madrid. As therefore he had no notice of their coming, all communications with the French fleet was forbid. However, after many cavils, and delays, the preliminary articles were at last signed at Madrid on the 24th of February, above eight months after the death of king George I. by the ministers of the emperor, England, France, Spain, and the states, which opened the way to the congress. *

King George had not visited his German Dominions these two years, and therefore, soon after the breaking up of the parliament, he prepared for his journey to Hanover, where he thought to enjoy the fruit of his labours in peace, or to continue his endeavours for the good of the common cause. Having appointed the lords-justices for the administration of the government, he embarked at Greenwich, on board the Carolina yacht, the 3d of June, attended by the earl of Ilay and the lord Townshend. The king landed on the 7th, at Vaert in Holland, where he lay that night. The next day he proceeded on his journey to Hanover; and, on the 9th of June, between ten and eleven at night, arrived at Delden, in all appearance in perfect health. He supped there very heartily, and eat an orange but no melon, as was reported; and, having rested well that night, set out from Delden about four the next morning. Between eight and nine he ordered the coach to stop, in order to make water, and perceiving, that one of his hands hung motionless, said, 'I cannot move this hand.' Monsieur Fabrice rubbed it with both his, but to no effect; upon which he called the surgeon (who followed on horseback) who rubbed it also with spirits. In this interval the king's mouth and eyes began to move strangely, and his tongue to swell, so that he could not speak. The surgeon, taking it for an apoplectic fit, opened a vein, and the king recovered his speech, so as to say, hasten to Osnaburgh; but

* To bring down these matters to the present time, it may be observed, that means were found to detach Spain from the emperor, and a treaty was concluded at Seville, Nov. 9, N. S. 1729, between Great-Britain, France, and Spain. By this treaty commissaries were to be appointed to examine at the court of Spain, and decide about the captures on both sides, among which were reckoned the ships taken by the English fleet in 1718. That instead of neutral garrisons (as agreed to in the quadruple alliance) Spanish garrisons should be introduced into Leghorn, &c. for preserving the succession of don Carlos. This it was that induced the queen of Spain to come into a treaty, which gave great offence to the emperor, as it put an end to his subsidy from Spain, of about a million sterling a year. He thundered out complaints against it at all the courts of Europe, and particularly by a commissorial decree, directed to the diet of Ratisbon. But it was to no purpose, for the treaty of Seville, with regard to the emperor, and all other states, and the balance of power, varied in nothing from the quadruple alliance, but in substituting six thousand Spanish instead of so many neutral troops, for asserting the eventual succession of the infant of Spain to the grand duke's dominions, to which the emperor had agreed. However, the British court offering to guarantee the pragmatic sanction, or the emperor's settlement of his hereditary dominions, on his eldest daughter, on his failure of issue male (which was thought necessary to preserve the balance of power) the emperor was at last pacified. This produced the second treaty of Vienna, March 16, 1731, between the emperor and Great-Britain, in which the States were included. By it the order of the succession, settled by the emperor, was guaranteed by Great-Britain and the states; the commerce and navigation to the East-Indies were to cease in the Netherlands, except two ships for once from Ostend: a tariff or new treaty concerning trade, and the rule of imposts relating to the Austrian Netherlands, was to be settled by commissaries at Antwerp: the introduction of Spanish garrisons into Leghorn, &c. was agreed to by the emperor.

Thus the queen of Spain was pacified by the variation of neutral troops, and the emperor was contended, by guaranteeing his succession. The conclusion of these treaties gave hopes of a lasting tranquility: but the death of the king of Poland soon put at end to these hopes. The emperor, in conjuction with Russia, espoused the quarrel of the elector of Saxony and supported an unfair election of a king forced upon a free nation. This being opposed by France, a war broke out between their imperial and most christian majesties, in which Great-Britain and the states stood neuter, as they did also in the differences which arose between Spain and Portugal. But, though Great-Britain and the states were not engaged in these disputes, they were both obliged to guard against events, which had a good effect. Our naval armaments struc terror into France and Spain alternately. The French durst not venture to the Baltick to relieve Dantzick, whilst our navy rid in the Downs, nor the Spaniards to insult, much less attac Portugal, whilst our fleet lay in the Tagus. At last, in order to adjust all differecnes between Great-Britain and Spain, the famous convention was transacted by sir Robert Walpole, but meeting with opposition was laid aside, and the present war with Spain ensued, which has brought on a war also with France.

immediately fell into a ſlumber in Fabrice's arms. As the violent motion of the coach could not keep the king awake, Fabrice aſked the ſurgeon, 'what he thought of him?' Who anſwered, 'he deſpaired of his life.' Fabrice ordered him to take care of him, and rode poſt himſelf from the laſt ſtage to Oſnaburgh to prepare the duke of York, the king's brother, for ſuch unexpected news. The king, being arrived there about ten, was immediately carried to bed, where he continued ſpeechleſs and in agonies till two o'clock in the morning, on Sunday the 11th of June, when he expired in the 68th year of his age, and 13th of his reign; and was interred at Hanover, among his anceſtors.[7]

Thus died king George the firſt, who may truly be conſidered as more fortunate in more important circumſtances of his life and affairs, than any prince of the laſt or preſent century. This good fortune, which is often the reward of virtue, and as often the effect of prudence, attended him as well before as after his acceſſion to the crown of Great-Britain. The eſtabliſhment of the electoral dignity in his family, was a work which, though begun by his father, was reſerved for him finally to accompliſh. A large acceſſion of dominion fell to him by his ſucceeding to the dukedom of Zell, whereby he became one of the greateſt princes of Germany, and by far the moſt powerful perſon that ever ſtood next heir to the Britiſh throne. The duchy of Bremen and the biſhopric of Oſnaburgh conſiderably ſtrengthened his intereſts in the empire, and gave an additional weight to the proteſtant cauſe.

But his good fortune appeared in nothing ſo remarkable as in the removal of thoſe ſeemingly invincible obſtacles to his ſucceſſion to the crown of theſe kingdoms. Queen Anne had high notions of hereditary right; and, in the latter part of her reign, ſlaviſh doctrines in ſupport of the indefeaſibleneſs of that right, were avowed in numerous addreſſes. Preparations were made for the execution of purpoſes well underſtood, though not expreſsly avowed. The miniſters, and all, who had been the ſure ſupports of the Hanover ſucceſſion, had been diſgraced. Many favourable conceſſions were made to our often defeated enemies, who both by intereſt and inclination were the protectors and friends of the pretender. The adminiſtration of affairs was committed to the moſt daring and determined, and the nation deluded into madneſs for deſtruction. But, amidſt theſe apprehenſions and dangers, the queen's ſudden and unexpected death gave the fortunate elector of Hanover an eaſy and unmoleſted acceſſion to the throne.

King George did not labour under king William's firſt diſadvantages. His and their country's enemies were well known, and could with no colour of right demand confidence and power. After ſtrong profeſſions of ſubmiſſion and loyalty, many actually entered into rebellion; and greater numbers wiſhed it ſucceſs. The murmuring and complaints, which were occaſioned by the diſgrace of the general and miniſtry, who had raiſed the credit and glory of the nation to an height before unknown, had been reſented as unpardonable affronts to the royal prerogative: and yet, when the ſucceſſor removed thoſe, from whom he had received many indignities, and whoſe meaſures and deſigns to defeat him of his royal dignity, he had many and undoubted proofs, this was repreſented as extreme partiality and injuſtice; and in public, and on the moſt ſalemn occaſions, it was pleaded as a juſt provocation to rebellion, and all puniſhments of the authors of ſo much miſchief and miſery were oppoſed under the pretence of being acts of inhumanity and cruelty.

There are many circumſtances not publicly known, which, if brought to the light, would demonſtrate the king's extraordinary good fortune in defeating the rebellion. Beſides what broke out in the north, the aſſociations and preparations in the ſouth and weſt were great and numerous. Caution, fearfulneſs, and delay prevented the execution of meaſures, which could hardly have failed of proving fatal to the government. Such a multitude of enemies in ſo many places would have divided the troops, and have rendered the army inſignificant in the defence of the whole. The march of part of the rebels into England, their trifling at Preſton, and their ſpeedy defeat, were of unſpeakable advantage, by effectually diſcouraging inſurrections in many other places; whereas a few days march further would have very much ſwelled their numbers, and given them a dangerous ſtrength.

But nothing could be more fortunate to the king than the death of Lewis XIV. of France. From him the rebels would have received all ſorts of ſuccours and ſupplies. Bigotry and revenge animated the whole French nation with unanimous zeal for the ſucceſs of the pretender. And even a minority, a conteſted regency, and the probable need which the regent might have of our ſupport, did not prevent all aſſiſtance. However, thoſe circumſtances proved a powerful reſtraint; and the ſituation of the neighbouring nations was an eminent ſecurity to this reign. The utmoſt degree of averſion and jealouſy ſubſiſted between the regent of France and the court of Madrid; which was properly improved by deſtroying the growing naval power of Spain; and our ſurprizing and complete advantage in this affair utterly diſappointed the vaſt deſigns of an able and enterprizing miniſter.

The invaſion and rebellion, in 1719, are the leſs remembered, becauſe not one perſon ſuffered death on that account. The Spaniſh fleet, with five thouſand ſoldiers, ſuffered ſo much in a ſtorm, as to be obliged to return home; but about four hundred of them landed in Scotland, where they were joined by a conſiderable body of Highlanders, but were ſoon defeated, by an inferior number of king's forces.

The king of Sweden's death was far from being the leaſt conſiderable of many favourable events; for, had that implacable monarch lived, his deſigns againſt Denmark would probably have ſucceeded; and then he would have had full leiſure and opportunity for tranſporting his hardy troops into Scotland.

But, on the other hand, how great and uncommon ſoever the king's good fortune was in removing all obſtructions, and firmly eſtabliſhing himſelf on the throne, it was not without ſome allay. Had his ſucceſſion taken place before the change of the miniſtry, and the diſgrace of the general, it would have been infinitely more happy, not only for the nation but for the laſting tranquility and liberties of Europe. France would then have been compelled to give up the Spaniſh monarchy. By advantages in trading to the dominions of Spain, in Europe and America, and by ſeveral conceſſions, we ſhould have had ample means of repairing the loſſes ſuſtained in a long and expenſive war. The houſe of Bourbon had been reduced within their proper bounds, and ceaſed to have been the terror and ſcourage of their neighbours.

To this may be added, that king George came to a people, who had been corrupted both in their political and religious notions, and had been taught an averſion to our natural allies, and to all foreign proteſtants, while an eſteem and affection for France, and a tenderneſs for many doctrines of popery had been infuſed into them with great ſucceſs; and theſe prejudices had indiſpoſed the nation to ſubmit to a proteſtant prince, while the dangers from a popiſh one were not attended to. The advantages likewiſe of a proſperous war, and many valuable branches of commerce had been given up or neglected; and the revenue was loaded with a very heavy debt. The authors of theſe calamities had the art and aſſurance to impute the conſequences of them to the king and his miniſters; and their peace-making had left Europe in ſuch a ſtate, and their principles infected the nation to ſuch a degree, that a good body of regular troops was abſolutely neceſſary to the ſafety of the nation; and yet this was exclaimed againſt as inſlaving it.

The moderate and ſure methods of diſcharging the public debts which had been offered, having been neglected, the South-ſea ſcheme took place to the great misfortune and diſgrace of this reign, as well as of the nation in general; and though men of all parties and degrees upon this occaſion equally renounced common ſenſe and honeſty, yet they transferred the whole blame from themſelves to the government. But whatever miſtakes or misfortunes happened, they cannot juſtly be imputed to the king, whoſe integrity and good deſigns were eminent and undoubted, and his reſolution to govern agreeably to our laws and conſtitution ſteady and unalterable; though the beſt underſtanding, and the beſt diſpoſition are not always ſecure from the arts of bold and ambitious men.

With regard to the management of affairs abroad, a due attention was paid to the feeble and corrupt ſtate of our allies; and the eager and haſty diſpoſition of the people for war, their perpetual complaints of the wiſeſt conduct, cavilling at the moſt affecting ſucceſſes, ſoon growing weary of the expence, and longing for peace on any terms, were well conſidered; but at the ſame time the dignity and honour of the nation were maintained in our methods of compoſing the diſorders and diſturbances; which was performed with as little expence and hazard as poſſible; and preventive and defenſive meaſures were the wiſe and ſafe politics, the happineſs and glory of this reign.

[7] His wife, the princeſs Sophia Dorothy, died November 2, 1726, at the caſtle of Ahlen, in the electorate of Brunſwick, where ſhe had been confined many years. She was daughter and heireſs of the duke of Zell, born in 1666, and married in 1682.

As king James, inſtead of giving the laws their proper courſe, aſſumed a power to diſpence with them: and as queen Anne was flattered into a perſuaſion that the regal authority was unlimited. King George, on the contrary, deſired no power but what enabled him to promote the welfare of his ſubjects, and was too wiſe to deem thoſe his friends, who would have made their court to him by the profeſſion of an obedience which they never practiſed, and which has always proved fatal to thoſe princes who have put it to the trial. He had given a proof of his ſovereign virtues before he exerciſed them in this nation. His natural inclination to juſtice led him to rule his German ſubjects in the ſame manner that our conſtitution directed him to govern the Engliſh. He regarded civil liberties as the natural rights of mankind, and therefore indulged them to a people who pleaded no other claim to them than his known goodneſs. The conſiſtency of his behaviour was ſuch, that he inflexibly purſued thoſe meaſures which appeared the moſt juſt and equitable. As he was moſt prudent in laying proper ſchemes, he was no leſs remarkable for his ſteadineſs in accompliſhing what he had once concerted. To this uniformity and firmneſs of mind which appeared in all his proceedings, the ſucceſſes that attended him were chiefly owing. His martial virtues were no leſs conſpicuous than his civil, though for the good of his ſubjects he ſtudied to decline all occaſions of military glory. He had acquired great reputation in his younger days, in Hungary and Morea, when he fought againſt the Turks, as well as in Germany and Flanders, where he commanded againſt the diſturber of the peace of Europe. And, as if perſonal courage was an hereditary virtue of his family, three of his brothers fell glorioufly in the field, fighting againſt the enemies of their country, and his ſon (his preſent majeſty king George II.) fought with the bravery of his father at the battle of Audenarde, when the ſons of France and the pretender fled before him.

As to his moſt private virtues, he was of a grave, eaſy, and calm temper, and generous upon all occaſions; and the ſerenity and benignity of his mind diſcovered themſelves in his countenance, and captivated the love and veneration of all, who approached him.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND:

BOOK XXVIII.

SECT. III.

From the commencement of KING GEORGE II. to the End of his Reign.

31. GEORGE II.

[1727] AT the acceſſion of George II. the nation had great reaſon to wiſh for an alteration of meaſures. The public debt, notwithſtanding the boaſted œconomy and management of the miniſters; notwithſtanding the ſinking fund, which had been extolled as a growing treaſure ſacred to the diſcharge of national incumbrances; was now increaſed to fifty millions two hundred ſixty-one thouſand two hundred and ſix pounds, nineteen ſhillings, eight pence three farthings. The kingdom was bewildered in a labyrinth of treaties and conventions by which it ſtood engaged in pecuniary ſubſides to many powers upon the continent, with whom its real intereſts could never be connected. The wealth of the nation had been laviſhed upon theſe foreign connexions; upon unneceſſary wars, and fruitleſs expeditions. Dangerous encroachments had been made upon the conſtitution, by the repeal of the act for triennial parliament; by frequent ſuſpenſions of the Habeas Corpus act upon frivolous occaſions; by repealing clauſes in the act of ſettlement; by votes of credit; by habituating the people to a ſtanding army; and, above all, by eſtabliſhing a ſyſtem of corruption, which at all times would ſecure a majority in parliament. The nature of prerogative, by which the liberties of the nation had formerly been often endangered, was now ſo well underſtood, and ſo ſecurely reſtrained, that it could no longer be uſed for the ſame oppreſſive purpoſes: beſides, an avowed extenſion of the prerogative required more ability, courage, and reſolution, than the preſent miniſtry could exert. They underſtood their own ſtrength, and had recourſe to a more ſafe and effectual expedient. The vice, luxury, and proſtitution of the age, the almoſt total extinction of ſentiment, honour, and public ſpirit, had prepared the minds of men for ſlavery and corruption. The means were in the hands of the miniſtry: the public treaſure was at their devotion: they multiplied places and penſions, to increaſe the number of their dependents: they ſquandered away the money of the nation without taſte, diſcernment, decency, or remorſe: they inliſted an army of the moſt abandoned emiſſaries, whom they employed to vindicate the worſt meaſures in the face of truth, common ſenſe, and common honeſty: and they did not fail to ſtigmatiſe as jacobites, and enemies to the government, all thoſe who preſumed to queſtion the merit of their adminiſtration.

The ſupreme direction of affairs was not yet engroſſed by a ſingle miniſter. Lord Townſhend had the reputation of conducting the external tranſactions relating to treaties and negotiations. He is ſaid to have underſtood that province, though he did not always follow the dictates of his own underſtanding. He poſſeſſed an extenſive fund of knowledge; and was well acquainted with the functions of his office. The duke of N. his colleague, was not remarkable for any of theſe qualifications: he owed his promotion to his uncommon zeal for the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, and to the ſtrength of his intereſt in parliament, rather than to his judgment, preciſion, or any other intellectual merit. Lord C. who may be counted an auxiliary, though not immediately concerned in the adminiſtration, had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the character of an envoy at ſeveral courts in Europe. He had attained an intimate knowledge of all the different intereſts and connexions ſubſiſting among the powers of the continent; and he infinitely ſurpaſſed all the miniſters in learning and capacity. He was, indeed, the only man of genius employed under this government. He ſpoke with eaſe and propriety: his conceptions were juſt and lively; his inferences bold; his counſels vigorous and warm. Yet he depreciated his talents, by acting in a ſubordinate character to thoſe whom he deſpiſed; and ſeemed to look upon the pernicious meaſures of a bad miniſtry with ſilent contempt, rather than with avowed deteſtation. The interior government of Great-Britain was chiefly managed by ſir Robert Walpole, a man of extraordinary talents, who had from low beginnings raiſed himſelf to the head of the treaſury. Having obtained a ſeat in the lower houſe, he declared himſelf one of the moſt forward partiſans of the whig faction. He was endued with a ſpecies of eloquence, which, though neither nervous nor elegant, flowed with great facility, and was ſo plauſible on all ſubjects, that even when he miſrepreſented the truth, whither from ignorance or deſign, he ſeldom failed to perſuade that part of his audience for whoſe hearing his harangue was chiefly intended. He was well acquainted with the nature of the public funds, and underſtood the whole myſtery of ſtock-jobbing. This knowledge produced a connection between him and the money-corporations, which ſerved to enhance his importance. He perceived the bulk of mankind were actuated by a ſordid thirſt of lucre: he had ſagacity enough to convert the degeneracy of the times to his own advantage; and on this, and this alone, he founded the whole ſuperſtructure of his ſubſequent adminiſtration. In the late reign he had, by dint of ſpeaking deciſively to every queſtion, by boldly impeaching the conduct of the tory miniſters, by his activity in elections, and engaging as a projector in the ſchemes of the monied-intereſt, become a leading member in the houſe of commons. By his ſufferings under the tory parliament, he attained the rank of a martyr to his party: his intereſt, his reputation, and his preſumption daily increaſed: he oppoſed Sunderland as his rival in power, and headed a dangerous defection from the miniſtry, which evinced the greatneſs of his influence and authority. He had the glory of being principally concerned in effecting a reconciliation between the late king and the prince of Wales: then he was re-aſſociated in the adminiſtration with additional credit; and, from the death of the earls of Sunderland and Stanhope, he had been making long ſtrides towards the office of prime-miniſter. He knew the maxims he had adopted would ſubject him to the hatred, the ridicule, and reproach of ſome individuals, who had not yet reſigned all ſentiments of patriotiſm, nor all views of oppoſition: but the number of theſe was inconſiderable, when compared to that which conſtituted the body of the community; and he would not ſuffer the conſideration of ſuch antagoniſts to come in competition with his ſchemes of power, affluence and authority. Nevertheleſs, low as he had humbled antiminiſterial aſſociation, it required all his artifice to elude, all his patience and natural phlegm to bear the powerful arguments that were urged, and the keen ſatire that was exerciſed againſt his meaſures and management, by a few members in the oppoſition. Sir William Windham poſſeſſed all the energy of elocution: mr. Shippen was calm, intrepid, ſhrewd, and ſarcaſtic: mr. Hungerford, ſly, inſinuating, and ironical. Mr. W. P. inherited from nature a good underſtanding, which he had ſtudiouſly cultivated. He was one of the moſt learned members in the houſe of commons, extremely well qualified to judge of literary productions; well read in hiſtory and politics; deeply ſkilled in the Britiſh conſtitution, the detail of government, and the nature of the finances. He ſpoke with freedom, fluency, and uncommon warmth of declaration, which was ſaid to be the effect of perſonal animoſity to ſir R. W. with whom he had been formerly connected.

An expreſs arriving on the 14th of June, with an account of the king's death, his late majeſty, king George II. repaired from Richmond, where he received this intellignce, to Leiceſter-houſe; and the members of the privy-council being aſſembled, were ſworn a-new. The king declared his firm purpoſe to preſerve the conſtitution in church and ſtate, and to cultivate thoſe alliances which his father had made with foreign princes. At the ſame time, he took and ſubſcribed the oath for the ſecurity of the church of Scotland, as required by the act of union. Next day he was proclaimed king of Great-Britain. The parliament aſſembled in purſuance of the act made for that purpoſe; but was immediately prorogued by commiſſion to the twenty-ſeventh day of the month. All the great officers of ſtate continued in their places: ſir Robert Walpole kept poſſeſſion of the treaſury; and the ſyſtem of politics, which the late king had eſtabliſhed, underwent no ſort of alteration. The king, in his ſpeech to both houſes at the opening of the ſeſſion, profeſſed a fixed reſolution to merit the love and affection of his people, by maintaining them in full enjoyment of their religious and civil rights. He promiſed to leſſen the public expence as ſoon as the circumſtances of affairs would permit: he obſerved to the commons, that the grant of the greateſt part of the civil-liſt revenues was now determined; and that it would be neceſſary for them to make a new proviſion for the ſupport of him and his family: laſtly, he recommended it to both houſes to diſpatch the buſineſs that ſhould be neceſſarily brought before them, as the ſeaſon of the year and circumſtances of time required their preſence in the country. Addreſſes of condolence and congratulation being drawn up and preſented, the commons, in a committee of the whole houſe, took into conſideration, a motion for a ſupply to his majeſty. Sir Robert Walpole having obſerved that the annual ſum of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, granted to, and ſettled on the late king, had fallen ſhort every year; and that his preſent majeſty's expences were likely to increaſe, by reaſon of the largeneſs of his family, moved that the entire revenues of the civil-liſt, which produced about eight hundred thouſand pounds per annum, ſhould be ſettled on the king during his life. Mr Shippen oppoſed the motion, as inconſiſtent with the truſt repoſed in them as repreſentatives of the people, who ought to be very frugal in exerciſing the right of giving away the public money. He ſaid, the ſum of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds was not obtained for his late majeſty without a long and ſolemn debate; and every member who contended for it at that time allowed it to be an ample royal revenue: that although his majeſty's family ſhould be enlarged, a circumſtance which had been urged as one reaſon for the motion, he preſumed the appointments of prince Frederick would be much inferior to thoſe ſettled on his preſent majeſty when he was prince of Wales: beſides, it was to be hoped that many perſonal, many particular expences in the late reign, eſpecially thoſe for frequent journies to Hanover, would be diſcontinued, and entirely ceaſe. He obſerved that the civil-liſt branches in the queen's reign did not often exceed the ſum of five hundred and fifty thouſand pounds; nevertheleſs, ſhe called upon her parliament but once, in a reign of thirteen years, to pay the debts contracted in her civil government; and theſe were occaſioned by the uparalleled inſtances of her piety and generoſity. She gave the firſt-fruits and tenths, ariſing to nineteen thouſand pounds a-year, as an augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy. She beſtowed five thouſand pounds per annum, out of the Poſt-office, on the duke of Marlborough: ſhe ſuffered ſeven hundred pounds to be charged weekly on the ſame office, for the ſervice of the public: ſhe expended ſeveral hundred thouſand pounds in building the caſtle of Blenheim: ſhe allowed four thouſand pounds annually to prince Charles of Denmark: ſhe ſuſtained great loſſes by the tin contract: ſhe ſupported the poor Palatines: ſhe exhibited many other proofs of royal bounty; and immediately before her death ſhe had formed a plan of retrenchment, which would have reduced her yearly expences to four hundred and fifty-nine thouſand nine hundred and forty-one pounds. He affirmed that a million a year would not be ſufficient to carry on the exorbitant expences, ſo often and ſo juſtly complained of in the houſe of commons: that over and above the yearly allowance of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, many occaſional taxes, many exceſſive ſums were raiſed, and all ſunk in the bottomleſs gulf of ſecret ſervice. Two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds were raiſed in defiance of the ancient parliamentary methods, to ſecure the kingdom from a Swediſh invaſion: then the two inſurance offices were erected, and paid near three hundred thouſand pounds for their charters: our enmity with Sweden being changed into alliance, a ſubſidy of ſeventy-two thouſand pounds was implicitly granted, to fulfil ſome ſecret engagement with that crown: four-and-twenty thouſand pounds were given for burning merchant ſhips arrived from infected places, though the goods, which ought to have been deſtroyed for the public ſafety, were afterwards privately ſold: a ſum of five hundred thouſand pounds was demanded, and granted, for the paying the debts of the civil-liſt; and his majeſty declared, by meſſage, he was reſolved to retrench his expences for the future. Notwithſtanding this reſolution, in leſs than four years, a new demand of the like ſum was made and granted, to diſcharge new incumbrances: the Spaniſh ſhips of war which admiral Byng took in the Mediterranean were ſold for a conſiderable ſum of money: one hundred and twenty-five thouſand pounds were granted in the laſt ſeſſion, to be ſecretly diſpoſed of for the public utility; and there was ſtill a debt in the civil government, amounting to above ſix hundred thouſand pounds. He took notice, that this amazing extravagance happened under the conduct of perſons pretending to ſurpaſs all their predeceſſors in the knowledge and care of the public revenue: that as none of theſe ſums had been accounted for, they were, in all probability, employed in ſervices not fit to be owned. He ſaid, he heartily wiſhed that time, the great diſcoverer of hidden truths, and concealed iniquities, might produce a liſt of all ſuch as had been perverted from their public duty by private penſions: who had been the hired ſlaves and the corrupt inſtruments of a profuſe and vain-glorious adminiſtration. He propoſed, that inſtead of granting an addition to the civil-liſt, they ſhould reſtrict that revenue to a certain ſum, by concluding the queſtion with theſe words, 'in like manner as they were granted and continued to his late majeſty, ſo as to make up the clear yearly ſum of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds.' To theſe particulars, which were indeed unanſwerable, no reply was made. Even this mark of decency was laid aſide, as idle and ſuperfluous. The houſe agreed to the motion; and a bill was brought in for the better ſupport of his majeſty's houſehold. The commons having received a meſſage from the king, deſiring they would make further proviſion for the queen his concert, reſolved, 'that in caſe ſhe ſhould ſurvive his majeſty, the ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be ſettled upon her for life, charged upon the revenues of the civil-liſt, together with his majeſty's palace of Somerſet-houſe, and Richmond Old Park.' A bill was formed on this reſolution, which, as well as the other, paſſed both houſes: and received the royal aſſent on the 17th day of July, when the king, in a ſpeech to both houſes, expreſſed his ſatisfaction with their conduct; and congratulated them upon the wealth and glory of the nation, by which they had acquired ſuch weight in holding the balance of Europe. Then the lord-chancellor prorogued the parliament to the 29th day of Auguſt; but on the ſeventh of that month a proclamation was iſſued for diſſolving this, and convoking another.

In the interim ſome changes were made in different departments of civil œconomy. Lord viſcount Torrington was placed at the head of the admiralty: the earl of Weſtmorland was appointed firſt lord-commiſſioner of trade and plantations. Philip Dormer Stanhope, earl of Cheſterfield, a nobleman remarkable for his wit, eloquence, and poliſhed manners, was nominated ambaſſador to the Hague. The privy-council being diſſolved, another was appointed of the members then preſent. The duke of Devonſhire was dignified with the place of preſident; and the duke of St. Alban's was appointed maſter of the horſe. On the eleventh day of October the coronation of the king and queen was performed at Weſtminſter-abbey, with the uſual ſolemnity.[a] By this time the courts of France and Spain were perfectly reconciled: all Europe was freed from the calamities of war; and the peace of Great-Britain ſuffered no interruption, except from ſome tranſient tumults among the tinners of Cornwall, who, being provoked by a ſcarcity of corn, roſe in arms, and plundered the granaries of that county.

The elections in England and Scotland for the parliament having ſucceeded on the new ſyſtem, according to the wiſhes of the miniſtry, the two houſes met on the 23d day of January, when the commons unanimouſly choſe for their ſpeaker Arthur Onſlow, eſq. knight of the ſhire for Surry, a gentleman of extenſive knowledge, worth, and probity, grave, eloquent, venerable, and every way qualified for the diſcharge of that honourable and important office. The king, in his ſpeech to this new parliament, declared, that, by the laſt advices from abroad, he had reaſon to hope the difficulties which had hitherto retarded the execution of the preliminaries, and the opening of the congreſs, would ſoon be entirely removed: in the mean time he repreſented the abſolute neceſſity of continuing the preparations which had hitherto ſecured the nation, and prevented an open rupture in Europe. He promiſed, that his firſt care ſhould be to reduce from time to time the expence of the public, as often, and as ſoon as the intereſt and ſafety of his people would permit ſuch reduction. He expreſſed an earneſt deſire of ſeeing the foundation laid of an effectual ſcheme for the increaſe and encouragement of ſeamen in general, that they might be invited rather than compelled into the ſervice of their country. Finally, he recommended unanimity, zeal, and diſpatch of the public buſineſs. Thoſe ſpeeches, penned by the miniſter, were compoſed with a view to ſoothe the minds of the people into an immediate concurrence with the meaſures of the government; but without any intention of performing thoſe promiſes of œconomy, reformation, and national advantage. The two houſes ſeemed to vie with each other in expreſſions of applauſe and affection to his majeſty. The lords, in their addreſs, hailed him as the beſt of kings, and true father of his country. The commons expreſſed the warmeſt ſenſe of gratitude for the bleſſings they enjoyed in his reign, though it was not yet eight months old. They approved of all his tranſactions; promiſed to ſupport him in all his undetrakings; and declared they would chearfully grant whatever ſupplies ſhould be wanted for the public ſervice. Having conſidered the eſtimates which were laid before them by order of his majeſty, they voted two-and-twenty thouſand nine hundred and fifty-five men for guards and garriſons; and fifteen thouſand ſeamen for the ſervice of the enſuing year. They granted two hundred and thirty thouſand nine hundred and twenty-three pounds, for the maintenance of twelve thouſand Heſſian troops: a ſubſidy of fifty thouſand pounds to the king of Sweden; and half that ſum to the duke of Brunſwick Wolfenbuttel.[b] The expence of the year amounted to four millions, raiſed by a land-tax of three ſhillings in the pound, a malt-tax, and by borrowing of the bank one million ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand pounds; for which annuities to the amount of ſeventy thouſand pounds, to be raiſed by duties on coals imported into the city of London, were granted to that corporation.

All theſe ſums, however, were not granted without queſtion. The number of land-forces occaſioned a debate; and the Heſſian auxiliaries were not allowed without diſpute and oppoſition. When they deliberated on the loan of the Bank, mr. W. Pulteney obſerved, that the ſhifting of funds was but perpetuating taxes, and putting off the evil day: that notwithſtanding the great merit which ſome perſons had built on the ſinking fund, it appeared that the national debt had been increaſed ſince the ſetting up that pompous project. Some warm altercation paſſed between him and ſir Robert Walpole on this ſubject. The lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London preſented a petition, ſetting forth, that the duties already laid upon coals and culm, imported into London, affected the trade of that city only; that the inequality of the burthen was a great diſcouragement to their manufactures, and an hardſhip upon all the trading inhabitants. The petition was rejected, and the tax impoſed. The houſe having addreſſed the king for a particular and diſtinct account of the diſtribution of two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, charged to have been iſſued for ſecuring the trade and navigation of the kingdom, and preſerving and reſtoring the peace of Europe, he declined granting their requeſt, but ſignified in general, that part of the money had been iſſued and diſburſed by his late majeſty, and the remainder by himſelf, for carrying on the ſame neceſſary ſervices, which required the greateſt ſecrecy. Such a meſſage in the reign of king William would have raiſed a dangerous flame in the houſe of commons.

[1728] Mr W. Pultney inveighed againſt ſuch a vague and general way of accounting for the public money, as tending to render parliaments altogether inſignificant, to cover embezzlements, and to ſcreen corrupt and rapacious miniſters. The commons having taken into conſideration the ſtate of the national debt, examined the accounts, and interrogated the proper officers. A motion was made by a court member, that it appeared the monies already iſſued and applied towards diſcharging the national debts, together with a ſum to be iſſued at Lady-day, amounted to ſix millions ſix hundred forty-eight thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-two pounds, five ſhillings, one penny, one farthing. In vain did the leaders of the oppoſition expoſe the fallacious tendency of this motion. In vain did they demonſtrate the fraudulent artifice uſed in drawing up the accounts: the motion was carried; and ſeveral reſolutions were taken on the ſtate of the national debts. In the particular account of theſe debts, upon which the houſe reſolved to form a repreſentation to his majeſty, an article of three hundred thouſand pounds relating to the duty upon wrought plate was totally omitted. This extraordinary omiſſion being diſcovered, gave riſe to a very warm debate, and to very ſevere reflexions againſt thoſe who ſuperintended the public accounts. This error being rectified, a committee appointed for the purpoſe drew up the repreſentation, containing a particular detail of the national debts diſcharged and incurred ſince the twenty-fifth day of December, in the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixteen, with a ſtate of the ſinking fund and of the public credit. The draft being approved by the houſe, was preſented to the king, who received it graciouſly. He took this opportunity of ſaying, that the proviſion made for gradually diſcharging the national debt was now become ſo certain and conſiderable, that nothing, but ſome unforeſeen event could alter or diminiſh it: a circumſtance that afforded the faireſt proſpect of ſeeing the old debts diſcharged, without any neceſſity of incurring new incumbrances.

This anſwer, fraught with many other expreſſions of fatherly tenderneſs for his people, paved the way for a meſſage to the houſe, demanding a vote of credit to fulfil certain engagements entered into, and concerted with the advice and concurrence of the laſt parliament, for ſecuring the trade and navigation of the kingdom, and for reſtoring and preſerving the peace of Europe. Though a debate enſued upon this meſſage, the majority reſolved that an addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, declaring the duty and fidelity of the commons, their entire confidence in his royal care and goodneſs, and their readineſs to enable his majeſty to fulfil his engagements. A vote of credit paſſed accordingly. During this ſeſſion, the peers were chiefly employed in examining copies of ſeveral treaties and alliances which the king ſubmitted to their peruſal: they likewiſe prepared a bill for amending the ſtatute of limitation, which, however, did not paſs into a law: they conſidered the ſtate of the national debt a ſubject fruitful of debates: they paſſed the mutiny-bill, and thoſe that were ſent up from the commons, touching the ſupplies; together with an act, obliging ſhips arriving from infected places to perform quarantine; and ſome others of a more private nature. Theſe bills having received the royal aſſent, the king cloſed the ſeſſion on the twenty-eighth day of May, when he thanked the commons for the effectual ſupplies they had raiſed, and in particular, for having empowered him to borrow five hundred thouſand pounds for the diſcharge of wages due to the ſeamen employed in the navy.

England was at this period quite barren of remark-

[a] King George II. aſcended the throne in the 44th year of his age. On the 2d day of September, 1705, he eſpouſed the princeſs Wilhelmina Charlotte Caroline, daughter to John Frederick marquis of Brandenburgh-Anſpach, by whom he had two ſons, Frederick Louis Prince of Wales, born at Hanover, on the 31ſt day of January, 1707, and William Auguſtus, born at London, on the 15th day of April, 1721. She had likewiſe born four princeſſes, namely, Anne, Amelia, Carolina, Mary, and was afterwards delivered of Louiſa, married in the ſequel to the king of Denmark.

[b] Nothing could be a greater burleſque upon negotiation than this treaty of alliance concluded with the petty duke of Wolfenbuttel, who very gravely guarantees to his Britannic majeſty the poſſeſſion of his three kingdoms, and obliges him to ſupply his majeſty with five thouſand men, in conſideration of an annual ſubſidy of five-and-twenty thouſand pounds for four years.

able events. The king's uncle, Erneſt Auguſtus, prince of Brunſwick, duke of York, and biſhop of Oſnabruck, died on the third day of Auguſt, and was ſucceeded in the biſhoprick by the elector of Cologn, according to the pactum by which Oſnabruck is alternately poſſeſſed by the houſe of Brunſwick and that elector. In the beginning of December, his majeſty's eldeſt ſon prince Fredrick arrived in England from Hanover, where he had hitherto reſided, was introduced into the privy-council, and created prince of Wales. Signior Como, reſident from the duke of Parma, was ordered to quit the kingdom, becauſe his maſter paid to the pretender the honours due to the king of Great-Britain. The congreſs opened at Soiſſons, for determining all diſputes among the powers of Europe, proved ineffectual. Such difficulties occurred in ſettling and reconciling ſo many different pretenſions and intereſts, that the contracting parties in the alliance of Hanover propoſed a proviſional treaty, concerning which no definitive anſwer was given as yet by the courts of Vienna and Madrid. The fate of Europe, therefore, continued in ſuſpence: the Engliſh fleet lay inactive and rotting in the Weſt-Indies: the ſailors periſhed miſerably, without daring to avenge their country's wrongs; while the Spaniſh cruiſers committed depredations with impunity on the commerce of Great-Britain. The court of Spain, at this juncture, ſeemed cold and indifferent with regard to a pacification with England. It had renewed a good underſtanding with France, and now ſtrengthened its intereſt by a double alliance of marriage with the royal family of Portugal. The infanta of this houſe was betrothed to the prince of Auſtrias: while the Spaniſh infanta, formerly affianced to the French king, was now matched with the prince of Braſil, eldeſt ſon of his Portugueſe majeſty. In the month of January, the two courts met in a wooden houſe built over the little river Coya, that ſeparates the two kingdoms, and there the princeſſes were exchanged.

The parliament of Great-Britain meeting according to their laſt prorogation on the twenty-firſt day of January, the king in his ſpeech communicated the nature of the negotiation at the congreſs. He demanded ſuch ſupplies as might enable him to act vigorouſly in concert with his allies, provided his endeavours to eſtabliſh an advantageous peace ſhould miſcarry; and he hinted, that the dilatory conduct of the courts of Vienna and Madrid proceeded in a great meaſure from the hopes that were given, of creating diſcontents and diviſions among the ſubjects of Great-Britain. This ſuggeſtion was a miniſterial artifice to inflame the zeal and reſentment of the nation, and intimidate the members in the oppoſition. Accordingly the hint was purſued, and in the addreſſes from both houſes, that could not fail of being agreeable, conſidering the manner in which they were dictated, particular notice was taken of this article: both peers and commons expreſſed their deteſtation and abhorrence of thoſe, who, by ſuch baſe and unnatural artifices, ſuggeſted the means of diſtreſſing their country, and clamoured at the inconveniencies which they themſelves had occaſioned. In theſe addreſſes, likewiſe, the parliament congratulated his majeſty on the arrival of the prince of Wales in his Britiſh dominions; and the commons ſent a particular compliment to his royal highneſs on that occaſion. The eſtimates having been examined in the uſual form, the houſe voted fifteen thouſand ſeamen for the enſuing year; but the motion for continuing the ſame number of land-forces which had been allowed in the preceeding year, was not carried without diſpute. All the arguments againſt a ſtanding army in time of peace, as inconſiſtent with the Britiſh conſtitution, and dangerous to the liberties of the people, were repeated with great vivacity by mr. Shippen and mr. W. Pulteney. Theſe, however, were anſwered, and repreſented as abſurd, by mr. Horatio Walpole and mr. D. two ſtaunch adherents of the miniſter. The firſt had, in deſpite of nature, been employed in different negotiations: he was blunt, aukward, and ſlovenly: an orator without eloquence, an ambaſſador without dignity, and a plenipotentiary without addreſs. The other had natural parts and acquired knowledge; ſpoke with confidence; and in diſpute was vain, ſarcaſtic, petulant, and verboſe.

The ſubſidies to Sweden, Heſſe-Caſſel, and Wolfenbuttel were continued, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of ſir Joſeph Jekyll, mr. Lutwyche, and mr. Pulteney; which laſt obſerved, that as the Landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, and the duke of Brunſwick Wolfenbuttel, uſually maintained a certain number of troops in their pay, it was but reaſonable that Great-Britain ſhould defray no more than the expence of the additional forces which thoſe powers had raiſed, in conſequence of their conventions with the king of England. Sir Robert Walpole perceiving that this remark made an impreſſion on the houſe, thought it neceſſary to vindicate his meaſure: he expatiated upon the wiſdom of the late king, in concluding the Hanover alliance. He affirmed that the convention with Heſſe-Caſſel had prevented a war in the empire, for which the court of Vienna had made great preparations: that the emperor had not only augmented his own forces by the help of Spaniſh ſubſidies, but alſo retained the troops of three electors; and if he had not been over-awed by the Heſſians, would certainly have rejected the preliminaries, and all other advances towards a pacification: that, therefore, they ought not to grudge an expence which had already proved ſo beneficial to the tranquillity of Europe. Sir Joſeph Jekyll replied, that whatever gloſs might be put upon ſuch meaſures, they were repugnant to the the maxims by which England in former times had ſteered and ſquared its conduct with relation to its intereſt abroad: that the navy was the natural ſtrength of Great-Britain—its beſt defence and ſecurity: but if, in order to avoid a war, they ſhould be ſo free-hearted as to buy and maintain the forces of foreign princes, they were never like to ſee an end of ſuch extravagant expences. This gentleman, who exerciſed the office of maſter of the rolls, had approved himſelf a zealous defender of whig principles, was an able lawyer, a ſenſible ſpeaker, and a conſcientious patriot. The ſupplies were raiſed by a continuation of the land-tax, the duties upon malt, cyder, and perry, an additional impoſition on unmalted corn uſed in diſtilling, and by ſale of annuities to the Bank not exceeding fifty thouſand pounds per annum.

Petitions were delivered to the houſe of commons from the merchants of London, Liverpool, and Briſtol, complaining of the interruptions they had ſuffered in their trade for ſeveral years, by the depredations of the Spaniards in the Weſt-Indies. Theſe being conſidered, the houſe ordered the lords of the admiralty to produce the other memorials of the ſame kind which they had received, that they might be laid before the congreſs at Soiſſons: then they addreſſed his majeſty for copies of all the letters and inſtructions which had been ſent to admiral Hoſier, and thoſe who ſucceeded him in the command of the Weſt-India ſquadron. Mr Oglethorpe having been informed of ſhocking cruelties and oppreſſions exerciſed by gaolers upon their priſoners, moved for an examination into theſe practices, and was choſen chairman of a committee appointed to enquire into the ſtate of the gaols of the kingdom. They began with the Fleet-priſon, which they viſited in a body: there they found ſir William Rich, baronet, loaded with irons, by order of Bambridge the warden, to whom he had given ſome ſlight cauſe of offence. They made a diſcovery of many inhuman barbarities, which had been committed by that ruffian, and detected the moſt iniquitous ſcenes of fraud, villainy, and extortion. When the report was made by the committee, the houſe unanimouſly reſolved, that Thomas Bambridge, acting warden of the Fleet, had wilfully permitted ſeveral debtors to eſcape; had been guilty of the moſt notorious breaches of truſt, great extortions, and the higheſt crimes and miſdemeanours in the execution of his office; that he had abitrarily and unlawfully loaded with irons, put into dungeons, and deſtroyed priſoners for debt, under his charge, treating them in the moſt barbarous and cruel manner, in high violation and contempt of the laws of the kingdom. John Huggins, eſq. who had been warden of the Fleet-priſon, was ſubjected to a reſolution of the ſame nature. The houſe preſented an addreſs to the king, deſiring he would direct his attorney-general forthwith to proſecute theſe perſons and their accomplices, who were committed priſoners to Newgate. A bill was brought in, diſabling Bambridge to execute the office of warden; another for the better regulating the priſon of the Fleet; and for more effectual preventing and puniſhing arbitrary and illegal practices of the warden of the ſaid priſon. [a]

Other merchants complained by petitions of the loſſes ſuſtained by the Spaniards. The houſe, in a grand committee, deliberated on this ſubject, enquired into the particulars, examined evidence, and drew up an addreſs to the king, deſiring his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to uſe his utmoſt endeavours for preventing ſuch depredations; for procuring juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction and for ſecuring to his ſubjects the free exerciſe of commerce and navigation to and from the Britiſh colonies in America. The king aſſured them he would uſe his beſt endeavours to anſwer the deſires and expectations of his people, in an affair of ſo much importance; and they, in another addreſs, thanked him for his gracious anſwer. They did not, however, receive ſuch a ſatisfactory reply to a former addreſs, touching the ſum of ſixty thouſand pounds that had been ſtated in the public account, without ſpecification of the particular uſes to which it was applied His majeſty gave them to underſtand that the money had been iſſued and diſburſed for ſecret ſevices; and that a diſtinct and particular account of the diſtribution of it could not be given without a manifeſt prejudice to the public. A bill was prepared for the more effectual preventing bribery and corruption in elections for members of parliament; and it paſſed through the houſe without oppoſition: but their attention was chiefly employed upon the Spaniſh depredations, which had raiſed a great clamour through the whole kingdom, and excited very warm diſputes in parliament; for they were generally reputed the fruits of negligence, incapacity, or want of vigour in the miniſters. The commons having made further progreſs in the enquiry, and received freſh petitions from the merchants, paſſed ſome reſolutions, in which the Spaniards were accuſed of having violated the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns; and with having treated inhumanly the maſters and crews of ſhips belonging to Great-Britain. They juſtified the inſtructions given to admiral Hoſier, to ſeiſe and detain the flota and galleons of Spain, until juſtice and ſatisfaction ſhould be rendered to his majeſty and his alllies; nay, even declared that ſuch ſeiſure would have been juſt, prudent, and neceſſary, tending to prevent an open rupture, and to preſerve the peace and tranquility of Europe. They again addreſſed the king to uſe his endeavours to procure ſatisfaction; and he promiſed to comply with their requeſt.

Mr Scroope, member for Briſtol, moved for an addreſs, entreating his majeſty to order an account of the produce of the civil-liſt revenues for one year to be laid before the houſe. The addreſs was preſented, the account produced, and the houſe, in a grand committee, took this affair into conſideration. The courtiers affirmed that they fell ſhort of the eight hundred thouſand pounds ſettled upon his majeſty; and mr. Scroope propoſed that the ſum of one hundred and fifteen thouſand pounds ſhould be granted to the king, on account of thoſe deficiencies and arrears. The motion was vigorouſly oppoſed by mr. Pulteney and other members. They expreſſed their ſurpriſe that it ſhould be made ſo late in the ſeſſion, when no further demand of money could be reaſonably expected; and they ſaid it was more extraordinary, becauſe it appeared in the former ſeſſion, from the examination of the accounts than before the houſe, that the revenues of the civil-liſt produced yearly a much greater ſum than that for which they were given. Mr Pulteney moved that the accounts and papers ſhould be referred to the examination of a ſelect committee, properly empowered to inveſtigate the truth. The miniſters oppoſed this motion; and the queſtion being put, it paſſed in the negative. The majority voted the ſum demanded; and in a bill for ſettling the price of imported corn, they inſerted the reſolution for granting to his majeſty the ſum of one hundred and fifteen thouſand pounds, on account of arrears due on the civil-liſt revenues.

The houſe of lords having prepared a bill for the more effectual puniſhment of forgery, which was paſſed into a law, and ordered the judges to bring in another, on the report of a committee appointed to conſider the caſe of impriſoned debtors, at length deliberated upon the ſtate of the nation, particularly the poſitive demand made by the court of Spain for the reſtitution of Gibraltar, grounded on a letter written by the late king to his catholic majeſty. From a copy of the letter laid before the houſe, it plainly appeared that king George I. had conſented to this reſtitution. A motion being made for a reſolution, importing, that for the honour of his majeſty, and the preſervation and ſecurity of the trade and commerce of the kingdom, effectual care ſhould be taken in the preſent treaty that the king of Spain ſhould renounce all claim and pretenſion to Gibraltar and Minorca, in plain and ſtrong terms, a debate enſued, and the queſtion being put, paſſed in the negative, though not without a proteſt. Then the majority reſolved, that the houſe did entirely rely upon his majeſty, that he would, for the maintaining the honour and ſecuring the trade of this kingdom, take effectual care in the preſent treaty to preſerve his undoubted right to Gibraltar and Minorca. When the houſe examined the papers relating to the Spaniſh depredations, many ſevere reflections were uttered againſt the conduct of the miniſtry; and a motion was made, to reſolve that Hoſier's expedition was an unreaſonable burthen on the nation; but this too was rejected, and occaſioned another proteſt. Nor did the clauſe in the corn-bill, for granting 115,000l. to his majeſty, paſs through the houſe of peers without warm oppoſition. Divers lords alledged, that, inſtead of a deficiency in the civil-liſt revenues, there was a conſiderable ſurplus: that this was a new grant, and a new burthen on the people: that the nation was loaded, not to complete, but to augment the ſum deſigned for the civil-liſt; and this at a time when the public debts were increaſed; when the taxes were heavily felt in all parts of the country; when the foreign trade of Britain was incumbered and diminiſhed; when her manufactures were decayed; her poor multiplied; and ſhe was ſurrounded by many other national calamities. They obſerved, that if the produce of the civil-liſt revenue ſhould not amount to the yearly ſum of 800,000l. the deficiency muſt be made good to his majeſty by the public; whereas no proviſion was made, by which, if the produce of theſe revenues ſhould exceed that ſum, the ſurplus could accrue to the benefit of the public: that, by this precedent, not only real deficiencies were to be made good, but alſo ſupplies were to be given for arrears ſtanding out at the end of every year, which ſhould come on before the ſupplies could be granted, though the ſupply given to make good arrears in one year would certainly increaſe the ſurpluſages in another: that the revenues of the civil-liſt were variable in their own nature; and even when there is a deficiency in the produce, there might be arrears in the receipt; theſe might be eaſily increaſed by the management of deſigning miniſters, by private directions to receivers, and by artful methods of ſtating accounts. All theſe arguments, and other objections equally ſtrong and plauſible, againſt this unconſcionable and unparliamentary motion, ſerved only to evince the triumph of the miniſtry over ſhame and ſentiment, their contempt of public ſpirit, and their defiance of national reproach.[d]

[1729] The king had, on the 24th day of March, given the royal aſſent to five bills; and on the 14th day of May, the ſame ſanction was given to thirty other bills, including an act, enabling the queen to be regent during his majeſty's abſence, without taking the oaths; and another for the relief of inſolvent debtors. At the ſame time two-and-thirty private bills were paſſed: then the king expreſſed his approbation of the parliament, ſignified his intention to viſit his German dominions, and ordered the chancellor to prorogue both houſes. His majeſty having appointed the queen regent of the realm, ſet out for Hanover, on the 17th day of May, in order to remove a petty miſunderſtanding which had happened between that electorate and the court of Berlin. Some Hanoverian ſubjects had been preſſed or decoyed into the ſervice of Pruſſia; and the regents of Hanover had ſeiſed certain Pruſſian officers, by way of repriſal. The whole united kingdom of Great-Britain at this juncture enjoyed uninterrupted repoſe; and commerce continued to increaſe, in ſpite of all reſtriction and diſcouragement. The people of Ireland found themſelves happy under the government of lord Carteret; and their parliament, aſſembling in the month of September, approved themſelves the fathers of their country. They eſtabliſhed funds for the diſcharge of their national debt, and for maintaining the expence of government: they enacted wholeſome laws for the encouragement of manufactures, trade, and agriculture; and they formed wiſe regulations in different branches of civil œconomy. Some time after this ſeſſion, which was conducted with ſo much harmony and patriotiſm, lord Carteret returned to England; and was ſucceeded by the duke of Dorſet in the government of that kingdom. In the month of May, Charles Townſhend reſigned the ſeals, which were given to colonel Stanhope, now created earl of Harrington; ſo ſir R. W. now reigned without a rival. James earl of Waldgrave was appointed ambaſſador to the court of France, which, about that time, was filled with joy by the birth of a dauphin.

In the month of September, Victor Amadeus, king of Sardinia, reſigned his crown to his ſon Charles Emanuel, prince of Piedmont. The father reſerved to himſelf a revenue of one hundred thouſand piſtoles per annum, retired to the caſtle of Chamberry, and eſpouſed the counteſs dowager of St. Sebaſtian, who declined the title of queen, but aſſumed that of marchioneſs of Somerive. Though the congreſs at Soiſſons proved abortive, conferences were begun at Seville, between the plenipotentiaries of England, [d] The peers that diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the oppoſition were Beaufort, Strafford, Craven, Foley, Lichfield, Scarſdale, Gower, Mountjoy, Plymouth, Bathurſt, Northampton, Coventry, Oxford and Mortimer, Willoughby de Broke, Boyle, and Warrington.

France, and Spain; and a treaty was concluded on the 9th of November, not only without the concurrence of the emperor, but even contrary to his right, as eſtabliſhed by the quadruple alliance. On this ſubject he communicated an imperial commiſſorial decree to the ſtates of the empire aſſembled in the diet at Ratiſbon, which was anſwered by the French miniſter de Chavigny. In October, Peter II. czar of Muſcovy, and grandſon of Peter I. died in the 15th year of his age, at Moſcow, and was ſucceeded on the Ruſſian throne by the princeſs Anne Ivanowna, ſecond daughter of John Alexowitz, eldeſt brother of the firſt Peter, and widow of Frederick William duke of Courland. The following month was rendered remarkable by the death of Pope Benedict XIII. in whoſe room cardinal Laurence Corſini was raiſed to the pontificate, and aſſumed the name of Clement XII.

The Britiſh parliament aſſembling on the 13th of January, the king gave them to underſtand, that the peace of Europe was now eſtabliſhed by the treaty of Seville, built upon the foundation of former treaties, and tending to render more effectual what the contracting powers in the quadruple alliance were before engaged to ſee performed. He aſſured them that all former conventions made with Spain in favour of the Britiſh trade and navigation were renewed and confirmed: that the free uninterrupted exerciſe of their commerce was reſtored: that the court of Spain had agreed to an ample reſtitution and reparation for unlawful ſeiſures and depredations: that all rights, privileges, and poſſeſſions, belonging to him and his allies, were ſolemnly re-eſtabliſhed, confirmed, and guaranteed; and that not one conceſſion was made to the prejudice of his ſubjects. He told them he had given orders for reducing a great number of his land-forces, and for laying up great part of the fleet; and obſerved that there would be a conſiderable ſaving in the expence of the current year. After both houſes had preſented their addreſſes of thanks and congratulation to the king on the peace of Seville, the lords took that treaty into conſideration, and it did not paſs enquiry without ſevere animadverſion.

The lords in the oppoſition excepted to the article by which the merchants of Great-Baitain were obliged to make proof of their loſſes at the court of Spain. They ſaid this ſtipulation was a hardſhip upon Britiſh ſubjects, and diſhonourable to the nation: that few would care to undertake ſuch a troubleſome and expenſive journey, eſpecially as they had reaſon to apprehend their claims would be counterbalanced by the Spaniards; and, after all, they would have no more but the ſlender comfort of hoping to obtain that addreſs by commiſſaries which they had not been able to procure by plenipotentiaries. They thought it very extraordinary, that Great-Britain ſhould be bound to ratify and guarantee whatever agreement ſhould be made between the king of Spain and the dukes of Parma and Tuſcany, concerning the garriſons once eſtabliſhed to their countries: that the Engliſh ſhould be obliged to aſſiſt in effectuating the introduction of ſix thouſand Spaniſh troops into the towns of Tuſcany and Parma, without any ſpecification of the methods to be taken, or the charge to be incurred in giving their aſſiſtance: that they ſhould guarantee for ever, not only to Don Carlos, but even to all his ſucceſſors, the poſſeſſion of the eſtates of Tuſcany and Parma; a ſtipulation which in all probability would involve Great-Britain in endleſs quarrels and diſputes, about a country with which they had no concern. They affirmed that the treaty of Seville, inſtead of confirming other treaties, was contradictory to the quadruple alliance, particularly in the article of introducing Spaniſh troops into Tuſcany and Parma, in the room of neutral forces ſtiptulated by the former alliance; and agreeing that they ſhould there remain until Don Carlos and his ſucceſſors ſhould be ſecure and exempt from all events. They complained that theſe alterations, from the tenour of the quadruple alliance were made without the concurrence of the emperor, and even without inviting him to accede; an affront which might alienate his friendſhip from England, and hazard the loſs of ſuch an ancient, powerful, and faithful ally: they declared that throughout the whole treaty there ſeemed to be an artful omiſſion of any expreſs ſtipulation, to ſecure Great-Britain in her right to Gibraltar and Minorca. Such was the ſubſtance of the objections made to the peace; then lord Bathurſt moved for a reſolution, that the agreement on the treaty of Seville, to ſecure the ſucceſſion of Don Carlos to the duchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, with Spaniſh troops, was a manifeſt violation of the 5th article of the quadruple alliance, tending to involve the nation in a dangerous and expenſive war, and to deſtroy the balance of power in Europe. The queſtion was put, and the motion rejected. Such too was the fate of two other motions, to reſolve that Great-Britain's right of ſovereignty, dominion, poſſeſſion, and claim to Gibraltar and Minorca, were not aſcertained by the treaty of Seville; and that the ſtipulations in that treaty for repairing the loſſes of the Britiſh merchants were inſufficient and precarious. The majority, far from ſtigmatiſing this tranſaction, reſolved, that the treaty did contain all neceſſary ſtipulations for maintaining and ſecuring the honour, dignity, rights and poſſeſſions of the crown: that all due care was taken therein for the ſupport of the trade of the kingdom, and for repairing the loſſes ſuſtained by the Britiſh merchants. On theſe reſolutions an addreſs of approbation was founded: but, when a motion was made for an addreſs to his majeſty, that he would order to lay before the houſe a liſt of all penſions payable to the crown, it was immediately reſolved in the negative. Divers conteſts of the ſame kind aroſe upon the mutiny-bill, the penſion-bill, and the maintenance of the twelve thouſand Heſſians; but the miniſtry bore down all oppoſion, though their triumphs were clogged with vigorous proteſts, which did not fail to make impreſſion upon the body of the people.

Nor was the ſucceſs of the court intereſt in the houſe of commons altogether pure and free from exception and diſpute. When the charge of the land-forces fell under the conſideration of the commons, and mr. Henry Pelham, ſecretary at war, moved that the number of effective men for the land-ſervice of the enſuing year ſhould be fixed at 17,709, mr. Pulteney inſiſted upon its being reduced to 12000. Mr Shippen affirmed, that mr. Pelham's motion was a flat negative to the addreſs for which he voted on the firſt day of the ſeſſion, as if plainly implied a diſtruſt of the validity of the treaty, which he then aſſured the houſe would immediately produce all the bleſſings of an abſolute peace; and deliver the kingdom from the apprehenſions and inconvenience of a war. He ſaid the motion tended directly towards the eſtabliſhment of an army in Great-Britain, which he hoped would never be ſo far Germaniſed, as tamely to ſubmit to a military government. He obſerved that the nation could have no occaſion for all the troops that were demanded, conſidering the glorious ſcene of affairs which was now opened to all Europe. 'They are not neceſſary (ſaid he) to awe Spain into a firm adherence to his own treaty; they are not neceſſary to force the emperor into an immediate acceſſion; nor are they in any ſort neceſſary for the ſafety of his majeſty's perſon and government. Force and violence are the reſort of uſurpers and tyrants only; becauſe they are, with good reaſon, diſtruſtful of the people whom they oppreſs; and becauſe they have no other ſecurity for the continuance of their unlawful and unnatural dominion, than what depends entirely on the ſtrength of their armies.' The motion, however, was carried in the affirmative.'

Another warm debate was excited by a bill which the courtiers brought in, to prevent any ſubjects of Great-Britain from advancing ſums of money to foreign princes or ſtates, without having obtained licenſe from his majeſty, under his privy-ſeal, or ſome greater authority. The miniſter pretended that this law was propoſed to diſable the emperor, who wanted to borrow a great ſum of the Engliſh merchants, for raiſing and maintaining troops to diſturb the tranquility of Europe. The bill contained a clauſe, empowering the king to prohibit by proclamation all ſuch loans of money, jewels, or bullion: the attorney-general was empowered to compel, by Engliſh bill, in the court of Exchequer, the effectual diſcovery, on oath, of any ſuch loans; and it was enacted, that in default of an anſwer to any ſuch bill the court ſhould declare a limited ſum againſt the perſon refuſing to anſwer. Mr Daniel Pulteney, a gentleman of uncommon talents and ability, and particularly acquainted with every branch of commerce, argued ſtrenuouſly againſt this bill, as a reſtraint upon trade that would render Holland the market of Europe, and the mart of the money to the nations of the continent. He ſaid, that by this general prohibition, extending to all princes, ſtates, or potentates, the Engliſh were totally diſabled from aſſiſting their beſt allies: that among others the king of Portugal frequently borrowed money of the Engliſh merchants reſiding within his dominions: that while the licenſing power remained in the crown, the licenſes would be iſſued through the hands of the miniſter, who by this new trade might gain twenty, thirty, or forty thouſand a-year: that the bill would render the Exchequer a court of inquiſion; and that whilſt it reſtrained our merchants from aſſiſting the princes and powers of Europe, it permitted our ſtoc-jobbers to trade in their funds without interruption. Other arguments of equal weight were enforced by mr. Barnard, a merchant of London, who perfectly underſtood trade in all its branches, ſpoke with judgment and preciſion, and upon all occaſions ſteadily adhered to the intereſts and liberties of his country. After having explained his reaſons, he declared he ſhould never conſent to a bill which he deemed a violation of our fundamental laws, a breach of our deareſt liberties, and a very terrible hardſhip on mankind. Sir William Wyndham diſtinguiſhed himſelf on the ſame ſide of the queſtion: the bill was vindicated by ſir Robert Walpole, mr. Pelham, and ſir Philip Yorke, attorney-general; and being ſupported by the whole weight of miniſterial influence, not only paſſed through the houſe, but was afterwards enacted into a law.

The ſubſides were continued to the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel and the duke of Brunſwick-Wolfenbuttel, in ſpite of all that could be urged againſt theſe extraneous incumberances; and the ſupply for the enſuing year was granted according to the eſtimates which the miniſtry thought proper to produce, amounting to about 2,280,000l. It muſt be owned, however, for the credit of this ſeſſion, that the houſe appropriated one million of the ſurpluſes ariſing from the ſinking fund towards the diſcharge of the national debt: and by another act extinguiſhed the duties upon ſalt, by which expedient the ſubject was eaſed of a heavy burthen, not only in being freed from the duty, but alſo from a conſiderable charge of ſalaries given to a great number of officers employed to collect this impoſition. They likewiſe encouraged the colony of Carolina with an act, allowing the planters and traders of that province to export rice directly to any part of Europe ſouthward of Cape Finiſterre; and they permitted ſalt from Europe to be imported into the colony of New-York. The term of the excluſive trade granted by act of parliament to the Eaſt-India company drawing towards a period, many conſiderable merchants and others made application for being incorporated and veſted with the privilege of trading to thoſe countries, propoſing to lay that branch of trade open to all the ſubjects of Great-Britain, on certain conditions. In conſideration of an act of parliament for this purpoſe, they offered to advance 3,200,000l. for redeeming the fund and trade of the preſent Eaſt-India company. This propoſal was rejected; and the excluſive privilege veſted in the company was, by act of parliament, protracted to the year 1766, upon the following conditions: that they ſhould pay into the Exchequer the ſum of 200,000l. towards the ſupplies of the year, without intereſt or addition to the capital ſtoc: that the annuity or yearly fund of 160,000l. payable to them from the public, ſhould be reduced to 128,000l. that after the year 1766, their right to the excluſive trade ſhould be liable to be taken away by parliament, on three years notice, and repayment of their capital.

[1730] On the 15th of May the king went to the houſe of peers, and cloſed the ſeſſion. In this ſpeech he expreſſed his joy, that, notwithſtanding all the clamours which were raiſed, the parliament had approved of thoſe matters which fell under their conſideration; a circumſtance which, he ſaid, could not fail to inſpire all mankind with a juſt deteſtation of thoſe incendiaries, who, by ſcandalous libels, laboured to alienate the affections of his people; to fill their minds with groundleſs jealouſies and unjuſt complaints, in diſhonour of him and his government, and in defiance of the ſenſe of both houſes of parliament.[c] The emperor was ſo much incenſed at the inſult offered to him in the treaty of Seville, with reſpect to the garriſons of Tuſcany and Parma, that he prohibited the ſubjects of Great-Britain from trading in his dominions: he began to make preparations for war, and actually detached bodies of troops to Italy, with ſuch diſpatch as had been very ſeldom exerted by the houſe of Auſtria. Yet the article of which he complained was not ſo much a real injury as an affront put upon the head of the empire; for the eventual ſucceſſion to thoſe Italian duchies had been ſecured to the infant, Don Carlos, by the quadruple alliance; and all that the emperor required, was, that this prince ſhould receive the inveſtiture of them as fiefs of the empire.

In Great-Britain, this year was not diſtinguiſhed by any tranſaction of great moment. Seven chiefs of the Cherokee nations of Indians in America were brought to England by ſir Alexander Cumin. Being introduced to the king, they laid their crown and regalia at his feet; and by an authentic deed acknowledged themſelves ſubjects to his dominion, in the name of all their compatriots, who had veſted them with full powers for this purpoſe. They were amazed and confounded at the riches and magnificence of the Britiſh court: they compared the king and queen to the ſun and moon, the princes to the ſtars of heaven, and themſelves to nothing. They gave their aſſent in the moſt ſolemn manner to articles of friendſhip and commerce, propoſed by the lords-commiſſioners for trade and plantations; and being loaded with preſents of neceſſaries, arms, and ammunition, were conveyed to their own country, which borders on the province of South-Carolina. In the month of September a ſurpriſing revolution was effected at Conſtantinople, without bloodſhed or confuſion. A few mean Janiſſaries diſplayed a flag in the ſtreets, exclaiming that all true Muſſulmen ought to follow them, and aſſiſt in reforming the government. They ſoon increaſed to the number of one hundred thouſand, marched to the Seraglio, and demanded the grand vizir, the kaja, and captain Pacha. Theſe unhappy miniſters were immediately ſtrangled. Their bodies being delivered to the inſurgents, were dragged through the ſtreets; and afterwards thrown to the dogs to be devoured. Not contented with this ſacrifice, the revolters depoſed the grand ſignor Achmet, who was confined to the ſame priſon from whence they brought his nephew Machmut, and raiſed this laſt to the throne, after he had lived 27 years in confinement.

England was at this period infeſted with robbers, aſſaſſins, and incendiaries, the natural conſequences of degeneracy, corruption, and the want of police in the interior government of the kingdom. This defect, in a great meaſure, aroſe from an abſurd notion, that laws neceſſary to prevent thoſe acts of cruelty, violence and rapine, would be incompatible with the liberty of Britiſh ſubjects; a notion that confounds all diſtinctions between liberty and brutal licentiouſneſs, as if that freedom was deſirable in the enjoyment of which people find no ſecurity for their lives or effects. The peculiar depravity of the times was viſible even in the conduct of thoſe who preyed upon the the commonwealth. Thieves and robbers were now become more deſperate and ſavage than ever they had appeared ſince mankind was civilized. In the exceſs of their rapine, they wounded, maimed, and even murdered the unhappy ſufferers, through a wantonneſs of barbarity. They circulated letters, demanding ſums of money from certain individuals, on pain of reducing their houſes to aſhes, and their families to ruin; and even ſet fire to the houſe of a rich merchant in Briſtol, who had refuſed to comply with their demand. The ſame ſpecies of villainy was practiſed in different parts of the kingdom; ſo that government was obliged to interpoſe, and offer a conſiderable reward for diſcovering the ruffians concerned in ſuch execrable deſigns.

In the ſpeech with which the king opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the 21ſt of January, he told them, that the preſent critical conjuncture ſeemed in a very particular manner to deſerve their attention: that as the tranſactions then depening in the ſeveral courts of Europe were upon the point of being determined, the great event of peace or war might be very much affected by the firſt reſolutions, which were expected by different powers with great impatience. He ſaid, the continuance of that zeal and vigour with which they had hitherto ſupported him and his engagements muſt at this time be of the greateſt weight and importance, both with regard to his allies, and to thoſe who might be diſpoſed, before the ſeaſon of the action, to prevent by an accommodation the fatal conſequences of a general rupture. The former ſcene was repeated. Both houſes, in their addreſſes, promiſed to ſupport his majeſty in all his engagements: yet the members in the oppoſition demonſtrated the abſurdity of promiſing to fulfil engagements, before they could poſſibly know whether or not they were for the ſervice of Great-Britain. Another bill was brought into the houſe of commons, to prevent penſioners from ſitting as members of parliament; and, after a third reading, carried up to the lords for their concurrence. When the ſupply fell under conſideration, the debates were renewed upon the ſubſides to the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel and the duke of Wolfenbuttel, which, however were continued; and every article was granted according to the eſtimates given in for the expence of the enſuing year. Two petitions being preſented to the commons, repreſenting the delays of juſtice, occaſioned by the uſe of the Latin tongue in proceedings at law, a bill was brought in for changing this practice, and enacting, That all thoſe proceſſes and pleadings ſhould be entered in the Engliſh language. Though one would imagine that very little could be advanced againſt ſuch a regulation, the bill met with warm oppoſition, on pretence that it would render uſeleſs the ancient records which were written in the language, and introduce confuſion and delay of juſtice, by altering the eſtabliſhed form and method of pleading: in ſpite of theſe objections, it paſſed through both houſes, and obtained the royal aſſent. A great number of merchants from different parts of the kingdom having repeated their complaints of depredations and cruelties committed by the Spaniards in the Weſt-Indies, their petitions were referred to the conſideration of a grand committee. Their complaints upon examination appeared to be well founded. The houſe preſented an addreſs to the king, deſiring his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to continue his endeavour to prevent ſuch depredations for the future; to procure full ſatisfaction for the damages already ſuſtained; and to ſecure to the Britiſh ſubjects the full and uninterrupted exerciſe of their trade and navigation to and from the Britiſh colonies in America. The bill againſt penſions produced a warm debate in the houſe of lords, where it was violently oppoſed by the dukes of Newcaſtle, and Argyle, the earl of Ilay, and dr. Sherlock, biſhop of Bangor. This prelate, in a remarkable ſpeech, repreſented it as a ſcheme to enlarge the power of the houſe of commons, and to break the balance between the powers eſſential to the conſtitution, ſo as ſooner or later to prove the ruin of the whole. The great barrier provided againſt bribery and corruption by this bill conſiſted in an oath to be impoſed on all members of the lower houſe, by which they muſt have ſolemnly ſworn and declared, that they had not directly, nor indirectly, any penſion during pleaſure, or for any number of years, or any office in part, or in the whole, held for them, or for their benefit, by any perſons whatſoever; and that they would not accept any ſuch penſions or offices, without ſignifying the ſame to the houſe within fourteen days after they ſhould be received or accepted. The bill was vindicated as juſt and neceſſary by the earls of Winchelſea and Strafford, lord Bathurſt, and lord Carteret, who had by this time joined as an auxiliary in the oppoſition. [f] [1731] The houſe of peers proceeded to conſider the ſtate of the national debt: they read a bill for the free importation of wool from Ireland into England, which was fiercely oppoſed, and laid aſide, contrary to all the rules of ſound policy. They paſſed the bill for carrying on proceedings at law in the Engliſh language; and a fruitleſs motion was made by lord Bathurſt for an addreſs, to deſire his majeſty would give directions for diſcharging the Heſſian troops that were in the pay of Great-Britain. On the 7th day of May the parliament was prorogued, after the king had given them to underſtand, that all apprehenſions of a war were now happily removed, by a treaty ſigned at Vienna, between him and the emperor. He ſaid it was communicated to the courts of France and Spain, as parties to the treaties of Seville, the execution of which it principally regarded; and that it was likewiſe ſubmitted to the conſideration of the ſtates-general. He obſerved, that the conditions and engagements into which he had entered on this occaſion were agreeable to that neceſſary concern which the Britiſh nation muſt always have for the ſecurity and preſervation of the balance of power in Europe: and that this happy turn, duly improved with a juſt regard to former alliances, yielded a favourable proſpect of ſeeing the public tranqility re-eſtabliſhed.

[c] In the courſe of this ſeſſion the commons paſſed a bill for making more effectual the laws in being, for diſabling perſons from being choſen members of parliament who enjoyed any penſion during pleaſure, or for any number of years, or any offices holden in truſt for them, by obliging all perſons hereafter to be choſen to ſerve for the commons in parliament, to take the oath therein mentioned. In all probability this bill would not have made its way through the houſe of commons had not the miniſter been well aſſured it would ſtic with the upper houſe, where it was rejected at the ſecond reading, though not without violent oppoſition.

In the month of January the duke of Parma died, after having made a will, in which he declared his ducheſs was three months advanced in her pregnancy; intreating the allied powers of Europe to have compaſſion upon his people, and defer the execution of their projects until his conſort ſhould be delivered. In caſe the child ſhould be ſtill-born, or die after the birth, he bequeathed his dominions and allodial eſtates to the infant Don Carlos of Spain; and appointed five regents to govern the duchy. Notwithſtanding this diſpoſition, a body of imperial troops immediately took poſſeſſion of Parma and Placentia, under the command of general Stampa, who declared they ſhould conduct themſelves with all poſſible regularity and moderation, and leave the adminiſtration entirely to the regents whom the duke had appointed. They publicly proclaimed in the market-place, that they took poſſeſſion of theſe duchies for the infant, Don Carlos: and that if the ducheſs dowager ſhould not be delivered of a prince, the ſaid infant might receive the inveſtiture from the emperor whenever he would, provided he ſhould come without an army. Though theſe ſteps ſeemed to threaten an immediate war, the king of Great-Britain and the ſtates-general interpoſed their mediation ſo effectually with the court of Vienna, that the emperor deſiſted from the proſecution of his deſign; and on the 16th day of March concluded at Vienna a treaty with his Britannic majeſty, by which he conſented to withdraw his troops from Parma and Placentia. He agreed, That the king of Spain might take poſſeſſion of theſe places in favour of his ſon don Carlos, according to the treaty of Seville. He likewiſe agreed, that the Oſtend company, which had given ſuch umbrage to the maritime powers, ſhould be totally diſſolved, on condition that the contracting powers concerned in the treaty of Seville ſhould guarantee the pragmatic ſanction, or ſucceſſion of the Auſtrian hereditary dominions to the heirs female of the emperor, in caſe he ſhould die without male iſſue. The Dutch miniſter reſiding at the imperial court did not ſubſcribe this treaty, becauſe, by the maxims received in that republic, and the nature of her government, he could not be veſted with full powers ſo ſoon as it would have been neceſſary: nevertheleſs, the ſtates-general were, by a ſeparate article, expreſsly named as a principal contracting party.

On the 22d day of July a new treaty was ſigned at Vienna between the emperor and the kings of Great-Britain and Spain, tending to confirm the former. In Auguſt a treaty of union and defenſive alliance between the electorates of Saxony and Hanover was executed at Dreſden.

The court of Spain expreſſing ſome doubts with regard to the pregnancy of the ducheſs of Parma, ſhe underwent a formal examination by five midwives of different nations, in preſence of the older ducheſs dowager, ſeveral ladies of quality, three phyſicians, and a ſurgeon; and was declared with child: nevertheleſs, after having kept all Europe in ſuſpence for ſix months, ſhe owned ſhe had been deceived; and general Stampa, with the imperial forces, took formal poſſeſſion of the duchies of Parma and Placentia.

Spain and the great duke of Tuſcany having acceded to the laſt treaty of Vienna, the crown of Great-Britain engaged to equip an armament that ſhould convey don Carlos to his new dominions. Accordingly, ſir Charles Wager ſailed with a ſtrong ſquadron from Portſmouth on the 26th day of Auguſt; and in September arrived at Barcelona, where being joined by the Spaniſh fleet and tranſports, they ſailed together to Leghorn; from whence the admiral returned to England. Don Carlos paſſed through part of France, and embarking at Antibes on board of the Spaniſh gallies, arrived at Leghorn in December. Then the imperial general withdrew his forces into Milaneſe; and the infant took poſſeſſion of his new territories.

During theſe tranſactions France was diſtracted by religious diſputes, occaſioned by the bull unigenitus thundered againſt the doctrines of Janſenius; a bull which had produced a ſchiſm in the Gallican church, and well nigh involved that country in civil war and confuſion. It was oppoſed by the parliaments and lay tribunals of the kingdom; but many biſhops, and the jeſuits in general, were its moſt ſtrenuous aſſerters. All the artifices of prieſtcraft were practiſed on both ſides, to inflame the enthuſiaſm, and manage the ſuperſtition of the people. Pretended miracles were wrought at the tombe of abbé Paris, who had died without accepting the bull, conſequently was declared damned by the abettors of that conſtitution. On the other hand, the jeſuits exerted all their abilities and induſtry in preaching againſt the Janſeniſts; in eſtabliſhing an opinion of their ſuperior ſanctity; and inſpiring a ſpirit of quietiſm among their votaries, who were tranſported into the delirium of poſſeſſion, illumination, and ſupernatural converſe. Theſe arts were often uſed for the moſt infamous purpoſes. Female enthuſiaſts were wrought up to ſuch a violence of agitations, that nature fainted under the ſtruggle, and the pſeudo-ſaint ſeiſed this opportunity of violating the chaſtity of his penitent. Such was ſaid to be the caſe of mademoiſelle la Cadiere, a young gentlewoman of Toulon, abuſed in this manner by the luſt and villainy of Pere Girard a noted jeſuit, who underwent a trial before the parliament of Aix, and very narrowly eſcaped the ſtake.

[f] Nothing was heard within doors in parliament, but ſarcaſtic repartee and violent declamation between the two parties, who did not confine their alercation to theſe debates, but took the field againſt each other in periodical papers, and occaſioned pamphlets. The paper called the Craftſman had already riſen into high reputaion all over England, for the wit, humour, and ſolid reaſoning it contained. Some of the beſt writers in the oppoſition, including lord Bolingbroke and mr. P. made uſe of this vehicle to convey their animadverſions upon the miniſter, who, on his ſide, employed the moſt wretched ſcriblers to defend his conduct. It was in conſequence of two political pamphlets, written in oppoſition to each other, by lord Harvey and mr. P. and ſome recrimination they produced in the houſe of commons, that his lordſhip challenged the other to ſingle combat, and had well nigh loſt his life in the duel, which was fought in Hyde-Park.

The parliament of Great-Britain meeting on the 13th day of January, the king in his ſpeech declared, that the general tranquillity of Europe was reſtored and eſtabliſhed by the laſt treaty of Vienna: that don Carlos was actually poſſeſſed of Parma and Placentia: that ſix thouſand Spaniards were quietly admitted and quartered in the duchy of Tuſcany, to ſecure, by the expreſs conſent and agreement of the great duke, the reverſion of his dominions; and that a family convention was made between the courts of Spain and Tuſcany, for preſerving mutual peace and friendſhip in the two houſes. He told the commons, that the eſtimates for the ſervice of the current year would be conſiderably leſs than thoſe of former years. He recommended unanimity: he obſerved that this government had no ſecurity but what was equally conducive to their happineſs, and to the protection of his people: that their poſterity had no foundation but in the defence and ſupport of his government. 'Our ſafety (ſaid he) is mutual, and our intereſts are inſeparable.'

The oppoſition to the court meaſures appears to have been uncommonly ſpirited during the courſe of this ſeſſion. The miniſter's motions were attacked with all the artillery of elocutions. His principal emiſſaries were obliged to taſk their faculties to their full exertion, to puzzle and perplex where they could not demonſtrate and convince, to miſrepreſent what they could not vindicate, and elude the arguments which they could not refute. In the houſe of commons lord Harvey, lately appointed vice-chamberlain of his majeſty's houſehold, made a motion for an addreſs of thanks, in which they ſhould declare their entire approbation of the king's conduct, acknowledge the bleſſings they enjoyed under his government, expreſs their confidence in the wiſdom of his councils; and declare their readineſs to grant the neceſſary ſupplies. This member, ſon to the earl of Briſtol, was a nobleman of ſome parts, which, however were more ſpecious than ſolid. He condeſcended to act as a ſubaltern to the miniſter, and approved himſelf extremely active in forwarding all his deſigns, whether as a ſecret emiſſary or public orator; in which laſt capacity he appears to have been pert, frivolous, and frothy. His motion was ſeconded by mr. Clutterbuck, and oppoſed by ſir Wilfred Lawſon, mr. Shippen, mr. W. Pulteney, ſir William Wyndham, and mr. Oglethorpe. They did not argue againſt a general addreſs of thanks; but expoſed the abſurdity and bad tendency of expreſſions which implied a blind approbation of all the meaſures of the miniſtry. Sir Wilfred Lawſon obſerved, that notwithſtanding the great things we had done for the crown of Spain, and the favours we had procured for the royal family of that kingdom, little or no ſatisfaction had as yet been received for the injuries our merchants had ſuſtained from that nation. Mr Pulteney took notice, that the nation, by becoming guarantee to the pragmatic ſanction, laid itſelf under an obligation to aſſiſt the Auſtrian family when attacked by any potentate whatever, except the grand ſignor: that they might be attacked when it would be much againſt the intereſt of the kingdom to engage itſelf in a war upon any foreign account: that it might one day be for the intereſt of the nation to join againſt them, in order to preſerve the balance of Europe, the eſtabliſhing of which had already coſt England ſuch immenſe ſums of money. He inſiſted upon the abſurdity of concluding ſuch a number of inconſiſtent treaties; and concluded with ſaying, that if affairs abroad were now happily eſtabliſhed, the miniſtry which conducted them might be compared to a pilot, who, though there was a clear, ſafe, and ſtraight channel into port, yet took it into his head to carry the ſhip a great way about, through ſands, rocs, and ſhallows: who after having loſt a great number of ſeamen, deſtroyed a great deal of tackle and rigging, and ſubjected the owners to an enormous expence, at laſt by chance hits the port, and triumphs in his good conduct. Sir William Wyndham ſpoke to the ſame purpoſe. Mr Oglethorpe, a gentleman of unblemiſhed character, brave, generous, and humane, affirmed that many other things related more nearly to the honour and intereſt of the nation than did the guarantee of the pragmatic ſanction. He ſaid he wiſhed to have heard that the new works at Dunkirk had been entirely raſed and deſtroyed: that the nation had received full and compleat ſatisfaction for the depredations committed by the natives of Spain: that more care was taken in diſciplining the militia, on whoſe valour the nation muſt chiefly depend in caſe of an invaſion; and that ſome regard had been ſhown to the oppreſſed proteſtants in Germany. He expreſſed his ſatisfaction to find that the Engliſh were not ſo cloſely united to France as formerly; for he had generally obſerved, that when two dogs were in a laſh together, the ſtronger generally ran away with the weaker; and this, he was afraid, had been the caſe between France and Great-Britain. The motion was vigorouſly defended by mr. Pelham, paymaſter of the forces, and brother to the duke of Newcaſtle, a man whoſe greateſt fault was his being concerned in ſupporting the meaſures of a corrupt miniſtry. In other reſpects he was liberal, candid, benevolent, and even attached to the intereſt of his country, though egregiouſly miſtaken in his notions of government. On this occaſion he aſſerted that it was no way inconſiſtent with the honour or dignity of that houſe to thank his majeſty in the moſt particular terms for every thing he had been pleaſed to communicate in his ſpeech from the throne: that no expreſſion of approbation in the addreſs could be any way made uſe of to prevent an enquiry into the meaſures which had been purſued, when the treaties ſhould be laid before the houſe. He ſaid, at the opening of a ſeſſion the eyes of all Europe were turned towards Great-Britain, and from the parliament's firſt reſolves all the neighbouring powers judged of the unanimity that would enſue between his majeſty and the repreſentatives of his people: that their appearing jealous or diffident of his majeſty's conduct would weaken his influence upon the councils of foreign ſtates and potentates, and perhaps put it out of his power to rectify any falſe ſtep that might have been made by his miniſters. His arguments were re-enforced by a long ſpeech from mr. H. Walpole. The queſtion was put, the motion carried, and the addreſs preſented.

The next ſubject of debate was the number of land-forces. When the ſupply fell under conſideration, ſir W. Strickland, ſecretary at war, moved that the ſame number which had been maintained in the preceeding year ſhould be continued in pay. On the other hand, lord Morpeth having demonſtrated the danger to which the liberties of the nation might be expoſed, by maintaining a numerous ſtanding army in time of peace, made a motion that the number ſhould be reduced to twelve thouſand. A warm diſpute enſuing, was managed in favour of the firſt motion by lord Hervey, ſir Robert Walpole and his brother, mr. Pelham, and ſir Philip Yorke, attorney-general. This gentleman was counted a better lawyer than a politician, and ſhone more as an advocate at the bar than as an orator in the houſe of commons. The laſt partiſan of the miniſtry was ſir William Yonge, one of the lords commiſſioners of the treaſury; a man who rendered himſelf ſerviceable and neceſſary, by ſtooping to all compliances, running upon every ſcent, and haranguing on every ſubject with an even, uninterrupted, tedious flow of dull declamation, compoſed of aſſertions without veracity, concluſions from falſe premiſes, words without meaning, and language without propriety. Lord Morpeth's motion was eſpouſed by mr. Watkin Williams Wynne, a gentleman of an ancient family and opulent fortune in Wales, brave, open, hoſpitable, and warmly attached to the ancient conſtitution and hierarchy: he was ſupported by mr. Walter Plumer, who ſpoke with weight, preciſion, and ſeverity, by ſir W. Wyndham, mr. Shippen, mr. W. Pulteney, and mr. Barnard. The courtiers argued that it was neceſſary to maintain ſuch a number of land-forces as might defeat the deſigns of mal-contents, ſecure the interior tranquility of the kingdom, defend it from external aſſaults, over-awe its neighbours, and enable it to take vigorous meaſures in caſe the peace of Europe ſhould be re-embroiled. They affirmed the ſcience of war was ſo much altered, and required ſuch attention, that no dependence was to be placed upon a militia: that all nations were obliged to maintain ſtanding armies, for their ſecurity againſt the encroachments of neighbouring powers. that the number of troops in Great-Britain was too inconſiderable to excite the jealouſy of the people, even under an ambitious monarch: that his majeſty never entertained the leaſt thought of infringing the liberties of his ſubjects: that it could not be ſuppoſed that the officers, among whom were many gentlemen of family and fortune, would ever concur in a deſign to enſlave their country; and that the forces now in pay could not be properly deemed a ſtanding army, inaſmuch as they were voted and maintained from year to year by the parliament, which was the repreſentative of the people. To theſe arguments the members in the oppoſition replied, that a ſtanding force in time of peace was unconſtitutional, and had been always thought dangerous: that a militia was as capable of diſcipline as a ſtanding army, and would have more incentives to courage and and perſeverance: that the civil magiſtrate was able to preſerve the peace of the country: that the number of the mal-contents was altogether contemptible, though it might be conſiderably augmented by maintaining a ſtanding army, and other ſuch abritary meaſures: that other nations had been enſlaved by ſtanding armies; and howſoever they might find themſelves neceſſitated to depend upon a military force for ſecurity againſt encroaching neighbours, the caſe was very different with regard to Great-Britain, for the defence of which nature had provided in a peculiar manner: that this proviſion was ſtrengthened and improved by a numerous navy, which ſecured her the dominion of the ſea; and, if, properly diſpoſed, would render all invaſion impracticable, or at leaſt ineffectual: that the land-army of Great-Britain, though ſufficient to endanger the liberties of an unarmed people, could not poſſibly ſecure ſuch an extent of coaſt, and therefore could be of very little ſervice in preventing an invaſion: that though they had all imaginable confidence in his majeſty's regard for the liberty of his ſubjects, they could not help apprehending, that ſhould a ſtanding army become part of the conſtitution, another prince of more dangerous talents, and more fatal deſigns, might ariſe, and employ it for the worſt purpoſes of ambition: that though many officers were gentlemen of honour and probity, theſe might be eaſily diſcarded, and the army gradually moulded into a quite different temper. By theſe means, practiſed in former times, an army had been new-modelled to ſuch a degree, that they turned their ſwords againſt the parliament, for whoſe defence they had been raiſed, and deſtroyed the conſtitution both in church and ſtate: that with reſpect to its being wholly dependent on the parliament, the people of England would have reaſon to complain of the ſame hardſhip, whether a ſtanding army ſhould be declared at once indiſpenſible, or regularly voted from year to year according to the direction of the miniſtry: that the ſanction of the legiſlature granted to meaſures which in themſelves are unconſtitutional, burthenſome, odious, and repugnant to the genius of the nation, inſtead of yielding conſolation, would ſerve only to demonſtrate, that the moſt effectual method of forging the chains of national ſlavery would be that of miniſterial influence operating upon a venal parliament. Such were the reaſons urged againſt a ſtanding army, of what number ſoever it might be compoſed: but the expediency of reducing the number from about 18,000 to 12,000 was inſiſted upon as the natural conſequence of his majeſty's declarations, by which they were given to underſtand that the peace of Europe was eſtabliſhed; and that he had nothing ſo much at heart as the eaſe and proſperity of his people. It was ſuggeſted, that if 18,000 men were ſufficient on the ſuppoſed eve of a general war in Europe, it was ſurely reaſonable to think that a leſs number would ſuffice when peace was perfectly re-eſtabliſhed. Whatever effect theſe reaſons had upon the body of the nation, they made no converts in the houſe, where the majority reſolved that the ſtanding army ſhould be maintained without reduction. Mr Plumer complained that the country was oppreſſed by an arbitrary method of quartering ſoldiers, in an undue proportion, upon thoſe publicans who refuſed to vote in elections according to the direction of the miniſtry. Mr Pulteney aſſerted that the money raiſed for the ſubſiſtance of 18,000 men in England would maintain 60,000 French or Germans, or the ſame number of almoſt any other people on the continent. Sir William Wyndham declared that 18,000 of the Engliſh troops in the late war were maintained on leſs than two-thirds of the ſum now demanded for the like number: but no regard was paid to thoſe allegations.

The next object of importance that attracted the notice of the houſe was the ſtate of the charitable corporation. This company was firſt erected in the year 1707. Their profeſſed intention was to lend money at legal intereſt to the poor, upon ſmall pledges; and to perſons of better rank upon an indubitable ſecurity of goods impawned. Their capital was at firſt limited to 30,000l. but by licenſes from the crown, they increaſed it to 600,000l. though their charter was never confirmed by act of parliament. In the month of October, George Robinſon, eſq. member for Marlow, the caſhier, and John Thompſon, warehouſe-keeper of the corporation, diſappeared in one day. The proprietors, alarmed at this incident, held ſeveral general courts, and appointed a committee to inſpect the ſtate of their affairs. They reported, that for a capital of above 500,000l. no equivalent was found; inaſmuch as their effects did not amount to the value of 30,000l. the remainder having been embezzled by means which they could not diſcover. The proprietors, in a petition to the houſe of commons, repreſented that by the moſt notorious breach of truſt in ſeveral perſons to whom the care and management of their affairs were committed, the corporation had been defrauded of the greateſt part of their capital; and that many of the petitioners were reduced to the utmoſt degree of miſery and diſtreſs, they, therefore, prayed, that as they were unable to detect the combinations of thoſe who had ruined them, or to bring the delinquets to juſtice, without the aid of the power and authority of parliament, the houſe would vouchſafe to enquire into the ſtate of the corporation, and the conduct of their managers; and give ſuch relief to the petitioners as the houſe ſhould ſeem meet. The petition was graciouſly received, and a ſecret committee appointed to proceed on the enquiry. They ſoon diſcovered a moſt iniquitous ſcene of fraud, which had been acted by Robinſon and Thompſon, in concert with ſome of the directors, for embezzling the capital, and cheating the proprietors. Many perſons of rank and quality were concerned in this infamous conſpiracy: ſome of the firſt characters in the nation did not eſcape ſuſpicion and cenſure. Sir Robert Sutton and ſir Archibald Grant were expelled the houſe of commons, as having had a conſiderable ſhare in thoſe fraudulent practices: a bill was brought in, to reſtrain them and other delinquents from leaving the kingdom, or alienating their effects. In the mean time, the committee received a letter from ſignor John Angelo Belloni, an eminent banker at Rome, giving them to underſtand, that Thompſon was ſecured in that city, with all his papers and confined to the caſtle of St. Angelo; and that the papers were tranſmitted to his correſpondent at Paris, who would deliver them up, on certain conditions ſtipulated in favour of the priſoner. This letter was conſidered as an artifice to inſinuate a favourable opinion of the pretender, as if he had taken meaſures for ſecuring Thompſon, from his zeal for juſtice, and affection to the Engliſh people. On this ſuppoſition, the propoſals were rejected with diſdain; and both houſes concurred in an order that the letter ſhould be burned at the Royal Exchange, by the hands of the common hangman. The lower-houſe reſolved that it was an inſolent and audacious libel, abſurd and contradictory; that the whole tranſaction was a ſcandalous artifice, calculated to delude the unhappy, and to diſguiſe and conceal the wicked practices of the profeſſed enemies to his majeſty's perſon, crown and dignity.

No motion, during this ſeſſion, produced ſuch a warm conteſt as did that of ſir Robert Walpole, when, after a long preamble, he propoſed that the duties on ſalt, which about two years before had been aboliſhed, ſhould now be revived, and granted to his majeſty, his heirs, and ſucceſſors, for the term of three years. In order to ſweeten this propoſal, he declared that the land-tax for the enſuing year ſhould be reduced to one ſhilling in the pound. All the members of the country-party were immediately in commotion. They expreſſed their ſurpriſe at the groſſneſs of the impoſition. They obſerved that two years had ſcarce elapſed ſince the king, in a ſpeech from the throne, had exhorted them to aboliſh ſome of the taxes that were the moſt burthenſome to the poor: the houſe was then of opinion, that the tax upon ſalt was the moſt burthenſome, and the moſt pernicious to the trade of the kingdom, of all the impoſitions to which the poor were ſubjected, and therefore it was taken off: but that no great reaſon could be produced for altering their opinion ſo ſuddenly, and reſolving to grind the faces of the poor, in order to eaſe a few rich men of the landed intereſt. They affirmed that the moſt general taxes are always the leaſt burthenſome: that after a nation is obliged to extend their taxes farther than the luxuries of their country, thoſe taxes that can be raiſed with the leaſt charge to the public are the moſt convenient and eaſieſt to the people: but they ought carefully to avoid taxing thoſe things which are neceſſary for the ſubſiſtence of the poor. The price of all neceſſaries being thus enhanced, the wages of the tradeſman and manufacturer muſt be increaſed; and where theſe are high the manufacturers will be underſold by thoſe of cheaper countries. The trade muſt of conſequence be ruined; and it is not to be ſuppoſed that the landed gentleman would chooſe to ſave a ſhilling in the pound from the land-tax, by means of an expedient that would ruin the manufactures of his country, and decreaſe the value of his own fortune. They alledged that the ſalt-tax particularly affected the poor, who could not afford to eat freſh proviſions; and that, as it formerly occaſioned murmurs and diſcontents among the lower claſs of people, the revival of it would, in all probability, exasperate them into open ſedition. They obſerved, that while it was exacted in England, a great number of merchants ſent their ſhips to Ireland, to be victualled for their reſpective voyages: that ſince it had been aboliſhed, many experiments had been ſucceſsfully tried with ſalt for the improvement of agriculture, which would be entirely defeated by the revival of this impoſition. They ſuggeſted that the land-tax was raiſed at a very ſmall expence, and ſubject to no fraud, whereas that upon ſalt would employ a great number of additional officers in the revenue, wholly depending upon the miniſtry, whoſe influence in elections they would proportionably increaſe. They even hinted, that this conſideration was one powerful motive for propoſing the revival of an odious tax, which was in effect an exciſe, and would be deemed a ſtep towards a general exciſe upon all ſorts of proviſions. Finally, they demonſtrated that the ſalt-tax introduced numberleſs frauds and perjuries in different articles of traffic. Sir Robert Walpole endeavoured to obviate all theſe objections in a long ſpeech, which was minutely anſwered and refuted in every article by mr. Pulteney. Nevertheleſs, the queſtion being put, the miniſter's motion was carried in the affirmative, and the duty revived: yet, before the bill paſſed, divers motions were made, and additional clauſes propoſed by the members in the oppoſition. New debates were raiſed on every new objection, and the courtiers were obliged to diſpute their ground by inches.

The penſion-bill was revived, and for the third time rejected in the houſe of lords. A bill for the encouragement of the ſugar colonies paſſed through the lower houſe with great difficulty, but was loſt amongſt the peers; another for the better ſecuring the freedom of parliaments, by further qualifying members to ſit in the houſe of commons, was read the third time, and thrown out upon the queſtion. A committee had been appointed to enquire into a ſale of an eſtate which had belonged to the late earl of Derwentwater. It appeared by the report, that the ſale had been fradulent: a bill was prepared to make it void: Dennis Bond, eſq. and ſerjeant Birch, commiſſioners for the ſale of the forfeited eſtates, were declared guilty of notorious breach of truſt, and expelled the houſe, of which they were members: George Robinſon, eſq. underwent the ſame ſentence, on account of the part he acted in the charitable corporation, as he and Thompſon had neglected to ſurrender themſelves, according to the terms ot a bill which paſſed for that purpoſe. During this ſeſſion, five members of parliament were expelled for the moſt ſordid acts of knavery: a ſure ſign of national degeneracy and diſhonour. All the ſupplies were granted, and among other articles, the ſum of 22,694l. 7s. 6d. for the agio or difference of the ſubſides payable to the crown of Denmark, in purſuance of the treaty ſubſiſting between the late king and that monarch: but this was not obtained without a violent diſpute. Mr Pulteney, who bore a conſiderable ſhare in all theſe debates, became in a little time ſo remarkable as to be thought worthy of a very particular mark of his majeſty's diſpleaſure. The king on the firſt day of July, called for the council-book, and with his own hand ſtruc the name of William Pulteney, eſq. out of the liſt of privy-councellors: his majeſty further ordered him to be put out of all the commiſſions of the peace. The ſeveral lord-lieutenants from whom he had received deputations were commanded to revoke them: and the lord-chancellor and ſecretaries of ſtate were directed to give the neceſſary orders for that purpoſe.

Nor did the houſe of peers tamely and unanimouſly ſubmit to the meaſures of the miniſtry. The penſion-bill being read, was again rejected, and a proteſt entered. A debate aroſe about the number of ſtanding forces; and the earl of Cheſterfield argued for the court motion. The earl of Oxford moved, that they might be reduced 12,000 effective men. The earl of Winchelſea obſerved, that a ſtanding army rendered miniſters of ſtate more daring than otherwiſe they would be, in contriving and executing projects that were grievous to the people: ſchemes that never could enter into the heads of any but thoſe who were drunk with exceſs of power. The marquis of Tweedale, in reaſoning againſt ſuch a number as the miniſty propoſed, took occaſion to obſerve, that not one ſhilling of the forfeited eſtates was ever applied to the uſe of the public: he likewiſe took notice that the 18,000 men, demanded as a ſtanding force, were modelled in ſuch a manner, that they might be ſpeedily augment to 40,000 men on any emergency. The duke of Argyle endeavoured to demonſtrate the danger of depending for the ſafety of the kingdom upon an undiſciplined militia, a fleet or any army of auxiliaries. Then he repreſented the neceſſity of having recourſe to a regular army in caſe of an invaſion; and after all acknowledged that the number propoſed was no way ſufficient for the purpoſe. All his arguments were anſwered and refuted in an excellent ſpeech by lord Carteret: nevertheleſs, victory declared for the miniſter.

[1732] The parliament having granted every branch of the ſupply towards the payment of which they borrowed a ſum from the ſinking-fund, and paſſed divers other acts for the encouragement of commerce and agriculture, the king on the firſt day of June, gave the royal aſſent to the bills that were prepared, and cloſed the ſeſſion, after having informed both houſes that the ſtates-general had acceded to the treaty of Vienna: that he had determined to viſit his German dominions, and to leave the queen regent in his abſence. He accordingly ſet out for Hanover in the beginning of June. By this time the pragmatic ſanction was confirmed by the diet of the empire, though not without a formal proteſt by the electors Palatine, Bavaria, and Saxony.

The moſt remarkable incident that diſtinguiſhed this year in England was a very uncommon inſtance of ſuicide; an act of deſpair ſo frequent among the Engliſh, that in other countries it is objected to them as a national reproach. Though it may be generally termed the effect of lunacy proceeding from natural cauſes operating on the human body, in ſome few inſtances it ſeems to have been the reſult of cool deliberation. Richard Smith, a bookbinder, and priſoner for debt within the liberties of the King's-bench, perſuaded his wife to follow his example in making away with herſelf, after they had murdered their little infant. This wretched pair were in the month of April found hanging in their bed-chamber, at about a yard's diſtance from each other; and in a ſeparate apartment the child lay dead in a cradle. They left two papers encloſed in a ſhort letter to their landlord, whoſe kindneſs they implored in favour of their dog and cat. They even left money to pay the porter who ſhould carry the incloſed papers to the perſon for whom they were addreſſed. In one of theſe the huſband thanked that perſon for the marks of friendſhip he had received at his hands; and complained of the ill offices he had undergone from a different quarter. The other paper, ſubſcribed by the huſband and wife, contained the reaſons which induced them to act ſuch a tragedy on themſelves and their offſpring. This letter was altogether ſurpriſing for the calm reſolution, the good humour, and the propriety with which it was written. They declared, that they withdrew themſelves from poverty and rags; evils that, through a train of unlucky accidents, were become inevitable. They appealed to their neighbours for the induſtry with which they had endeavoured to earn a livelihood. They juſtified the murder of their child, by ſaying, it was leſs cruelty to take her with them, than to leave her friendleſs in the world, expoſed to ignorance and miſery. They profeſſed their belief and confidence in an Almighty God, the fountain of goodneſs and beneficence, who could not poſſibly take delight in the miſery of his creatures: they, therefore, reſigned up their lives to him without any terrible apprehenſions; ſubmitting themſelves to thoſe ways which, in his goodneſs, he ſhould appoint after death. Thoſe unfortunate ſuicides had been always induſtrious and frugal, invincibly honeſt, and remarkable for conjugal affection.

Truſtees having been appointed by charter to ſuperintend a new ſettlement in Georgia, ſituated to the ſouthward of Carolina in America, Mr Oglethorp, as general, and governor of the province, embarked at Graveſend, with a number of poor families, to plant that colony. The king of Spain having equipped a very powerful armament, the fleet ſailed on the 4th day of June from the road of Alicant, under the command of the count de Montemar, and arrived on the coaſt of Barbary in the neighbourhood of Oran, where a conſiderable body of troops was landed without much oppoſition. Next day, however, they were attacked by a numerous army of Moors, over whom they obtained a complete victory. The Bey or governor of Oran immediately retired with his garriſon, and the Spaniards took poſſeſſion of the place, from which they had been driven in the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and eight. The ſtrong fort of Mazalaquivir was likewiſe ſurrendered to the victors at the firſt ſummons; ſo that this expedition anſwered all the views with which it had been projected. Victor Amadæus, the abdicated king of Sardinia, having, at the inſtigation of his wife, engaged in ſome intrigues, in order to re-aſcend the throne, his ſon, the reigning king, ordered his perſon to be ſeized at Montcalier, and conveyed to Rivoli, under a ſtrong eſcort. His wife, the marchioneſs de Spigno, was conducted to Seva. The old king's confeſſor, his phyſician, and 48 perſons of diſtinction were impriſoned. The citadel of Turin was ſecured with a ſtrong garriſon; and new inſtructions were given to the governor and ſenate of Chamberri. The diſpute which had long ſubſiſted between the king of Pruſſia and the young prince of Orange, touching the ſucceſſion to the eſtates poſſeſſed by king William III. as head of the houſe of Orange, was at laſt accommodated by a formal treaty ſigned at Berlin and Dieren. The Dutch were greatly alarmed about this time with an apprehenſion of being overwhelmed by an inundation, occaſioned by worms, which were ſaid to have conſumed the piles and timber-work that ſupported their dykes. They prayed and faſted with uncommon zeal, in terror of this calamity, which they did not know how to avert in any other manner. At length, they were delivered from their fears by a hard froſt, which effectually deſtroyed thoſe dangerous animals. About this time, mr. Dieden, plenipotentiary from the elector of Hanover, received, in the name of his maſter, the inveſtiture of Bremen and Verden from the hands of the emperor.

The hiſtory of England at this period cannot be very intereſting, as it chiefly conſiſts in an annual revolution of debates in parliament. Debates, in which the ſame argument, perpetually recur on the ſame ſubjects. When the ſeſſion was opened on the 16th day of January, the king declared, that the ſituation of affairs both at home and abroad rendered it unneceſſary for him to lay before the two houſes any other reaſons for calling them together, but the ordinary diſpatch of the public buſineſs, and his deſire of receiving their advice in ſuch affairs as ſhould require the care and conſideration of parliament. The motion made in the houſe of commons for an addreſs of thanks implied, that they ſhould expreſs their ſatisfaction at the preſent ſituation of affairs both at home and abroad. The motion was carried, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of thoſe who obſerved, that the nation had very little reaſon to be pleaſed with the preſent poſture of affairs; that the French were employed in fortifying and reſtoring the harbour of Dunkirk, contrary to the faith of the moſt ſolemn treaties: that the Britiſh merchants had received no redreſs for the depredations committed by the Spaniards: that the commerce of England daily decreaſed: that no ſort of trade throve but the traffic of Change-Alley, where the moſt abominable frauds were practiſed; and that every ſeſſion of parliament opened a new ſcene of villainy and impoſition.

The penſion bill was once more revived, and loſt again in the houſe of Peers. All the reaſons formerly advanced againſt a ſtanding army were now repeated; and a reduction of the number inſiſted upon with ſuch warmth, that the miniſterial party were obliged to have recourſe to the old phantom of the pretender. Sir Archer Croft ſaid a continuation of the ſame number of forces was the more neceſſary, becauſe, to his knowledge, popery was increaſing very faſt in the country; for, in one pariſh which he knew, there were ſeven popiſh prieſts; and that the danger from the pretender was the more to be feared, becauſe they did not know but he was then breeding his ſon a proteſtant. Sir Robert Walpole obſerved, that a reduction of the army was the chief things wiſhed for and deſired by all the jacobites in the kingdom, that no reduction had ever been made but what gave freſh hopes to that party, and encouraged them to raiſe tumults againſt the government; and he did not doubt but that if they ſhould reſolve to reduce any part of the army, there would be poſt-horſes employed that very night to carry the good news beyond ſea to the pretender. His brother Horatio added that the number of troops then propoſed was abſolutely neceſſary to ſupport his majeſty's government, and would be neceſſary as long as the nation enjoyed the happineſs of having the preſent illuſtrious family on the throne. The futility, the ſelf-contradiction, and the ridiculous abſurdity of theſe ſuggeſtions were properly expoſed: nevertheleſs, the army was voted without any reduction. Sir Wilfred Lawſon having made a motion for an addreſs to the king, to know what ſatisfaction had been made by Spain for the depredations committed on the Britiſh merchants, it was after a violent debate approved, and the addreſs preſented. The king, in anſwer to this remonſtrance, gave them to underſtand, that the meeting of the commiſſaries of the two crowns had been ſo long delayed by unforeſeen accidents; that the conferences were not opened till the latter end of the preceding February; and that as the courts of London and Madrid had agreed that the term of three years ſtipulated for finiſhing the commiſſion ſhould be computed from their firſt meeting, a perfect account of their proceedings could not as yet be laid before the houſe of commons. A bill had been long depending for granting encouragement to the ſugar colonies in the Weſt-Indies; but, as it was founded upon a prohibition that would have put a ſtop to all commerce between the French iſlands and the Britiſh ſettlements in North-America, it met with a very warm oppoſition from thoſe who had the proſperity of thoſe northern colonies at heart. But the bill being patroniſed and ſupported by the court intereſt, ſurmounted all objections; and afterwards paſſed into a law. While the commons deliberated upon the ſupply, ſir Robert Walpole moved, that 500,000l. ſhould be iſſued out of the ſinking fund for the ſervice of the enſuing year. Sir William Wyndham, mr. Pulteney, and ſir John Barnard, expatiated upon the iniquity of pillaging a ſacred depoſit, ſolemnly appropriated to the diſcharge of the national debt. They might have demonſtrated the egregious folly of a meaſure, by which the public, for a little tempory eaſe, loſt the advantage of the accumulating intereſt which would have ariſen from the ſinking fund if properly managed and reſerved. All objections vaniſhed before the powers of miniſterial influence, which nothing now could chec but the immediate danger of popular commotion. Such hazardous interpoſition actually defeated a ſcheme which had been adopted by the miniſter, and even before its appearance alarmed all the trading part of the nation.

The houſe having reſolved itſelf into a committee, to deliberate upon the moſt proper methods for the better ſecurity and improvement of the duties and revenues charged upon tobacco and wines, all the papers relating to theſe duties were ſubmitted to the peruſal of the members: the commiſſioners of the cuſtoms and exciſe were ordered to attend the houſe, the avenues of which were crowded with multitudes of people; and the members in the oppoſition waited impatiently for a propoſal, in which they thought the liberties of their country ſo deeply intereſted. In a word, there had been a call to the houſe on the preceding day. The ſeſſion was frequent and full; and both ſides appeared ready and eager for the conteſt, when ſir Robert Walpole broached his deſign. He took notice of the arts which had been uſed to prejudice the people againſt his plan before it was known. He affirmed that the clamours occaſioned by theſe prejudices had originally riſen from ſmugglers and fraudulent dealers, who had enriched themſelves by cheating the public; and theſe had been ſtrenuouſly aſſiſted and ſupported by another ſet of men, fond of every opportunity to ſtir up the people of Great-Britain to mutiny and ſedition. He expatiated on the frauds that were committed in that branch of the revenue ariſing from the duties on tobacco; upon the hardſhips to which the American planters were ſubjected by the heavy duties payable on importation, as well as by the ill uſage they had met with from the factors and correſpondents in England, who, from being their ſervants, were now become their maſters; upon the injury done to the fair trader; and the loſs ſuſtained by the public with reſpect to the revenue. He aſſerted that the ſcheme he was about to propoſe would remove all theſe inconveniences, prevent numberleſs frauds, perjuries, and falſe entries, and add two or three hundred thouſand pounds per annum to the public revenue. He entered into a long detail of frauds practiſed by the knaviſh dealer in thoſe commodies: he recited the ſeveral acts of parliament that related to the duties on wine and tobacco: he declared he had no intention to promote a general exciſe; he endeavoured to obviate ſome objections that might be made to his plan, the nature of which he at length explained. He propoſed to join the laws of exciſe to thoſe of the cuſtoms: that the further ſubſidy of three farthings per pound charged upon imported tobacco ſhould be ſtill levied at the cuſtom-houſe, and payable to his majeſty's civil-liſt as heretofore: that then the tobacco ſhould be lodged in warehouſes, to be appointed for that purpoſe by the commiſſioners of the exciſe: that the keeper of each warehouſe, appointed likewiſe by the commiſſioners, ſhould have one loc and key, and the merchant-importer have another: and that the tobacco ſhould be thus ſecured until the merchant ſhould find vent for it, either by exportation or home conſumption: that the part deſigned for exportation ſhould be weighed at the Cuſtom-houſe, diſcharged of the three farthings per pound which had been paid at its firſt importation, and then exported without further trouble: that the portion deſigned for home conſumption ſhould, in preſence of the warehouſe-keeper, be delivered to the purchaſer, upon his paying the inland duty of four-pence per pound weight to the proper officer appointed to receive it; by which means the merchant would be eaſed of the inconvenience of paying the duty upon importation, or of granting bonds and finding ſureties for the payment, before he had found a market for the commodity: that all penalties and forfeitures, ſo far as they formerly belonged to the crown, ſhould for the future be applied to the uſe of the public: that appeals in this, as well as in all other caſes relating to the exciſe, ſhould be heard and determined by two or three of the judges, to be named by his majeſty; and in the country, by the judge of aſſize upon the next circuit, who ſhould hear and determine ſuch appeals in the moſt ſummary manner, without the formality of proceedings in courts of law or equity.

Such was the ſubſtance of the famous exciſe ſcheme, in favour of which ſir Robert Walpole moved that the duties and ſubſides on tobacco ſhould from and after the 24th day of June ceaſe and determine. The debate which enſued was managed and maintained by all able ſpeakers on both ſides of the queſtion. Sir Robert Walpole was anſwered by mr. Perry, member for the city of London. Sir Paul Methuen joined in the oppoſition. Sir John Barnard, another repreſentative of London, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſame cauſe. He was ſupported by mr. Pulteney, ſir William Wyndham, and other patriots. The ſcheme was eſpouſed by ſir Philip York; appointed lord-chief-juſtice of the King's-bench, and ennobled in the courſe of the enſuing year. Sir Joſeph Jekyll approved of the project, which was likewiſe ſtrenuouſly defended by lord Harvey, ſir Thomas Robinſon, ſir William Yonge, mr. Pelham, and mr. Winnington, which laſt excelled all his contempories of the miniſtry in talents and addreſs. Thoſe who argued againſt the ſcheme accuſed the miniſter of having miſrepreſented the frauds, and made falſe calculations. With reſpect to the ſuppoſed hardſhips under which the planters were ſaid to labour, they affirmed that no planter had ever dreamed of complaining, until inſtigated by letters and applications from London: that this ſcheme, far from relieving the planters, would expoſe the factors to ſuch grievous oppreſſion, that they would not be able to continue the trade, conſequently the planters would be entirely ruined; and after all it would not prevent thoſe frauds againſt which it was ſaid to be provided: that from the examination of the commiſſioners of the cuſtoms, it appeared that thoſe frauds did not exceed 40,000l. per annum, and might in a great meaſure be aboliſhed, by a due execution of the laws in being; conſequently this ſcheme was unneceſſary, would be ineffectual in augmenting the revenue, deſtructive to trade, and dangerous to the liberties of the ſubject, as it tended to promote a general exciſe, which was in all countries conſidered as a grievous oppreſſion. They ſuggeſted that it would produce an additional ſwarm of exciſe-officers and warehouſe-keepers, appointed and paid by the treaſury, ſo as to multiply the dependents on the crown, and enable it ſtill further to influence the freedom of elections: that the traders would become ſlaves to exciſemen and warehouſe-keepers, as they would be debarred all acceſs to their commodities, except at certain hours, when attended by thoſe officers: that the merchant, for every quantity of tobacco he could ſell, would be obliged to make a journey, or ſend a meſſenger to the office for a permit, which could not be obtained without trouble, expence, and delay: that ſhould a law be enacted in conſequence of this motion, it would in all probality be ſome time or other uſed as a precident for introducing exciſe laws into every branch of the revenue; in which caſe the liberty of Great-Britain would be no more. In the courſe of this debate, ſir Robert Walpole took notice of the multitudes which had beſet all the approaches to the houſe. He ſaid it would be an eaſy taſk for a deſigning ſeditious perſon to raiſe a tumult and diſorder among them: that gentlemen might give them what name they ſhould think fit, and affirm they were come as humble ſuppliants; but he knew whom the law called ſturdy beggars; and thoſe who brought them to that place could not be certain but that they might behave in the ſame manner. This inſinuation was reſented by ſir John Barnard, who obſerved that merchants of character had a right to come down to the Court of Requeſts, and lobby of the houſe of commons, in orde to ſollicit their friends and acquaintance againſt any ſcheme or project which they might think prejudicial to their commerce: that when he came into the houſe, he ſaw none but ſuch as deſerved the appellation of ſturdy beggars as little as the honourable gentleman himſelf, or any gentleman whatever. After a warm diſpute the motion was carried by a majority of 61 voices. Several reſolutions were founded on the propoſal; and to theſe the houſe agreed, though not without a violent conteſt.

[1733] The reſolution produced a bill, againſt which petitions were preferred by the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, the cities of Coventry and Nottingham. A motion was made that counſel ſhould be heard for the city of London; but it was rejected by the majority, and the petitions were ordered to lie upon the table. Had the minister encountered no oppoſition but that which appeared within doors, his project would have certainly been carried into execution: but the whole nation was alarmed, and clamoured loudly againſt the exciſe-bill. The populace ſtill crowded around Weſtminſter-hall, blocking up all the avenues to the houſe of Commons. They even inſulted the perſons of thoſe members who had voted for the miniſtry on this occaſion; and ſir Robert Walpole began to be in fear of his life. He, therefore, thought proper to drop the deſign, by moving that the ſecond reading of the bill might be poſtponed till the twelfth day of June. Then complaint being made of the inſolence of the populace, who had ill-treated ſeveral members, divers reſolutions were taken againſt thoſe tumultuous crowds, and their abettors; theſe reſolves were communicated to the lord-mayor of London, the ſheriff of Middleſex, and the high-baliff of Weſtminſter. Some individuals were apprehended in the court of requeſts, as having fomented the diſturbances; but they were ſoon releaſed. The miſcarriage of the bill was celebrated with public rejoicings in London and Weſtminſter; and the miniſter was burned in effigy by the populace. After the miſcarriage of the exciſe-ſcheme, the houſe unanimouſly reſolved to enquire into the frauds and abuſes in the cuſtoms; and a committee of 21 perſons was choſen by ballot for this purpoſe.

The ſubſequent debates of this ſeſſion were occaſioned by a bill to prevent the infamous practice of ſtock-jobbing, which with great difficulty made its way to the houſe of lords, who propoſed ſome amendments, in conſequence of which it was laid aſide; and by another bill eſtabliſhing a lottery, to raiſe 500,000l. for the relief of thoſe who had ſuffered by the charitable corporation. After having undergone ſome alterations it paſſed through both houſes, and obtained the royal aſſent. The king, by a meſſage to parliament, had ſignified his intention to give the princeſs royal in marriage to the prince of Orange, promiſing himſelf their concurrence and aſſiſtance, that he might be enabled to beſtow ſuch a portion with his eldeſt daughter as ſhould be ſuitable to the occaſion. The commons immediately reſolved, that out of the monies ariſing from the ſale of lands in the iſland of St. Chriſtopher's his majeſty ſhould be empowered to apply 80,000l. as a marriage dower for his daughter; and a clauſe for this purpoſe was inſerted in the bill, for enabling his majeſty to apply 500,000l. out of the ſinking fund for the ſervice of the current year.

The oppoſition in the houſe of lords was ſtill more animated, though ineffectual. The debates chiefly turned upon the penſion-bill, the number of land-forces, and a motion made by lord Bathurſt, for an account of the produce of the forfeited eſtates which had belonged to the directors of the South-ſea company. The truſtees for theſe eſtates had charged themſelves with a great ſum of money, and the lords in the oppoſition thought they had a right to know how it had been diſpoſed. The miniſtry had reaſons to ſtifle this enquiry; and, therefore, oppoſed it with all their vigour. Nevertheleſs, the motion was carried, after a warm diſpute, and the directors of the South-ſea company were ordered to lay the account before the houſe. From this, it appeared that the large ſums of money ariſing from the forfeited eſtates had been diſtributed among the proprietors, by way of dividend, even before recourſe was had to parliament for directions in what manner that produce ſhould be applied: lord Bathurſt, therefore moved for a reſolution of the houſe, that the diſpoſal of this money by way of dividend, without any order or direction of a general court for that purpoſe, was a violation of the act of parliament made for the diſpoſal thereof, and a manifeſt injuſtice done to the proprietors of that ſtoc. The duke of Newcaſtle, in order to gain time, moved, that as the account was confuſed, and almoſt unintelligible, the preſent directors of the company might be ordered to lay before the houſe a further and more diſtinct account of the manner in which the money had been diſpoſed. A violent conteſt enſued, in the courſe of which the houſe divided, and of 57 peers, who voted for the delay, 46 were ſuch as enjoyed preferment in the church, commiſſions in the army, or civil employments under the government. At length lord Bathurſt waved his motion for that time: then the houſe ordered that the preſent and former directors of the South-ſea company, together with the late inſpectors of their accounts, ſhould attend, and be examined. They were accordingly interrogated, and gave ſo little ſatisfaction, that lord Bathurſt moved for a committee of enquiry; but the queſtion being put, was carried in the negative: yet a very ſtrong proteſt was entered by the lords in the oppoſition.

The next ſubject of altercation was the bill for miſapplying part of the produce of the ſinking-fund. It was attacked with all the force of argument, wit, and declamation by the earl of Stafford, lords Bathurſt and Carteret, and particularly by the earl of Cheſterfield, who had by this time reſigned his ſtaff of lord-ſteward of the houſehold, and renounced all connexion with the miniſtry. Lord Bathurſt moved for a reſolution importing that, in the opinion of the houſe, the ſinking-fund ought for the future to be applied, in time of peace and public tranquility, to the redemption of thoſe taxes which were moſt prejudicial to the trade, moſt burthenſome on the manufactures and moſt oppreſſive on the poor of the nation. This motion was over-ruled, and the bill adopted by the majority. On the eleventh day of June, the king gave the royal aſſent to the bills that were prepared, and cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he took notice of the wicked endeavours that had been lately uſed to inflame the minds of the people, by the moſt unjuſt miſrepreſentations.

Europe was now re-involved in freſh troubles, by a vacancy on the throne of Poland. Auguſtus died at Warſaw in the end of January, and the neighbouring powers were immediately in commotion. The elector of Saxony, ſon to the late king, and Staniſlaus, whoſe daughter was married to the French monarch, declared themſelves candidates for the Poliſh throne. The emperor, the czarina, and the king of Pruſſia eſpouſed the intereſts of the Saxon: the king of France ſupported the pretenſions of his father-in-law. The foreign miniſters at Warſaw forthwith began to form intrigues among the electors; the marquis de Monti, ambaſſador from France, exerted himſelf ſo ſucceſsfully, that he ſoon gained over the primate, and a majority of the catholic dietines, to the intereſts of Staniſlaus; while the imperial and Ruſſian troops hovered on the frontiers of Poland. The French king no ſooner underſtood that a body of the emperor's forces was encamped at Sileſia, than he ordered the duke of Berwick to aſſemble an army on the Rhine, and take meaſures for entering Germany, in caſe the imperialiſts ſhould march into Poland. A French fleet ſet ſail for Dantzick, while Staniſlaus travelled through Germany in diſguiſe to Poland, and concealed himſelf in the houſe of the French ambaſſador at Warſaw. As the day of election approached, the imperial, Ruſſian, and Pruſſian miniſters delivered in their ſeveral declarations, by way of proteſt againſt the contingent election of Staniſlaus, as a perſon proſcribed, diſqualified, depending upon a foreign power, and connected with the Turks, and other infidels. The Ruſſian general Laſci entered Poland at the head of 50,000 men: the diet of the election was opened with the uſual ceremony on the 25th day of Auguſt. Prince Vieſazowiſki, chief of the Saxon intereſt, retired to the other ſide of the Viſtula, with 3,000 men, including ſome of the nobility who adhered to that party. Nevertheleſs, the primate proceeded to the election: Staniſlaus was unanimouſly choſen king; and appeared in the electoral field, where he was received with loud acclamation. The oppoſite party ſoon increaſed to 10,000 men; proteſted againſt the election, and joined the Ruſſian army, which advanced by ſpeedy marches. King Staniſlaus finding himſelf unable to cope with ſuch adverſaries retired with the primate and French ambaſſador to Dantzick, leaving the palatine of Kiow at Warſaw. This general attacked the Saxon palace, which was ſurrendered upon terms; then the ſoldiers and inhabitants plundered the houſes belonging to the grandees who had declared for Auguſtus, as well as the hotel of the Ruſſian miniſter. In the mean time, the Poles, who had joined the Muſcovites finding it impracticable to paſs the Viſtula before the expiration of the time fixed for the ſeſſion of the diet, erected a kolo at Grocow, where the elector of Saxony was choſen and proclaimed, by the biſhop of Cracow, king of Poland, under the name of Auguſtus III. on the ſixth day of October. They afterwards paſſed the river, and the palatine of Kiow retiring towards Cracow, they took poſſeſſion of Warſaw, where in their turn they plundered the palaces and houſes belonging to the oppoſite party.

During theſe tranſactions, the French king concluded a treaty with Spain and Sardinia, by which thoſe powers agreed to declare war againſt the emperor. Manifeſtos were publiſhed reciprocally by all contracting powers. The duke of Berwick paſſed the Rhine in October, and undertook the ſiege of fort Kehl, which in a few days was ſurrendered on capitulation; than he repaſſed the river, and returned to Verſailles. The king of Sardinia having declared war againſt the emperor, joined a body of French forces commanded by mareſchal de Villars, and drove the imperialiſts out of the Milaneſe. His imperial majeſty dreading the effects of ſuch a powerful confederacy againſt him, offered to compromiſe all differences with the crown of Spain, under the mediation of the king of Great-Britain; and mr. Keene, the Britiſh miniſter at Madrid propoſed an accommodation. Philip expreſſed his acknowledgments to the king of England, declaring, however, that the emperor's advances were too late; and that his own reſolutions were already taken. Nevertheleſs, he ſent orders to the count de Montijo, his ambaſſador at London to communicate to his Britannic majeſty the motives which had induced him to take theſe reſolutions. In the mean time, he detached a powerful armament to Italy where they inveſted the imperial fortreſs of Aula, the garriſon of which was obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. The republic of Venice declared ſhe would take no ſhare in the diſputes of Italy: the ſtates-genral ſigned a neutrality with the French king for the Auſtrian Netherlands, without conſulting the emperor or the king of Great-Britain: and the Engliſh councils ſeemed to be altogether pacific.

In November the prince of Orange arrived at Greenwich, in order to eſpouſe the princeſſes royal: but the marriage was poſtponed on account of his being taken ill, and he repaired to Bath in Somerſetſhire, to drink the waters for the recovery of his ſtrength. Henrietta the young dutcheſs of Malborough dying about this time, the title devolved to her ſiſter's ſon, the earl of Sunderland. Lord king reſigning his office of chancellor, it was conferred upon mr. Talbot, ſollicitor-general, together with the title of a baron; a promotion that reflected honour upon thoſe by whom it was adviſed. He poſſeſſed the ſpirit of a Roman ſenator, the elegance of an Atticus, and the integrity of a Cato. At the meeting of the parliament in January, the king told them, in his ſpeech, that though he was no way engaged in the war which had begun to rage in Europe, except by the good offices he had employed among the contending powers, he could not ſit regardleſs of the preſent events, or be unconcerned for the conſequences of a war undertaken and ſupported by ſuch a powerful alliance. He ſaid, he had thought proper to take time to examine the facts alledged on both ſides, and to wait the reſult of the councils of thoſe powers that were more immdiately intereſted in the conſequences of the rupture. He declared he would concert with his allies, more particularly with the ſtates-general of the united provinces, ſuch meaſures as ſhould be thought moſt adviſeable for their common ſafety, and for reſtoring the peace of Europe. In the mean time, he expreſſed his hope that they would make ſuch proviſion as ſhould ſecure his kingdom, rights, and and poſſeſſions from all dangers and inſults, and maintain the reſpect due to the Britiſh nation. He ſaid that whatever part it might in the end be moſt reaſonable for him to act, it would in all views be neceſſary, when all Europe was preparing for arms, to put his kingdoms in a poſture of defenſe. The motion for an addreſs of thanks produced, as uſual, a debate in both houſes, which, it muſt be owned, appears to have proceeded from a ſpirit of cavilling, rather than from any reaſonable cauſe of objection.

The houſe of commons reſolved to addreſs his majeſty for a copy of the treaty of Vienna. Sir John Ruſhout moved for another, deſiring that the letters and inſtructions relating to the execution of the treaty of Seville ſhould be ſubmitted to the inſpection of the commons; but, after a hard ſtruggle, it was over-ruled. The next motion was made by mr. Sandys, a gentleman who had for ſome time appeared ſtrenuous in the oppoſition, and wrangled with great perſeverance. He propoſed that the houſe ſhould examine the inſtructions which had been given to the Britiſh miniſter in Poland, ſome years before the death of king Auguſtus, that they might be the better able to judge of the cauſes which produced this new rupture among the powers of Europe. The motion being oppoſed by all the court members a conteſt enſued, in the courſe of which mr. Pulteney compared the miniſtry to an empyrick, and the conſtitution of England to his patient. "This pretender in phyſic (ſaid he) being conſulted, tells the diſtempered perſon, there were but two or three ways of treating his diſeaſe; and he was afraid that none of them would ſucceed. A vomit might throw him into convulſions that would occaſion immediate death; a purge might bring on a diarrœa that would carry him off in a ſhort time; and he had been already bled ſo much, and ſo often, that he could bear it no longer. The unfortunate patient ſhocked at this declaration, replies, 'Sir you have always pretended to be a regular doctor but I now find you are an arrant quac. I had an excellent conſtitution when I firſt fell into your hands, but you have quite deſtroyed it; and now I find I have no other chance for ſaving my life, but by calling for the help of ſome regular phyſician." In the debate, the members on both ſides ſeemed to wander from the queſtion, and indulge themſelves with ludicrous perſonalities. Mr H. Walpole took occaſion to ſay, that the oppoſition treated the miniſtry as he himſelf was treated by ſome of his acquaintance, with reſpect to his dreſs. 'If I am in plain clothes (ſaid he) then they call me a ſlovenly, dirty fellow; and if by chance I wear a laced ſuit, they cry, What, ſhall ſuch an aukward fellow wear fine clothes?' He continued to ſport in this kind of idle buffoonery. He compared the preſent adminiſtration to a ſhip at ſea. As long as the wind was fair, and proper for carrying us to our deſigned port, the word was 'ſteady! ſteady!' but when the wind began to ſhift and change, the word was neceſſarily altered to 'thus, thus, and no near.' The motion was overpowered by the majority; and this was the fate of ſeveral other propoſals made by the members in the oppoſition.

Sir John Barnard preſented a petition from the druggiſts, and other dealers in tea, complaining of the inſults and oppreſſion to which they were ſubjected by the exciſe laws, and imploring relief. Sir John and mr. Perry, another of the city-members, explained the grievous hardſhips which thoſe traders ſuſtained, and moved that the petition might be referred to the conſideration of the whole houſe. They were oppoſed by mr. Winnington, ſir W. Yonge, and other partiſans of the miniſtry; and theſe ſkirmiſhes brought on a general engagement of the two parties, in which every weapon of ſatire, argument, reaſon, and truth was wielded againſt that odious, arbitrary, and oppreſſive method on collecting the public revenue. Nevertheleſs, the motion in favour of the ſufferers was rejected.

When the commons deliberated upon the ſupply, mr. Andrews, deputy-paymaſter of the army, moved for an addition of 1800 men to the number of land-forces which been continued ſince the preceeding year. The members in the oppoſition diſputed this ſmall augmentation with too much heat and eagerneſs. It muſt be acknowledged, they were by this time irritated into ſuch perſonal animoſity againſt the miniſter, that they reſolved to oppoſe all his meaſures, whether they might or might not be neceſſary for the ſafety and advantage of the kingdom. Nor indeed were they altogether blameable for acting on this maxim, if their ſole aim was to remove from the confidence and councils of their ſovereign a man whoſe conduct they thought prejudicial to the intereſt and liberties of their country. They could not however, prevent the augmentation propoſed: but they reſolved, if they could not wholly ſtop the career of the miniſter, to throw in ſuch a number of rubs as ſhould at leaſt retard their progreſs. The duke of Bolton and lord Cobham had been deprived of the regiments they commanded, becauſe they refuſed to concur in every project of the adminiſtration. It was in conſequence of their diſmiſſion that lord Morpeth moved for a bill to prevent any commiſſion-officer, not above the rank of a colonel, from being removed, unleſs by a court-martial, or by addreſs of either houſe of parliament. Such an attac on the prerogative might have ſucceeded in the latter part of the reign of the firſt Charles; but at this juncture could not fail to miſcarry: yet it was ſuſtained with great vigour and addreſs. When the propoſal was ſet aſide by the majority, mr. Sandys moved for an addreſs to the king, deſiring to know who adviſed his majeſty to remove the duke of Bolton and lord Cobham from their reſpective regiments. He was ſeconded by mr. Pulteney and ſir William Wyndham: but the miniſtry foreſeeing another tedious diſpute called for the queſtion, and the motion was carried in the negative. The next ſource of contention was a bill for ſecuring the freedom of parliament, by limiting the number of officers in the houſe of commons. It was read a firſt and ſecond time; but, when a motion was made for its being committed, it met with a powerful oppoſition, and produced a warm debate that iſſued in a queſtion, which, like the former, paſſed in the negative. A clergyman having inſinuated in converſation, that ſir William Milner, baronet, member for York, received a penſion from the miniſtry, the houſe took cognizance of this report: the clergyman acknowledged at the bar that he might have dropped ſuch a hint from hearſay. The accuſed member proteſted, upon his honour, that he never did, or ever would receive, place, penſion, gratuity, or reward from the court, either directly or indirectly, for voting in parliament, or upon any other account whatever. The accuſation was voted falſe and ſcandalous, and the accuſer taken into cuſtody: but in a few days he was diſcharged upon his humble petition, and his begging pardon of the member whom he had calumniated. The duty upon ſalt was prolonged for eight years; and a bill paſſed againſt ſtoc-jobbing.

But the ſubject which of all others employed the eloquence and abilities on both ſides to the moſt vigorous exertion, was a motion made by mr. Bromely, who propoſed that a bill ſhould be brought in for repealing the ſeptennial act, and for the more frequent meeting and calling of parliaments. The arguments for and againſt ſeptennial parliaments have already been ſtated. The miniſtry now inſiſted upon the increaſe of papiſts and jacobites, which rendered it dangerous to weaken the hands of the government: they challenged the oppoſition to produce one inſtance in which the leaſt encroachment had been made on the liberties of the people ſince the ſeptennial act took place; and they defied the moſt ingenious malice to prove that his preſent majeſty had ever endeavoured to extend any branch of the prerogative beyond its legal bounds. Sir John Hinde Cotton affirmed that in many parts of England the papiſts had already begun to uſe all their influence in favour of thoſe candidates who were recommended by the miniſters as members in the enſuing parliament. With reſpect to his majeſty's conduct, he ſaid he would not anſwer one word: but as to the grievances introduced ſince the law was enacted for ſeptennial parliaments, he thought himſelf more at liberty to declare his ſentiments. He aſſerted that the ſeptennial law itſelf was an encroachment on the rights of the people: a law paſſed by a parliament that made itſelf ſeptennial. He obſerved, that the laws of treaſon with regard to trials were altered ſince that period: that in former times a man was tried by a jury of his neighbours, within the country where the crimes alledged againſt him were ſaid to be committed; but by an act of a ſeptennial parliament he might be removed and tried in any place where the crown, or rather the miniſtry, could find a jury proper for their purpoſe; where the priſoner could not bring any witneſs in his juſtification, without an expenſe which perhaps his circumſtances would not bear. He aſked if the riot act was not an encroachment on the rights of the people? an act by which a little dirty juſtice of the peace, the meaneſt and vileſt tool a miniſter can uſe, who perhaps ſubſiſts by his being in the commiſſion, and may be deprived of that ſubſiſtence at the pleaſure of his patron, had it in his power to put 20 or 30 of the beſt ſubjects in England to immediate death, without any trial or form but that of reading a proclamation. 'Was not the fatal South-ſea ſcheme (ſaid he) eſtabliſhed by the act of a ſeptennial parliament? and can any man aſk, whether that law was attended with any inconvenience? To the glorious catalogue I might have added the late exciſe bill, if it had paſſed into a law; but, thank heaven, the ſeptennial parliament was near expiring before that famous meaſure was introduced.'

Sir William Wyndham concluded an excellent ſpeech, that ſpoke him the unrivalled orator, the uncorrupted Briton, and the unſhaken patriot, in words to this effect: 'let us ſuppoſe a man abandoned to all notions of virtue and honour, of no great family, and but a mean fortune, raiſed to be chief miniſter of ſtate, by the concurrence of many whimſical events; afraid, or unwilling, to truſt any but creatures of his own making; loſt to all ſenſe of ſhame and reputation; ignorant of his country's true intereſt; purſuing no aim but that of aggrandizing himſelf and his favourites; in foreign affairs, truſting none but thoſe who, from the nature of their education, cannot poſſibly be qualified for the ſervice of their country, or give weight and credit to their negotiations. Let us ſuppoſe the true intereſt of the nation, by ſuch means neglected or miſunderſtood, her honour tarniſhed, her importance loſt, her trade inſulted, her merchants plundered, and her ſailors murdered; and all theſe circumſtances over-looked, leſt his adminiſtration ſhould be endangered. Suppoſe him next poſſeſſed of immenſe wealth, the plunder of the nation, with a parliament chiefly compoſed of members whoſe ſeats are purchaſed, and whoſe votes are bought at the expence of the public treaſure. In ſuch a parliament, ſuppoſe all attempts made to enquire into his conduct, or to relieve the nation from the diſtreſs which has been entailed upon it by his adminiſtration. Suppoſe him ſcreened by a corrupt majority of his creatures, whom he retains in daily pay, or engages in his particular intereſt, by diſtributing among them thoſe poſts and places which ought never to be beſtowed upon any but for the good of the public. Let him plume himſelf upon his ſcandalous victory, becauſe he has obtained a parliament like a packed jury ready to acquit him at all adventures. Let us ſuppoſe him domineering with inſolence over all the men of ancient families, over all the men of ſenſe, figure, or fortune in the nation: as he has no virtue of his own, ridiculing it in others, and endeavouring to deſtroy or corrupt it in all. With ſuch a miniſter, and ſuch a parliament, let us ſuppoſe a caſe which I hope will never happen: a prince upon the throne, uninformed, ignorant, and unacquainted with the inclinations and true intereſt of his people, weak, capricious, tranſported with unbounded ambition, and poſſeſſed with inſatiable avarice. I hope ſuch a caſe will never occur; but as it poſſibly may, could any greater curſe happen to a nation than ſuch a prince on the throne, adviſed, and ſolely adviſed, by ſuch a miniſter, and that miniſter ſupported by ſuch a parliament. The nature of mankind cannot be altered by human laws: the exiſtence of ſuch a prince or ſuch a miniſter we cannot prevent by act of parliament; but the exiſtence of ſuch a parliament I think we may prevent; as it is much more likely to exiſt, and may do more miſchief while the ſeptennial law remains in force, than if it were repealed: therefore I am heartily for its being repealed.' Notwithſtanding the moſt warm, the moſt nervous, the moſt pathetic remonſtrances in favour of the motion, the queſtion was put, and it was ſuppreſſed by mere dint of number.

[1734] The triumph of the miniſtry was ſtill more complete in the ſucceſs of a meſſage delivered from the crown in the latter end of the ſeſſion, when a great many members of the other party had retired to their reſpective habitations in the country. Sir Robert Walpole delivered this commiſſion to the houſe, importing, that his majeſty might be enabled to augment his forces, if occaſion ſhould require ſuch an augmentation, between the diſſolution of this parliament and the election of another. Such an important point, that was ſaid to ſtrike at the foundation of our liberties, was not tamely yielded; but on the contrary, conteſted with uncommon ardour. The motion for taking the meſſage into conſideration was carried in the affirmative; and an addreſs preſented to the king, ſignifying their compliance with his deſire. In conſequence of a ſubſequent meſſage, they prepared and paſſed a bill, enabling his majeſty to ſettle an annuity of 5000l. for life on the princeſs royal, as a mark of his paternal favour and affection.

The oppoſition in the houſe of peers kept pace with that in the houſe of commons, and was ſupported with equal abilities, under the auſpices of the lords Bathurſt and Carteret, the earls of Cheſterfield and Abingdon. The duke of Marlborough made a motion for a bill to regulate the army, equivalent to that which had been rejected in the lower houſe; and it met with the ſame fate after a warm diſpute. Then lord Carteret moved for an addreſs to the king, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to acquaint the houſe who adviſed his majeſty to remove the duke of Bolton and lord viſcount Cobham from their reſpective regiments: and what crimes were laid to their charge. This propoſal was likewiſe rejected, at the end of a debate in which the duke of Argyle obſerved, that two lords had been removed, but only one ſoldier loſt his commiſſion. Such a great majority of the Scottiſh repreſentatives had always voted for the miniſtry, ſince the acceſſion of the late king; and ſo many of theſe enjoyed places and preferments in the gift of the crown, that ſeveral attempts were made by the lords in the oppoſition, to prevent for the future the miniſterial influence from extending itſelf to the elections of North-Britain. Accordingly, two motions for this purpoſe were made by the earl of Marchmont and the duke of Bedford; and ſuſtained by the earls of Cheſterfield, Winchelſea, and Stair, lords Willoughby de Broke, Bathurſt, and Carteret. They were oppoſed by the dukes of Newcaſtle and Argyle, the earl of Cholmondely, earl Paulet, lord Hervey, now called up by writ to the houſe of peers, and lord Talbot. The queſtion being put on both, they were of courſe defeated; and the earl of Stair was deprived of his regiment of dragoons, after having performed the moſt ſignal ſervices to the royal family, and exhauſted his fortune in ſupporting the intereſts and dignity of the crown. Strenuous proteſts were entered againſt the deciſion of the majority concerning the king's meſſage demanding a power to augment his forces during the receſs of parliament; as alſo againſt a bill for enabling his majeſty to apply the ſum of 1,200,000l. out of the ſinking-fund, for the ſervice of the current year.

The buſineſs of the ſeſſion being diſpatched, the king repaired to the houſe of lords on the 16th day of April, and having paſſed all the bills that were ready for the royal aſſent, took leave of this parliament, with the warmeſt acknowledgement of their zeal, duty, and affection. It was at firſt prorogued, then diſſolved, and another convoked by the ſame proclamation. On the 14th day of March the nuptuals of the prince of Orange and the princeſs royal were ſolemnized with great magnificence; and the match was attended with addreſſes of congratulation to his majeſty from different parts of the kingdom.

The powers at war upon the continent acted with ſurpriſing vigour. The Ruſſian and Saxon army inveſted the city of Dantzick, in hopes of ſecuring the perſon of king Staniſlaus. The town was ſtrong, the garriſon numerous, and, animated by the examples of the French and Poles, made a very obſtinate defence. For ſome time they were ſupplied by ſea with recruits, arms, and ammunition. On the 11th day May a re-enforcement of 1500 men was landed from two French ſhips of war and ſome tranſports, under Fort Wechſelmunde, which was ſo much in want of proviſions, that they were not admitted: they, therefore, re-embarked, and ſailed bac to Copenhagen. But afterwards a larger number were landed in the ſame place, and attacked the Ruſſian entrenchments, in order to force their way into the city. They were repulſed in this attempt, but retired in good order. At length the Ruſſian fleet arrived, under the command of admiral Gordon; and now the ſiege was carried on with great fury. Fort Wechſelmonde ſurrendered: the French troops capitulated, and were embarked in the Ruſſian ſhips to be conveyed to ſome port in the Baltic. Staniſlaus eſcaped in the diſguiſe of a peaſant to Marienwarder in the Pruſſian territories. The city of Danzick ſubmitted to the dominion of Auguſtus III. king of Poland, and was obliged to defray the expence of the war to the Ruſſian general, count de Munich, who had aſſumed the command after the ſiege was begun. The Poliſh lords at Danzick ſigned an act of ſubmiſſion to king Auguſtus, who, on the 10th day of July, arrived at the convent of Olivia. There a council was held in his preſence. The recuſant noblemen took the oath which he propoſed. Then a general anneſty was proclaimed; and the king ſet out on his return to Dreſden.

On the Rhine the French arms bore down all reſiſtance. The count de Belleiſle beſieged and took Trarbach. The duke of Berwick, at the head of 60,000 men, inveſted Philipſburgh, whilſt prince Eugene was obliged to remain on the defenſive, in the ſtrong camp at Heilbron, waiting for the troops of the empire. On the 12th day of June, the duke of Berwick, in viſiting the trenches, was killed by a cannon-ball, and the command devolved upon the marquis d'Aſfeldt, who carried on the operations of the ſiege with equal vigour and capacity. Prince Eugene being joined by the different re-enforcements he expected, marched towards the French lines; but found them ſo ſtrong, that he would not hazard an attac; and ſuch precautions taken, that all his military talents he could not relieve the beſieged. At length general Watgenau, the governor, capitulated, after having made a noble defence, and obtained the moſt honourable conditions. Prince Eugene retired to Heidelberg: and the compaign ended about the beginning of October. The imerial arms were not more ſucceſsful in Italy. The infant, don Carlos had received ſo many invitations from the Neapolitan nobility, that he reſolved to take poſſeſſion of that kingdom. He began his march in February, at the head of the Spaniſh forces; publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring he was ſent by his father to relieve the kingdom of Naples from the oppreſſion under which it groaned; and entered the capital amidſt the acclamations of the people; while the count de Viſcounti, the German viceroy, finding himſelf unable to cope up with the invaders, thought proper to retire, after having thrown ſuccours into Gaeta and Capua. When he arrived at Nocera, he began to aſſemble the militia, with intent to form a camp at Barletta. The count de Montemar marched with a body of forces againſt this general, and obtained over him a complete victory at Bitonto in Apuglia, on the 25th of May, when the imperialiſts were entirely routed, and a great number of principal officers taken priſoners. Don Carlos being proclaimed, and acknowledged king of Naples, created the count de Montemar duke of Bitonto; reduced Gaeta, and all other parts of the kingdom which were garriſoned with imperial troops; and reſolved to ſubdue the iſland of Sicily. About 20,000 troops being deſtined for this expedition were landed in the road of Solanto in Auguſt, under the command of the new duke of Bitonto, who being favoured by the natives, proceeded in his conqueſts with great rapidity. The people acknowledged don Carlos as their ſovereign, and took arms in ſupport of his government; ſo that the imperial troops were driven before them, and the Spaniards poſſeſſed the whole kingdom, except Meſſina, Syracuſe, and Trepani, when the infant determined to viſit the iſland in perſon.

While don Carlos was thus employed in the conqueſt of Naples and Sicily, the imperialiſts were hard preſſed in Lombardy by the united forces of France and Piedmont, commanded by the king of Sardinia and the old mareſchal duke de Villars. In the month of January they undertook the ſiege of Tortona, which they reduced; while the troops of the emperor began to pour in great numbers into the Mantuan. In the beginning of May, count Merci, who commanded them, paſſed the Po in the face of the allies, notwithſtanding all the ſkill of Villers, obliged him to retreat from the banks of that river, and took the caſtle of Colorno. The old French general being taken ill, quitted the army, and retired to Turin, where in a little time he died; and the king of Sardinia retiring to the ſame place, the command of the allied forces devolved upon the mareſchal de Coigny. The confederates were poſted at Sanguina, and the imperialiſts at Sorbola, when the count de Merci made a motion to San Proſpero, as if he intended either to attac the enemy, or take poſſeſſion of Parma. The mareſchal de Coigny forthwith made a diſpoſition for an engagement; and, on the 29th day of June, the imperial general having paſſed the Parma, began the attac with great impetuoſity. He charged in perſon at the head of his troops, and was killed ſoon after the battle began. Nevertheleſs, the prince of Wirtemberg aſſuming the command, both armies fought with great obſtinacy, from eleven in the forenoon to four in the afternoon, when the imperialiſts retired towards Monte Cirugalo, leaving 5000 men dead on the field of battle, and among theſe many officers of diſtinction. The loſs of the allies was very conſiderable, and they reaped no ſolid fruits from their victory.

The imperial forces retreated to Reggio, and from thence moved to the plains of Carpi, on the right of the Secchia, where they received ſome re-enforcements: then general count Konigſegg arriving in the camp, took upon himſelf the command of the army. His firſt ſtep was to take poſt at Quingentolo, by which motion he ſecured Mirandola, that was threatened with a ſiege. On the fifteenth of February he forded the river Secchia, and ſurprized the quarters of mareſchal de Broglio, who eſcaped in his ſhirt with great difficulty. The French retired with ſuch precipitation, that they left all their baggage behind, and above 2000 were taken priſoners. They poſted themſelves under Guaſtalla, where, on the 19th day of the month, they were vigorouſly attacked by the imperialiſts, and a general engagement enſued. Konigſegg made ſeveral deſperate efforts to break the French cavalry, upon which, however, he could make no impreſſion. The infantry on both ſides fought with uncommon ardour for ſix hours, and the field was covered with carnage. At length the imperial general retreated to Lazara, after having loſt above 5000 men, including the prince of Wirtemberg, the generals Valpareze and Colminero, with many other officers of diſtinction; nor was the damage ſuſtained by the French greatly inferior to that of the Germans, who repaſſed the Po, and took poſt on the banks of the Oglio. The allies croſſed the ſame river, and the marquis de Maillebois was ſent with a detachment to attac Mirandolo; but the imperialiſts marching to the relief of the place, compelled him to abandon the enterpriſe: then he rejoined his army, which retired under the walls of Cremona, to wait for ſuccours from don Carlos. So little reſpect did the French court pay to the Britiſh nation, at this juncture, that in the month of November an edict was publiſhed in Paris, commanding all the Britiſh ſubjects in France, who were not actually in employment, from the age of 18 to 50, to quit the kingdom in 15 days, or inliſt in ſome of the Iriſh regiments, on pain of being treated as vagabonds, and ſent to the gallies. This edict was executed with the utmoſt rigour. The priſons of Paris were crouded with the ſubjects of Great-Britain, who were ſurpriſed and cut off from all communication with their friends, and muſt have periſhed by cold and hunger, had not they been relieved by the active charity of the janſeniſts. The earl of Waldegrave, who then reſided at Paris as ambaſſador from the king of Great-Britain, made ſuch vigorous remonſtrances to the French miniſtry, upon this unheard-of outrage againſt a nation with which they had been ſo long in alliance, that they thought proper to ſet the priſoners at liberty, and publiſh another edict, by which the meaning of the former was explained away.

While theſe tranſactions occured on the continent, the king of Great-Britain augmented his land-forces; and warm conteſts were maintained through the whole united kingdom in electing repreſentatives for the new parliament. But in all theſe ſtruggles the miniſterial power predominated; and the new members appeared with the old complection. The two houſes aſſembled on the 14th day of January, and mr. Onſlow was re-elected ſpeaker. The leaders of both parties in all debates were the ſelf-ſame perſons who had conducted thoſe of the former parliament; and the ſame meaſures were purſued in the ſame manner. The king, in his ſpeech at the opening of the ſeſſion, gave them to underſtand, that he had concerted with the ſtates-general of the united provinces ſuch meaſures as were thought moſt adviſeable for their common ſafety, and for reſtoring the peace of Europe: that they had conſidered on one ſide the preſſing applications made by the imperial court both in England and Holland, for obtaining ſuccours againſt the powers at war with the houſe of Auſtria; and on the other ſide the repeated profeſſions made by the allies, of their ſincere diſpoſition to put an end to the preſent troubles upon honourable and ſolid terms: that he and the ſtates-general had concurred in a reſolution to employ their joint and earneſt inſtances to bring matters to a ſpeedy and happy accommodation; that their good offices were at length accepted; and in a ſhort time a plan would be offered to the conſideration of all parties engaged in the war, as a baſis for a general negotiation of peace. He told them he had uſed the power veſted in him by the laſt parliament with great moderation; and concluded a treaty with the crown of Denmark of great importance in the preſent conjuncture. He obſerved, that whilſt many of the principal powers of Europe were actually engaged in a war, Great-Britain muſt be more or leſs affected with the conſequences; and as the beſt concerted meaſures are liable to uncertainty, the nation ought to be prepared againſt all events. He, therefore, expreſſed his hope, that his good ſubjects would not repine at the neceſſary means of procuring the bleſſings of peace and univerſal tranquillity, or of putting him in a condition to act that part which it might be neceſſary and incumbent upon him to take. The addreſs of thanks produced a diſpute as uſual, which ended with an acquieſcence in the motion. The houſe, in a grand committee on the ſupply, reſolved, That 30,000 ſeamen ſhould be employed for the ſervice of the enſuing year; and that the land-forces ſhould be augmented to the number of 25744 effective men. But theſe reſolutions were not taken without diſpute and diviſion. The miniſter's opponents not only re produced all the reaſons which had been formerly advanced againſt a ſtanding army, but they oppoſed this augmentation with extraordinary ardour, as a hugh ſtride towards the eſtabliſhment of arbitrary power. They refuted thoſe fears of external broils on which the miniſtry pretended to ground the neceſſity of ſuch an augmentation; and they expoſed the weak conduct of the adminiſtration, in having contributed to deſtroy the balance of power, by aſſiſting Spain againſt the emperor in Italy, ſo as to aggrandize the houſe of Bourbon.

Sir William Wyndham moved, that the eſtimate of the navy for the enſuing year might be referred to a ſelect committee. He expreſſed his ſurpriſe, that notwithſtanding the vaſt ſums which had been yearly raiſed, and the long continuance of the peace, the people had not been quite delivered of any one tax incurred in the preceeding war. He ſaid, he could not comprehend how it was poſſible to to find pretences for expoſing the nation to ſuch exhorbitant charges; and he took notice of ſome unconſcionable articles in the accounts of the navy-debt that lay upon the table. He was ſeconded by mr. Sandys, and ſupported by ſir Joſeph Jekyll and mr. Pulteney: but after ſome debate the motion was carried in the negative. When the new treaty with Denmark fell under conſideration in a grand committee, mr. H. Walpole moved, that the ſum of 56,250l. ſhould be granted to his majeſty, as a ſubſidy to the Dane, purſuant to the ſaid treaty, for the ſervice of the enſuing year. The demand did not meet with immediate compliance. All the leaders in the oppoſition exclaimed againſt the ſubſidy as unneſſary and unreaſonable. They obſerved, that as the Engliſh had no particular intereſt of their own for inducing them to engage in the preſent war, but only the danger to which the balance of power might be expoſed by that event; and as all the powers of Europe were as much, if not more, intereſted than the Engliſh in the preſervation of that balance, ſhould it ever be really endangered, they would certainly engage in its defence, without receiving any valuable conſideration from Great-Britain; but ſhould the Engliſh be always the firſt to take the alarm upon any rupture, and offer bribes and penſions to all the princes in Europe, the whole charge of preſerving that balance would fall upon Great-Britain: every ſtate would expect a gratification from her, for doing that which it would otherwiſe be obliged to do for its own preſervation: even the Dutch might at laſt refuſe to aſſiſt in trimming this balance, unleſs Britain ſhould ſubmit to make the grand penſionary of Holland a penſionary of England, and take a number of their forces into Engliſh pay. The debate having had its free courſe, the queſtion was put, and the motion approved by the majority. The miniſtry allowed a bill to be brought in for limiting the number of officers in the houſe of commons; but at the ſecond reading it was rejected upon a diviſion, after a learned debate, in which it appeared that the oppoſition had gained a valuable auxiliary in the perſon of lord Polwarth, ſon to the earl of Marchmont, a nobleman of elegant parts, keen penetration, and uncommon vivacity, who ſpoke with all the fluency and fervour of elocution.

The minority in the houſe of lords were not leſs vigilant and reſolute in detecting and oppoſing every meaſure which they thought would redound to the prejudice of their country. But the moſt remarkable object that employed their attention during this ſeſſion was a very extraordinary petition, ſubſcribed by the dukes of Hamilton, Queenſberry, and Montroſe, the earls of Dundonald, Marchmont, and Stair, repreſenting, that undue influence had been uſed for carrying on the election of the 16 peers for Scotland. The duke of Bedford, who delivered their petition to the houſe, propoſed a day for taking it into conſideration; and to this they agreed. It was afterwards moved, that the conſideration of it ſhould be adjourned to a ſhort day, before which the petitioners ſhould be ordered to declare whether they intended to controvert the laſt election of all the 16 peers, or the election of any, and which of them. This affair was of ſuch an unprecedented nature, that the houſe ſeemed to be divided in opinion about the manner in which they ought to proceed. The partiſans of the miniſtry would have willingly ſtifled the enquiry in the beginning; but the petitioners were ſo ſtrenuouſly ſupported in their claim to ſome notice, by the earls of Cheſterfield, Abingdon, and Strafford, the lords Bathurſt and Carteret, that they could not diſmiſs it at once with any regard to decorum. The order of the houſe, according to the motion explained above, being communicated by the lord-chancellor to the petitioners, they waited on him with a declaration, importing, that they did not intend to controvert the election or return of the 16 peers for Scotland; but they thought it their duty to lay before their lordſhips the evidence of ſuch facts and undue methods as appeared to them to be dangerous to the conſtitution; and might in future elections equally affect the right of the preſent 16 peers, as that of the other peers of Scotland, if not prevented by a proper remedy. This declaration being repeated to the houſe, the duke of Devonſhire made a motion, that the petitioners might be ordered to lay before the houſe in writing inſtances of thoſe undue methods and illegal practices upon which they intended to proceed, and the names of the perſons they ſuſpected to be guilty. He was warmly oppoſed by the country party; and a long debate enſued, after which the queſtion was carried in favour of the motion, and the order ſignified to the petitioners. Next day their anſwer was read to the houſe to this effect: that as they had no intention to ſtate themſelves accuſers, they could not take upon them to name particular perſons who might have been concerned in thoſe illegal practices; but who they were would undoubtedly appear to their lordſhips upon their taking the proper examinations: nevertheleſs they did humbly acquaint their lordſhips, that the petition was laid before them upon information that the liſt of the 16 peers for Scotland had been framed previous to the election, by perſons in high truſt under the crown: that this liſt was ſhown to peers, as a liſt approved by the crown; and was called the king's liſt, from which there was to be no variation, unleſs to make way for one or two particular peers, on condition they ſhould conform to meaſures: that peers were ſollicited to vote for this liſt, without the liberty of making any alteration: that endeavours were uſed to engage peers to vote for this liſt by promiſe of penſions, and offices civil and military to themſelves and relations, as well as by offers of money: that ſums were given for this purpoſe: that penſions, offices, and releaſes of debts owing to the crown were actually granted to peers who concurred in voting for this liſt, and to their relations: that on the day of election a battalion of his majeſty's troops was drawn up in the abbey-court of Edinburgh, contrary to cuſtom, and without any apparent cauſe but that of over-awing the electors. This anſwer gave riſe to another violent diſpute; but the majority voted it unſatisfactory, and the petition was rejected, though the reſolution was clogged with a vigorous proteſt.

[1735] Notwithſtanding this diſcouragement, the earl of Abingdon moved, That although the petition was diſmiſſed, an enquiry might be ſet on foot touching an affair of ſuch conſequence to the liberties of the kingdom. The earl of Ilay declaring his belief, that no ſuch illegal methods had been practiſed, the other produced a pamphlet, intituled, The proteſts of a great number of noble lords, entered by them at the laſt election of peers for Scotland. Exceptions being taken to a pamphlet, as an object unworthy of their notice, lord Bathurſt exhibited an authentic copy of thoſe proteſts, extracted from the journal of that election, ſigned by the two principal clerks, and witneſſed by two gentlemen then attending in the lobby. Theſe were accordingly read, and plainly demonſtrated the truth of the allegations contained in the petition. Nothing could be more ſcandalous, arrogant, and ſhamefully flagrant than the conduct and deportment of thoſe who acted the part of under-ſtrappers to the miniſtry on this occaſion. But all this demonſtration, adorned and enforced by the charms and energy of eloquence, was like preaching in a deſert. A motion was made for adjourning, and carried in the affirmative: a proteſt was entered, and the whole affair conſigned to oblivion. Divers other motions were made ſucceſſively by the lords in the oppoſition, and rejected by the invincible power of a majority. The uninterrupted ſucceſs of the miniſtry did not, however, prevent them from renewing the ſtruggle as often as an opportunity offered. They diſputed the continuation of the ſalt-tax, and the bill for enabling the king to apply the ſum of one million out of the ſinking-fund for the ſervice of the current year, though ſucceſs did not attend their endeavours. They ſupported with all their might a bill ſent up from the commons, explaining and amending an act of the Scottiſh parliament, for preventing wrongous impriſonment, and againſt undue delays in trials. This was all the natives of Scotland had in lieu of the Habeas Corpus act; though it did not ſcreen them from oppreſſion. Yet the earl of Ilay undertook to prove they were on a footing with their neighbours of England in this reſpect; and the bill was thrown out on a diviſion. The ſeſſion was cloſed on the 15th of May, when the king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, declared, that the plan of pacification concerted between him and the ſtates-general had not produced the deſired effect. He thanked the commons for the ſupplies they had granted with ſuch chearfulneſs and diſpatch. He ſignified his intention to viſit his German dominions; and told them he ſhould conſtitute the queen regent of the realm in his abſence. Immediately after the prorogation his majeſty embarked for Holland, in his way to Hanover.

By this time the good underſtanding between the courts of Madrid and Liſbon was deſtroyed by a remarkable incident. The Portugueſe ambaſſador at Madrid having allowed his ſervants to reſcue a criminal from the officers of juſtice, all the ſervants concerned in that reſcue were dragged from his houſe to priſon, by the Spaniſh king's order, with circumſtances of rigour and diſgrace. His Portugueſe majeſty being informed of this outrage, ordered reprizals to be made upon the ſervants of the Spaniſh ambaſſador in Liſbon. The two miniſters withdrew abruptly to their reſpective courts. The two monarchs expreſſed their mutual reſentment. The king of Spain aſſembled a body of troops on the frontiers of Portugal and his Portugueſe majeſty had recourſe to the aſſiſtance of king George. Don Marcos Antonio d'Alzeveda was diſpatched to London, with the character of envoy extraordinary; and ſucceeded in his commiſſion according to his wiſh. In a litte time after the king's departure from England, ſir John Norris ſailed from Spithead with a powerful ſquadron, in order to protect the Portugueſe againſt the Spaniards; and on the 9th day of June arrived at Liſbon, where he was welcomed as a deliverer. Mr Keene, the Britiſh envoy at the court of Spain, had communicated to his catholic majeſty the reſolution of his maſter to ſend a powerful ſquadron to Liſbon, with orders to guard that coaſt from inſults, and ſecure the Brazil fleet, in which the merchants of Great-Britain were deeply intereſted. Don Joſeph Patinho, miniſter of his catholic majeſty, delivered a memorial to mr. Keene, repreſenting, that ſuch an expedition would affect the commerce of Spain, by intimidating foreign merchants from embarking their merchandiſe in the flota. But, in all probability, it prevented a rupture between the two crowns and diſpoſed the king of Spain to liſten to terms of accommodation.

The powers in alliance againſt the houſe of Auſtria having rejected the plan of pacification concerted by the king of Great-Britain and the ſtates-general mr. Walpole, ambaſſador at the Hague, preſented a memorial to their high mightineſſes, deſiring they would, without loſs of time, put themſelves in a poſture of defence by an augmentation of their forces at ſea and land, that they might take ſuch vigorous ſteps in concert with Great-Britain, as the future conjuncture of affairs might require. But, before they would ſubject themſelves to ſuch expence, they reſolved to make further trial of their influence with the powers in alliance againſt the emperor; and conferences were renewed with the miniſters of thoſe allies. The affairs of Poland became more and more unfavourable to the intereſt of Staniſlaus; for though a great number of the Poliſh nobility engaged in a confederacy to ſupport his claim, and made repeated efforts in his behalf, the palatine of Kiow ſubmitted to Auguſtus; and even his brother the primate, after having ſuſtained a long impriſonment, and many extraordinary hardſhips was obliged to acknowledge that prince his ſovereign. In Italy the arms of the allies ſtill continued to proſper. Don Carlos landed in Sicily, and reduced the whole iſland, almoſt without oppoſition; while the imperialiſts were forced to abandon all the territories they poſſeſſed in Italy, except the Mantuan. The emperor being equally unable to cope with the French armies on the Rhine, implored ſuccours of the czarina, who ſent 30,000 men to his aſſiſtance. This vigorous interpoſition, and the ſucceſs of Auguſtus in Poland, diſpoſed the court of Verſailles to a pacification. A ſecret negotiation was begun between France and the houſe of Auſtria; and the preliminaries were ſigned without the concurrence or knowledge of Spain, Sardinia, and the maritime powers. In theſe articles it was ſtipulated, that France ſhould reſtore all the conqueſt ſhe had made in Germany; that the reverſion of the dukedom of Tuſcany ſhould be veſted in the duke of Lorraine: that Lorraine ſhould be allotted to king Staniſlaus; and after his death be united to the crown of France: that the emperor ſhould poſſeſs the Milaneſe, the Mantuan, and Parma: that the king of Sardinia ſhould enjoy Vigevano and Novara: that don Carlos ſhould be acknowledged king of Naples and Sicily, and retain the iſland of Elba, with all the Spaniſh territories on the coaſt of Tuſcany; and that France ſhould guarantee the pragmatic ſanction.

The king of Great-Britain returned from Hanover to England in the month of November; and on the 15th day of January opened the ſeſſion of parliament. On this occaſion he congratulated them on the near proſpect of a general peace in Europe, in conſequence of the preliminary articles in which the emperor and the king of France had agreed: and of which he had expreſſed his approbation, as they did not differ in any eſſential point from the plan of pacification which he and the ſtates-general had offered to the belligerent powers. He told them that he had already ordered a conſiderable reduction to be made in his forces both by ſea and land; but at the ſame time obſerved it would be neceſſary to continue ſome extraordinary expence, until a more perfect reconciliation ſhould be eſtabliſhed among the ſeveral powers of Europe. An addreſs of thanks was unanimouſly voted, preſented, and graciouſly received. After the houſe had received ſeveral petitions from different counties and gentlemen, complaining of undue influence in elections for members of parliament, it proceeded to conſider of the ſupply, and ſir Charles Wager moving that 15,000 ſeamen ſhould be employed for the ſervice of the enſuing year, the propoſal was approved without oppoſition. But this was not the caſe with a motion made by mr. Pulteney, 'that the ordinary eſtimate of the navy ſhould be referred to a ſelect committee.' The miniſtry diſcouraged all ſuch prying meaſures: a debate was produced, the houſe divided, and the motion was rejected. Such was the fate of a motion for raiſing the ſupplies within the year, made by mr. Sandys, and ſupported by ſir John Barnard, mr. Willimot, and other patriots, who demonſtrated, that this was a ſpeedy and practicable expedient for diſcharging the national debt, lowering the intereſt of money, reducing the price of labour, and encouraging a ſpirit of commerce.

The bill for limiting the number of officers in the houſe of commons was again revived. The king was empowered to borrow 600,000l. chargeable on the ſinking-fund, for the ſervice of the enſuing year, though this power was not eaſily granted; and the houſe reſolved to lay a duty of twenty ſhillings per gallon on all ſpirituous liquors, after it had appeared to the committee appointed for that purpoſe that thoſe ſpirits were pernicious to the health and morals of the people. To this reſolution was added another, which amounted to a total prohibition, namely, that 50l. ſhould be yearly paid to his majeſty for a licence to be annually taken out by every perſon who ſhould vend, barter, or utter any ſuch ſpirituous liquors. Mr Walter Plumer, in a well concerted ſpeech, moved for the repeal of ſome clauſes in the teſt act: theſe he repreſented as a ſpecies of perſecution, in which proteſtant diſſenters were confounded with the Roman catholics and enemies to the eſtabliſhment. He was ſuſtained by lord Polwarth and mr. Heathcote; but ſir Robert Walpole was joined by mr. Shippen againſt the motion as dangerous to the eſtabliſhed church: and the queſtion being put, it was carried in the negative.

[1736] When ſir Joſeph Jekyll preſented to the houſe, according to order, a bill founded on the reſolutions they had taken againſt ſpirituous liquors, ſir Robert Walpole acquainted them, by his majeſty's command, that as the alterations propoſed to be made by that bill in the duties charged upon all ſpirituous liquors might in a great degree affect ſome part of the civil-liſt revenues, his majeſty, for the ſake of remedying ſo great an evil as was intended by that bill to be prevented did conſent to accept any other revenue of equal value, to be ſettled and appropriated in lieu of his intereſt in the ſaid duties. The bill was read a ſecond time, and conſigned to a committee of the whole houſe; but that for limiting the number of officers in the houſe of commons was thrown out at the ſecond reading. Petitions againſt the bill touching the retail of ſpirituous liquors were preſented by the traders to the Britiſh ſugar colonies, by the merchants of Briſtol and Liverpool, repreſenting the hardſhips to which they would be expoſed by a law which amounted to a prohibition of rum and ſpirits diſtilled from melaſſes. In conſequence of theſe remonſtrances, a mitigating clauſe was inſerted, in favour of the compoſition known by the name of punch; and diſtillers were permitted to exerciſe any other employment. The ſum of 70,000l. was voted for making good the deficiencies that might happen in the civil-liſt by this bill, which at length paſſed through the houſe, though not without reiterated diſputes and warm altercation. Violent oppoſition was likewiſe made to a bill for the relief of the people called quakers, who offered a petition, repreſenting, that though, from motives of conſcience, they refuſed the payment of tithes, church-rates, oblations, and eccleſiaſtical dues, they were expoſed to grievous ſufferings by proſecution in the exchequer, eccleſiaſtical, and other courts, to the impriſonment of their perſons, and the ruin of them and their families. A bill being prepared for their relief, was read and printed: then petitions were preferred againſt it by the clergy of Middleſex, and of many other parts of the kingdom. Counſel was heard in behalf of theſe petitioners, and ſeveral alterations propoſed in the bill, which after long repeated debates ſurmounted all oppoſition, and was ſent up to the lords.

In the month of February the king had ſent two members of the privy-council to the prince of Wales, with a meſſage, propoſing a marriage between his royal highneſs and the princeſs of Saxegotha. The propoſal being agreeable to the prince, the marriage was celebrated on the 27th day of April. Upon this occaſion mr. Pulteney moved for an addreſs of congratulation to his majeſty, and was ſupported by mr. George Lyttelton and mr. William Pitt, who ſeiſed this opportunity of pronouncing elegant panegyrics on the prince of Wales and his amiable conſort. Theſe two young members ſoon diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the houſe by their eloquence and ſuperior talents. The attention of the houſe was afterwards converted to a bill for the preventing of ſmuggling; and another for explaining the act for the more effectual preventing bribery and corruption in the election of members to ſerve in parliament. Both made their way through the lower houſe, and were ſent up to the lords for their concurrence. The number of land-forces voted for the ſervice of the current year was reduced to 17,704 effective men. The ſupplies were raiſed by the malt-tax and land-tax, at two ſhillings in the pound, additional duties on mum, cyder, and perry, ſtamped vellum, parchment, and paper; and by an act empowering his majeſty to borrow 600,000l. of the ſinking-fund. In this ſeſſion the parliament repealed the old ſtatutes of England and Scotland againſt conjuration, witchcraft, and dealing with evil ſpirits. The commons likewiſe prepared a bill to reſtrain the diſpoſition of lands in Mortmain, whereby they became unalienable. Againſt this meaſure petitions were preſented by the two univerſities, the colleges of Eton, Wincheſter, and Weſtminſter, and divers hoſpitals that ſubſiſted by charitable donations. In favour of the univerſities and colleges a particular exempting clauſe was inſerted. Several other amendments were made in the bill, which paſſed through both houſes, and obtained the royal aſſent. Among the acts paſſed in this ſeſſion, was one for naturaliſing her royal highneſs the princeſs of Wales; and another for building a bridge acroſs the Thames from New-Palace-yard, in the city of Weſtminſter, to the oppoſite ſhore in the county of Surrey. The points chiefly debated in the houſe of lords were the addreſs of thanks for his majeſty's ſpeech, the Mortmain-bill, the quakers-bill, which was thrown out, and that for the prevention of ſmuggling, which did not paſs without diviſion and proteſt. On the 20th day of May the king cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he told both houſes, that a further convention touching the execution of the preliminaries had been made and communicated to him by the emperor and moſt chriſtian king: and that negotiations were carrying on by the ſeveral powers engaged in the late war, in order to ſettle a general pacification. He expreſſed great concern at ſeeing ſuch ſeeds of diſſatisfaction ſown among his people: he proteſted it was his deſire, and ſhould be his care, to preſerve the preſent conſtitution in church and ſtate, as by law eſtabliſhed: he recommended harmony and mutual affection among all proteſtants of the nation, as the great ſecurity of that happy eſtabliſhment; and ſignified his intention to viſit his German dominions. Accordingly, the parliament was no ſooner prorogued than he ſet out for Hanover, after having appointed the queen regent in his abſence.

Such a degree of licentiouſneſs prevailed over the whole nation, that the kingdom was filled with tumult and riots, which might have been prevented by proper regulations of the civil government in a due execution of the laws. The moſt remarkable of theſe diſturbances happened at Edinburgh, on the 7th day of September. John Porteous, who commanded the guard paid by that city, a man of brutal diſpoſition and abandoned morals, had, at the execution of a ſmuggler, been provoked by ſome inſults from the populace to order his men, without uſing the previous formalities of the law, to fire with ſhot among the crowd; by which precipitate order ſeveral innocent perſons loſt their lives. Porteous was tried for murder, convicted and received ſentence of death; but the queen, as guardian of the realm, thought proper to indulge him with a reprieve. The common people of Edinburgh reſented this lenity ſhown to a criminal who was the object of their deteſtation. They remembered that pardons had been granted to divers military delinquents in that country, who had been condemned by legal trial. They ſeemed to think thoſe were encouragements to oppreſſion: they were fired by a national jealouſy: they were ſtimulated by the relations and friends of thoſe who had been murdered; and they reſolved to wreak their vengeance on the author of that tragedy, by depriving him of life on the very day which the judges had fixed for his execution. Thus determined, they aſſembled in different bodies, about ten o'clock at night. They blocked up the gates of the city, to prevent the admiſſion of the troops that were quartered in the ſuburbs. They ſurprized and diſarmed the town-guards: they broke open the priſon doors, dragged Porteous from thence to the place of execution, and leaving him hanging by the nec on a dyer's pole, quietly diſperſed to their ſeveral habitations. This exploit was performed with ſuch conduct and deliberation as ſeemed to be the reſult of a plan formed by ſome perſons of conſequence: it, therefore, became the object of a very ſevere enquiry.

During this ſummer a rupture happened between the Turks and the Ruſſians, which laſt reduced the city of Aſoph on the Black-ſea, and over-ran the greateſt part of Crim Tartary. The czarina declared war againſt the Ottoman Porte, becauſe the Tartars of the Crimea had made incurſions upon her frontiers; and when ſhe complained of theſe diſorders to the vizir, ſhe received no ſatisfaction: beſides a large body of Tartars had, by order of that miniſter, marched through the Ruſſian provinces in deſpite of the empreſs, and committed terrible havock in their route. The emperor was obliged to engage as a party in this war, by a treaty offenſive and defenſive, which he had many years concluded with the czarina. Yet, before he declared himſelf, he joined the maritime powers in offering his mediation to the Sultan, who was very well diſpoſed to peace; but the czarina inſiſted upon her retaining Aſoph, which her forceſs had reduced; and this preliminary article being rejected, as diſhonourable to the Ottoman empire, the court of Vienna began to make preparations for war. By this time all the belligerent powers in Italy had agreed to the preliminaries of peace concluded between the emperor and France. The duke of Lorraine had eſpouſed the emperor's eldeſt daughter, the archduchеſs Maria Thereſa, and ceded Lorrain to France, even before he ſucceeded to Tuſcany. Don Carlos was crowned king of Sicily; Staniſlaus abdicated the crown of Poland, and Auguſtus was univerſally acknowledged ſovereign of that kingdom. The preliminaries were approved and accepted by the diet of the empire: the king of Spain ſent orders for his troops to evacuate Tuſcany; and the provinces in Italy yielded to the houſe of Auſtria. Prince Eugene, who had managed the intereſt of the emperor on this occaſion, did not live to ſee the happy fruits of his negotiation. He died at Vienna, in April, at the age of ſeventy-three, leaving behind him the character of an invincible hero and conſummate politician. He was not long ſurvived by count Staremberg, another imperial general, who ranked next to the prince in military reputation. About the ſame time Great-Britain ſuſtained a national loſs in the death of lord-chancellor Talbot, who by his worth, probity, and acquired accompliſhments, had dignified the great office to which he had been raiſed. He died univerſally lamented, in the month of February, at the age of fifty-two; and was ſucceeded on the bench by lord Hardwicke.

The king being indiſpoſed in conſequence of having been fatigued by a very tempeſtuous paſſage from Holland, the parliament was prorogued from the 21ſt day of January to the 1ſt of February, and then the ſeſſion was opened by commiſſion. The lord-chancellor, as one of the peers authoriſed by his commiſſion, made a ſpeech in his majeſty's name to both houſes. With reſpect to foreign affairs, he told them, that the reſpective acts of ceſſion being exchanged, and orders given for the evacuation and poſſeſſion of the ſeveral countries and places by the powers concerned, according to the allotment and diſpoſition of the preliminary articles, the great work of re-eſtabliſhing the general tranquillity was far advanced; that, however, common prudence called upon them to be very attentive to the final concluſion of the new ſettlement. He ſaid his majeſty could not without ſurpriſe and concern obſerve the many contrivances and attempts carried on, in various ſhapes, and in different parts of the nation, tumultuouſly to reſiſt and obſtruct the execution of the laws, and to violate the peace of the kingdom. He obſerved, that the conſideration of the height to which theſe audacious practices might riſe, if not timely ſuppreſſed, afforded a melancholy proſpect, and required particular attention, leſt they ſhould affect private perſons in the quiet enjoyment of their property, as well as the general peace and good order of the whole. After the commons had agreed to an addreſs, and heard counſel on ſome controverted elections, they proceeded to take the ſupply into conſideration. They voted 10,000 men for the ſea-ſervice. They continued for the land-ſervice the ſame number they had maintained in times of tranquillity, amounting to 17,704; but this meaſure was not adopted without oppoſition: the money was raiſed by the land and malt-taxes, re-enforced with one million granted out of the ſinking-fund.

The chief ſubject of contention that preſented itſelf in the courſe of this ſeſſion, was a motion which mr. Pulteney made for an addreſs to his majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to ſettle 100,000l. a-year upon the prince of Wales. He repreſented that ſuch a proviſion was conformable to the practice of ancient times: that what he propoſed had been enjoyed by his preſent majeſty in the life-time of his father; and that a ſettlement of this nature was reaſonable and neceſſary to aſcertain the independency of the apparent heir to the crown. The motion was vigorouſly oppoſed by ſir Robert Walpole, as an encroachment on the prerogative; as an officious intermeddling in the king's family affairs; and as an effort to ſet his majeſty and the prince at variance. But a miſunderſtanding, it ſeems, had already happened in the royal family. The miniſter in the midſt of his harangue told the houſe, by his majeſty's command, that on the preceeding day the king had ſent a meſſage to the prince by ſeveral noblemen of the firſt quality importing, that his majeſty had given orders for ſettling a jointure upon the princeſs of Wales, ſuitable to her high rank and dignity, which he would in a proper time lay before parliament, in order to be rendered more certain and effectual: that although his royal highneſs had not thought fit, by any application to his majeſty, to deſire that his allowance of 50,000l. might be rendered leſs precarious, the king, to prevent the bad conſequences which he apprehended might follow from the undutiful meaſures which his majeſty was informed the prince had been adviſed to purſue, would grant to his royal highneſs, for his majeſty's life, the ſaid 50,000l. per annum, to be iſſued out of the civil-liſt revenues, over and above the prince's revenues ariſing from the duchy of Cornwall, which his majeſty thought a very competent allowance, conſidering his own numerous iſſue, and the great expence which did and muſt neceſſarily attend an honourable proviſion for the whole royal family: that the prince, by a verbal anſwer, deſired their lordſhips to lay him with all humility at his majeſty's feet: to aſſure him that he did, and ever ſhall retain the utmoſt duty for his royal perſon: that he was very thankful for any inſtance of his majeſty's goodneſs to him or to the princeſs, and particularly for his majeſty's gracious intention of ſettling a jointure upon her royal highneſs; but that, as to the meſſage, the affair was now out of his hand, and, therefore, he could give no anſwer to it; that his royal highneſs afterwards uſed many dutiful expreſſions towards his majeſty; adding, 'indeed, my lords, it is in other hands, and I am ſorry for it;' or words to that effect. Sir Robert Walpole then endeavoured to demonſtrate, that the annual ſum of 50,000l. pounds was as much as the king could afford to allow for the prince's maintenance; and he expatiated upon the bad conſequences that might enſue, if the ſon ſhould be rendered altogether independent of the father.

Theſe ſuggeſtions did not paſs unanſwered. Sir Robert Walpole had aſſerted, that the parliament had no right to interfere in the creation or maintenance of a prince of Wales; and that in the caſe of Richard II. who, upon the death of his father the Black Prince, was created prince of Wales, in conſequence of an addreſs or petition from parliament: that meaſure was in all probability directed by the king himſelf. In anſwer to this aſſertion it was obſerved, that probably the king would not have been ſo forward in creating his grandſon prince of Wales, if he had not been forced into this ſtep by his parliament; for Edward in his old age fell into a ſort of love-dotage, and gave himſelf entirely up to the management of his miſtreſs, Alice Pierce, and his ſecond ſon, the duke of Lancaſter; a circumſtance that raiſed a moſt reaſonable jealouſy in the black prince, at that time on his death bed, who could not but be anxious about the ſafety and right of his only ſon, whom he found he was ſoon to leave a child in the hands of a doating grandfather, and an ambituous, aſpiring uncle. The ſupporters of the motion obſerved, that the allowance of 50,000l. was not ſufficient to defray the prince's yearly expence, without allotting one ſhilling for acts of charity and munificence; and that the ſeveral deductions for land-taxes and fees reduced it to 43,000l. They affirmed, that his whole income, including the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, did not exceed to 52,000l. a-year, though by his majeſty's own regulation, the expence of the prince's houſehold amounted to 63,000l. They proved, that the produce of the civil-liſt exceeded 900,000l. a ſum above 100,000l. a-year more than was enjoyed by his late majeſty; and that in the firſt year of the late king the whole expence of his houſehold and civil government did not much exceed 450,000l. a-year. They obſerved, that the parliament added 140,000l. annually for acts of charity and bounty, together with the article of ſecret ſervice money; and allowed 100,000l. for the maintenance of the prince of Wales: that the article of ſecret ſervice money had prodigiouſly increaſed in the late reign: by an account which happened to be laid before the parliament, it appeared that vaſt ſums of money had been given for purpoſes which nobody underſtood, and to perſons whom nobody knew. In the beginning of the following ſeſſion ſeveral members propoſed that this extraordinary account ſhould be taken into conſideration; but the enquiry was warded off by the other party, who declared that the parliament could not examine any account which had been preſented to a former ſeſſion. The debate was fierce and long; and ended in a diviſion, by which the motion was rejected. A motion of the ſame nature was made by lord Carteret in the houſe of peers, and gave riſe to a very keen diſpute, maintained by the ſame arguments, and iſſuing in the ſame termination.

The next remarkable conteſt was occaſioned by a motion of ſir R. Walpole, who propoſed that the ſum of one million ſhould be granted to his majeſty, towards redeeming the like ſum of the increaſed capital of the South-ſea company, commonly called South-ſea annuities. Several members argued for the expediency of applying this ſum to the payment of the debt due to the Bank, as part of that incumbrance was ſaddled with an intereſt of ſix per cent. whereas the intereſt paid for the other ſums that conſtituted the public debt did not exceed four per cent. Many plauſible arguments were offered on both ſides of the queſtion; and at length the motion was carried in the affirmative. The houſe having reſolved itſelf into a committee to conſider of the national debt, ſir John Barnard made a motion, for enabling his majeſty to raiſe money either by the ſale of annuities, or by borrowing at an intereſt not exceeding three per cent. to be applied towards redeeming the South-ſea annuities; and that ſuch of the ſaid annuitants as ſhould be inclined to ſubſcribe their reſpective annuities, ſhould be preferred to all others. He ſaid, that even thoſe public ſecurities which bore an intereſt of three per cent. only were ſold at a premium in Change-Alley: he was, therefore, perſuaded, that all thoſe who were willing to give a premium for three per cent. ſecurity would gladly lend their money to the government at the ſame intereſt, ſhould books of ſubſcription be opened for that purpoſe, with an aſſurance that no part of the principal ſhould be paid off for fourteen years. He expatiated upon the national advantages that would accrue from a reduction of intereſt. From eaſy and obvious calculations he inferred, that in a very little time the intereſt upon all the South-ſea annuities would be reduced from four to three per cent. without any danger to public credit, or breach of public faith; that then the produce of the ſinking-fund would amount to 1400,000l. per annum. to be applied only towards redeeming the capital of the ſeveral trading companies: he proved that this meaſure would bring every one of them ſo much within the power of parliament, that they would be glad to accept of three per cent. intereſt to any reaſonable terms; in which caſe the ſinking-fund would riſe to one million ſix hundred thouſand pounds per annum. Then the parliament might venture to annihilate one half of it, by freeing the people from the taxes upon coales, candles, ſoap, leather, and other ſuch impoſitions as lay heavy upon the poor labourers and manufactures; the remaining part of the ſinking-fund might be applied towards the diſcharge of thoſe annuities and public debts which bore an intereſt of three per cent. only, and afterwards towards diminiſhing the capitals of the ſeveral trading companies till the term of fourteen years ſhould be expired; then the ſinking-fund would again amount to above a million yearly, which would be ſufficient for paying them off, and freeing the nation entirely from all its incumberances. This ſalutary ſcheme was violently oppoſed by alderman Heathcote, and other partiſans of the miniſtry: yet all their objections were refuted; and in order to defeat the project, they were obliged to have recourſe to artifice. Mr Winnington moved, that all the public creditors, as well as the South-ſea annuitants, ſhould be comprehended. Sir John Barnard demonſtrated, that it might be eaſy for the government to borrow money at three per cent. ſufficient for paying off ſuch of the proprietors of four-and-twenty millions as were not willing to accept of that intereſt, but it would be extremely difficult to borrow enough to ſatisfy the proprietors of four-and-forty millions, who might chooſe to have their principal rather than ſuch an intereſt. Nevertheleſs, reſolutions were founded on this and other alterations of the original ſcheme; and a bill was immediately prepared. It produced many other debates, and was at laſt poſtponed by dint of miniſteral influence. The ſame venerable patriot who projected this ſcheme moved, that as ſoon as the intereſt of all the national redeemable debt ſhould be reduced to three per cent. the houſe would take off ſome of the heavy taxes which oppreſſed the poor and the manufacturers: but this motion was rejected by the majority.

[1737] The laſt diſputes of this ſeſſion were excited by a bill ſent down from the lords for puniſhing the magiſtrates and city of Edingburgh, on account of the murder of John Porteous. In the beginning of the ſeſſion lord Carteret recapitulated the ſeveral tumults and riots which had lately happened in different parts of the kingdom he particularly inſiſted upon the atrocious murder of captain Porteous, as a flagrant inſult upon the goverment, and a violation of the public peace, ſo much the more dangerous, as it ſeemed to have been concerted and executed with deliberation and decency. He ſuſpected that ſome citizens of Edingburgh had been concerned in the murder, not only from this circumſtance, but likewiſe becauſe, notwithſtanding the reward of two hundred pounds which had been offered by proclamation for the diſcovery of any perſon who acted in that tragedy, not one individual as yet been detected. He ſeemed to think that the magiſtrates had encouraged the riot, and that the city had forfeited its charter; and he propoſed a minute enquiry into the particulars of the affair. He was ſeconded by the duke of Newcaſtle and the earl of Hay: though this laſt nobleman differed in opinion from him with reſpect to the charter of the city, which, he ſaid, could not be juſtly forfeited by the fault of the magiſtracy. The lords reſolved, That the magiſtrates and other perſons from whom they might obtain the neceſſary information concerning this riot ſhould be ordered to attend; and, that an addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, deſiring that the different accounts and papers relating to the murder of captain Porteous might be ſubmitted to the peruſal of the houſe. Theſe documents being accordingly examined, and all the witneſſes arrived, including three Scottiſh judges, a debate aroſe about the manner in which theſe laſt ſhould be interrogated, whether at the bar, at the table, or on the woolſacs. Some Scottiſh lords aſſerted, that they had a right to be ſeated next to the judges of England: but after a long debate this claim was rejected, and the judges of Scotland appeared at the bar in their robes.

A bill was brought in to diſable Alexander Wilſon, eſq. lord-provoſt of Edinburgh, from enjoying any office or place of magiſtracy in the city of Edinburgh, or elſewhere in Great-Britain; for impriſoning the ſaid Alexander Wilſon; for aboliſhing the guard of that city; and for taking away the gates of the Nether-Bow-Port, ſo as to open a communication between the city and the ſuburbs, in which the king's troops are quartered. The duke of Argyle, in arguing againſt this bill, ſaid he could not think of a proceeding more harſh or unprecedented than the preſent, as he believed there was no inſtance of the whole weight of parliamentary indignation, for ſuch he called a proceeding by a bill, ex poſt facto, falling upon any ſingle perſon, far leſs upon any community, for crimes that were within the reach of the inferior courts of juſtice: for this reaſon he obſerved, that if the lord-provoſt and citizens of Edinburgh ſhould ſuffer in the terms of the preſent bill, they would ſuffer by a cruel, unjuſt, and fantaſtical proceeding; a proceeding of which the worſt uſe might be made, if ever the nation ſhould have the misfortune to fall under a partial, ſelf-intereſted adminiſtration. He told them he ſat in the parliament of Scotland when that part of the treaty of union relating to the privileges of the royal burghs was ſettled on the ſame footing as religion, that is, they were made unalterable by any ſubſequent parliament of Great-Britain. Notwithſtanding the eloquence and warmth of his remonſtrance, the bill was ſent down to the houſe of commons, where it produced a violent conteſt. The commons ſet on foot a ſevere ſcrutiny into the particular circumſtances that preceded and attended the murder of Porteous: from the examination of the witneſſes it appeared that no freeman or citizen of Edinburgh was concerned in the riot, which was chiefly compoſed of country-people, excited by the relations of ſome unhappy perſons whom Porteous and his men had ſlain at the execution of the ſmuggler; and theſe were aſſiſted by prentice boys, and the loweſt claſs of vagabonds that happened to be at Edinburgh; that the lord-provoſt had taken all the precautions to prevent miſchief that his reflexion ſuggeſted: that he even expoſed his perſon to the rage of the multitude, in his endeavours to diſperſe them; and that if he had done amiſs, he erred from want of judgment, rather than from want of inclination to protect the unhappy Porteous. It likewiſe appeared, that mr. Lindſay, member for the city, of Edinburgh, had gone in perſon to general Moyle, commander of the forces in North-Britain, informed him of the riot, implored his immediate aſſiſtance, and promiſed to conduct his troops into the city; and that his ſuit was rejected, becauſe he could not produce a written order from the magiſtracy, which he neither could have obtained in ſuch confuſion, nor venture to carry about his perſon through the midſt of an enraged populace. The Scottiſh members exerted themſelves with uncommon vivacity in defence of their capital. They were joined by ſir John Barnard, lord Cornbury, mr. Shippen, and mr. Oglethorpe. Lord Polwarth declared, that if any gentleman would ſhow where one argument in the charge againſt the lord-provoſt and the city of Edinburgh had been proved, he would that inſtant give his vote for the commitment of the bill. He ſaid, if gentlemen would lay their hands upon their hearts, and aſk themſelves, whether they would have voted in this manner had the caſe of Edinburgh been that of the city of Briſtol, York, or Norwich, he was perſuaded they would have required that every tittle of the charge againſt them ſhould have been fully and undeniable proved. Some amendments and mitigations being inſerted in the bill, it paſſed the houſe, was ſent bac to the lords, who agreed to the alterations, and then received the royal aſſent.

The next effort of the miniſter was obliquely levelled at the liberty of the preſs, which it was much for his intereſt to abridge. The errors of his conduct, the miſtery of that corruption which he had ſo ſucceſsfully reduced to a ſyſtem, and all the blemiſhes of his adminiſtration, had been expoſed and ridiculed, not only in political periodical writings produced by the moſt eminent hands, but likewiſe in a ſucceſſion of theatrical pieces, which met with uncommon ſucceſs among the people. He either wanted judgment to diſtinguiſh men of genius, or could find none that would engage in his ſervice: he, therefore, employed a ſet of wretched authors, void of underſtanding and ingenuity. They undertook the defence of his miniſtry, and anſwered the animadverſions of his antagoniſts. The match was ſo extremely unequal, that, inſtead of juſtifying his conduct, they expoſed it to additional ridicule and contempt; and he ſaw himſelf in danger of being deſpiſed by the whole nation. He reſolved to ſeiſe the firſt opportunity to choak thoſe canals through which the torrent of cenſure had flowed upon his character. The manager of a play-houſe communicated to him a manuſcript farce, intituled, The Golded Rump, which was fraught with treaſon and abuſe upon the government, and had been preſented to the ſtage for exhibition. This performance was produced in the houſe of commons. The miniſter deſcanted upon the inſolence, the malice, the immorality, and the ſeditious calumny, which had been of late propagated in theatrical pieces. A bill was brought in to limit the number of play-houſes; to ſubject all dramatic writers to the inſpection of the lord-chamberlain; and to compel them to take out a licence for every production before it could appear on the ſtage. Notwithſtanding a vigorous oppoſition, this bill paſſed through both houſes with extraordinary diſpatch, and obtained the royal ſanction. In this debate the earl of Cheſterfield diſtinguiſhed himſelf by an excellent ſpeech, that will ever endear his character to all the friends of genius and literature, to all thoſe who are warmed with zeal for the liberties of their country. 'Our ſtage (ſaid he) ought certainly to be kept within due bounds; but, for this purpoſe, our laws as they ſtand at preſent are ſufficient. If our ſtage-players at any time exceed thoſe bounds, they ought to be proſecuted; they may be puniſhed. We have precedents, we have examples of perſons puniſhed for things leſs criminal than ſome pieces which have been lately repreſented: a new law muſt, therefore, be unneceſſary; and in the preſent caſe it cannot be unneceſſary without being dangerous. Every unneceſſary reſtraint is a fetter upon the legs, is a ſhackle upon the hands of liberty. One of the greateſt bleſſings we enjoy, one of the greateſt bleſſings a people can enjoy, is liberty. But every good in this life has its allay of evil. Licentouſneſs is the allay of liberty. It is an ebullition, an exceſſence; it is a ſpec upon the eye of the political body, which I can never touch but with a gentle, with a trembling hand, leſt I deſtroy the body; leſt I injure the eye upon which it is apt to appear. If the ſtage becomes at any time licentious, if a play appears to be a libel upon the government, or upon any particular man, the king's courts are open; the law is ſufficient to puniſh the offender. If poets and players are to be reſtrained, let them be reſtrained as other ſubjects are, by the known laws of their country; if they offend, let them be tried as every Engliſhman ought to be, by God and their country. Do not let us ſubject them to the arbitrary will and pleaſure of any one man. A power lodged in the hands of a ſingle man to judge and determine without limitation, control, or appeal, is a ſort of power unknown to our laws, inconſiſtent with our conſtitution. It is a higher, a more abſolute power than we truſt even to the king himſelf; and, and, therefore, I muſt think we ought not to veſt any ſuch power in his majeſty's lord-chamberlain.' His arguments had no effect, though the houſe admired his elocution; and the play-houſe bill paſſed into a law. On the 21ſt day of June the king made a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, and the lord-chancellor prorogued the parliament.

A congreſs had been opened at Niemerow in Poland, to compromiſe the differences between the czarina and the grand ſignor; but this proving ineffectual, the emperor declared war againſt the Turks, and demanded aſſiſtance from the diet of the empire. He concerted the operations of the campaign with the empreſs of Muſcovy. It was agreed, that the imperialiſt under count Seckendorf ſhould attac Widen in Servia, while the Ruſſians, commanded by count de Munich, ſhould penetrate to the Ukraine, and beſiege Oczakow, on the Boriſthenes. They accordingly advanced againſt this place, which was garriſoned by 20,000 men; and on the ſide of the Boriſthenes defended by 81 gallies. The Muſcovites carried on their approaches with ſuch impetuoſity and perſeverances that the Turks were terrified at their valour, and in a few days capitulated. Among thoſe who ſignalized themſelves by uncommon marks of proweſs in theſe attacs, was general Keith, new field-marſhal in the Pruſſian ſervice, who was dangerouſly wounded on this occaſion. Mean while count Seckendorf, finding it impoſſible to reduce Widin without a ſquadron of ſhips on the Danupe, turned his arms againſt Niſſa, which was ſurrendered to him on the 28th day of July: but this was the fartheſt verge of his good fortune. The Turks attacked the poſts which the imperialiſts occupied along the Danube. They took the fort of Padudil, burned the town of Ilas in Walachi, and plundered the neighbouring villages. The prince of Saxe-Hildburghauſen, who had inveſted Bagnalack in Boſnia, was defeated, and obliged to repaſs the Saave. Count Seckendorf was recalled to Vienna; and the command of the army devolved upon count Philippi. Count Kevenhuller was obliged to retreat from Servia; and Niſſa was re-taken by the Muſſulmen. The conferances at Niemerow were broken off; and the Turkiſh plenipotentiaries returned to Conſtantinople.

The king of Poland now enjoyed the moſt perfect repoſe under the dominion of Auguſtus. Ferdinand, the old duke of Courland, dying without iſſue, the ſucceſſion was diſputed by the Teutonick order and the kingdom of Poland, while the ſtates of Courland claimed a right of election, and ſent deputies to Peterſburgh, imploring the protection of the czarina. A body of Ruſſian troops immediately entered that country: and the ſtates elected the count de Biron, high-chamberlain to the empreſs of Muſcovy. The elector of Cologne, as grand maſter of the Teutonick order, proteſted againſt this election; but the king of Poland agreed to it, on certain conditions ſettled at Dantzick with the commiſſaries of the new duke and thoſe of the czarina. In the month of July, John Gaſton de Medicis, great duke of Tuſcany, died at Florence; and the prince de Craon took poſſeſſion of his territories, in the name of the duke of Lorraine, to whom the emperor had already granted the eventual inveſtiture of that duchy.

In England the attention of the public was attracted by an open breach in the royal family. The princeſs of Wales had advanced to the very laſt month of her pregnancy before the king and queen was informed of her being with child. She was twice conveyed from Hampton-court to the palace of St. James's, when her labour pains were ſuppoſed to be approaching; and at length was delivered of a princeſs in about two hours after her arrival. The king being appriſed of this event, ſent a meſſage by the earl of Eſſex to the prince, expreſſing his diſpleaſure at the conduct of his royal highneſs, as an indignity offered to himſelf and the queen. The prince deprecated his majeſty's anſwer in ſeveral ſubmiſſive letters, and implored the queen's mediation. The princeſs joined her entreaties to thoſe of his royal highneſs: but all their humility and ſupplication proved ineffectual. The king, in another meſſage ſent by the duke of Grafton, obſerved, that the prince had removed the princeſs twice in the week immediately preceding the day of her delivery from the place of his majeſty's reſidence, in expectation of her labour; and both times, on his return; induſtriouſly concealed from the knowledge of the king and queen every circumſtance relating to this important affair: that at laſt, without giving any notice to their majeſties, he had precipitately hurried the princeſs from Hampton-court, in the condition not to be named: and the whole tenour of his conduct, for a conſiderable time, had been ſo entirely void of all real duty to the king, that his majeſty had reaſon to be highly offended with him. He gave him to underſtand, that until he ſhould withdraw his regard and confidence from thoſe by whoſe inſtigation and advice he was directed and encouraged in this unwarrantable behaviour to his majeſty and the queen, and return to his duty, he ſhould not reſide in the palace: he therefore ſignified his pleaſure that he ſhould leave St. James's, with all his family, when it could be done without prejudice or inconvenience to the princeſs. In obedience to this order, the prince retired to Kew, and made other efforts to be re-admitted into his majeſty's favour, which, however, he could not retrieve. Whatever might have been his deſign in concealing ſo long from the king and queen the pregnancy of the princeſs, and afterwards hurrying her from place to place in ſuch a condition, to the manifeſt hazard of her life, his majeſty had certainly cauſe to be offended at this part of his conduct: though the puniſhment ſeems to have been ſevere, if not rigorous; for he was not even admitted into the preſence of the queen his mother, to expreſs his duty to her, in her laſt moments, to implore her forgiveneſs, and receive her laſt bleſſing. She died of a mortification in her bowels, on the 20th day of November, in the 55th year of her age, regretted as a princeſs of uncommon ſagacity, and as a pattern of conjugal virtue.

The king opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the 24th day of January, with a ſhort ſpeech, recommending the diſpatch of the public buſineſs with prudence and unanimity. Each houſe preſented a warm addreſs of condolance on the queen's death, with which he ſeemed to be extremely affected. Though the houſe of commons unanimouſly ſympathiſed with the king in his affliction, the miniſter ſtill met with contradiction in ſome of his favourite meaſures. One would imagine that all the arguments for and againſt a ſtanding army in time of peace had been already exhauſted; but when it was moved that the ſame number of land-forces which they had voted in the preceding year ſhould be continued in pay for the enſuing year the diſpute was renewed with ſurpriſing vivacity, and produced ſome reaſons which had not been ſuggeſted before. The adherents of the miniſter fairly owned that if the army ſhould be diſbanded, or even conſiderably reduced, they believed the tory intereſt would prevail: that the preſent number of forces was abſolutely neceſſary to maintain the peace of the kingdom, which was filled with clamour and diſcontent, as well to ſupport the whig intereſt; and that they would vote for keeping up four times the number, ſhould it be found expedient for that purpoſe. The members in the oppoſition replied, that this declaration was a ſevere ſatire on the miniſtry, whoſe conduct had given birth to ſuch a ſpirit of diſcontent. They ſaid it was in effect a tacit acknowledgment, that what they called the whig intereſt was no more than an inconſiderable party, which had engroſſed the adminiſtration by indirect methods; which acted contrary to the ſenſe of the nation; and depended for ſupport upon a military power, by which the people in general were over-awed, and conſequently enſlaved. They affirmed, that the diſcontent of which the miniſtry complained was in a great meaſure owing to that very ſtanding army, which perpetuated their taxes, and hung over their heads, as the inſtruments of arbitrary power and oppreſſion. Lord Polwarth explained the nature of whig principles, and demonſtrated that the party which diſtinguiſhed itſelf by this appellation no longer retained the maxims by which the whigs were originally characteriſed. Sir John Hynde Cotton, who then ſpoke with the courage and freedom of an old Engliſh baron, declared he never knew a member of that houſe who acted on true whig principles vote for a ſtanding army in time of peace. 'I have heard of whigs (ſaid he) who oppoſed all unlimited votes of credit: I have heard of whigs who looked upon corruption as the greateſt curſe that could befal any nation: I have heard of whigs who eſteemed the liberty of the preſs to be the moſt valuable privilege of a free people, and triennial parliaments as the greateſt bulwark of their liberties; and I have heard of a whig adminiſtration which has reſented injuries done to the trade of the nation, and revenged inſults offered to the Britiſh flag.' The miniſtry triumphed as uſual, and the ſame number of forces was continued.

Ever ſince the treaty of Seville, the Spaniards in America had almoſt inceſſantly inſulted and diſtreſſed the commerce of Great-Britain. They diſputed the right of Engliſh traders to cut logwood in the bay of Campeachy, and gather ſalt on the iſland of Tortugas; though that right was acknowledged by implication in all the treaties which had been lately concluded between the two nations. The captains of their armed veſſels, known by the name of guarda-coſtas had made a practice of boarding and plundering Britiſh ſhips, on pretence of ſearching for contraband commodities, on which occaſions they had behaved with the utmoſt inſolence, cruelty and rapine. Some of their ſhips of war had actually attacked a fleet of Engliſh merchant-ſhips of the iſland of Tortugas, as if they had been at open enmity with England. They had ſeized and detained a great number of Britiſh veſſels, impriſoned their crews, and confiſcated their cargoes, in violation of treaties, in defiance of common juſtice and humanity. Repeated memorials were preſented to the court of Spain, by the Britiſh ambaſſador at Madrid. He was amuſed with evaſive anſwers, vague promiſes of enquiry, and cedulas of inſtructions ſent to the Spaniſh governors in America, to which they paid no ſort of regard. Not but that the Spaniards had reaſon to complain, in their turn, of the illicit commerce which the Engliſh traders from Jamaica and other iſlands carried on with their ſubjects on the continent of South-America: though this could not juſtify the depredations and cruelties which the commanders of the guarda-coſtas had committed, without provocation or pretence.

The merchants of England loudly complained of theſe outrages: the nation was fired with reſentment, and cried for vengeance; but the miniſter appeared cold, phlegmatic, and timorous. He knew that a war would involve him in ſuch difficulties as muſt of neceſſity endanger his adminiſtration. The treaſure which he now employed for domeſtic purpoſes muſt in that caſe be expended in military armaments: the wheels of that machine on which he had raiſed his influence would no longer move: the oppoſition would of conſequence gain ground, and the impoſition of freſh taxes, neceſſary for the maintenance of the war, would fill up the meaſure of popular reſentment againſt his perſon and miniſtry. Moved by theſe conſiderations, he induſtriouſly endeavoured to avoid a rupture, and to obtain ſome ſort of ſatisfaction by dint of memorials and negotiations, in which he betrayed his own fears to ſuch a degree as animated the Spaniards to perſiſt in their depredations, and encouraged the court of Madrid to diſregard the remonſtrances of the Britiſh ambaſſador. But his apprehenſion of war did not proceed from Spain only: the two branches of the houſe of Bourbon were now united by politics, as well as by conſanguinity; and he did not doubt, that in caſe of a rupture with Spain, they would join their forces againſt Great-Britain. Petitions were delivered to the houſe by merchans from different parts of the kingdom, explaining the repeated violences to which they had been expoſed, and imploring the relief of the parliament. Theſe were referred to a committee of the whole houſe; and an order was made to admit the petitioners, if they ſhould think fit to be heard by themſelves or by counſel. Sir John Barnard moved for an addreſs to the king, that all the memorials and papers relating to the Spaniſh depredations ſhould be laid before the houſe; and this with ſome alteration, propoſed by ſir Robert Walpole, was actually preſented. In compliance with the requeſt, an enormous multitude of letters and memorials was produced.

The houſe, in a grand committee, proceeded to hear counſel for the merchants, and examine evidence; by which it appeared that amazing acts of wanton cruelty and injuſtice had been perpetrated by Spaniards on the ſubjects of Great-Britain. Mr Pulteney expatiated upon the circumſtances of barbarity. He demonſtrated, from treaties, the right of the Britiſh traders to the logwood of Campeachy, and to the ſalt of Tortugas: he expoſed the puſillanimity of the miniſter, and the futility of his negotiations: he moved for ſuch reſolutions as would evince the reſentment of an injured nation, and the vigour of a Britiſh parliament. Theſe were warmly combated by ſir Robert Walpole, who affirmed they would cramp the miniſters in their endeavours to compromiſe theſe differences: that they would fruſtrate their negotiations, entrench upon the king's prerogative, and precipitate the nation into an unneceſſary and expenſive war. Anſwers produced replies, and a general debate enſued. A reſolution was reported; but the queſtion being put for recommitting it, was carried in the negative. The houſe, however, agreed to an addreſs, beſeeching his majeſty to uſe his endeavours to obtain effectual relief for his injured ſubjects, to convince the court of Spain that his majeſty could no longer ſuffer ſuch conſtant and repeated inſults and injuries to be carried on, to the diſhonour of his crown, and to the ruin of his trading ſubjects: and aſſuring him, that in caſe his royal and friendly inſtances with the catholic king ſhould miſcarry, the houſe would effectually ſupport his majeſty in taking ſuch meaſures as honour and juſtice ſhould make it neceſſary for him to purſue. To this addreſs the king made a favourable anſwer.

[1738] The next important ſubject on which both ſides exerciſed their talents, was a bill prepared and brought in by mr. Pulteney, for the more effectual ſecuring the trade of his majeſty's ſubjects in America. This was no other than the revival of part of two acts paſſed in the reign of queen Anne, by which the property of all prizes taken from the enemy was veſted in the captors: while the ſovereign was empowered to grant commiſſions or charters to any perſon or ſocieties, for taking any ſhips, goods, harbours, lands, or fortifications of the nation's enemies in America, and for holding and enjoying the ſame as their own property and eſtate for ever. The miniſtry endeavoured to evade the diſcuſſion of this bill, by amuſing the houſe with other buſineſs, until an end ſhould be put to the ſeſſion. A mean artifice was practiſed with this view; and ſome ſevere altercation paſſed between ſir Robert Walpole and mr. Pulteney. At length the bill was read, and gave riſe to a very long and warm conteſt, in which the greateſt orators of both ſides found opportunities to diſplay their eloquence and ſatire. Mr Pulteney defended the bill with all the ardour of paternal affection; but, notwithſtanding his warmeſt endeavours, it was rejected upon a diviſion.

When the mutiny-bill was ſent up to the houſe of lords, a long debate aroſe upon the number of troops voted for the enſuing year. Lord Carteret explained the ſituation of affairs, in almoſt every nation in Europe, with great conciſeneſs and preciſion. He demonſtrated the improbability of a rupture between Great-Britain and any power againſt which a land-army could be of any ſervice. He examined the domeſtic circumſtances of the nation; and proved, that whatever diſcontents there might be in the kingdom, there was little or no diſaffection, and no ſeeming deſign to overturn or diſturb the government. In anſwer to an argument, that ſuch a number of regular forces was neceſſary for preventing or quelling tumults, and for enabling the civil magiſtrate to execute the laws of his country, he expreſſed his hope that he ſhould never ſee the nation reduced to ſuch unfortunate circumſtances: he ſaid a law which the civil power was unable to execute muſt either be in itſelf oppreſſive; or ſuch a one as afforded a handle for oppreſſion. In arguing for a reduction of the forces, he took notice of the great increaſe of the national expence. He obſerved, that before the revolution, the people of England did not raiſe above two millions for the whole of the public charge; but now what was called the current expence, for which the parliament annually provided, exceeded that ſum, beſides the civil liſt, the intereſt due to the public creditors, and the ſinking-fund, which added together, compoſed a burthen of ſix millions yearly. The earl of Cheſterfield, on the ſame ſubject, affirmed that ſlavery and arbitrary power were the certain conſequences of keeping up a ſtanding army for any number of years. It is the machine by which the chains of ſlavery are riveted upon a free people. They may be ſecretly prepared by corruption; but unleſs a ſtanding army protected thoſe that forged them, the people would break them aſunder, and chop off the polluted hands by which they were perpared. By degrees a free people muſt be accuſtomed to be governed by an army: by degrees that army muſt be made ſtrong enough to hold them in ſubjection. England had for many years been accuſtomed to a ſtanding army, under pretence of its being neceſſary to aſſiſt the civil power; and by degrees the number and ſtrength of it have been increaſing. At the acceſſion of the late king it did not exceed 6000: it ſoon amounted to double that number, which has been ſince augmented under various pretences. He, therefore, concluded, that ſlavery, under the diſguiſe of an army for protecting the liberties of the people, was creeping in upon them by degrees: if no reduction ſhould be made, he declared he ſhould expect in few years to hear ſome miniſter, or favourite of a miniſter, terrifying the houſe with imaginary plots and invaſions, and making the tour of Europe in ſearch of poſſible dangers, to ſhow the neceſſity of keeping up a mercenery ſtanding army three times as numerous as the preſent. In ſpite of theſe ſuggeſtions, the ſtanding army maintained its ground. The ſame noblemen, aſſiſted by lord Bathurſt, diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a debate upon the Spaniſh depredations, which comprehended the ſame arguments that were uſed in the houſe of commons. They met with the ſame ſucceſs in both. Reſolutions equivalent to thoſe of the lower-houſe were taken; an addreſs was preſented; and his majeſty aſſured them he would repeat, in the moſt preſſing manner, his inſtances at the court of Spain, in order to obtain ſatisfaction and ſecurity for his ſubjects trading to America. This aſſurance was renewed in the ſpeech at the cloſe of the ſeſſion, on the 20th of May, when the parliament was prorogued.

At this period the princeſs of Wales was delivered of a ſon, who was baptiſed by the name of George, now king of Great-Britain. His birth was celebrated with uncommon rejoicings: addreſſes of congratulation were preſented to the king by the two univerſities, and by almoſt all the cities and communities of the kingdom. But the prince of Wales ſtill laboured under the diſpleaſure of his majeſty, who had ordered the lord-chamberlain to ſignify in the Gazette, that no perſon who viſited the prince ſhould be admitted to the court of St. James's. His royal highneſs was diveſted of all the external marks of royalty, and lived like a private gentleman, cultivating the virtues of a ſocial life, and enjoying the beſt fruits of conjugal felicity. In the latter end of this month, rear-admiral Haddock ſet ſail with a ſtrong ſquadron for the Mediterranean, which it was hoped would give weight to the negotiation of the Britiſh miniſter at the ourt of Madrid. The act to diſcourage the retail of ſpiritus liquors had incenſed the populace to ſuch a degree as occaſioned numberleſs tumults in the cities of London and Weſtminſter. They were ſo addicted to the uſe of that pernicious compound known by the appellation of gin or geneva, that they ran all riſques rather than forego it entirely; and ſo little regard was paid to the law by which it was prohibited, that in leſs than two years 12,000 perſons within the bills of mortality were convicted of having ſold it illegally. Nearly one-half of that number were caſt in the penalty of 100l. and 3000 perſons paid 10l. each, for an exemption from the diſgrace of being committed to the houſe of correction.

The war maintained by the emperor and the czarina againſt the Ottoman Porte had not yet produced any deciſive event. Count Seckendorf was diſgraced and confined, on account of the ill ſucceſs of the laſt campaign. General Doxat was tried by a council of war at Belgrade, and condemned to death, for having ſurrendered to the enemy the town of Niſſa, in which he commanded. The diet of the empire granted a ſubſidy of fifty Roman months to the emperor, who began to make vigorous preparations for the enſuing campaign: but, in the mean time, Ragotiki, vaivode of Tranſylvania, revolted againſt the houſe of Auſtria, and brought a conſiderable army into the field, under the protection of the grand ſignor. He was immediately proclaimed a rebel, and a price ſet upon his head by the court of Vienna. The Turks taking the field early, reduced the fort of Uſitza, and Meadia, and undertook the ſiege of Orſova, which, however, they abandoned at the approach of the imperial army, commanded by the grand duke of Tuſcany, aſſiſted by count Konigſegg. The Turks, being re-enforced, marched back, and attacked the imperialiſts, by whom they were repulſed after an obſtinate engagement. The Germans, notwithſtanding this advantage, repaſſed the Danube; and then the infidels made themſelves maſters of Orſova, where they found a fine train of artillery, deſigned for the ſiege of Widin. By the conqueſt of this place, the Turks laid the Danube open to their gallies and veſſels; and the Germans retired under the cannon of Belgrade. In the Ukraine, the Ruſſians under general count Munich obtained the advantage over the Turks in two engagements; and general Lacy routed the Tartars of the Crimea: but they returned in greater numbers, and harraſſed the Muſcovites in ſuch a manner, by intercepting their proviſions, and deſtroying the country, that they were obliged to abandon the lines of Precops.

In the month of October, an affair of very ſmall importance produced a rupture between the king of Denmark and the elector of Hanover. A detachment of Hanoverians took by aſſault the caſtle of Steinhorſt, belonging to the privy-counſellor Wederkop, and defended by thirty Daniſh dragoons, who had received orders to repel force by force. Several men were killed on both ſides, before the Hanoverians could enter the place, when the garriſon was diſarmed, and conducted to the frontiers. This petty diſpute, about a ſmall territory which did not yield the value of 1000l. a year, had well nigh involved Hanover in a war, which, in all probability, Great-Britain muſt have maintained: but this diſpute was compriſed by a convention between the kings of England and Denmark.

The ſeſſion of parliament was opened on the firſt day of February, when the king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, gave them to underſtand, that a convention was concluded and ratified between him and the king of Spain, who had obliged himſelf to make reparation to the Britiſh ſubjects for their loſſes, by certain ſtipulated payments: the plenipotentiaries were named and appointed for regulating, within a limited time, all thoſe grievances and abuſes which had hitherto interrupted the commerce of Great-Britain in the American ſeas; and for ſettling all matters in diſpute, in ſuch a manner as might for the future prevent and remove all new cauſes and pretences of complaint. The motion for an addreſs of approbation was diſputed as uſual. Though the convention was not yet laid before the houſe, the nature of it was well known to the leaders of the oppoſition. Sir William Wyndham obſerved, that if the miniſtry had made the reſolutions taken by the parliament in the laſt ſeſſion the foundation of their demands; if they had diſcovered a reſolution to break off all treating, rather than depart from the ſenſe of parliament, either a defenſive treaty might have been obtained, or by this time the worſt would have been known: but, by what appeared from his majeſty's ſpeech, the convention was no other than a preliminary; and, in all probability, a very bad preliminary. He ſuppoſed the miniſter had ventured to clothe ſome of his creatures with full powers to give up the rights of the nation; for they might do it if they durſt. Sir Robert Walpole, in anſwer to theſe ſuggeſtions, affirmed, that the miniſtry had on this occaſion obtained more than ever on like occaſions was known to be obtained; that they had reconciled the peace of their country with her true intereſt that this peace was attended with all the advantages that the moſt ſucceſsful arms could have procured: that future ages would conſider this as the moſt glorious period of our hiſtory, and do juſtice to the councils that produced the happy event, which every gentleman diveſted of paſſion and prejudice was ready to do; and which, he believed, the preſent age, when rightly informed, would not refuſe. In a word, he extolled his own convention with the moſt extravagant encomiums.

The houſe reſolved to addreſs the king, that copies of all the memorials, repreſentations, letters, and papers, preſented to his majeſty, or his ſecretary of ſtate, relating to depredations ſhould be ſubmitted to the peruſal of the houſe: but ſome members in the oppoſition were not contented with this reſolution. Then mr. Sandys, who may, be termed the 'motion-maker,' moved for an addreſs, deſiring that the houſe might inſpect all letters written, and inſtructions given by the ſecretaries of ſtate, or commiſſioners of the admiralty, to any of the Britiſh governors of America, or any commander in chief, or captains of his majeſty's ſhips of war, or his majeſty's miniſter at the court of Spain, or any of his majeſty's conſuls in Europe, ſince the treaty of Seville, relating to loſſes which the Britiſh ſubjects had ſuſtained by means of depredations committed by the ſubjects of Spain in Europe and America. This was an unreaſonable propoſal, ſuggeſted by the ſpirit of animoſity and faction. Mr H. Walpole juſtly obſerved, that a compliance with ſuch an addreſs might lay open the moſt private tranſactions of the cabinet, and diſcover ſecrets that ought, for the good of the kingdom, to be concealed. It would diſcover to the court of Spain the ultimatum of the king's demands and conceſſions, and the nation would thereby be deprived of many advantages which it might reap, were no ſuch diſcovery made. He ſaid, that as ſoon as the differences betwixt the two courts ſhould arrive at ſuch a criſis, and not before, the conſuls were inſtructed to give notice to the merchants, that they might retire in time with their effects; but, ſhould ſuch inſtructions come to the knowledge of the Spaniards, it would be a kind of watch-word to put them on their guard, and unavoidably occaſion the ruin of many thouſands of Britiſh ſubjects. Certain it is, no government could act either in external or domeſtic affairs with proper influence, dignity, and diſpatch, if every letter and inſtruction relating to an unfiniſhed negotiation ſhould be expoſed to the view of ſuch a numerous aſſembly, compoſed of individuals actuated by motives in themſelves diametrically oppoſite. The motion being rejected by the majority, the ſame gentleman moved again for an addreſs, that his majeſty would give directions for laying before the houſe copies of ſuch memorials or repreſentations as had been made, either to the king of Spain or to his miniſters, ſince the treaty of Seville, relating to the depredations commmitted in Europe or America. A debate enſued; and, upon a diviſion, the queſtion paſſed in the negative.

The houſe, in a committee of ſupply, voted 12,000 ſeamen for the ſervice of the enſuing year, and the ſtanding army was continued without reduction, though powerfully attacked by the whole ſtrength of the oppoſition. The commons likewiſe ordered an addreſs to his majeſty, for the copies of ſeveral memorials ſince the treaty of Seville, touching the rights of Great-Britain, or any infraction of treaties which had not been laid before them. Theſe were accordingly ſubmitted to the inſpection of the houſe. By this time the convention itſelf was not only preſented to the commons, but alſo publiſhed for the information of the people. Divers merchants, planters, and others trading to America, the cities of London and Briſtol, the merchants of Liverpool, and the owners of ſundry ſhips which had been ſeiſed by the Spaniards, offered petitions againſt the convention, by which the ſubjects of Spain were ſo far from giving up their groundleſs and unjuſtifiable practice of viſiting and ſearching Britiſh ſhips ſailing to and from the Britiſh plantations, that they appeared to have claimed the power of doing it as a right: for they inſiſted that the differences which had ariſen concerning it ſhould be referred to plenipotentiaries, to be diſcuſſed by them, without even agreeing to abſtain from ſuch viſitation and ſearch during the time that the diſcuſſion of this affair might laſt. They, therefore, prayed that they might have an opportunity of being heard, and allowed to repreſent the great importance of the Britiſh trade to and from the plantations in America; the clear indiſputable right which they had to enjoy it, without being ſtopped, viſited, or ſearched, by the Spaniards, on any pretence whatſoever; and the certain inevitable deſtruction of all the riches and ſtrength derived to Great-Britain from that trade, if a ſearch of Britiſh ſhips ſailing to and from their own plantations ſhould be tolerated upon any pretext, or under any reſtrictions, or even if the freedom of this navigation ſhould continue much longer in a ſtate of uncertainty. Theſe petitions were referred to the committee appointed to conſider of the covention. Another remonſtrance was likewiſe preſented by the truſtees for eſtabliſhing the colony of Georgia, ſetting forth, that the king of Spain claimed that colony as part of his territories; and that by the convention, the regulation of the limits of Carolina and Florida was referred to the determination of plenipotentiaries; ſo that the colony of Georgia, which undoubtedly belonged to the crown of Great-Britain, was left in diſpute, while the ſettlers remained in the moſt precarious and dangerous ſituation. It was moved that the merchants ſhould be heard by their counſel: but the propoſal was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by miniſtry, and rejected upon a diviſion.

This famous convention, concluded at the Pardo on the 14th day of January, imported, That within ſix weeks, to be reckoned from the day on which the ratifications were exchanged, two miniſters plenipotentiaris ſhould meet at Madrid, to confer and finally regulate the reſpective pretenſions of the two crowns, with relation to the trade and navigation in America and Europe and to the limits of Florida and Carolina, as well as concerning other points which remained likewiſe to be adjuſted, according to the former treaties ſubſiſting between the two nations; that the plenipotentiaries ſhould finiſh their conferrences within the ſpace of eight months: that in the mean time no progreſs ſhould be made in the fortifications of Florida and Carolina: that his catholic majeſty ſhould pay to the king of Great-Briton the ſum of 95,000l. for a balance due to the crown and ſubjects of Great-Britain, after deduction made of the demands of the crown and ſubjects of Spain: that this ſum ſhould be employed for the ſatisfaction, diſcharge, and payment of the demands of the Britiſh ſubjects upon the crown of Spain: that this reciprocal diſcharge, however, ſhould not extend or relate to the accounts and differences which ſubſiſted and were to be ſettled between the crown of Spain and the aſſiento company, nor to any particular or private contracts that might ſubſiſt between either of the two crowns, or their miniſters, with the ſubjects of the other; or between the ſubjects and ſubjects of each nation reſpectively: that his catholic majeſty ſhould cauſe the ſum of 95,000l. to be paid at London within four months, to be reckoned from the day on which the ratifications were exchanged. Such was the ſubſtance of that convention, which alarmed and provoked the merchants and traders of Great-Britain, excited the indignation of all thoſe who retained any regard for the honour of their country, and raiſed a general cry againſt the miniſter who ſtood at the helm of adminiſtration.

The eyes of the whole kingdom were now turned upon the houſe of commons. The two contending parties ſummoned their whole force for the approaching diſpute: on the day appointed for conſidering the convention, 400 members had taken their ſeats by eight in the morning. In a committee of the whole houſe, certain Weſt-India merchants and planters were heard againſt the convention: ſo that this and the following day were employed in reading papers and obtaining information. On the 8th day of March mr. H. Walpole having launched out in the praiſe of that agreement, moved for an addreſs of approbation to his majeſty. He was ſeconded by mr. Campbell, of Pembrokeſhire; and the debate began with extraordinary ardour. He who firſt diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the liſts was ſir Thomas Sanderſon, at that time treaſurer to the prince of Wales, afterwards earl of Scarborough. All the officers and adherents of his royal highneſs had joined the oppoſition; and he himſelf on this occaſion ſat in the gallery, to hear the debate on ſuch an important tranſaction. Sir Thomas Sanderſon obſerved, that the Spaniards by the convention, inſtead of giving us reparation, had obliged us to give them a general releaſe. They had not allowed the word 'Satisfaction' to be ſo much as once mentioned in the treaty. Even the Spaniſh pirate who had cut off the ear of captain Jenkins [e], and uſed the moſt inſulting expreſſion towards the perſon of the king—an expreſſion which no Britiſh ſubject could decently repeat—an expreſſion which no man that had regard for his ſovereign could ever forgive—even this fellow lived to enjoy the fruits of his rapine, and remained a living teſtimony of the cowardly tameneſs and mean ſubmiſſion of Great-Britain; of the triumphant haughtineſs, and ſtubborn pride of Spain. Lord Gage, one of the moſt keen, ſpirited, and ſarcaſtic orators in the houſe, ſtated in this manner the account of the ſatisfaction obtained from the court of Spain by the convention: the loſſes ſuſtained by the Spaniſh depredations amounted to 340,000l. The commiſſary, by a ſtroke of his pen, reduced this demand to 200,000l. then 45,000l. were ſtruc off for prompt payment. He next allotted 60,000l. as the remaining part of a debt pretended to be due to Spain, for the deſtruction of her fleet by ſir George Byng, though it appeared by inſtructions on the table, that Spain had been already amply ſatisfied on that head. Theſe deductions reduced the balance to 95,000l. but the king of Spain inſiſted upon the South-ſea company's paying immediately the ſum of 68,000l. as a debt due to him on one head of accounts, though, in other articles, his catholic majeſty was indebted to the company a million over and above this demand. The remainder to be paid by Spain did not exceed 27,000l. from which ſhe inſiſted upon deducting whatever ſhe might have already given in ſatisfaction for any of the Britiſh ſhips that had been taken; and on being allowed the value of the St. Thereſa, a Spaniſh ſhip which had been ſeized in the port of Dublin. Mr. W. Pitt, with an energy of argument and diction, peculiar to himſelf, declaimed againſt the convention, as inſecure, unſatisfactory, and diſhonourable to Great-Britain. He ſaid the great national objection, the ſearching of Britiſh ſhips, was not admitted, indeed, in the preamble; but ſtood there as the reproach of the whole, as the ſtrongeſt evidence of the fatal ſubmiſſion that followed: on the part of Spain, an uſurpation, an inhuman tyranny claimed and exerciſed over the American ſeas: on the part of England, an undoubted right by treaties, and from God and nature declared and aſſerted in the reſolutions of parliament, were now referred to the diſcuſſion of plenipotentiaries, upon one and the ſame equal foot. This undoubted right was to be diſguiſſed and regulated; and if to regulate be to preſcribe rules, as in all conſtruction it is, that right was, by the expreſs words of the convention to be given up and ſacrificed: for it muſt ceaſe to be any thing from the moment it is ſubmitted to limitation. Mr Lyttelton, with equal force and fluency, anſwered the ſpeech of mr. H. Walpole. 'After he had uſed many arguments to perſuade us to peace (ſaid he) to any peace, good or bad, by pointing out the dangers of a war, dangers I by no means allow to be ſuch as he repreſents them, he crowned all thoſe terrors with the name of the pretender. It would be the cauſe of the pretender. The pretender would come. Is the honourable gentleman ſenſible what this language imports? The people of England complain of the greateſt wrongs and indignities: they complain of the interruption, the deſtruction of their trade: they think the peace has left them in a worſe condition than before; and in anſwer to all theſe complaints, what are they told? why, that their continuing to ſuffer all this, is the price they muſt pay to keep the king and his family on the throne of theſe realms. If this were true, it ought not be owned; but it is far from truth; the very reverſe is true. Nothing can weaken the family; nothing ſhake the eſtabliſhment, but ſuch meaſures as theſe, and ſuch language as this.' He affirmed, that if the miniſters had proceeded conformably to the intentions of parliament, they would either have acted with vigour, or have obtained a real ſecurity in an expreſs acknowledgement of our right not to be ſearched, as a preliminary, ſine qua non, to our treating at all. Inſtead of this, they had referred it to plenipotentiaries. 'Would you, ſir, (ſaid he) ſubmit to a reference, whether you may travel unmoleſted from your houſe in town to your [e] Captain Jenkins was maſter of a Scottiſh merchant ſhip. He was boarded by the captain of a Spaniſh guarda-coſtas, who treated him in the moſt barbarous manner. The Spaniards, after having rummaged his veſſel for what they called contraband commodities, without finding any thing to juſtify their ſearch, inſulted Jenkins with the moſt opprobrious invectives. They tore off one of his ears, bidding him carry it to his king, and tell him they would ſerve him in the ſame manner ſhould an opportunity offer: they tortured him with the moſt ſhocking cruelty, and threatened him with immediate death. This man was examined at the bar of the houſe of commons, and being aſked by a member, what he thought when he found himſelf in the hands of ſuch barbarians? 'I recommended my ſoul to God (ſaid he) and my cauſe to my country.' The behaviour of this brave ſeaman, the ſight of his ear, which was produced, with his account of the indignities which had been offered to the nation and ſovereign of Great-Britain, filled the whole houſe with indignation. Jenkins was afterwards employed in the ſervice of the Eaſt-India company: he approved himſelf worthy of his good fortune, in a long engagement with the pirate Angria, during which he behaved with extraordinary courage and conduct; and ſaved his own ſhip, with three others that were under his convoy.

houſe in the country? Your right is clear and undeniable, why would you have it diſcuſſed; but much leſs would you refer it; if two of your judges belonged to a gang which has often ſtopped and robbed you in your way thither before.' The miniſters, in vindication of the convention, aſſered, that the ſatisfaction granted by Spain was adequate to the injury received: that it was only the preliminary of a treaty which would remove all cauſes of complaint: that war was always expenſive and detrimental to a trading nation, as well as uncertain in its events: that France and Spain would certainly join their forces in caſe of a rupture with Great-Britain that there was not one power in Europe upon which the Engliſh could depend for effectual aſſiſtance; and that war would favour the cauſe and deſigns of a popiſh pretender. The houſe, upon a diviſion, agreed to the addreſs; but when a motion was made for its being recommitted, the two parties renewed the engagement with redoubled eagerneſs and impetuoſity. Sir William Wyndham and mr. Pulteney poured all the thunder of their eloquence againſt the inſolence of Spain, and the conceſſions of the Britiſh miniſtry. Sir Robert Walpole exerted all his fortitude and dexterity in defence of himſelf and his meaſures, and the queſtion being put, the reſolutions for the addreſs were carried by a ſmall majority.

Then ſir William Wyndham ſtanding up, made a pathetic remonſtrance upon this determination. 'This addreſs (ſaid he) is intended to convince mankind, that the treaty under our conſideration is a reaſonable and an honourable treaty. But if a majority of 28 in ſuch a full houſe ſhould fail of that ſucceſs; if the people ſhould not implicitly reſign their reaſon to a vote of this houſe, what will be the conſequence? Will not the parliament loſe its authority? Will it not be thought, that even in the parliament we are governed by a faction? and what the conſequence of this may be, I leave to thoſe gentlemen to conſider, who are now to give their vote for this addreſs: for my own part, I will trouble you no more; but, with theſe my laſt words, I ſincerely pray to Almighty God, who has ſo often wonderfully protected theſe kingdoms, that he will graciouſly continue his protection over them, by preſerving us from that impending danger which threatens the nation from without, and likewiſe from the impending danger which threaten our conſtitution from within.' The miniſter was on this occaſion deſerted by his uſual temper, and even provoked into perſonal abuſe. He declared, that the gentleman who was now the mouth of his opponents had been looked upon as the head of thoſe traitors, who 25 years before conſpired the deſtruction of their country and of the royal family, in order to ſet a popiſh pretender upon the throne: that he was ſeized by the vigilence of the then government, and pardoned by its clemency, but all the uſe he had ungratefully made of that clemency, was to qualify himſelf according to law, that he and his party might ſome time or other have an opportunity to overthrow all law. He branded them all as traitors, and expreſſed his hope, that their behaviour would unite all the true friends of the preſent happy eſtabliſhment. To ſuch a degree of mutual animoſity were both ſides inflamed, that the moſt eminent members of the minority actually retired from parliament; and were by the nation in general revered as martyrs to the liberty of the people.

The diſpute occaſioned by the convention in the houſe of lords, was maintained with equal warmth, and perhaps with more abilities. After this famous treaty had been conſidered, lord Carteret ſuggeſted, that poſſibly one of the contracting powers had preſented a proteſt or declaration, importing that ſhe acceded to ſuch or ſuch a meaſure, only upon condition that the terms of that proteſt or declaration ſhould be made good. He ſaid, that until his mind ſhould be free from the moſt diſtant ſuſpicion that ſuch paper might exiſt in the preſent caſe, he could not form a juſt opinion of the tranſaction himſelf, nor communicate to their lordſhips any light which might be neceſſary for that purpoſe. The adherents to the miniſtry endeavoured to evade his curioſity in this particular, by general aſſertions: but he inſiſted on his ſuſpicion with ſuch perſeverance, that at length the miniſtry produced the copy of a declaration made by the king of Spain before he ratified the convention, ſignifying that his catholic majeſty reſerved to himſelf, in its full force, the right of being able to ſuſpend the aſſiento of negroes, in caſe the company ſhould not pay within a ſhort time the ſum of 68,000l. ſterling, owing to Spain on the duty of negroes, or on the profit of the ſhip Caroline: That under the validity and force of this proteſt, the ſigning of the ſaid convention might be proceeded on, and in no other manner. In the debate that enſued, lord Carteret diſplayed a ſurpriſing extent of political knowledge, recommended by all the graces of elocution, chaſe, pure, dignified, and delicate. Lord Bathurſt argued againſt the articles of convention with his uſual ſpirit, integrity, and good ſenſe, particularly animated by an honeſt indignation, which the wrongs of his country had inſpired. The earl of Cheſterfield attacked this inglorious meaſure with all the weight of argument, and all the poignancy of ſatire. The duke of Argyle, no longer a partiſan of the miniſtry, inveighed againſt it as infamous, treacherous and deſtructive, with all the fire, impetuoſity, and enthuſiaſm of declamation. It was defended with unequal arms by the duke of Newcaſtle, the earl of Cholmondley, lord Harvey, the lord-chancellor, the Biſhop of Saliſbury, and in particular by the earl of Ilay, a nobleman of extenſive capacity and uncommon erudition; remarkable for his knowledge of the civil law, and ſeemingly formed by nature for a politician; cool, diſcerning, plauſible, artful, and enterpriſing; ſtanch to the miniſter, and invariably true to his own intereſt. The diſpute was learned, long, and obſtinate: but ended as uſual in the diſcomfiture of thoſe who had ſtigmatiſed the treaty. The houſe agreed to an addreſs, in which they thanked his majeſty for his gracious condeſcenſion in laying before them the convention. They acknowledged his great prudence in bringing the demands of his ſubjects for the paſt loſſes, which had been ſo long depending, to a final adjuſtment; in procuring an expreſs ſtipulation for a ſpeedy payment; and in laying a foundation for accompliſhing the great and deſireable ends of obtaining future ſecurity, and preſerving the peace between the two nations. They declared their confidence in his royal wiſdom, that in the treaty to be concluded in purſuance of the convention, proper proviſions would be made for the redreſs of the grievances of which the nation had ſo juſtly complained: they aſſured his majeſty, that in caſe his juſt expectations ſhould not be anſwered, the houſe would heartily and zealouſly concur in all ſuch meaſures as ſhould be neceſſary to vindicate his majeſty's honour, and to preſerve to his ſubjects the full enjoyment of all thoſe rights to which they were entitled by treaty and the law of nations. This was a hard-won victory. At the head of thoſe who voted againſt the addreſs we find the prince of Wales. His example was followed by ſix dukes, 22 earls, 4 viſcounts 18 barons, 4 biſhops, and their party was re-enforced by 16 proxies. A ſpirited proteſt was entered and ſubſcribed by 39 peers, comprehending all the noblemen of the kingdom who were moſt eminent for their talants, integrity, and virtue.

[1739] A meſſage having been delivered to the houſe from his majeſty, importing, That he had ſettled 39,000l. per annum on the younger children of the royal family; and deſiring their lordſhips would bring in a bill to enable his majeſty to make that proviſion good, out of the hereditary revenues of the crown, ſome lords in the oppoſition obſerved that the next heir to the crown might look upon this ſettlement as a mortgage of his revenue, which a parliament had no power to make: that formerly no daughter of the royal family was ever provided for by parliament, except the eldeſt, and that never was by way of annuity, but an expreſs proviſion of a determinate ſum of money paid by way of dowry. Theſe objections were over-ruled; and the houſe complied with his majeſty's requeſt. Then the duke of Newcaſtle produced a ſubſidy-treaty, by which his majeſty obliged himſelf to pay to the king of Denmark 70,000l. per annum, on condition of the Dane's furniſhing to his Britannic majeſty a body of 6000 men, when demanded. At the ſame time, his grace delivered a meſſage from the king, deſiring the houſe would enable him to fulfil his engagement; and alſo to raiſe what money and troops the exigency of affairs, during the approaching receſs, might require. Another vehement diſpute aroſe from this propoſal. With reſpect to the treaty, lord Carteret obſerved, that no uſe could be made of the Daniſh troops in any expedition undertaken againſt Spain, becauſe it was ſtipulated in the treaty, that they ſhould not be uſed either in Italy, or on board of the fleet, or be tranſported in whole or in part beyond the ſea, after they ſhould have marched out of the territories of Denmark, except for the defence of the kingdoms of Great-Britain and Ireland: nay, ſhould France join againſt the Engliſh, the Danes could not act againſt that power or Spain, except as part of an army formed in Germany or Flanders. This body of Danes may be ſaid, therefore, to have been retained for the defence and protection of Hanover: or, if the intereſt of Britain was at all conſulted in the treaty, it muſt have been in preventing the Danes from joining their fleets to thoſe of France and Spain. Then he argued againſt the ſecond part of the meſſage with great vivacity. He ſaid nothing could be more dangerous to the conſtitution than a general and unlimited vote of credit. Such a demand our anceſtors would have heard with amazement, and rejected with ſcorn. He affirmed that the practice was but of a modern date in England: that it was never heard of before the revolution; and never became frequent until the nation was bleſſed with the preſent wiſe adminiſtration. He ſaid, if ever a general vote of credit and confidence ſhould become a cuſtomary compliment from the parliament to the crown at the end of every ſeſſion, or as often as the miniſter might think fit to deſire it, parliaments would grow deſpicable in the eyes of the people: then a proclamation might be eaſily ſubſtituted in its ſtead, and happy would it be for the nation if that ſhould be ſufficient; for when a parliament ceaſes to be a check upon miniſters, it becomes an uſeleſs and unneceſſary burthen on the people. The repreſentatives muſt always be paid ſome way or other: if their wages are not paid openly and ſurely by their reſpective conſtituents, as they were formerly, a majority of them may in future times be always ready to accept of wages from the adminiſtration, and theſe muſt come out of the pockets of the people. The duke of Argyle and the earl of Cheſterfield enlarged upon the ſame topics. Nevertheleſs, the houſe complied with the meſſage; and preſented an addreſs, in which they not only approved of the treaty with Denmark, but likewiſe aſſured his majeſty they would concur with his meaſures, and ſupport him in fulfilling his engagements, as well as in making ſuch further augmentation of his forces by ſea and land, as he ſhould think neceſſary for the honour, intereſt, and ſafety of theſe kingdoms.

The ſame meſſage being communicated to the commons, they voted 70,583l. for the ſubſidy to Denmark, and 500,000l. for augmenting the forces on any emergency. As Great-Britain ſtood engaged by the convention to pay to the crown of Spain the ſum of 60,000l. in conſideration of the ſhips taken and deſtroyed by ſir George Byng, which ſum was to be applied to the relief of the Britiſh merchants who had ſuffered by the Spaniſh depredations, the commons inſerted in a bill a clauſe, providing for this ſum to be paid by the parliament. When the bill was read in the houſe of lords a motion was made by lord Bathurſt for an addreſs, to know, whether Spain had paid the money ſtipulated by the convention, as the time limited for the payment of it was now expired? The duke of Newcaſtle, by his majeſty's permiſſion, acquainted the houſe, that it was not paid; and that Spain had as yet given no reaſon for the non-payment. Then a day was appointed to conſider the ſtate of the nation, when lord Carteret moved for a reſolution, that the failure of Spain in this particular was a breach of the convention, a high indignity to his majeſty, and an injuſtice to the nation: but after a warm debate, this motion was over-ruled by the majority. The miniſter, in order to atone in ſome meaſure for the unpopular ſtep he had taken in the convention, allowed a ſalutary law to paſs for the encouragement of the woolen manufacture; and two bills in behalf of the ſugar colonies, one permitting them, for a limited time, to export their produce directly to foreign parts, under proper reſtrictions; and the other making more effectual proviſions for ſecuring the duties laid upon the importation of foreign ſugars, rum, and melaſſes into Great-Britain, and his majeſty's plantations in America. The ſupplies being voted, the funds eſtabliſhed, and the crown gratified in every particular, the king cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech on the 14th day of June, when the chancellor in his majeſty's name prorogued the parliament. [f]

Letters of marque and repriſal were granted againſt the Spaniards: a promotion was made of general-officers: the troops were augmented: a great fleet was aſſembled at Spithead; a re-enforcement ſent out to admiral Haddock; and an embargo laid on all merchant ſhips outward bound. Notwithſtanding theſe preparations of war, mr. Keen, the Britiſh miniſter at Madrid, declared to the court of Spain, that his maſter, although he had permitted his ſubjects to make repriſals, would not be underſtood to have broken the peace; and that this permiſſion would be recalled as ſoon as his catholic majeſty ſhould be diſpoſed to make the ſatisfaction which had been ſo juſtly demanded. He was given to underſtand, that the king of Spain looked upon thoſe repriſals as acts of hoſtility; and that he hoped, with the aſſiſtance of heaven and his allies, he ſhould be able to ſupport a good cauſe againſt his adverſaries. He publiſhed a manifeſto in juſtification of his own conduct, complaining that admiral Haddock had received orders to cruiſe with his ſquadron between the capes St. Vincent and St. Mary, in order to ſurpriſe the aſſogue ſhips; that letters of repriſal had been publiſhed at London, in an indecent ſtyle, and even carried into execution in different parts of the world. He excuſed his non-payment of the 95,000l. ſtipulated in the convention, by affirming that the Britiſh court had firſt contravened the articles of that treaty, by the orders ſent to Haddock; by continuing to fortify Georgia, by re-enforcing the ſquadron at Jamaica; and by eluding the payment of the 68,000l. due to Spain from the South-ſea company, on the aſſiento for negroes. The French ambaſſador at the Hague, declared that the king his maſter was obliged by treaties to aſſiſt his catholic majeſty by ſea and land, in caſe he ſhould be attacked; he diſſuaded the ſtates-general from eſpouſing the quarrel of Great-Britain, and they aſſured him they would obſerve a ſtrict neutrality, though they could not avoid furniſhing his Britannic majeſty with ſuch ſuccours as he could demand, by virtue of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two powers. The people of England were inſpired with uncommon alacrity at the near proſpect of war, for which they had ſo long clamoured; and the miniſtry ſeeing it unavoidable, began to be earneſt and effectual in their preparations.

The events of war were ſtill unfavourable to the emperor. He had beſtowed the command of his army upon Velt-mareſchal count Wallis, who aſſembled his forces in the neighbourhood of Belgrade, and advanced towards Crotſka, where he was attacked by the Turks with ſuch impetuoſity and perſeverance, that he was obliged to give ground, after a long and obſtinate engagement, in which he loſt above 6000 men. The earl of Crawford, who ſerved as a volunteer in the imperial army, ſignalized his courage in an extraordinary manner on this occaſion, and received a dangerous wound, of which he never perfectly recovered. The Turks were afterwards worſted at Jabouka; nevertheleſs, their grand army inveſted Belgrade on the ſide of Servia, and carried on the operations of the ſiege with extraordinary vigour. The emperor, dreading the loſs of this place, ſeeing his finances exhauſted, and his army conſiderably diminiſhed, conſented to a negotiation for peace, which was tranſacted under the mediation of the French ambaſſador at the Ottoman Porte. The count de Neuperg, as imperial plenipotentiary, ſigned the preliminaries on the 1ſt day of September. They were ratified by the emperor, though he pretended to be diſſatisfied with the articles; and declared that his miniſter had exceeded his powers. By this treaty the houſe of Auſtria ceded to the grand ſignor Belgrade, Sabatz, Servia, Auſtrian Walachia, the iſle and fortreſs of Orſova, with the fort of St. Elizabeth; and the contracting powers agreed that the Danube and the Saave ſhould ſerve as boundaries to the two empires. The emperor publiſhed a circular letter, addreſſed to his miniſters at all the courts in Europe, blaming count Wallis for the bad ſucceſs of the laſt campaign, and diſowning the negotiations of count Neuperg: nay, theſe two officers were actually diſgraced, and confined in different caſtles. This, however, was no other than a ſacrifice to the reſentment of the czarina, who loudly complained, that the emperor had concluded a ſeparate peace, contrary to his engagements with the Ruſſian empire. Her general, count Munich, had obtained a victory over the Turks at Choczim in Moldavia, and made himſelf maſter of that place, in which he found 200 pieces of artillery: but the country was ſo ruined by the incurſions of the Tartars, that the Muſcovites could not ſubſiſt in it during the winter. The czarina finding herſelf abandoned by the emperor, and unable to cope with the whole power of the Ottoman empire, took the firſt opportunity of putting an end to the war upon honourable terms. After a ſhort negotiation, the conferences ended in a treaty, by which ſhe was left in poſſeſſion of Aſoph, on condition that its fortifications ſhould be demoliſhed; and the ancient limits were re-eſtabliſhed between the two empires.

[f] Among the laws enacted in the courſe of this ſeſſion was an act againſt gaming, which had become univerſal through all ranks of people, and likely to prove deſtructive of all morals, induſtry, and ſentiments. Another bill paſſed, for granting a reward to Joanna Stevens, on her diſcovering, for the benefit of the public, a noſtrum for the cure of perſons afflicted with the ſtone; a medicine which has by no means anſwered the expectations of the legiſlature.

In the houſe of lords complaint was made by lord Delawar of a ſatire, intituled, Manners, written by mr. Whitehead; in which ſome characters of diſtinction were ſeverely laſhed, in the true ſpirit of poetry. It was voted a libel; a motion was made to take the author into cuſtody: but he having withdrawn himſelf, the reſentment of the houſe fell upon R. Dodſley, the publiſher of the work, who was committed to the uſher of the black rod, though lord Carteret, the earl of Abingdon, and lord Talbot, ſpoke in his behalf.

A rupture between Great-Britain and Spain was now become inevitable. The Engliſh ſquadron in the Mediterranean had already made prize of two rich Carracca ſhips. The king had iſſued orders for augmenting his land-forces, and raiſing a body of marines: and a great number of ſhips of war were put in commiſſion. Admiral Vernon had been ſent to the Weſt-Indies, to aſſume the command of the ſquadron in thoſe ſeas; and to annoy the trade and ſettlements of the Spaniards. This gentleman had rendered himſelf conſiderable in the houſe of commons, by loudly condemning all the meaſures of the miniſtry, and bluntly ſpeaking his ſentiments, whatever they were, without reſpect of perſons, and ſometimes without any regard to decorum. He was counted a good officer, and this boiſterous manner ſeemed to enhance his character. As he had once commanded a ſquadron in Jamaica, he was perfectly well acquainted with thoſe ſeas; and in a debate upon the Spaniſh depredations, he chanced to affirm, that Porto-Bello, on the Spaniſh main, might be eaſily taken: nay, he even undertook to reduce it with ſix ſhips only. This offer was echoed from the mouths of all the members in the oppoſition. Vernon was extolled as another Drake or Raleigh: he became the idol of a party, and his praiſe reſounded from all corners of the kingdom. The miniſter, in order to appeaſe the clamours of the people on this ſubject, ſent him as commander in chief to the Weſt-Indies. He was pleaſed with an opportunity to remove ſuch a troubleſome cenſor from the houſe of commons; and perhaps, he was not without hope, that Vernon would diſgrace himſelf and his party, by failing in the exploit he had undertaken. His catholic majeſty having ordered all the Britiſh ſhips in his harbours to be ſeiſed and detained, the king of England would keep meaſures with him no longer, but denounced war againſt him on the 23d day of October. Many Engliſh merchants began to equip privateers, and arm the trading veſſels, to protect their own commerce, as well as to diſtreſs that of the enemy. The ſeſſion of parliament was opened in November, when the king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, declared that he had augmented his forces by ſea and land, purſuant to the power veſted in him by parliament for the ſecurity of his dominions, the protection of trade, and the annoyance of the enemy; and he expreſſed his apprehenſion, that the heats and animoſities which had been induſtriouſly fomented throughout the kingdom encouraged Spain to act in ſuch a manner as rendered it neceſſary for him to have recourſe to arms. In anſwer to this ſpeech, affectionate addreſſes were preſented by both houſes, without any conſiderable oppoſition.

The ſeceding members had again reſumed their ſeats in the houſe of commons; and mr. Pulteney thought proper to vindicate the extraordinary ſtep which they had taken. He ſaid, they thought that ſtep was neceſſary, as affairs then ſtood, for clearing their characters to poſterity from the imputation of ſitting in an aſſembly where a determined majority gave a ſanction to meaſures evidently to the diſgrace of his majeſty and the nation. He obſerved, that their conduct was ſo fully juſtified by the declaration of war againſt Spain, that any further vindication would be ſuperfluous; for every aſſertion contained in it had been almoſt in the ſame words inſiſted upon by thoſe who oppoſed the convention: 'every ſentence in it (added he) is an echo of what was ſaid in our reaſoning againſt that treaty: every poſitive truth which the declaration lays down was denied with the utmoſt confidence by thoſe who ſpoke for the convention; and, ſince that time, there has not one event happened which was not then foreſeen and foretold.' He propoſed, that in maintaining the war, the Spaniſh ſettlements in the Weſt-Indies ſhould be attacked; and that the miniſtry ſhould not have the power to give up the conqueſt that might be made. He ſaid he heartily wiſhed, for his majeſty's honour and ſervice, that no mention had been made of heats and animoſities in the king's ſpeech; and gave it as his opinion, that they ſhould take no notice of that clauſe in their addreſs. He was anſwered by ſir Robert Walpole, who took occaſion to ſay, he was in no great concern leſt the ſervice of his majeſty or the nation ſhould ſuffer by the abſence of thoſe members who had quitted the houſe: he affirmed the nation was generally ſenſible, that the many uſeful and popular acts which paſſed towards the end of the laſt ſeſſion were greatly forwarded and facilitated by the ſeceſſion of thoſe gentlemen; and, if they were returned only to oppoſe and perplex, he ſhould not be at all ſorry to ſee them recede again.

Mr Pulteney revived the bill which he had formerly prepared for the encouragement of ſeamen. After a long diſpute and eager oppoſition by the miniſtry, it paſſed both houſes, and obtained the royal aſſent. Mr Sandys having obſerved, that there could be no immediate uſe for a great number of forces in the kingdom; and explained how little ſervice could be expected from raw and undiſciplined men; propoſed an addreſs to the king, deſiring that the body of marines ſhould be compoſed of drafts from the old regiments: that as few officers ſhould be appointed as the nature of the caſe would permit; and he expreſſed his hope, that the houſe would recommend this method to his majeſty, in tender compaſſion to his people, already burthened with many heavy and grievous taxes. This ſcheme was repugnant to the intention of the miniſtry, whoſe aim was to increaſe the number of their dependents, and extend their parliamentary intereſt, by granting a great number of commiſſions. The propoſal was, therefore, after a long debate, rejected by the majority. Motions were made for an enquiry into the conduct of thoſe who concluded the convention; but they were over-ruled. The penſion-bill was revived, and ſo powerfully ſupported by the eloquence of ſir William Wyndham, mr. Pulteney, and mr. Littelton, that it made its way through the commons to the upper houſe, where it was again loſt, upon a diviſion, after a very long debate. As the ſeamen of the kingdom expreſſed uncommon averſion to the ſervice of the government, and the fleet could not be manned without great difficulty, the miniſtry prepared a bill, which was brought in by ſir Charles Wager, for regiſtering all ſeamen, watermen, fiſhermen, and lightermen, throughout his majeſty's dominions. Had this bill paſſed into a law, a Britiſh ſailor would have been reduced to the moſt abject degree of ſlavery: had he removed from a certain diſtrict allotted for the place of his reſidence, he would have been deemed a deſerter, and puniſhed accordingly: he muſt have appeared, when ſummoned, at all hazards, whatever might have been the circumſtances of his family, or the ſtate of his private affairs: had he been incumbered with debt, he muſt either have incurred the penalties of this law, or lain at the mercy of his creditors: had he acquired by induſtry, or received by inheritance, an ample fortune, he would have been liable to be torn from his poſſeſſions, and ſubjected to hardſhips which no man would endure but from the ſenſe of fear or indigence. The bill was ſo vigorouſly oppoſed by ſir John Barnard and others, as a flagrant encroachment on the liberties of the people, that the houſe rejected it on the ſecond reading.

The king having by meſſage communicated to the houſe his intenſion of diſpoſing the princeſs Mary in marriage to prince Frederick of Heſſe; and expreſſing his hope, that the commons would enable him to give a ſuitable portion to his daughter; they unanimouſly reſolved to grant 40,000l. for that purpoſe; and preſented an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty, for having communicated to the houſe this intended marriage. On the 13th day of March a ſhip arrived from the Weſt-Indies, diſpatched by admiral Vernon, with an account of his having taken Porto-Bello, on the iſthmus of Darien, with ſix ſhips only, and demoliſhed all the fortification of the place. The Spaniards acted with ſuch puſillanimity on this occaſion, that their forts were taken almoſt without bloodſhed. The two houſes of parliament joined in an addreſs of congratulation upon this ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms; and the nation in general was wonderfully elated by an exploit which was magnified much above its merit. The commons granted every thing the crown thought proper to demand. They provided for 28,000 land-forces, beſides 6000 marines. They enabled his majeſty to equip a very powerful navy; they voted the ſubſidy to the king of Denmark; and they empowered their ſovereign to defray certain extraordinary expences not ſpecified in the eſtimates. To anſwer theſe uncommon grants, they impoſed a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound; and enabled his majeſty to deduct 1200,000l. from the ſinking-fund; in a word, the expence of the war, during the courſe of the enſuing year amounted to about four millions. The ſeſſion was cloſed on the 29th day of April, when the king thanked the commons for the ſupplies they had ſo liberally granted, and recommended union and moderation to both houſes.

[1740] During the greateſt part of this winter, the poor had been grievouſly afflicted in conſequence of a ſevere froſt, which began at Chriſtmas and continued till the latter end of February. The river Thames was covered with ſuch a cruſt of ice, that a multitude of people dwelled upon it in tents, and a great number of booths were erected for the entertainment of the populace. The navigation was entirely ſtopped: the watermen and fiſhermen were diſabled from earning a livelihood: the fruits of the earth were deſtroyed by the cold, which was ſo extreme, that many perſons were chilled to death; and this calamity was the more deeply felt, as the poor could not afford to ſupply themſelves with coals and fuel, which were advanced in price, in proportion to the ſeverity and continuance of the froſt. The lower claſs of labourers, who worked in the open air, were now deprived of all means of ſubſiſtence: many kinds of manufactures were laid aſide, becauſe it was found impracticable to carry them on. The price of all ſorts of proviſion roſe almoſt to a dearth: even water was ſold in the ſtreets of London. In this ſeaſon of diſtreſs, many wretched families muſt have periſhed by cold and hunger, had not thoſe of opulent fortunes, been inſpired with remarkable ſpirit of compaſſion and humanity. Nothing can more redound to the honour of the Engliſh nation, than did thoſe inſtances of benevolence and well conducted charity which were then exhibited. The liberal hand was not only opened to the profeſſed beggar, and the poor that owned their diſtreſs: but uncommon pains were taken to find out and relieve thoſe more unhappy objects, who from motives of falſe pride, or ingenuous ſhame, endeavoured to conceal their miſery. Theſe were aſſiſted almoſt in their own deſpite. The ſolitary habitations of the widow, the fatherleſs, and the unfortunate, were viſited by the beneficent, who felt for the woes of their fellow-creatures; and, to ſuch as refuſed to receive a portion of the public charity, the neceſſaries of life were privately conveyed, in ſuch a manner as could leaſt ſhoc the delicacy of their diſpoſitions.

In the beginning of May, the king of Great-Britain ſet out for Hanover, after having appointed a regency, and concerted vigorous meaſures for diſtreſſing the enemy. In a few days after his departure, the eſpouſals of the princeſs Mary were celebrated by proxy, the duke of Cumberland repreſenting the prince of Heſſe, and in June, the princeſs embarked for the continent. About the ſame time, a ſloop arrived in England with diſpatches from admiral Vernon, who, ſince his adventure at Porto-Bello, had bombarded Carthagena, and taken the fort of San Lorenzo, on the the river of Chagre, in the neighbourhood of his former conqueſt. This month was likewiſe marked by the death of his Pruſſian majeſty, a prince by no means remarkable for great or amiable qualities. He was ſucceeded on the throne by Frederick his eldeſt ſon, the late king of that realm, who has ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a warrior and legiſlator. In Auguſt the king of Great-Britain concluded a treaty with the landgrave of Heſſe, who engaged to furniſh him with a body of 6000 men for four years, in conſideration of an annual ſubſidy of 250,000 crowns.

Mean while, preparations of war were vigorouſly carried on by the miniſtry in England. They had wiſely reſolved to annoy the Spaniards in their American poſſeſſions. Three ſhips of war cruiſing in the bay of Biſcay, fell in with a large Spaniſh ſhip of the line ſtrongly manned, and took her after a very obſtinate engagement: but the aſſogue ſhips arrived, with the treaſure in Spain, notwithſtanding the vigilance of the Engliſh commanders, who were ſtationed in a certain latitude to intercept that flota. One camp was formed on Hounſlow-heath; and 6000 marines lately levied were encamped on the iſle of Wight, in order to be embarked for the Weſt-Indies. Intelligence being received that a ſtrong ſquadron of Spaniſh ſhips of war waited at Ferrol for orders to ſail to their American ſettlements, ſir John Norris ſailed with a powerful fleet from Spithead, to diſpute their voyage; and the duke of Cumberland ſerved in perſon as a volunteer in this expedition: but after divers fruitleſs efforts, he was by contrary winds obliged to lie inactive for the greateſt part of the ſummer in Torbay; and, upon the advice that the French and Spaniſh ſquadrons had ſailed to the Weſt-Indies in conjunction, the deſign againſt Ferrol was wholly laid aſide. In September, a ſmall ſquadron of Ships, commanded by commodore Anſon, ſet ſail for the South-ſea in order to act againſt the enemy on the coaſt of Chilli and Peru, and co-operate occaſionally with admiral Vernon acroſs the iſthmus of Darien. The ſcheme was well laid, but ruined by unneceſſary delays, and unforeſeen accidents. But the hopes of the nation centered chiefly in a formidable armament deſigned for the northern coaſt of new Spain, and his catholic majeſty's other ſettlements on that ſide of the Atlantick. Commiſſions had been iſſued for raiſing a regiment of four battalions in the Engliſh colonies of North-America, that they might be tranſported to Jamaica, and join the forces from England. Theſe, conſiſting of the marines, and detachments from ſome old regiments, were embarked in October at the iſle of Wight, under the command of lord Cathcart, a nobleman of approved honour, and great experience in the art of war; and they ſailed under convoy of ſir Chaloner Ogle, with a fleet of 27 ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, fire-ſhips, bomb-ketches, and tenders. They were likewiſe furniſhed with hoſpital-ſhips, and ſtore-ſhips, laden with proviſion, ammunition, all ſorts of warlike implements, and every kind of convenience. Never was an armament more completely equipped; and never had the nation more reaſon to hope for extraordinary ſucceſs.

On the 20th day of October, Charles VI. emperor of Germany, the laſt prince of the houſe of Auſtria, died at Vienna, and was ſucceeded in his hereditary dominions by his eldeſt daughter, the archduchеſs Maria Thereſa, married to the grand duke of Tuſcany. Though this princeſs ſucceeded as queen of Hungary, by virtue of the pragmatic ſanction guaranteed by all the powers in Europe, her ſucceſſion produced ſuch conteſts as kindled a cruel war in the empire. The young king of Pruſſia was no ſooner informed of the emperor's death, than he entered Sileſia at the head of 20,000 men; ſeized the fiefs to which his family laid claim; and publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring that he had no intention to contravene the pragmatic ſanction. The elector of Bavaria refuſed to acknowledge the archduchеſs as queen of Hungary and Bohemia, alledging that he himſelf had pretenſions to thoſe countries, as the deſcendant of the emperor Ferdinand I. who was head of the German branch of the houſe of Auſtria. Charles VI. was ſurvived but a few days before his ally, the czarina Anne Iwnowna, who died in the 45th year of her age, after having bequeathed her crown to Iwan, or John, the infant ſon of her neice, the princeſs Anne of Mecklenburgh, who had been married to Anthony Ulrick, duke of Brunſwick Lunenburgh-Bevern. She appointed the duke of Courland regent of the empire, and even guardian of the young czar, though his own parents were alive: but this diſpoſition was not long maintained.

The king of Great-Britain having returned to England from his German dominions, the ſeſſion of the parliament was opened in November. His majeſty aſſured them, on this occaſion, that he was determined to proſecute the war vigorouſly, even though France ſhould eſpouſe the cauſe of Spain, as her late conduct ſeemed to favour this ſuppoſition. He took notice of the emperor's death, as an event which in all likelihood would open a new ſcene of affairs in Europe: he therefore, recommended to their conſideration the neceſſary ſupplies for putting the nation in ſuch a poſture that it ſhould have nothing to fear from any emergency. Finally, he deſired them to conſider of ſome proper regulations for preventing the exportation of corn, and for more effectual methods to man the fleet at this conjunction. The commons, after having voted an addreſs of thanks, brought in a bill for prohibiting the exportation of corn and proviſions, for a limited time, out of Great-Britain, Ireland, and the American plantations. This was a meaſure calculated to diſtreſs the enemy, who were ſuppoſed to be in want of theſe neceſſaries. The French had contracted for a very large quantity of beef and pork in Ireland, for the uſe of their own and the Spaniſh navy; and an embargo had been laid upon the ſhips of that kingdom. The bill met with a vigorous oppoſition: yet the houſe unanimouſly reſolved, that his majeſty ſhould be addreſſed to lay an immediate embargo upon all ſhips laden with corn, grain, ſtarch, rice, beef, pork, and other proviſions, to be exported to foreign parts. They likewiſe reſolved that the thanks of the houſe ſhould be given to vice-admiral Vernon, for the ſervice he had done to his king and country in the Weſt-Indies. One William Cooley was examined at the bar of the houſe, and committed to priſon, after having owned himſelf author of a paper intitled, 'Conſiderations upon the embargo on proviſion or victual.' The performance contained many ſhrewd and ſevere animadverſions upon the government, for having taken a ſtep which, without anſwering the purpoſe of diſtreſſing the enemy, would prove a grievous diſcouragement to trade, and ruin all the graſiers of Ireland. Notwithſtanding the arguments uſed in this remonſtrance, and ſeveral petitions were preſented againſt the corn-bill, it paſſed by mere dint of miniſterial influence. The other party endeavoured, by various motions, to ſet on foot an enquiry into the orders, letters, and inſtructions, which had been ſent to admiral Vernon and admiral Haddock: but all ſuch inveſtigations were carefully avoided.

A very hot conteſt aroſe from a bill which the miniſtry brought in under the ſpecious title of, A bill for the encouragement and increaſe of ſeamen, and for the better and ſpeedier manning his majeſty's fleet. This was a revival of the oppreſſive ſcheme which had been rejected in the former ſeſſion; a ſcheme by which the juſtices of the peace were empowered to iſſue warrants to conſtables and headboroughs, to ſearch by day or night for ſuch ſea-faring men as ſhould conceal themſelves within their reſpective juriſdictions. Theſe ſearchers were veſted with authority to force open doors, in caſe of reſiſtance; and encouraged to this violence by a reward for every ſeaman they ſhould diſcover; while the unhappy wretches ſo diſcovered were dragged into the ſervice, and their names entered in a regiſter to be kept at the Navy or the Admiralty-office. Such a plan of tyranny did not paſs uncenſured. Every exceptionable clauſe produced a warm debate, in which ſir John Barnard, mr. Pulteney, mr. Sandys, lord Gage, mr. Pitt, and mr. Lyttelton, ſignalized themſelves nobly in defending the liberties of their fellow-ſubjects. Mr Pitt having expreſſed a laudable indignation at ſuch a large ſtride towards deſpotic power, in juſtification of which nothing could be urged but the plea of neceſſity, mr. H. Walpole thought proper to attac him with ſome perſonal ſarcaſms. He reflected upon his youth; and obſerved that the diſcovery of truth was very little promoted by pompous diction and theatrical emotion. Theſe inſinuations expoſed him to a ſevere reply. Mr Pitt ſtanding up again, ſaid 'he would not undertake to determine whether youth could be juſtly imputed to any man as a reproach: but he affirmed, that the wretch, who after having ſeen the conſequences of repeated errors, continues ſtill to blunder, and whoſe age has only added obſtinacy to ſtupidity, is ſurely the object of either abhorrence or contempt, and deſerves not that his grey head ſhould ſecure him from inſults: much more is he to be abhorred, who, as he has advanced in age, has receded from virtue, and becomes more wicked with leſs temptation; who proſtitutes himſelf for money which he cannot enjoy; and ſpends the remains of his life in the ruin of his country.'—Petitions were preſented from the city of London, and county of Gloceſter, againſt the bill, as detrimental to the trade and navigation of the kingdom, by diſcouraging rather than encouraging ſailors, and deſtructive to the liberties of the ſubjects: but they were both rejected, as inſults upon the houſe of commons. After very long debates, maintained on both ſides with extraordinary ardour and emotion, the ſevere clauſes were dropped, and the bill paſſed with amendments.

But the moſt remarkable incident of this ſeſſion was an open and perſonal attac upon the miniſter, who was become extremely unpopular all over the kingdom. The people were now more than ever ſenſible of the grievous taxes under which they groaned; and ſaw their burthens daily increaſing. No effectual attempt had as yet been made to annoy the enemy. Expenſive ſquadrons had been equipped; had made excurſions, and returned without ſtriking a blow. The Spaniſh fleet had ſailed firſt from Cadiz, and then from Ferrol, without any interruption from admiral Haddock, who commanded the Britiſh ſquadron in the Mediterranean, and who was ſuppoſed to be reſtricted by the inſtructions he had received from the miniſtry, though in fact his want of ſucceſs was owing to accident. Admiral Vernon had written from the Weſt-Indies to his private friends, that he was neglected, and in danger of being ſacrificed. Notwithſtanding the numerous navy which the nation maintained, the Spaniſh privateers made prizes of the Britiſh merchant ſhips with impunity. In violation of treaties, and in contempt of that intimate connexion which had been ſo long cultivated between the French and Engliſh miniſtry, the king of France had ordered the harbour and fortifications of Dunkirk to be repaired: his fleet had ſailed to the Weſt-Indies, in conjunction with that of Spain; and the merchants of England began to tremble for Jamaica: finally, commerce was in a manner ſuſpended, by the practice of preſſing ſailors into the ſervice, and by the embargo which had been laid upon ſhips in all the ports of Great-Britain and Ireland. Theſe cauſes of popular diſcontent, added to other complaints which had been ſo long repeated againſt the miniſter, exaggerated and inculcated by his enemies with unwearied induſtry, at length rendered him ſo univerſally odious, that his name was ſeldom or never mentioned with decency, except by his own dependents.

The country-party in parliament ſeiſed this opportunity of vengeance. Mr Sandys went up to ſir Robert Walpole in the houſe, and told him, that on Friday next he ſhould bring a charge againſt him in public. The miniſter ſeemed to be ſurpriſed at this unexpected intimation: but, after a ſhort pauſe, thanked him politely for this previous notice, and ſaid he deſired no favour, but fair play.[g] Mr Sandys, at the time which he had appointed for this accuſation, ſtood up, and in a ſtudied ſpeech entered into a long deduction of the miniſter's miſconduct. He inſiſted upon the diſcontents of the nation, in conſequence of the meaſures which had been for many years purſued at home and abroad. He profeſſed his belief that there was not a gentleman in the houſe who did not know that one ſingle perſon in the adminiſtration was the chief, if not the ſole adviſer and promoter of all thoſe meaſures. 'This (added he) is known without doors, as well as within; therefore, the diſcontents, the reproaches, and even the curſes of the people, are all directed againſt that ſingle perſon. They complain of preſent meaſures: they have ſuffered by paſt meaſures: they expect no redreſs; they expect no alteration or amendment, whilſt he has a ſhare in directing or adviſing our future adminiſtration. Theſe, ſir, are the ſentiments of the people in regard to that miniſter: theſe ſentiments we are in honour and duty bound to repreſent to his majeſty; and the proper method for doing this, as eſtabliſhed by our conſtitution, is to addreſs his majeſty to remove him from his councils.' He then proceeded to explain the particulars of the miniſter's miſconduct in the whole ſeries of his negotiations abroad. He charged him with having endeavoured to ſupport his own intereſt, and to erect a kind of deſpotic government, by the practice of corruption; with having betrayed the intereſt and honour of Great-Britain in the late convention; with having neglected to proſecute the war againſt Spain; and he concluded with a motion for an addreſs to the king, that he would be pleaſed to remove ſir Robert Walpole from his preſence and councils for ever. He was anſwered by mr. Pelham, who undertook to defend or excuſe all the meaſures which the other had condemned; and acquitted himſelf as a warm friend and unſhaken adherent. Againſt this champion ſir John Barnard entered the liſts, and was ſuſtained by mr. Pulteney, who, with equal ſpirit and preciſion, pointed out and expoſed all the material errors and mal-practices of the adminiſtration. Sir Robert Walpole ſpoke with great temper and deliberation in behalf of himſelf. With reſpect to the article of bribery and corruption, he ſaid if any one inſtance had been mentioned; if it had been ſhown that he ever offered a reward to any member of either houſe, or ever threatened to deprive any member of his office or employment, in order to influence his voting in parliament, there might have been ſome ground for this charge; but when it was ſo generally laid, he did not know what he could ſay to it, unleſs to deny it as generally and as poſitively as it had been aſſerted.—Such a declaration as this, in the hearing of ſo many perſons, who not only knew, but ſubſiſted by his wages of corruption, was a ſtrong proof of the miniſter's being dead to all ſenſe of ſhame, and all regard to veracity. The debate was protracted by the court members till three o'clock in morning, when above 60 of the oppoſite party having retired, the motion was rejected by a conſiderable majority.

A bill was brought in for prohibiting the practice of inſuring ſhips belonging to the enemies of the nation; but it was vigorouſly oppoſed by ſir John Barnard and mr. Willimot, who demonſtrated that this kind of traffic was advantageous to the kingdom; and the ſcheme was dropped. Another warm conteſt aroſe upon a clauſe of the mutiny-bill relating to the quartering of ſoldiers upon inn-keepers and publicans, who complained of their being diſtreſſed in furniſhing thoſe gueſts with proviſions and neceſſaries at the rates preſcribed by law or cuſtom. There were not wanting advocates to expatiate upon the nature of this grievance, which, however, was not redreſſed. A new trade was at this time opened with Perſia, through the dominions of the czar, and veſted with an excluſive privilege in the Ruſſia company, by an act of parliament. The commons voted 40,000 ſeamen for the ſervice of the enſuing year, and about 30,000 men for the eſtabliſhment of land-forces. They provided for the ſubſidies granted to the king of Denmark and the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel; and took every ſtep which was ſuggeſted for the eaſe and the convenience of the government.

The parties in the houſe of lords were influenced by the ſame motives which actuated the commons. The duke of Argyle, who had by this time reſigned all his places, declared open war againſt the miniſtry. In the beginning of the ſeſſion, the king's ſpeech was no ſooner reported by the chancellor, than this nobleman ſtood up, and moved that a general addreſs of thanks ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, inſtead of a recapitulation of every paragraph of the king's ſpeech, re-echoed from the parliament to the throne, with expreſſions of blind approbation, implying a general concurrence with all the meaſures of the miniſter. He ſpoke on this ſubject with an aſtoniſhing impetuoſity of eloquence, that rolled like a river which had overflowed its banks and deluged the whole adjacent country. The motion was ſupported by lord Bathurſt, lord Carteret, the earl of Cheſterfield, and lord Gower, who, though they diſplayed all the talents of oratory, were out-voted by the oppoſite party, headed by the duke of Newcaſtle, the earl of Cholmondely, lord Hervey, and the lord-chancellor. The motion was rejected, and the addreſs compoſed in the uſual ſtrain. The ſame motions for an enquiry into orders and inſtructions, which had miſcarried in the lower-houſe, were here repeated with the ſame bad ſucceſs: in the debates which enſued, the young earls of Hallifax and Sandwich acquired a conſiderable ſhare of reputation, for the ſtrength of argument and elocution with which they contended againſt the adherents of the miniſtry. When the houſe took into conſideration the ſtate of the army, the duke of Argyle having harangued with equal ſkill and energy on military affairs, propoſed that the forces ſhould be augmented by adding new levies to the old companies, without increaſing the number of officers; as ſuch an augmentation ſerved only to debaſe the dignity of the ſervice, by raiſing the loweſt of mankind to the rank of gentlemen; and to extend the influence the miniſter, by multiplying his dependents. He, therefore, moved for a reſolution, that the augmenting the army by raiſing regiments, as it is the moſt unneceſſary and moſt expenſive method of augmentation, was alſo the moſt dangerous to the liberties of the nation. This propoſal was likewiſe over-ruled, after a ſhort though warm contention. This was the fate of all the other motions made by the lords in the oppoſition, though the victory of the courtiers was always clogged with a nervous and ſpirited proteſt. Two days were expended in the debate produced by lord Carteret's motion for an addreſs, beſeeching his majeſty to remove ſir Robert Walpole from his preſence and councils for ever. The ſpeech that uſhered in this memorable motion would not have diſgraced a Cicero. It contained a retroſpect of all the public meaſures which had been purſued ſince the revolution. It explained the nature of every treaty, whether right or wrong, which had been concluded under the preſent adminiſtration. It deſcribed the political connexions ſubſiſting between the different powers in Europe. It expoſed the weakneſs, the miſconduct, and the iniquity of the miniſter, both in his foreign and domeſtic tranſactions. It was embelliſhed with all the ornaments of rhetoric, and warmed with a noble ſpirit of patriot indignation. The duke of Argyle, lord Bathurſt, and his other colleagues, ſeemed to be animated with uncommon fervour, and even inſpired, by the ſubject. A man of imagination, in reading their ſpeeches, will think himſelf tranſported into the Roman ſenate, before the ruin of that republic. Nevertheleſs, the miniſter ſtill triumphed by dint of numbers; though his victory was dearly purchaſed. Thirty peers entered a vigorous proteſt; and Walpole's character ſuſtained ſuch a rude ſhoc from this oppoſition, that his authority ſeemed to be drawing near a period.

[g] Upon this occaſion he miſquoted Horace. 'As I am not conſcious of any crime (ſaid he) I do not doubt of being able to make a proper defence. Nil conſcire ſibi nulli pallescere culpæ.' He was corrected by by mr. Pulteney; but inſiſted upon his being in the right, and actually laid a wager on the juſtneſs of his quotation.

[1741] Immediately after this conteſt was decided, the duke of Marlborough moved for a reſolution, that any attempt to inflict any kind of puniſhment on any perſon, without allowing him an opportunity to make his defence, or without any proof of any crime or miſdemeanour committed by him, is contrary to natural juſtice, the fundamental laws of the realm, and the ancient eſtabliſhed uſage of parliament; and is a high infringement of the liberties of the ſubject. It was ſeconded by the duke of Devonſhire and lord Lovel; and oppoſed by lord Gower, as an intended cenſure on the proceedings of the day. This ſentiment was ſo warmly eſpouſed by lord Talbot, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the former debate, that he ſeemed to be tranſported beyond the bounds of moderation. He was interrupted by the earl of Cholmondely, who charged him with having violated the order and decorum which ought to be preſerved in ſuch an aſſembly. His paſſion was inflamed by this rebuke: he declared himſelf an independent lord; a character which he would not forfeit for the ſmiles of a court, the profit of an employment, or the reward of a penſion: he ſaid when he was engaged on the ſide of truth, he would trample on the inſolence that ſhould command him to ſuppreſs his ſentiments.—On a diviſion, however, the motion was carried.

In the beginning of April, the king repairing to the houſe of peers, paſſed ſome acts that were ready for the royal aſſent. Then, in his ſpeech to both houſes, he gave them to underſtand, that the queen of Hungary had made a requiſition of 12,000 men ſtipulated by treaty; and that he had ordered the ſubſidy-troops of Denmark and Heſſe-Caſſel to be in readineſs to march to her aſſiſtance. He obſerved, that in this complicated and uncertain ſtate of affairs, many incidents might ariſe, and render it neceſſary for him to incur extraordinary expences for maintaining the pragmatic ſanction, at a time when he could not poſſibly have recourſe to the advice and aſſiſtance of his parliament. He therefore, demanded of the commons ſuch a ſupply as might be requiſite for theſe ends; and promiſed to manage it with all poſſible frugality. The lower-houſe, in their addreſs, approved of all his meaſures; declared they would effectually ſupport him againſt all inſults and attacs that might be made upon any of his territories, though not belonging to the crown of Great-Britain; and that they would enable him to contribute, in the moſt effectual manner, to the ſupport of the queen of Hungary. Sir Robert Walpole moved that an aid of 200,000l. ſhould be granted to that princeſs. Mr Shippen proteſted againſt any interpoſition in the affairs of Germany. He expreſſed the diſlike of the promiſe which had been made to defend his majeſty's foreign dominions; a promiſe in his opinion, inconſiſtent with that important and inviolable law, the act of ſettlement: a promiſe which, could it have been foreknown, would perhaps have for ever precluded from the ſucceſſion that illuſtrious family, to which the nation owed ſuch numberleſs bleſſings, ſuch continued felicity. The motion however paſſed, though not without further oppoſiton: and the houſe reſolved, that 300,000l. ſhould be granted to his majeſty, to enable him effectually to ſupport the queen of Hungary. Towards the expence of this year, a million was deducted from the ſinking-fund: and the land-tax continued at four ſhillings in the pound. The preparations for this war had already coſt five millions. The ſeſſion was cloſed on the 25th of April, when the king took his leave of this parliament, with warm expreſſions of tenderneſs and ſatisfaction. Henry Bromley, Stephen Fox, and John Howe, three members of the lower-houſe, who had ſignalized themſelves in defence of the miniſter, were now enobled, and created barons of Montfort, Ilcheſter, and Chedworth. A camp was formed near Colcheſter; and the king having appointed a regency, ſet out in May for his German dominions. [h]

The Britiſh armament had by this time proceeded to action in the Weſt-Indies. Sir Chaloner Ogle, who ſailed from Spithead, had been overtaken by a tempeſt in the bay of Biſcay, by which the fleet, conſiſting of about 170 ſail, were ſcattered and diſperſed. Nevertheleſs, he proſecuted his voyage, and anchored with a view to provide wood and water, in the neutral iſland of Dominica, where the intended expedition ſuſtained a terrible ſhoc in the death of the gallant lord Cathcart, who was carried off by a dyſentery. The loſs of this nobleman was the more ſeverely felt, as the command of the land-forces devolved upon general Wentworth, an officer without experience, authority, and reſolution. As the fleet ſailed along the iſland of Hiſpaniola, in its way to Jamaica, four large ſhips of war were diſcovered; and ſir Chaloner detached an equal number of his ſquadron to give them chaſe, while he himſelf proceeded on his voyage. As thoſe ſtrange ſhips refuſed to bring to, lord Auguſtus Fitzroy, the commodore of the four Britiſh ſhips, ſaluted one of them with a broadſide, and a ſmart engagement enſued. After they had fought during the beſt part of the night, the enemy hoiſted their colours in the morning, and appeared to be part of the French ſquadron, which had ſailed from Europe, under the command of the marquis d'Antin, with orders to aſſiſt the Spaniſh admiral, de Torres, in attacking and diſtreſſing the Engliſh ſhips and colonies. War was not yet declared between France and England; therefore hoſtilities ceaſed: the Engliſh and French commanders complimented each other; excuſed themſelves mutually, for the miſtake which had happened; and parted as friends, with a conſiderable loſs of men on both ſides.

[h] Sir William Wyndham died in the preceding year, deeply regretted as an orator, a patriot, and a man, the conſtant aſſertor of Britiſh liberty, and one of the chief ornaments of the Engliſh nation. In the courſe of the ſame year, general Oglethorpe, governor of Georgia, had, with ſome ſuccours, obtained from the colony of Carolina, and a ſmall ſquadron of the king's ſhips, made an attempt upon fort Auguſtine, the capital of Spaniſh Florida; and actually reduced ſome ſmall forts in the neighbourhood of the place; but the Carolinians withdrawing in diſguſt, diſſentions prevailing among the ſea officers, the hurricane months approaching, and the enemy having received a ſupply and re-enforcement, he abandoned the enterpriſe, and returned to Georgia.

In the mean time ſir Chaloner Ogle arrived at Jamaica, where he joined vice-admiral Vernon, who now found himſelf at the head of the moſt formidable fleet and army that ever viſited thoſe ſeas, with full power to act at diſcretion. The conjoined ſquadrons conſiſted of 29 ſhips of the line, with almoſt an equal number of frigates, fireſhips, and bomb-ketches, well manned, and plentifully ſupplied with all kinds of proviſion, ſtores and neceſſaries. The number of ſeamen amounted to 15,000: that of the land-forces, including the American regiment of four battalions, and a body of negroes inliſted at Jamaica, did not fall ſhort of 12,000. Had this armament been ready to act in the proper ſeaſon of the year, under the conduct of wiſe experienced officers, united in councils, and ſteadily attached to the intereſt and honour of their country, the Havannah, and whole iſland of Cuba, might have been eaſily reduced: the whole treaſure of the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies would have been intercepted; and Spain muſt have been humbled into the moſt abject ſubmiſſion. But ſeveral unfavourable circumſtances concurred to fruſtrate the hopes of the public. The miniſtry had detained ſir Chaloner Ogle at Spithead, without any viſible cauſe, until the ſeaſon for action was almoſt exhauſted; for, on the continent of New Spain, the periodical rains begin about the end of April; and this change in the atmoſphere is always attended with epidemical diſtempers, which render the climate extremely unhealthy: beſides the rain is ſo exceſſive, that for the ſpace of two months no army can keep the field.

Sir Chalomer Ogle arrived at Jamaica on the 9th day of January; and admiral Vernon did not ſail on his intended expedition till towards the end of the month. Inſtead of directing his courſe to the Havannah, which lay to leeward, and might have been reached in leſs than three days, he reſolved to beat up againſt the wind to Hiſpaniola, in order to obſerve the motion of the French ſquadron, commanded by the marquis d'Antin. The 15th day of February had elapſed before he received certain information that the French admiral had ſailed for Europe in great diſtreſs, for want of men and proviſions, which he could not procure in the Weſt-Indies. Admiral Vernon, thus diſappointed, called a council of war, in which he was determined to proceed for Carthagena. The fleet being ſupplied with wood and water at Hiſpaniola, ſet ſail for the continent of New Spain, and on the 4th of March anchored in Playa Grande, to the windward of Carthagena. Admiral de Torres had already ſailed to the Havannah: but Carthagena was ſtrongly fortified, and the garriſon re-enforced by the crews of a ſmall ſquadron of large ſhips, commanded by don Blas de Leſo, an officer of experience and reputation. Here the Engliſh admiral lay inactive till the ninth, when the troops were landed on the iſland of Tierra Bomba, near the mouth of the harbour, known by the name of Bochica, or Little-mouth, which was ſurpriſingly fortified with caſtles, batteries, booms, chains, cables, and ſhips of war. The Britiſh forces erected a battery on ſhore, with which they made a breach in the principal fort, while the admiral ſent in a number of ſhips to divide the fire of the enemy, and co-operate with the endeavours of the army. Lord Aubrey Beauclerc, a gallant officer, who commanded one of theſe ſhips, was ſlain on this occaſion. The breach being deemed practicable, the forces advanced to the attac; but the forts and batteries were abandoned: the Spaniſh ſhips that lay athwart the harbour's mouth were deſtroyed or taken: the paſſage was opened, and the fleet entered without further oppoſition. Then the forces were re-embarked with the artillery, and landed within a mile of Carthagena, where they were oppoſed by about 700 Spaniards, whom they obliged to retire. The admiral and general had contracted a hearty contempt for each other, and took all opportunities of expreſſing their mutual diſlike: far from acting vigorouſly in concert, for the advantage of the community, they maintained a mutual reſerve, and ſeparate cabals; and each proved more eager for the diſgrace of his rival, than zealous for the honour of the nation.

The general complained that the fleet lay idle, while his troops were harraſſed and diminiſhed by hard duty and diſtemper. The admiral affirmed that his ſhip could not lie near enough to batter the town of Carthagena: he upbraided the general with inactivity and want of reſolution to attac the fort of St. Lazor, which commanded the town, and might be taken by ſcalade. Wentworth, ſtimulated by theſe reproaches, reſolved to try the experiment. His forces marched up to the attac; but the guides being ſlain, they miſtook their rout, and advanced to the ſtrongeſt part of the fortification, where they were moreover expoſed to the fire of the town. Colonel Grant, who commanded the grenadeers, was mortally wounded: the ſcaling-ladders were found too ſhort: the officers were perplexed for want of orders and directions: yet the ſoldiers ſuſtained a ſevere fire for ſeveral hours with ſurpriſing intrepidity, and at length retreated, leaving about 600 killed or wounded on the ſpot. The number was now ſo much reduced, that they could no longer maintain their footing on ſhore: beſides, the rainy ſeaſon had begun with ſuch violence, as rendered it impoſſible for them to live in camp. They were, therefore, re-embarked: and all hope of further ſucceſs immediately vaniſhed. The admiral, however, in order to demonſtrate the impracticability of taking the place by ſea, ſent in the Gallicia, one of the Spaniſh ſhips which had been taken at Boca-chica, to cannonade the town, with 16 guns mounted on one ſide, like a floating battery. This veſſel, manned by detachments of volunteers from different ſhips, and commanded by captain Hore, was warped into the inner harbour, and moored before day, at a conſiderable diſtance from the walls, in very ſhallow water. In this poſition ſhe ſtood the fire of ſeveral batteries for ſome hours, without doing or ſuſtaining much damage: then the admiral ordered the men to be brought off in boats, and the cables to be cut; ſo that ſhe drove with the ſea-breeſe upon a ſhoal, where ſhe was ſoon filled with water. This exploit was abſurd, and the inference which the admiral drew from it altogether fallacious. He ſaid it plainly proved, that there was not depth of water in the inner harbour, ſufficient to admit large ſhips near enough to batter the town, with any proſpect of ſucceſs. This, indeed, was the caſe in that part of the harbour to which the Gallicia was conducted: but a little farther to the left he might have ſtationed four or five of his largeſt ſhips abreaſt, within piſtol-ſhot of the walls; and if this ſtep had been taken, when the land-forces marched to the attac of St. Lezar, in all probability the town would have been ſurrendered.

After the re-embarkation of the troops, the diſtempers peculiar to the climate and ſeaſon began to rage with redoubled fury; and great numbers of thoſe who eſcaped the vengeance of the enemy periſhed by a more painful and inglorious fate. Nothing was heard but complaints and execrations: the groans of the dying, and the ſervice for the dead: nothing was ſeen but objects of woe, and images of dejection. The conductors of this unfortunate expedition agreed in nothing but the expediency of a ſpeedy retreat from this ſcene of miſery and diſgrace. The fortifications of the harbour were demoliſhed, and the fleet returned to Jamaica. The miſcarriage of this expedition, which had coſt the nation an immenſe ſum of money, was no ſooner known in England, than the kingdom was filled with murmurs and diſcontent, and the people were depreſſed, in proportion to that ſanguine hope by which they had been elevated. Admiral Vernon, inſtead of undertaking any enterpriſe which might have retrieved the honour of the Britiſh arms, ſet ſail for Jamaica with the forces in July, and anchored at the ſouth-eaſt part of Cuba, in a bay, on which he beſtowed the appellation of Cumberland Harbour. The troops were landed and encamped at the diſtance of 20 miles farther up the river, where they remained totally inactive, and ſubſiſted chiefly on ſalt and damaged proviſions, till the month of November, when, being conſiderably diminiſhed by ſickneſs, they were put on board again, and reconveyed to Jamaica. He was afterwards re-enforced from England by four ſhips of war, and about 3000 ſoldiers: but he performed nothing worthy of the reputation he had acquired; and the people began to perceive that they had miſtaken his character.

The affairs on the continent of Europe were now more than ever embroiled. The king of Pruſſia had demanded of the court of Vienna part of Sileſia, by virtue of old treaties of cofraternity, which were either abſolete or annulled; and promiſed to aſſiſt the queen with all his forces, in caſe ſhe ſhould comply with his demand: but this being rejected with diſdain, he entered Sileſia at the head of an army, and proſecuted his conqueſts with great rapidity. In the mean time, the queen of Hungary was crowned at Preſburg, after having ſigned a capitulation, by which the liberties of that kingdom were confirmed; and the grand duke her conſort was, at her requeſt, aſſociated with her for ten years in the government. At the ſame time the ſtates of Hungary refuſed to receive a memorial from the elector of Bavaria. During theſe tranſactions, his Pruſſian majeſty made his public entrance into Breſlau, and confirmed all the privileges of the inhabitants. One of his generals ſurprized the town and fortreſs of Jablunka, on the confines of Hungary: prince Leopold of Anhalt-Deſſau, who commanded another army, which formed the blockade of great Glogau on the order, took the place by ſcalade, made the generals Wallis and Reyſki priſoners, with a thouſand men that were in garriſon: here, likewiſe, the victor found the military cheſt, 50 pieces of braſs cannon, and a great quantity of ammunition.

The queen of Hungary had ſollicited the maritime powers for aſſiſtance, but found them fearful and backward. Being obliged, therefore, to exert herſelf with the more vigour, ſhe ordered count Neuperg to aſſemble a body of forces, and endeavour to ſtop the progreſs of the Pruſſians in Sileſia. The two armies encountered each other in the nighbourhood of Neiſs, at a village called Molwitz; and, after an obſtinate diſpute, the Auſtrians were obliged to retire, with the loſs of 4000 men killed, wounded, or taken. The advantage was dearly purchaſed by the king of Pruſſia. His kinſman, Frederick Margrave of Brandenburgh, and lieutenant-general Schuylemberg were killed in the engagement, together with a great number of general officers, and about 2000 ſoldiers. After this action, Brieg was ſurrendered to the Pruſſian, and he forced the important paſs of Fryewalde, which was defended by 4000 Auſtrian huſſars. The Engliſh and Dutch miniſters, who accompained him in his progreſs, ſpared no pains to effect an accommodation: but the two ſovereigns were too much irritated againſt each other to acquieſce in any terms that could be propoſed. The queen of Hungary was incenſed to find herſelf attacked, in the day of her diſtreſs, by a prince to whom ſhe had given no ſort of provocation; and his Pruſſian majeſty charged the court of Vienna with a deſign either to aſſaſſinate, or carry him off by treachery: a deſign which was diſowned with expreſſions of indignation and diſdain. Count Neuperg being obliged to abandon Sileſia, in order to oppoſe the Bavarian arms in Bohemia, the king of Pruſſia ſent thither a detachment to join the elector, under the command of count Deſſau, who, in his rout, reduced, Glatz and Neiſs, almoſt without oppoſition: then his maſter received the homage of the Sileſian ſtate at Breſlaw, and returned to Berlin. In December, the Pruſſian army was diſtributed in winter-quarters in Moravia, after having taken Olmutz, the capital of that province; and in March his Pruſſian majeſty formed a camp of obſervation in the neighbourhood of Magedburg.

The elector of Hanover was alarmed at the ſucceſs of the king of Pruſſia, in apprehenſion that he would become too formidable a neighbour. A ſcheme was ſaid to have been propoſed to the court of Vienna, for attacking that prince's electoral dominions, and dividing the conqueſt: but it never was put in execution. Nevertheleſs, the troops of Hanover were augmented: the auxilary Danes and Heſſians in the pay of Great-Britain were ordered to be in readineſs to march; and a good number of Britiſh forces encamped and prepared for embarkation. The ſubſidy of 300,000l. granted by parliament, was remitted to the queen of Hungary; and every thing ſeemed to preſage the vigorous interpoſition of his Britannic majeſty. But in a little time after his arrival at Hanover, that ſpirit of action ſeemed to flag, even while her Hungarian majeſty tottered on the verge of ruin. France reſolved to ſeize this opportunity of cruſhing the houſe of Auſtria. In order to intimidate the elector of Hanover, mareſchal Malleboís was ſent with a numerous army into Weſtphalia; and this expedient proved effectual. A treaty of neutrality was concluded; and the king of Great-Britain engaged to vote for the elector of Bavaria at the enſuing election of an emperor. The deſign of the French court was to raiſe this prince to the imperial dignity, and furniſh him with ſuch ſuccours as ſhould enable him to deprive the queen of Hungary of her hereditary dominions.

While the French miniſter at Vienna endeavoured to amuſe the queen with the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of his maſter's friendſhip, a body of 35,000 men began their march for Germany, in order to join the elector of Bavaria: another French army was aſſembled upon the Rhine; and the count de Belleiſle being provided with large ſums of money, was ſent to negotiate with different electors. Having thus ſecured a majority of voices, he proceeded to Munich, where he preſented the elector of Bavaria with a commiſſion, appointed him generaliſſimo of the French troops marching to his aſſiſtance; and now the treaty of Nymphenburg was concluded. The French king engaged to aſſiſt the elector with his whole power, towards raiſing him to the imperial throne: the elector promiſed, that after his elevation he would never attempt to recover any of the towns or provinces of the empire which France had conquered: that he would, in his imperial capacity, renounce the barrier-treaty; and agree that France ſhould irrevocably retain whatever places ſhe ſhould ſubdue in the Auſtrian Netherlands. The next ſtep of Belleiſle was to negotiate another treaty between France and Pruſſia, importing, that the elector of Bavaria ſhould poſſeſs Bohemia, Upper-Auſtria, and the Tyroleſe: that the king of Poland ſhould be gratified with Moravia and Upper-Sileſia; and that his Pruſſian majeſty ſhould retain Lower-Sileſia, with the town of Neiſs and the county of Glatz. Theſe precautions being taken, the count de Belleiſle repared to Franckfort, in quality of ambaſſador and plenipotentiary from France, at the imperial diet of election. It was in this city that the French king publiſhed a declaration, ſignifying, that as the king of Great-Britain had aſſembled an army to influence the approaching election of an emperor, his moſt chriſtian majeſty, as guarantee of the treaty of Weſtphalia, had ordered ſome troops to advance towards the Rhine, with a view to maintain the tranquillity of the Germanick body, and ſecure the freedom of the imperial election.

In July, the elector of Bavaria, being joined by the French forces under mareſchal Broglio, ſurpriſed the imperial city of Paſſau, upon the Danube: and entering Upper-Auſtria, at the head of 70,000 men, took poſſeſſion of Lintz, where he received the homage of the ſtates of that country. Underſtanding that the garriſon of Vienna was very numerous, and that count Palfi had aſſembled 30,000 Hungarians in the neighbourhood of this capital, he made no farther progreſs in Auſtria, but marched into Bohemia, where he was re-enforced by a conſiderable body of Saxons, under the command of count Rutowſki, natural ſon to the late king of Poland. By this time his Poliſh majeſty had acceeded to the treaty of Nymphenburg, and declared war againſt the queen of Hungary, on the moſt frivolous pretences. The elector of Bavaria advanced to Prague, which was taken in the night by ſcalade; an achievement in which Maurice count of Saxe, another natural ſon of the king of Poland, diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the head of the French forces. In December the elector of Bavaria made his public entry into his capital, where he was proclaimed king of Bohemia, and inaugurated with the uſual ſolemnities; then he ſet out for Franckfort, to be preſent at the diet of election.

At this period the queen of Hungary ſaw herſelf abandoned by all her allies, and ſeemingly devoted to deſtruction. She was not, however, forſaken by her courage; nor deſtitute of good officers, and an able miniſtry. She retired to Preſburg, and in a pathetic Latin ſpeech to the ſtates, expreſſed her confidence in the loyalty and valour of her Hungarian ſubjects. The nobility of that kingdom, touched with her preſence and diſtreſs, aſſured her unanimouſly, that they would ſacrifice their lives and fortunes in her defence. The ban being raiſed, that brave people crowded to her ſtandard; and the diet expreſſed their reſentment againſt her enemy by a public edict, excluding for ever the electoral houſe of Bavaria from the ſucceſſion to the crown of Hungary: yet, without the ſubſidy ſhe received from Great-Britain, their courage and attachment would have proved ineffectual. By this ſupply ſhe was enabled to pay her army, erect magazines, complete her warlike preparations, and put her ſtrong places in a poſture of defence. In December her generals, Berenclau and Mentzel, defeated count Thoring, who commanded 8000 men, at the paſs of Scardingen, and opening their way into Bavaria, laid the whole country under contribution; while count Kievenhuller retook the city of Lintz, and drove the French troops out of Auſtria. The grand ſignor aſſured the queen of Hungary, that far from taking advantage of her troubles, he ſhould ſeize all opportunities to convince her of his friendſhip: the pope permitted her to levy a tenth on the revenues of the clergy within her dominions; and even to uſe all the church-plate for the ſupport of the war.

As the czarina expreſſed an inclination to aſſiſt this unfortunate princeſs, the French court reſoved to find her employment in another quarter. They had already gained over to their intereſt count Gyllenburg, prime-miniſter and preſident of the chancery in Sweeden. A diſpute happening between him and mr. Burnaby, the Britiſh reſident at Stockholm, ſome warm altercation paſſed: mr. Burnaby was forbid the court, and publiſhed a memorial in his own vindication: on the other hand, the king of Sweeden juſtified his conduct in a reſcript ſent to all the foreign miniſters. The king of Great-Britain had propoſed a ſubſidy-treaty to Sweeden, which, from the influence of French councils, was rejected. The Sweeds having aſſembled a numerous army in Finland, and equipped a large ſquadron of ſhips, declared war againſt Ruſſia, upon the moſt trifling pretences; and the fleet putting to ſea, commenced hoſtilities by blocking up the Ruſſian ports in Livonia. A body of 11,000 Swedes, commanded by general Wrangel, having advanced to Willmenſtrane, were in Auguſt attacked and defeated by general Laſci, at the head of 30,000 Ruſſians. Count Lewenhaupt, who commanded the main army of the Swedes, reſolved to take vengeance for this diſgrace, after the Ruſſian troops had retired into winter-quarters. In December he marched towards Wybourg: but, receiving letters from the prince of Heſſe-Homburg, and the marquis de la Chetardie, the French ambaſſador at Peterſburgh, informing him of the ſurpriſing revolution which had juſt happened in Ruſſia, and propoſing a ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities; he retreated with his army, in order to wait for further inſtructions; and the two courts agreed to a ceſſation of arms for three months.

The Ruſſians had been for ſome time diſcontented with their government. The late czarina was influenced chiefly by German councils, and employed a great number of foreigners in her ſervice. Theſe cauſes of diſcontent produced factions and conſpiracies; and when they were diſcovered, the empreſs treated the authors of them with ſuch ſeverity as increaſed the general diſaffection. Beſides, they were diſpleaſed at the manner in which ſhe had ſettled the ſucceſſion. The prince of Brunſwick-Lunenburgh-Bevern, father to the young czar, was not at all agreeable to the Ruſſian nobility, and his conſort, the princeſs Anne of Mecklenburgh, having aſſumed the reins of government during her ſon's minority, ſeemed to follow the maxims of her aunt, the late czarina. The Ruſſian grandees and generals, therefore, turned their eyes upon the princeſs Elizabeth, who was daughter of Peter the great, and the darling of the empire. The French ambaſſador gladly concurred in a project for depoſing a princeſs who was well affected to the houſe of Auſtria. General Laſci approved of the deſign, which was chiefly conducted by the prince of Heſſe-Homburgh, who, in the reigns of the empreſs Catharina and Peter II. had been generaliſſimo of the Ruſſian army. The good will and concurrence of the troops being ſecured, two regiments of guards took poſſeſſion of all the avenues of the imperial palace at Peterſburgh. The princeſs Elizabeth, putting herſelf at the head of 1000 men, on the 5th day of December entered the winter-palace, where the princeſs of Mecklenburgh and the infant czar reſided. She advanced into the chamber where the princeſs and her conſort lay and deſired them to riſe, and quit the palace, adding, that their perſons were ſafe; and that they could not juſtly blame her for aſſerting her right. At the ſame time, the counts Oſterman, Golofkin, Mingden, and Munich were arreſted; their papers and effects were ſeiſed, and their perſons conveyed to Schliſſelbourg, a fortreſs on the Neva. Early in the morning the ſenate aſſembling, declared all that had paſſed ſince the reign of Peter II. to be uſurpation; and that the imperial dignity belonged of right to the princeſs Elizabeth; ſhe was immediately proclaimed empreſs of all the Ruſſias, and recognized by the army in Finland. She forthwith publiſhed a general act of indemnity: ſhe created the prince of Heſſe-Homburgh generaliſſimo of her armies: ſhe reſtored the Dolgorucky family to their honours and eſtates: ſhe recalled and rewarded all thoſe who had been baniſhed for favouring her pretenſions: ſhe mitigated the exile of the duke of Courland, by indulging him with a maintenance more ſuitable to his rank: ſhe releaſed general Wrangel, count Waſaburg, and the other Swediſh officers who had been taken at the battle of Willmenſtrand: and the princeſs Anne of Mecklenburgh, with her conſort and children, were ſent under a ſtrong guard, to Riga, the capital of Livonia.

Amidſt theſe tempeſts of war and revolution, the ſtates-general wiſely determined to preſerve their own tranquillity. It was, doubtleſs, their intereſt to avoid the dangers and expence of a war, and to profit by that ſtagnation of commerce which would neceſſarily happen among their neighbours that were at open enmity with each other; beſides, they were overawed by the declarations of the French monarch on one ſide; by the power, activity, and pretenſions of his Pruſſian majeſty on the other; and they dreaded the proſpect of a Stadtholder at the head of their army. Theſe at leaſt were the ſentiments of many Dutch patriots, re-enforced by others that acted under French influence. But the prince of Orange numbered among his partiſans and adherents many perſons of dignity and credit in the commonwealth: he was adored by the populace, who loudly exclaimed againſt their governors, and clamoured for a war, without ceaſing. This national ſpirit, joined to the remonſtrances and requiſitions made by the courts of Vienna and London, obliged the ſtates to iſſue orders for an augmentation of their forces; but theſe were executed ſo ſlowly, that neither France nor Pruſſia had much cauſe to take umbrage at their preparations. In Italy the king of Sardinia declared for the houſe of Auſtria: the republic of Genoa was deeply engaged in the French intereſt: the pope, the Venetians, and the dukedom of Tuſcany were neutral: the king of Naples reſolved to ſupport the claim of his family to the Auſtrian dominions in Italy, and began to make preparations accordingly. His mother, the queen of Spain, had formed a plan for erecting theſe dominions into a monarchy for her ſecond ſon don Philip; and a body of 15,000 men being embarked at Barcelona, were tranſported to Orbitello, under the convoy of the united ſquadrons of France and Spain. While admiral Haddock, with 12 ſhips of the line, lay at anchor in the bay of Gibraltar, the Spaniſh fleet paſſed the ſtraits in the night, and was joined by the French ſquadron from Toulon. The Britiſh admiral ſailing from Gibraltar, fell in with them in a few days, and found both ſquadrons drawn up in line of battle. As he bore down upon the Spaniſh fleet, the French admiral ſent a flag of truce, to inform him, that as the French and Spaniards were engaged in a joint-expedition, he ſhould be obliged to act in concert with his maſter's allies. This interpoſition prevented an engagement. The combined fleets amounting to double the number of the Engliſh ſquadron, Admiral Haddock was obliged to deſiſt; and proceeded to Port-Mahon, leaving the enemy to proſecute their voyage without moleſtation. The people of England were incenſed at this tranſaction, and did not ſcruple to affirm, that the hands of the Britiſh admiral were tied up by the neutrality of Hanover.[i]

The court of Madrid ſeemed to have ſhaken off that indolence and phlegm which had formerly diſgraced the councils of Spain. They no ſooner learned the deſtination of commodore Anſon, who had ſailed from Spithead in the courſe of the preceding year, than they ſent don Pizzaro, with a more powerful ſquadron, upon the ſame voyage, to defeat his deſign. He accordingly ſteered the ſame courſe, and actually fell in with one or two ſhips of the Britiſh armament, near the ſtraits of Magellen: but he could not weather a long and furious tempeſt, through which mr. Anſon proceeded into the South-ſea. One of the Spaniſh ſhips periſhed at ſea: another was wrecked on the coaſt of Brazil; and Pizzaro bore away for the Pio de la Plata, where he arrived with the three remaining ſhips, in a ſhattered condition, after having loſt 1200 men by ſickneſs and famine. The Spaniards exerted the ſame vigilance and activity in Europe. Their privateers were ſo induſtrious and ſucceſsful, that in the beginning of this year they had taken, ſince the commencement of the war, 407 ſhips belonging to the ſubjects of Great-Britain, valued at near four millions of piaſtres. The traders had, therefore, too much cauſe to complain, conſidering the formidable fleets which were maintained for the production of commerce. In the courſe of the ſummer, ſir John Norris had twice ſailed towards the coaſt of Spain, at the head of a powerful ſquadron, without taking any effectual ſtep for annoying the enemy, as if the ſole intention of the miniſtry had been to expoſe the nation to the ridicule and contempt of its enemies. The inactivity of the Britiſh arms appears the more inexcuſable, when we conſider the great armaments which had been prepared. The land-forces of Great-Britain, excluſive of the Daniſh and Heſſian auxiliaries, amounted to 60,000 men; and the fleet conſiſted of above 100 ſhips of war, manned by 54,000 ſailors.

The general diſcontent of the people had a manifeſt influence upon the election of members for the new parliament, which produced one of the moſt violent conteſts between the two parties, which had happened ſince the revolution. All the adherents of the prince of Wales concurred with the country-party, in oppoſition to the miniſter; and the duke of Argyle exerted himſelf ſo ſucceſsfully among

[i] In the month of July two ſhips of Haddock's ſquadron falling in with three French ſhips of war, captain Barnet, the Engliſh commodore, ſuppoſing them to be Spaniſh regiſter ſhips, fired a ſhot, in order to bring them to; and they refuſing to comply with this ſignal, a ſharp engagement enſued: after they had fought ſeveral hours, the French commander ceaſed firing, and thought proper to come to an explanation, when he and Barnet parted with mutual apologies.

In the courſe of this year a dangerous conſpiracy was diſcovered at New-York, in North-America. One Hewſon a low publican, had engaged ſeveral negroes in a deſign to deſtroy the town, and maſſacre the people. Fire was ſet to ſeveral parts of the city: nine or ten negroes were apprehended, convicted, and burned alive. Hewſon, with his wife, and a ſervant-maid, privy to the plot, were found guilty and hanged, though they died proteſting their innocence.

the ſhires and boroughs of Scotland, that the partizans of the miniſtry could not ſecure ſix members out of the whole number returned from North-Britain. They were, however, much more fortunate in the election of the 16 peers, who were choſen literally according to the liſt tranſmitted from court. Inſtructions were delivered by the conſtituents to a great number of members returned for cities and counties, exhorting and requiring them to oppoſe a ſtanding army in time of peace; to vote for the mitigation of exciſe laws; for the repeal of ſeptennial parliaments; and for the limitation of placemen in the houſe of commons. They, likewiſe, inſiſted upon their examining into the particulars of the public expence, and endeavoured to redreſs the grievances of the nation. Obſtinate ſtruggles were maintained in all parts of the united kingdom with uncommon ardour and perſeverance; and ſuch a national ſpirit of oppoſition prevailed, that, notwithſtanding the whole weight of miniſterial influence, the contrary intereſt ſeemed to preponderate in the new parliament.

The king returned to England in the month of October; and on the 1ſt day of December the ſeſſion was opened. Mr Onſlow being re-choſen ſpeaker was approved of by his majeſty, who ſpoke in the uſual ſtile to both houſes. He obſerved, that the former parliament had formed the ſtrongeſt reſolutions in favour of the queen of Hungary, for the maintenance of the pragmatic ſanction; for the preſervation of the balance of power, and the peace and liberties of Europe; and that if the other powers which were under the like engagements with him had anſwered the juſt expectations ſo ſolemnly given, the ſupport of the common cauſe would have been attended with leſs difficulty. He ſaid, he had endeavoured, by the moſt proper and early applications, to induce other powers that were united with him by the ties of common intereſt to concert ſuch meaſures as ſo important and critical a conjuncture required; that where an accommodation ſeemed neceſſary, he had laboured to reconcile princes whoſe union would have been the moſt effectual means to prevent the miſchiefs which had happened, and the beſt ſecurity for the intereſt and ſafety of the whole. He owned his endeavours had not hitherto produced the deſired effect; though he was not without hope, that a juſt ſenſe of approaching danger would give a more favourable turn to the councils of other nations. He repreſented the neceſſity of putting the kingdom in ſuch a poſture of defence as would enable him to improve all opportunities of maintaining the liberties of Europe, and defeat any attempts that ſhould be made againſt him and his dominions; and he recommended unanimity, vigour, and diſpatch. The houſe of commons having appointed their ſeveral committees, the ſpeaker reported the king's ſpeech; and mr. Herbert moved for an addreſs of thanks, including an approbation of the means by which the war had been proſecuted. The motion being ſeconded by mr. Trevor, lord Noel Somerſet ſtood up and moved, that the houſe would in their addreſs deſire his majeſty not to engage theſe kingdoms in a war for the preſervation of his foreign dominions. He was ſupported by that incorruptible patriot mr. Shippen, who declared he was neither aſhamed nor afraid to affirm, that 30 years had made no change in any of his political opinions. He ſaid he was grown old in the houſe of commons; that time had verified the predictions he had formerly uttered; and that he had ſeen his conjectures ripened into knowledge. 'If my country (added he) has been ſo unfortunate as once more to commit her intereſt to men who propoſe to themſelves no advantage from their truſt but that of ſelling it, I may, perhaps, fall once more under cenſure for declaring my opinion, and be once more treated as a criminal, for aſſerting what they who puniſh me cannot deny; for maintaining that Hanoverian maxims are inconſiſtent with the happineſs of this nation; and for preſerving the caution ſo ſtrongly inculcated by thoſe patriots who framed the act of ſettlement, and conferred upon the preſent royal family their title to the throne.' He particularized the inſtances in which the miniſtry had acted in diametrical oppoſition to that neceſſary conſtitution; and he inſiſted on the neceſſity of taking ſome ſtep to remove the apprehenſion of the people, who began to think themſelves in danger of being ſacrificed to the ſecurity of foreign dominions. Mr Gibbon, who ſpoke on the ſame ſide of the queſtion, expatiated upon the abſurdity of returning thanks for the proſecution of a war which had been egregiouſly miſmanaged. 'What! (ſaid he) are our thanks to be ſolemnly returned for defeats, diſgrace, and loſſes, the ruin of our merchants, the impriſonment of our ſailors, idle ſhows of armaments, and uſeleſs expences?' Sir Robert Walpole having made a ſhort ſpeech in defence of the firſt motion for an addreſs, was anſwered by mr. Pulteney, who ſeemed to be animated with a double proportion of patriot indignation. He aſſerted, that from a review of that miniſter's conduct ſince the beginning of the diſpute with Spain, it would appear that he had been guilty not only of ſingle errors, but of deliberate treachery: that he had always co-operated with the enemies of his country, and ſacrificed to his private intereſt the happineſs and honour of the Britiſh nation. He then entered into a detail of that conduct againſt which he had ſo often declaimed; and being tranſported by an over-heated imagination, accuſed him of perſonal attachment and affection to the enemies of the kingdom. A charge that was doubtleſs the reſult of exaggerated animoſity, and ſerved only to invalidate the other articles of imputation that were much better founded. His objections were over-ruled; and the addreſs, as at firſt propoſed, was preſented to his majeſty.

This ſmall advantage, however, the miniſter did not conſider as a proof of his having aſcertained an undoubted majority in the houſe of commons. There was a great number of diſputed elections; and the diſcuſſion of theſe was the point on which the people had turned their eyes, as the critarion of the miniſter's power and credit. In the firſt, which was heard at the bar of the houſe, he carried his point by a majority of ſix only; and this he looked upon as a defeat rather than a victory. His enemies exulted in their ſtrength: as they knew they ſhould be joined, in matters of importance, by ſeveral members who voted againſt them on this occaſion. The inconſiderable majority that appeared on the ſide of the adminiſtration plainly proved that the influence of the miniſter was greatly diminiſhed, and ſeemed to prognoſticate his further decline. This conſideration induced ſome individuals to declare againſt him as a ſetting ſun, from whoſe beams they could expect no further warmth. His adherents began to tremble; and he himſelf had occaſion for all his art and equanimity. The court-intereſt was not ſufficient to ſupport the election of their own members for Weſtminſter. The high-bailiff had been guilty of ſome illegal practices at the poll; and three juſtices of the peace had, on pretence of preventing riots, ſent for a military force to over-awe the election. A petition preſented by the electors of Weſtminſter was taken into conſideration by the houſe; and the election was declared void by a majority of four voices. The high-bailiff was taken into cuſtody: the officer who ordered the ſoldiers to march, and the three juſtices who ſigned the letter, in conſequence of which he acted, were reprimanded on their knees at the bar of the houſe.

The country-party maintained the advantage they had gained in deciding upon ſeveral other controverted elections; and ſir Robert Walpole tottered on the brink of ruin. He knew that the majority of a ſingle vote would at any time commit him priſoner to the Tower, ſhould ever the motion be made; and he ſaw that his ſafety could be effected by no other expedient but that of dividing the oppoſition. Towards the accompliſhment of this purpoſe he employed all his credit and dexterity. His emiſſaries did not fail to tamper with thoſe members of the oppoſite party who were the moſt likely to be converted by their arguments. A meſſage was ſent by the biſhop of Oxford to the prince of Wales, importing, That if his royal highneſs would write a letter of condeſcention to the king, he and all his counſellors ſhould be taken into favour; that 50,000l. ſhould be added to his revenue; four times that ſum be diſburſed immediately for the payment of his debts; and ſuitable proviſion be made in due time for all his followers. The prince declined this propoſal. He declared that he would accept no ſuch conditions while ſir Robert Walpole continued to direct the public affairs: that he looked upon him as a bar between his majeſty and the affections of his people; as the author of the national grievances both at home and abroad; and as that ſole cauſe of the contempt which Great-Britain had incurred in all the courts of Europe. His royal highneſs was now chief of this formidable party, revered by the whole nation—a party which had gained the aſcendancy in the houſe of commons; which profeſſed to act upon the principles of public virtue; which demanded the fall of an odious miniſter, as a ſacrifice due to an injured people; and declared that no temptation could ſhake their virtue; that no art could diſſolve the cement by which they were united. Sir Robert Walpole, though repulſed in his attempt upon the prince of Wales, was more ſucceſsful in his other endeavours. He reſolved to try his ſtrength once more in the houſe of commons, in another diſputed election; and had the mortification to ſee the majority augmented to 16 voices. He declared he would never more ſit in that houſe, and next day which was the 3d of February, the king adjourned both houſes of parlirment to the 18th day of the ſame month. In this interim ſir Robert Walpole was created earl of Orford, and reſigned all his employments.

At no time of his life did he acquit himſelf with ſuch prudential policy as he now diſplayed. He found means to ſeparate the parts that compoſed the oppoſition, and to transfer the popular odium from himſelf to thoſe who had profeſſed themſelves his keeneſt adverſaries. The country-party conſiſted of the tories, re-enforced by diſcontented whigs, who had either been diſappointed in their own ambitious views, or felt for the diſtreſſes of their country, occaſioned by a weak and worthleſs adminiſtration. The old patriots and the whigs whom they had joined, acted upon very different, and indeed upon oppoſite principles of government; and, therefore, they were united only by the ties of convenience. A coalition was projected between the diſcontented whigs and thoſe of the ſame denomination who acted in the miniſtry. Some were gratified with titles and offices; and all were aſſured, that in the management of affairs a new ſyſtem would be adopted, according to the plan they themſelves ſhould propoſe. The court required nothing of them, but that the earl of Orford ſhould eſcape with impunity. His place of chancellor of the Exchequer was beſtowed upon mr. Sandys, who was likewiſe appointed a lord of the treaſury: and the earl of Wilmington ſucceeded him as firſt commiſſioner of that board. Lord Harrington being dignified with the title of earl, was declared preſident of the council; and in his room lord Carteret became ſecretary of ſtate. The duke of Argyle was made maſter-general of the ordnance, colonel of his majeſty's royal regiment of horſe-guards, field-marſhal and commander in chief of all the forces in South-Britain; but finding himſelf diſappointed in his expectations of the coalition, he, in leſs than a month, renounced all theſe employments. The marquis of Tweedale was appointed ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland, a poſt which had been long ſuppreſſed: mr. Pulteney was ſworn of the privy-councellor, and afterwards created earl of Bath. The earl of Winchelſea and Nottingham was preferred to the head of the Admiralty, in the room of ſir Charles Wager; and after the reſignation of the duke of Argyle, the earl of Stair was appointed field-marſhal of all his majeſty's forces, as well as ambaſſador-extraordinary to the ſtates-general. On the 17th day of February the prince of Wales, attended by a numerous retinue of his adherents, waited on his majeſty, who received him graciouſly, and ordered his guards to be reſtored. Lord Carteret and mr. Sandys were the firſt who embraced the offers of the court, without the conſent or privity of any other leaders in the oppoſition, except that of mr. Pulteney; but they declared to their friends, they would ſtill proceed upon patriot principles: that they would concur in promoting an enquiry into paſt meaſures; and in enacting neceſſary laws to ſecure the conſtitution from the practices of corruption. Theſe profeſſions were believed, not only by their old coadjutors in the houſe of commons, but alſo by the nation in general. The reconciliation between the king and the prince of Wales, together with the change in the miniſtry, were celebrated with public rejoicings all over the kingdom; and immediately after the adjournment nothing but concord appeared in the houſe of commons.

But this harmony was of ſhort duration. It ſoon appeared, that thoſe who had declaimed the loudeſt for the liberties of their country had been actuated ſolely by the moſt ſordid, and even the moſt ridiculous motives of ſelf-intereſt. Jealouſy and mutual diſtruſt enſued between them and their former confederates. The nation complained, that, inſtead of a total change of men and meaſures, they ſaw the old miniſtry ſtrengthened by this coalition; and the ſame intereſt in parliament predominating with redoubled influence. They branded the new converts as apoſtates and betrayers of their country; and, in the tranſports of their indignation, they entirely over-looked the old object of their reſentment. That a nobleman of pliant principles, narrow fortune, and unbounded ambition, ſhould forſake his party for the blandiſhments of affluence, power, and authority, will not appear ſtrange to any perſon acquainted with the human heart; but the ſenſible part of mankind will always reflect with amazement upon the conduct of a man, who ſeeing himſelf idolized by his fellow-citizens, as the firſt and firmeſt patriot in the kingdom, as one of the moſt ſhining ornaments of his country, could give up all his popularity, and incur the contempt or deteſtation of mankind, for the wretched conſideration of an empty title, without office, influence, or the leaſt ſubſtantial appendage. One cannot, without an emotion of grief, contemplate ſuch an inſtance of infatuation—one cannot but lament, that ſuch glory ſhould have been ſo weakly forfeited: that ſuch talents ſhould have been loſt to the cauſe of liberty and virtue. Doubtleſs he flattered himſelf with the hope of one day directing the councils of his ſovereign; but this was never accompliſhed, and he remained a ſolitary monument of blaſted ambition. Before the change in the miniſtry, mr. Pulteney moved that the ſeveral papers relating to the conduct of the war, which had been laid before the houſe, ſhould be referred to a ſelect committee, who ſhould examine ſtrictly into the particulars, and make a report to the houſe of their remarks and objections. The motion introduced a debate; but, upon a diviſion, was rejected by a majority of three voices. Petitions having been preſented by the merchants of London, Briſtol, Liverpool, Glaſgow, and almoſt all the trading towns in the kingdom, complaining of the loſſes they had ſuſtained by the bad conduct of the war, the houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee, to deliberate on theſe remonſtrances. The articles of the London petition were explained by mr. Glover, an eminent merchant of that city. Six days were ſpent in peruſing papers and examining witneſſes: then the ſame gentleman ſummed up the evidence, and in a pathethic ſpeech endeavoured to demonſtrate, that the commerce of Great-Britain had been expoſed to the inſults and rapine of the Spaniards, not by inattention or accident, but by one uniform and continued deſign. This enquiry being reſumed after the adjournment, copies of inſtructions to admirals and captains of cruiſing ſhips were laid before the houſe; the commons paſſed ſeveral reſolutions, upon which a bill was prepared for the better protecting and ſecuring the trade and navigation of the kingdom. It made its way through the lower-houſe; but was thrown out by the lords. The penſion-bill was revived and ſent up to the peers, where it was again rejected, lord Carteret voting againſt that very meaſure which he had ſo lately endeavoured to promate. On the 9th day day of March, lord Limerick made a motion for appointing a committee to enquire into the conduct of affairs for the laſt 20 years: he was ſeconded by ſir John St. Aubin, and ſupported by mr. Velters Cornwall, mr. Phillips, mr. W. Pitt, and lord Percival, the new member for Weſtminſter, who had already ſignalized himſelf by his eloquence and capacity. The motion was oppoſed by ſir Charles Wager, mr. Pelham, and mr. Henry Fox, ſurveyor-general to his majeſty's works, and brother to lord Ilcheſter. Though the oppoſition was faint and frivolous, the propoſal was rejected by a majority of two voices.

[1742] Lord Limerick, not yet diſcouraged, made a motion, on the 23d day of March, for an enquiry into the conduct of Robert earl of Orford, for the laſt ten years of his adminiſtration; and, after a ſharp debate, it was carried in the affirmative. The houſe reſolved to chooſe a ſecret committee by ballot; and in the mean time preſented an addreſs to the king, aſſuring him of their fidelity, zeal, and affection.

Sir Robert Godſchall having moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the act for ſeptennial parliaments, he was ſeconded by ſir John Barnard; but warmly oppoſed by mr. Pulteney and mr. Sandys; and the queſtion paſſed in the negative. The committee of ſecreſy being choſen, began to examine evidence, and mr. Paxton, ſollicitor to the treaſury, refuſing to anſwer ſuch queſtions as were put to him, lord Limerick, chairman of the committee, complained to the houſe of his obſtinacy. He was firſt taken into cuſtody; and ſtill perſiſting in his refuſal, committed to Newgate. Then his lordſhip moved, that leave ſhould be given to bring in a bill for indemnifying evidence againſt the earl of Orford; and it was actually prepared by a deciſion of the majority. In the houſe of lords it was vigorouſly oppoſed by lord Carteret, and as ſtrenuouſly ſupported by the duke of Argyle; but fell upon a diviſion, by the weight of ſuperior numbers. Thoſe members in the houſe of commons who heartily wiſhed that the enquiry might be proſecuted were extremely incenſed at the fate of this bill. A committee was appointed to ſearch the journals of the lords for precedents: their report being read, lord Strange, ſon of the earl of Derby, moved for a reſolution, 'That the lords refuſing to concur with the commons of Great-Britain, in an indemnification neceſſary to the effectual carrying on the enquiry, now depending in parliament, is an obſtruction to juſtice, and may prove fatal to the liberties of this nation.'—This motion, which was ſeconded by lord Quarendon, ſon of the earl of Lichfield, gave riſe to a warm debate; and mr. Sandys declaimed againſt it, as a ſtep that would bring on an immediate diſſolution of the preſent form of government. It is really amazing to ſee with what effrontery ſome men can ſhift their maxims, and openly contradict the whole tenor of their former conduct. Mr Sandys did not paſs uncenſured: he ſuſtained ſome ſevere ſarcaſms on his apoſtacy, from ſir John Hynde Cotton, who refuted all his objections: nevertheleſs, the motion paſſed in the negative. Notwithſtanding this great obſtruction, purpoſely thrown in the way of the enquiry, the ſecret committee diſcovered many flagrant inſtances of fraud and corruptiou in which the earl of Orford had been concerned. It appeared that he had granted fraudulent contracts for paying the troops in the Weſt-Indies: that he had employed iniquitous arts to influence elections: that for ſecret-ſervice, during the laſt ten years, he had touched one million four hundred fifty-three thouſand four hundred pounds of the public money: that above 50,000l. of this ſum had been paid to authors and printers of news-papers and political tracts written in defence of the miniſtry: that on the very day which preceded his reſignation he had ſigned orders on the civil-liſt revenues for above 30,000l. but as the caſh remaining in the exchequer did not much exceed 14,000l. he had raiſed the remaining part of the 30,000, by pawning the orders to a banker. The committee proceeded to make further progreſs in their ſcrutiny, and had almoſt prepared a third report, when they were interrupted by the prorogation of parliament.

The miniſtry, finding it was neceſſary to take ſome ſtep for conciliating the affection of the people, gave way to a bill for excluding certain officers from ſeats in the houſe of commons. They paſſed another for encouraging the linen manufacture; a third for regulating the trade of the plantations; and a fourth to prevent the marriage of lunatics. They voted 40,000 ſeamen, and 62,500 landmen for the ſervice of the current year. They provided for the ſubſidies to Denmark and Heſſe-Caſſel, and voted 500,000l. to the queen of Hungary. The expence of the year amounted to near 600,000l. raiſed by the land-tax at four ſhillings in the pound, by the malt-tax, by one million from the ſinking-fund, by annuities granted upon it for 800,000l. and a loan of 1,600,000l. from the Bank. In the month of July, John lord Gower was appointed keeper of his majeſty's privy-ſeal: Allen lord Bathurſt was made captain of the band of penſioners; and on the 15th day of the month, mr. Pulteney took his ſeat in the houſe of peers, as earl of Bath. The king cloſed the ſeſſion in the uſual way, after having given them to underſtand, that a treaty of peace was concluded between the queen of Hungary and the king of Pruſſia, under his mediation; and that the late ſucceſſes of the Auſtrian arms were in a great meaſure owing to the generous aſſiſtance afforded by the Britiſh nation.

By this time great changes had happened in the affairs of the continent. The elector of Bavaria was choſen emperor of Germany at Franckfort on the Maine, and crowned by the name of Charles VII. on the 12th day of February. Thither the imperial diet was removed from Ratiſbon: they confirmed his election, and indulged him with a ſubſidy of 60 Roman months, amounting to about 200,000l. ſterling. In the mean time, the Auſtrian general, Khevenhuller, ravaged his electorate, and made himſelf maſter of Munich, the capital of Bavaria: he likewiſe laid part of the Palatine under contribution, in reſentment for that elector's having ſent a body of his troops to re-enforce the imperial army. In March, count Saxe, with a detachment of French and Bavarians, reduced Egra; and the Auſtrians were obliged to evacuate Bavaria, though they afterwards returned. Khevenhuller took poſt in the neighbourhood of Paſſau, and detached general Bernclau to Dinglefing on the Iſer, to obſerve the motions of the enemy, who were now become extremely formidable. In May, a detachment of French and Bavarians advanced to the caſtle of Hilkerſbergh on the Danube, with a view to take poſſeſſion of a bridge over the river: the Auſtrian garriſon immediately marched out to give them battle, and a ſevere action enſued, in which the imperialiſts were defeated.

In the beginning of the year, the queen of Hungary had aſſembled two conſiderable armies in Moravia and Bohemia. Prince Charles of Lorraine, at the head of 50,000 men, advanced againſt the Saxons and Pruſſians, who thought proper to retire with precipitation from Moravia, which they had invaded. Then the prince took the route to Bohemia; and marſhal Broglio, who commanded the French forces in that country, muſt have fallen a ſacrifice, had not the king of Pruſſia received a ſtrong re-enforcement, and entered that kingdom before his allies could be attacked. The two armies advanced towards each other; and, on the 17th day of May, joined battle at Czaſlaw, where the Auſtrians at firſt gained a manifeſt advantage and penetrated as far as the Pruſſian baggage: then the irregulars began to plunder ſo eagerly, that they neglected every other conſideration. The Pruſſian infantry took this opportunity to rally: the battle was renewed, and, after a very obſtinate conteſt, the victory was ſnatched out of the hands of the Auſtrians, who were obliged to retire, with the loſs of 5000 men killed, and 1200 taken by the enemy. The Pruſſians paid dear for the honour of remaining on the field of battle; and from the circumſtances of this action the king is ſaid to have conceived a diſguſt to the war. When the Auſtrians made ſuch progreſs in the beginning of the engagement, he rode off with great expedition, until he was recalled by a meſſage from his general, the count de Schwerin, aſſuring his majeſty that there was no danger of a defeat. Immediately after this battle, he diſcovered an inclination to accommodate all differences with the queen of Hungary. The earl of Hyndford, ambaſſador from the court of Great-Britain, who accompanied him in this campaign, and was veſted with full powers by her Hungarian majeſty, did not fail to cultivate this favourable diſpoſition: and on the 1ſt day of June, a treaty of peace between the two powers was concluded at Breſlaw. The queen ceded to his Pruſſian majeſty the Upper and Lower Sileſia, with the county of Glatz in Bohemia; and he charged himſelf with the payment of the ſum lent by the merchants of London to the late emperor, on the Sileſian revenues. He likewiſe engaged to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality during the war, and to withdraw his forces from Bohemia in 15 days after the ratification of the treaty, in which were comprehended the king of Great-Britain, elector of Hanover, the czarina, the king of Denmark, the ſtates-general, the houſe of Wolfenbuttle, and the king of Poland elector of Saxony, on certain conditions which were accepted.

The king of Pruſſia recalled his troops; while Mareſchal Broglio, who commanded the French auxiliaries in that kingdom, and the count de Belleiſle, abandoned, their magazines and baggage, and retired with precipitation under the cannon of Prague. There they entrenched themſelves in an advantageous ſituation; and prince Charles being joined by the other body of Auſtrians, under prince Lobkowitz, encamped in ſight of them, on the hills of Giriſnitz. The grand-duke of Tuſcany arrived in the Auſtrian army, of which he took the command; and the French generals offered to ſurrender Prague, Egra, and all the other places they poſſeſſed in Bohemia, provided they might be allowed to march off with their arms, artillery, and baggage. The propoſal was rejected, and Prague inveſted on all ſides about the end of July. Though the operations of the ſiege were carried on in an aukward and ſlovenly manner, the place was ſo effectually blocked up, that famine muſt have compelled the French to ſurrender at diſcretion, had not very extraordinary efforts been made for their relief. The emperor had made advances to the queen of Hungary. He promiſed that the French forces ſhould quit Bohemia, and evacuate the empire; and he offered to renounce all pretenſions to the kingdom of Bohemia, on conditions that the Auſtrians would reſtore Bavaria: but theſe conditions were declined by the court of Vienna. The king of France was no ſooner appriſed of the condition to which the generals Broglio and Belleiſle were reduced, then he ſent orders to marſhal Maillebois, who commanded his army on the Rhine, to march to their relief. His troops were immediately put in motion; and when they reached Amberg in the Upper Palatine were joined by the French and imperialiſts from Bavaria. Prince Charles of Lorrain having received intelligence of their junction and deſign, left 18,000 men to maintain the blocade of Prague, under the command of general Feſtititz, while he himſelf, with the reſt of the army, advanced to Haydon, on the frontiers of Bohemia. There he was joined by count Khevenhuller, who from Bavaria had followed the enemy, now commanded by count Seckendorff, and the count de Saxe. Seckendorff, however was ſent bac to Bavaria, while marſhal Maillebois entered Bohemia on the 25th day of September. But he marched with ſuch precaution, that prince Charles could not bring him to an engagement. Mean while Feſtititz, for want of ſufficient force, was obliged to abandon the blocade of Prague; and the French generals being now at liberty, took poſt at Leutmaritz. Maillebois advanced as far as Kadan: but ſeeing the Auſtrians poſſeſſed of all the paſſes of the mountains, he marched bac to the Palatine, and was miſerably harraſſed in his retreat by prince Charles, who had left a ſtrong body with prince Lobkowitz, to watch the motions of Belleiſle and Broglio.

These generals seeing themselves surrounded on all hands, returned to Prague, from whence Broglio made his escape in the habit of a courier, and was sent to command the army at Maillebois, who was by this time disgraced. Prince Lobkowitz, who now directed the blocade of Prague, had so effectually cut off all communication between that place and the adjacent country, that in a little time the French troops were reduced to great extremity, both from the severity of the season, and the want of provision. They were already reduced to the necessity of eating horse-flesh, and unclean animals; and they had no other prospect but that of perishing by famine or war, when their commander formed the scheme of a retreat, which was actually put in execution. Having taken some artful precautions to deceive the enemy, he, in the middle of December, departed from Prague at midnight, with about 14,000 men, thirty pieces of artillery, and some of the principal citizens as hostages for the safety of 900 soldiers whom he had left in garrison. Notwithstanding the difficulties he must have encountered at that season of the year, in a broken and unfrequented road which he purposely chose, he marched with such expedition, that he had gained the passes of the mountains, before he was overtaken by the horse and hussars of prince Lobkowitz. The fatigue and hardships which the miserable soldiers underwent are inexpressible. A great number perished in the snow, and many hundreds, fainting with weariness, cold, and hunger, were left to the mercy of the Austrian irregulars, consisting of the most barbarous people on the face of the earth. The count de Belleisle, though tortured with the hip-gout, behaved with surprising resolution and activity. He caused himself to be carried in a litter to every place where he thought his presence was necessary, and made such dispositions, that the pursuers never could make an impression upon the body of his troops: but all his artillery, baggage, and even his own equipage, fell into the hands of the enemy. On the 29th day of December, he arrived at Egra, from whence he proceeded to Alsace without further molestation: but, when he returned to Versailles, he met with a very cold reception, notwithstanding the gallant exploit which he had performed. After his escape, prince Lobkowitz returned to Prague, and the small garrison which Belleisle had left in that place surrendered upon honourable terms; so that this capital reverted to the house of Austria.

The king of Great-Britain resolving to make a powerful diversion in the Netherlands, had, in the month of April, ordered 16,000 effective men to be embarked for that country: but, as this step was taken without any previous concert with the states-general, the earl of Stair, destined to the command of the forces in Flanders, was in the mean time appointed ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to their high-mightinesses, in order to persuade them to co-operate vigorously in the plan which his Britannic majesty had formed—A plan by which Great-Britain was engaged as a principal in a foreign dispute, and entailed upon herself the whole burthen of an expensive war, big with ruin and disgrace. England, from being the umpire, was now become a party in all continental quarrels; and, instead of trimming the balance of Europe, lavished away her blood and treasure in supporting the interest and allies of a puny electorate in the north of Germany. The king of Prussia had been at variance with the elector of Hanover. The duchy of Mecklenburgh was the avowed subject of dispute: but his Prussian majesty is said to have had other more provoking causes of complaint, which, however, he did not think proper to divulge. The king of Great-Britain found it convenient to accommodate these differences. In the course of this summer, the two powers concluded a convention, in consequence of which the troops of Hanover evacuated Mecklenburgh, and three regiments of Brandenburgh took possession of those bailiwicks that were mortagged to the king of Prussia. The elector of Hanover being now secured from danger, sixteen thousand troops of that country, together with the 6000 auxilary Hessians, began their march for the Netherlands; and about the middle of October arrived in the neighbourhood of Brussels, were they encamped. The earl of Stair repaired to Ghent, where the British forces were quartered: a body of Austrians was assembled; and though the season was far advanced, he seemed determined upon some expedition: but all of a sudden the troops were sent into winter-quarters. The Austrians retired to Luxemburgh; the English and Hessians remained in Flanders; and the Hanoverians marched into the county of Liege, without paying any regard to the bishop's protestation.

The states-general had made a considerable augmentation of their forces by sea and land; but, notwithstanding the repeated instances of the earl of Stair, they resolved to adhere to their neutrality: they dreaded the neighbourhood of the French; and they were far from being pleased to see the English get footing in the Netherlands. The friends of the house of Orange began to exert themselves: the states of Groningen and West-Friesland protested, in favour of the prince, against the promotion of foreign generals which had lately been made: but his interest was powerfully opposed by the provinces of Zealand and Holland, which had the greatest weight in the republic. The revolution in Russia did not put an end to the war with Sweden. These two powers had agreed to an armistice of three months during which the czarina augmented her forces in Finland. She likewise ordered the counts Osterman and Munich, with their adherents, to be tried: they were condemned to death, but pardoned on the scaffold, and sent in exile to Siberia. The Swedes still encouraged by the intrigues of France, refused to listen to any terms of accommodation, unless Carelia, and the other conquests of the czar Peter, should be restored. The French court had expected to bring over the new empress to their measures: but they found her as well disposed as her predecessor to assist the house of Austria. She remitted a considerable sum of money to the queen of Hungary; and at the same time congratulated the elector of Bavaria on his elevation to the imperial throne. The ceremony of her coronation was performed in May, with great solemnity, at Moscow; and in November, she declared her nephew, the duke of Holstein-Gottorp, her successor, by the title of grand-prince of all the Russias. The cessation of arms being expired, general Lasci reduced Frederickshein, and obliged the Swedish army, commanded by count Lewenhaupt, to retire before him, from one place to another, until at length they were quite surrounded near Helsingfors. In this emergency, the Swedish general submitted to a capitulation, by which his infantry were transported by sea to Sweden: his cavalry marched by land to Abo; and his artillery and magazines remained in the hands of the Russians. The king of Sweden being of an advanced age, the diet assembled in order to settle the succession; and the duke of Holstein-Gottorp, as grandson to the eldest sister to Charles XII. was declared next heir to the crown. A courier was immediately dispatched to Moscow, to notify to the duke this determination of the diet; and this message was followed by a deputation; but when they understood that he had embraced the religion of the Greek church, and been acknowledged successor to the throne of Russia, they annulled his election for Sweden, and resolved that the succession should not be re-established, until a peace should be concluded with the czarina. Conferrences were opened at Abo for this purpose. In the mean time, the events of war had been so long unfortunate for Sweden, that it was absolutely necessary to appease the indignation of the people with some sacrifice. The generals Lewnhaupt and Bodenbrock were tried by a court-martial for misconduct: being found guilty and condemned to death, they applied to the diet, by which the sentence was confirmed. The term of the subsidy-treaty between Great-Britain and Denmark expiring, his Danish majesty refused to renew it; nor would he accede to the peace of Breslau. On the other hand, he became subsidiary to France, with which also he concluded a new treaty of commerce.

The court of Versailles were now heartily tired of maintaining the war in Germany, and had actually made equitable proposals of peace to the queen of Hungary, by whom they were rejected. Thus repulsed, they redoubled their preparations; and endeavoured, by advantageous offers, to detach the king of Sardinia from the interest of the house of Austria. This prince had espoused a sister to the grand-duke, who pressed him to declare for her brother, and the queen of Hungary promised to gratify him with some territories in the Milanese: besides, he thought the Spaniards had already gained too much ground in Italy: but, at the same time, he was afraid of being crushed between France and Spain, before he could be properly supported. He, therefore, temporized, and protracted the negotiation, until he was alarmed at the progress of the Spanish arms in Italy, and fixed in his determination by the subsidies of Great-Britain. The Spanish army assembled at Rimini, under the duke de Montemar; and being joined by the Neapolitan forces, amounted to 60,000 men, furnished with a large train of artillery. About the beginning of May, they entered the Bolognese: then the king of Sardinia declaring against them, joined the Austrian army commanded by count Traun: marched into the duchy of Parma; and underſtanding that the duke of Modena had engaged in a treaty with the Spaniards, diſpoſſeſſed that prince of his dominions. The duke de Montemar, ſeeing his army diminiſhed by ſickneſs and deſertion, retreated to the kingdom of Naples, and was followed by the king of Sardinia, as far as Rimini.

Here he received intelligence, that don Philip, third ſon of his catholic majeſty, had made an irruption into Savoy with another army of Spaniards, and already taken poſſeſſion of Chamberri, the capital. He forthwith began his march for Piedmont. Don Philip abandoned Savoy at his approach, and retreating into Dauphiné, took poſt under the cannon of Barreaux. The king purſued him thither, and both armies remained in ſight of each other till the month of December, when the marquis de Minas, an active and enterprizing general, arrived from Madrid, and took upon him the command of the forces under don Philip. This general's firſt exploit was againſt the caſtle of Aſpremont, in the neighbourhood of the Sardinian camp. He attacked it ſo vigorouſly that the garriſon was obliged to capitulate in 44 hours. The loſs of this important poſt compelled the king to retire into Piedmont, and the Spaniards marched bac into Savoy, where they eſtabliſhed their winter-quarters. In the mean time, the duke de Montemar, who directed the other Spaniſh army, though the duke of Modena was nominal generaliſſimo, reſigned his command to count Gages, who attempted to penetrate into Tuſcany; but was prevented by the vigilance of count Traun, the Auſtrian general. In December he quartered his troops in the Bolognese and Romagna; while the Auſtrians and Piedmonteſe were diſtributed in the Modeneſe and Parmeſan. The pope was paſſive during the whole campaign: the Venetians maintained their neutrality and the king of the two Sicilies was over-awed by the Britiſh fleet in the Mediterranean.

The new miniſtry in England had ſent out admiral Matthews to aſſume the command of this ſquadron, which had been for ſome time conducted by Leſtock, an inferior officer, as Haddock had been obliged to reſign his commiſſion, on account of his ill ſtate of health. Matthews was likewiſe inveſted with the character of miniſter-plenipotentiary to the king of Sardinia and the ſtates of Italy. Immediately after he had taken poſſeſſion of his command, he ordered captain Norris to deſtroy five Spaniſh gallies which had been put into the bay of St. Tropez; and this ſervice was effectually performed. In May he detached commodore Rowley, with eight ſail, to cruiſe off the harbour of Toulone and a great number of merchant-ſhips belonging to the enemy fell into his hands. In Auguſt he ſent commodore Martin with another ſquadron into the bay of Naples, to bombard that city, unleſs his Sicilian majeſty would immediately recal his troops, which had joined the Spaniſh army, and promiſe to remain neuter during the continuance of the war. Naples was immediately filled with conſternation; the king ſubſcribed to theſe conditions; and the Engliſh ſquadron rejoined the admiral in the road of Hieres, which he had choſen for his winter ſtation. Before this period he had landed ſome men at St. Remo, in the territories of Genoa, and deſtroyed the magazines that were erected for the uſe of the Spaniſh army. He had likewiſe ordered two of his cruiſers to attac a Spaniſh ſhip of the line which lay at anchor in the port of Ajaccio, in the iſland of Corſica: but the Spaniſh captain ſet his men on ſhore, and blew up his ſhip, rather than ſhe ſhould fall into the hands of the Engliſh.

In the courſe of this year admiral Vernon and general Wentworth made another effort in the Weſt-Indies. They had in January received a re-enforcement from England, and planned a new expedition, in concert with the governor of Jamaica, who accompanied them in the voyage. Their deſign was to diſembark the troops at Porto-Bello, and march acroſs the iſthmus of Darien, to attac the rich town of Panama. They ſailed from Jamaica on the 9th of March, and on the 28th arrived at Porto-Bello. There they held a council of war, in which it was reſolved, that as the troops were ſicly, the rainy ſeaſon begun, and ſeveral tranſports not yet arrived, the intended expedition was become impracticable. In purſuance of this detirmination the armament immediately returned to Jamaica, exhibiting a ridiculous ſpectacle of folly and irreſolution. [k] In Auguſt a ſhip of war was ſent from thence, with about 300 ſoldiers, to the ſmall iſland Rattan, in the bay of Honduras, of which they took poſſeſſion. In September Vernon and Wentworth received orders to return to England with ſuch troops as remained alive: theſe did not amount to a tenth part of the number which had been ſent abroad in that inglorious ſervice. The inferior officers fell ignobly by ſickneſs and deſpair, without an opportunity of ſignalizing their courage, and the commanders lived to feel the ſcorn and reproach of their country. In the month of June the new colony of Georgia was invaded by an armament from St. Auguſtine, commanded by don Marinel de Monteano, governor of that fortreſs. It conſiſted of 36 ſhips, from which 4000 men were landed at St. Simon's, and began their march for Frederica. General Oglethorpe, with a handful of men, took ſuch wiſe precautions for oppoſing their progreſs, and harraſſed them in their march with ſuch activity and reſolution, that after two of their detachments had been defeated, they retired to their ſhips, and totally abandoned the enterprize.

In England the merchants ſtill complained that their commerce was not properly protected, and the people clamoured much againſt the conduct of the war.——They ſaid their burthens were increaſed to maintain quarrels with which they had no concern; to defray the enormous expence of inactive fleets and pacific armies.—Lord C. had by this time inſinuated himſelf into the confidence of his ſovereign, and engroſſed the whole direction of public affairs. The war with Spain was now become a ſecondary conſideration, and neglected accordingly; while the chief attention of the new miniſter was turned upon the affairs of the continent. The diſpute with Spain concerned Britain only. The intereſts of Hanover were connected with the troubles of the empire. By purſuing this object he ſoothed the wiſhes of his maſter, and opened a more ample field for his own ambition. He had ſtudied the policy of the continent with peculiar eagerneſs. This was the favourite ſubject of his reflection, upon which he thought and ſpoke with a degree of enthuſiaſm. The intolerable taxes, the poverty, the ruined commerce of his country, the iniquity of ſtanding armies, votes of credit, and foreign connexions, upon which he had ſo often expatiated, were now forgotten, or overlooked. He ſaw nothing but glory, conqueſt, and acquired dominion. He ſet the power of France at defiance; and, as if Great-Britain had felt no diſtreſs, but teemed with treaſure which ſhe could not otherwiſe employ, he powered forth her millions with a raſh and deſperate hand, in purchaſing beggarly allies, and maintaining mercenary armies. The earl of Stair had arrived in England towards the end of Auguſt, and conferred with his majeſty. A privy-council was ſummoned; and in a few days that nobleman returned to Holland. Lord Carteret was ſent with a commiſſion to the Hague in September; and when he returned the baggage of the king and the duke of Cumberland, which had been ſhipped for Flanders, was ordered to be brought on ſhore. The parliament met on the 16th day of November, when his majeſty told them, that he had augmented the Britiſh forces in the Low-Countries with 16,000 Hanoverians and the Heſſian auxiliaries, in order to form ſuch a force, in conjunction with the Auſtrian troops, as might be of ſervice to the common cauſe at all events. He extolled the magnanimity and fortitude of the queen of Hungary, as well as the reſolute conduct of the king of Sardinia, and that prince's ſtrict adherence to his engagements, though attacked in his own dominions. He mentioned the requiſition made by Sweden, of his good offices for procuring a peace between that nation and Ruſſia; the defenſive alliances which he had concluded with the czarina, and with the king of Pruſſia, as events which could not have been expected, if Great-Britain had not manifeſted a ſeaſonable ſpirit and vigour, in defence and aſſiſtance of her ancient allies, and in maintaining the liberties of Europe. He ſaid, the honour and intereſt of his crown and kingdoms, the ſucceſs of the war with Spain, the re-eſtabliſhment of the balance and tranquillity of Europe would greatly depend on the prudence and vigour of their reſolutions. The marquis of Tweedale moved for an addreſs of thanks, which was oppoſed by the earl of Cheſterfield, for the reaſons ſo often urged on the ſame occaſion; but ſupported by lord C. on his new-adopted maxims, with thoſe ſpecious arguments which he could at all times produce, delivered with amazing ſerenity and aſſurance. The motion was agreed to, and the addreſs preſented to his ma[k] In May two Engliſh frigates, commanded by captain Smith and captain Stuart, fell in with three Spaniſh ſhips of war, near the iſland of St. Chriſtopher's. They forthwith engaged, and the action continued till night, by the favour of which the enemy retired to Porto-Rico in a ſhattered condition.

In the month of September the Tilbury ſhip of war, of ſixty-guns, was accidently ſet on fire, and deſtroyed, off the iſland of Hiſpaniola: on which occaſion 127 men periſhed: the reſt were ſaved by captain Hoare, of the Defiance, who happened to be on the ſame cruiſe.

jeſty. About this period a treaty of mutual defence and guarantee between his majeſty and the king of Pruſſia was ſigned at Weſtminſter. In the houſe of commons mr. Lyttelton made a motion for reviving the place-bill; but it was oppoſed by a great number of members who had formerly been ſtrenuous advocates for this meaſure, and rejected upon a diviſion. This was alſo the fate of a motion made to renew the enquiry into the conduct of Robert earl of Orford. As many ſtrong preſumptions of guilt had appeared againſt him in the reports of the ſecret committee, the nation had reaſon to expect that this propoſal would have been embraced by a great majority: but ſeveral members, who in the preceding ſeſſion had been loud in their demands of juſtice, now ſhamefully contributed their talents and intereſt in ſtifling the enquiry.

When the houſe of lords took into conſideration the ſeveral eſtimates of the expence occaſioned by the forces in the pay of Great-Britain, earl Stanhope, at the cloſe of an elegant ſpeech, moved for an addreſs, to beſeech and adviſe his majeſty, that, in compaſſion to his people, loaded already with ſuch numerous and heavy taxes, ſuch large and growing debts, and greater annual expences than the nation at any time before had ever ſuſtained, he would exonorate his ſubjects of the charge and burthen of thoſe mercenaries who were taken into the ſervice laſt year, without the advice or conſent of parliament. The motion was ſupported by the earl of Sandwich, who took occaſion to ſpeak with great contempt of Hanover, and in mentioning the royal family, ſeemed to forget that decorum which the ſubject required. He had, indeed, reaſon to talk with aſperity on the contract by which the Hanoverians had been taken into the pay of Great-Britain. Levy-money was charged to the account, though they were engaged for one year only; and though not a ſingle regiment had been raiſed on this occaſion: they had been levied for the ſecurity of the electorate; and would have been maintained if England had never engaged in the affairs of the continent. The duke of Bedford enlarged upon the ſame ſubject. He ſaid it had been ſuſpected, nor was the ſuſpicion without foundation, that the meaſures of the Engliſh miniſtry had long been regulated by the intereſt of his majeſty's electoral territories: that theſe had been long conſidered as a gulf into which the treaſures of Great-Britain had been thrown: that the ſtate of Hanover had been changed without any viſible cauſe, ſince the acceſſion of its princes to the throne of England: affluence had begun to wanton in their towns, and gold to glitter in their cottages, without the diſcovery of mines, or the increaſe of their commerce; and new dominions had been purchaſed, of which the value was never paid from the revenues of Hanover. The motion was hunted down by the new miniſter, the patriot lord Bathurſt, and the earl of Bath, which laſt nobleman declared that he conſidered it as an act of cowardice and meanneſs, to fall paſſively down the ſtream of popularity, to ſuffer his reaſon and integrity to be overborne by the noiſe of vulgar clamours, which had been raiſed againſt the meaſures of government by the low arts of exaggeration, fallacious reaſonings, and partial repreſentations. This is the very language which ſir Robert Walpole had often uſed againſt mr. Pulteney and his confedrates in the houſe of commons. The aſſociates of the new ſecratary pleaded the cauſe of Hanover, and inſiſted upon the neceſſity of a land-war againſt France, with all the vehemence of declamation. Their ſuggeſtions were anſwered; their conduct was ſeverely ſtigmatized by the earl of Cheſterfield, who obſerved, that the aſſembling an army in Flanders, without the concurrence of the ſtates-general or any other power engaged by treaty, or bound by intereſt, to ſupport the queen of Hungary, was a raſh and ridiculous meaſure: the taking 16,000 Hanoverians into Britiſh pay, without conſulting the parliament, ſeemed highly derogatory to the rights and dignity of the great council of the nation, and a very dangerous precedent to future times: that theſe troops could not be employed againſt the emperor, whom they had already recognized: that the arms and wealth of Britain alone were altogether inſufficient to raiſe the houſe of Auſtria to its former ſtrength, dominion, and influence: that the aſſembling an army in Flanders would engage the nation as principals in an expenſive and ruinous war, with a power which it ought not to provoke, and could not pretend to withſtand in that manner: that while Great-Britain exhauſted herſelf almoſt to ruin, in purſuance of ſchemes founded on engagements to the queen of Hungary, the electorate of Hanover, though under the ſame engagements, and governed by the ſame prince, did not appear to contribute any thing as an ally to her aſſiſtance, but was paid by Great-Britain for all the forces it had ſent into the field, at a very exorbitant price: that nothing could be more abſurd and iniquitous than to hire theſe mercenaries, while a numerous army lay inactive at home; and the nation groaned under ſuch intolerable burthens. 'It may be proper (added he) to repeat what may be forgotten in the multitude of other objects, that this nation, after having axalted the elector of Hanover from a ſtate of obſcurity to the crown, is condemned to hire the troops of that electorate to fight their own cauſe; to hire them at a rate which was never demanded before; and to pay levy-money for them, though it is known to all Europe that they were not raiſed for this occaſion.' All the partiſans of the old miniſtry joined in the oppoſition to earl Stanhope's motion, which was rejected by the majority. Then the earl of Scarborough moved for an addreſs, to approve of the meaſures which had been taken on the continent; and this was likewiſe carried by dint of number. It was not, however, a very eligible victory: what they gained in parliament they loſt with the people. The new miniſters became more odious than their predeceſſors; and people began to think that public virtue was an empty name.

But the moſt ſevere oppoſition they underwent was in their endeavours to ſupport a bill which they had concerted, and which had paſſed through the houſe of commons with great precipitation: it repealed certain duties on ſpirituous liquors; and licences for retailing thoſe liquors; and impoſed others at an eaſier rate. When thoſe ſevere duties, amounting almoſt to a prohibition, were impoſed, the populace of London were ſunk into the moſt brutal degeneracy, by drinking to exceſs the pernicious ſpirit called Gin, which was ſold ſo cheap, that the loweſt claſs of the people could afford to indulge themſelves in one ſtate of intoxication, to the deſtruction of all morals, induſtry, and order. Such a ſhameful degree of profligacy prevailed, that the retailers of this poiſonous compound ſet up painted boards in public, inviting people to be drunk for the ſmall expence of one penny; aſſuring them they might be dead drunk for two-pence, and have ſtraw for nothing. They accordingly provided cellars and places ſtrewed with ſtraw, to which they conveyed thoſe wretches who were overwhelmed with intoxication. In theſe diſmal caverns they lay until they recovered ſome uſe of their faculties, and then they had recourſe to the ſame miſchievous potion: thus conſuming their health, and ruining their families in hideous receptacles of the moſt filthy vice, reſounding with riot, execration and blaſphemy. Such beaſtly practices too plainly denoted a total want of all police and civil regulations, and would have reflected diſgrace upon the moſt barbarous community. In order to reſtrain this evil, which was become intolerable, the legiſlature enacted that law which we have already mentioned. But the populace ſoon broke through all reſtraint. Though no licince was obtained, and no duty paid, the liquor continued to be ſold in all corners of the ſtreets: informers were intimidated by the threats of the people; and the juſtices of the peace, either from indolence or corruption, neglected to put the law in execution. The new miniſters foreſaw that a great revenue would accrue to the crown from a repeal of this act; and this meaſure they thought they might the more decently take, as the law had proved ineffectual: for it appeared that the conſumption of gin had conſiderably increaſed every year ſince thoſe heavy duties were impoſed. They, therefore, pretended, that ſhould the price of the liquor be moderately raiſed, and licences granted at 20s. each to the retailers, the loweſt claſs of people would be debarred the uſe of it to exceſs: their morals would of conſequence be mended; and a conſiderable ſum of money might be raiſed for the ſupport of the war, by mortgaging the revenue ariſing from the duty and the licences. Upon theſe maxims the new bill was founded, and paſſed through the lower-houſe without oppoſition: but among the peers it produced the moſt obſtinate diſpute which had happened ſince the beginning of this parliament. The firſt aſſault it ſuſtained was from lord Hervey, who had been diveſted of his poſt of privy-ſeal, which was beſtowed on lord Gower; and theſe two noblemen exchanged principles from that inſtant. The firſt was hardened into a ſturdy patriot; the other ſupplied into an obſequious courtier. Lord Hervey, on this occaſion, made a florid harangue upon the pernicious effects of the deſtructive ſpirit they were about to let looſe upon their fellow-creatures. Several prelates expatiated on the ſame topics: but the earl of Cheſterfield attacked the bill with the united powers of reaſon, wit, and redicule. Lord Carteret, lord Bathurſt, and the earl of Bath were numbered among its advocates; and ſhrewd arguments were advanced on both ſides of the queſtion. After very long, warm, and repeated debates, the bill paſſed without amendments, though the whole bench of biſhops voted againſt it; and we cannot help owing, that it has not been attended with thoſe diſmal conſequences which the lords in the oppoſition foretold. When the queſtion was put for committing this bill, and the earl of Cheſterfield ſaw the biſhops join in his diviſion, 'I am in doubt (ſaid he) whether I have not got on the other ſide of the queſtion; for I have not had the honour to divide with ſo many lawn ſleeves for ſeveral years.'

By the report of the ſecret committee it appeared that the then miniſter had commenced proſecutions againſt the mayors of boroughs who oppoſed his influence in the elections of members of parliament. Theſe proſecutions were founded on ambiguities in characters, or trivial informalities in the choice of magiſtrates. An appeal on ſuch a proceſs was brought into the houſe of lords; and this evil falling under conſideration, a bill was prepared for ſecuring the independency of corporations; but as it tended to diminiſh the influence of the miniſtry, they argued againſt it with their uſual eagerneſs and ſucceſs; and it was rejected on a diviſion. The mutiny-bill and ſeveral others paſſed through both houſes. The commons granted ſupplies to the amount of ſix millions, raiſed by the land-tax, the malt-tax, duties on ſpirituous liquors, and licences, and a loan from the ſinking-fund. In two years the national debt had ſuffered an increaſe of 2,400,000l.

[1743] On the 21ſt day of April the ſeſſion was cloſed in the uſual manner. The king in his ſpeech to both houſes, told them, that, at the requiſition of the queen of Hungary, he had ordered his army, in conjunction with the Auſtrians, to paſs the Rhine for her ſupport and aſſiſtance: that he continued one ſquadron of ſhips in the Mediterranean, and another in the Weſt-Indies. He thanked the commons for the ample ſupplies they had granted; and declared it was the fixed purpoſe of his heart to promote the true intereſt and happineſs of his kingdoms. Immediately after the prorogation of parliament he embarked for Germany, accompanied by the duke of Cumberland, lord Carteret, and other perſons of diſtinction.

At this period the queen of Hungary ſeemed to triumph over all her enemies. The French were driven out of Bohemia and part of the Upper-Palatinate; and their forces under Mareſchal Broglio were poſted on the Danube. Prince Charles of Lorraine, at the head of the Auſtrian army, entered Bavaria; and in April obtained a victory over a body of Bavarians at Brauneau: at the ſame time, three bodies of Croatians penetrating through the paſſes the Tyroleze, ravaged the whole country to the very gates of Munich. The emperor preſſed the French general to hazard a battle; but he refuſed to run this riſque, though he had received a ſtrong re-enforcement from France. His imperial majeſty, thinking himſelf unſafe in Munich, retired to Augſburgh: Mareſchal Seckendorf retreated with the Bavarian troops to Ingoldſtadt, where he was afterwards joined by Mareſchal Broglio, whoſe troops had in this retreat been purſued and terribly harraſſed by the Auſtrian cavalry and huſſars. Prince Charles had opened a free communication with Munich, which now, for the third time, fell into the hands of the queen of Hungary. Her arms likewiſe reduced Friedberg and Landſperg, while prince Charles continued to purſue the French to Donawert, where they were joined by 12,000 men from the Rhine. Broglio ſtill avoided an engagement, and retreated before the enemy to Hailbron. The emperor being thus abandoned by his allies, and ſtripped of all his dominions, repaired to Franckfort, where he lived in indigence and obſcurity. He now made advances towards an accommodation with the queen of Hungary. His general, Seckendorf, had an interview with count Khevenhuller at the convent of Lowerſconfield, where a convention was ſigned. This treaty imported, That the emperor ſhould remain neuter during the continuance of the preſent war; and, that his troops ſhould be quartered in Franconia: that the queen of Hungary ſhould keep poſſeſſion of Bavaria till the peace: that Braunau and Scarding ſhould be delivered up to the Auſtrians: that the French garriſon of Ingoldſtadt ſhould be permitted to withdraw, and be replaced by Bavarians; but that the Auſtrian generals ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of all the artillery, magazines, and warlike ſtores belonging to the French, which ſhould be found in the place. The governors of Egra and Ingoldſtadt refuſing to acquieſce in the capitulation, the Auſtrians had recourſe to the operations of war; and both places were reduced. In Ingoldſtadt they found all the emperor's domeſtic treaſure, jewels, plate, pictures, cabinets, and curioſities, with the archives of the houſe of Bavaria, the moſt valuable effects belonging to the nobility of that electorate, a prodigious train of artillery, and a vaſt quantity of proviſions, arms, and ammunition.

The French king, baffled in all the efforts he had hitherto made for the ſupport of the emperor, ordered his miniſter at Franckfort to deliver a declaration to the diet, profeſſing himſelf very well pleaſed to hear they intended to interpoſe their mediation for terminating the war. He ſaid, he was no leſs ſatisfied with the treaty of neutrality which the emperor had concluded with the queen of Hungary; an event of which he was no ſooner informed, than he had ordered his troops to return to the frontiers of his dominions, that the Germanic body might be convinced of his equity and moderation. To this declaration the queen of Hungary anſwered in a reſcript, that the deſign of France was to embarraſs her affairs, and deprieve her of the aſſiſtance of her allies: that the elector of Bavaria could not be conſidered as a neutral party in his own cauſe: that the mediation of the empire could only produce a peace either with or without the concurrence of France: that in the former caſe no ſolid peace could be expected; in the latter, it was eaſy to foreſee, that France would pay no regard to a peace in which ſhe ſhould have no concern. She affirmed, that the aim of the French king was ſolely to gain time to repair his loſſes, that he might afterwards revive the troubles of the empire. The elector of Mentz, who had favoured the emperor, was now dead, and his ſucceſſor inclined to the Auſtrian intereſt. He allowed this reſcript to be entered in the journal of the diet, together with the proteſts which had been made when the vote of Bohemia was ſuppreſſed in the late election. The emperor complained in a circular letter of this tranſaction, as a ſtroke levelled at his imperial dignity; and it gave riſe to a warm diſpute among the members of the Germanic body. Several princes reſented the haughty conduct, and began to be alarmed at the ſucceſs of the houſe of Auſtria: while others pitied the deplorable ſituation of the emperor. The kings of Great-Britain and Pruſſia, as electors of Hanover and Brandenburgh, eſpouſed oppoſite ſides in this conteſt. His Pruſſian majeſty proteſted againſt the inveſtiture of the duchy of Saxe-Lawenburgh, claimed by the king of Great-Britain: he had an interview with general Seckendorf at Anſpach; and was ſaid to have privately viſited the emperor at Franckfort.

The troops which the king of Great-Britain had aſſembled in the Netherlands began their march for the Rhine in the latter end of February; and in May they encamped near Hoech on the river Mayne, under the command of the earl of Stair. This nobleman ſent major-general Bland to Franckfort, with a compliment to the emperor, aſſuring him, in the name of his Britannic majeſty, that the reſpect owing to his dignity ſhould not be violated, nor the place of his reſidence diſturbed. Notwithſtanding this aſſurance, the emperor retired to Munich, though he was afterwards compelled to return, by the ſucceſs of the Auſtrians in Bavaria. The French king, in order to prevent the junction of the Britiſh forces with prince Charles of Lorrain, ordered the mareſchal de Noailles to aſſemble 60,000 men upon the Mayne; while Coigny was ſent into Alſace with a numerous army, to defend that province, and oppoſe prince Charles, ſhould he attempt to paſs the Rhine. The mareſchal de Noailles, having ſecured the towns of Spire, Worms, and Oppenheim, paſſed the Rhine in the beginning of June, and poſted himſelf on the eaſt ſide of that river, above Franckfort. The earl of Stair advanced towards him, and encamped at Killenbach, between the river Mayne and the foreſt of D'Armſtadt: from this ſituation he made a motion to Aſcaffenburg, with a view to ſecure the navigation of the Upper-Mayne: but he was anticipated by the enemy, who lay on the other ſide of the river, and had taken poſſeſſion of the poſts above, ſo as to intercept all ſupplies. They were poſted on the other ſide of the river, oppoſite to the allies, whoſe camp they overlooked; and they found means, by their parties and other precautions, to cut off the communication by water between Franckfort and the confederates. The duke of Cumberland had already come to make his firſt campaign, and his majeſty arrived in the camp on the 9th day of June. He found his army, amounting to about 40,000 men, in danger of ſtarving: he received intelligence, that a re-enforcement of 12,000 Hanoverians and Heſſians had reached Hanau; and he reſolved to march thither, both with a view to effect the junction, and to procure proviſion for his forces. With this view he decamped on the 26th day of June. He had no ſooner quitted Aſchaffenburgh than it was ſeiſed by the French general: he had not marched above three leagues, when he perceived the enemy, to the number of 30,000, had paſſed the river farther down, at Selingenſtadt, and were drawn up in order of battle at the village of Dettingen, to diſpute his paſſage. Thus he found himſelf cooped up in a very dangerous ſituation. The enemy had poſſeſſed themſelves of Aſchaffenburgh behind, ſo as to prevent his retreat: his troops were confined in a narrow plain, bounded by hills and woods on the right, flanked on the left by the river Mayne, on the oppoſite ſide of which the French had erected batteries that annoyed the allies on their march: in the front a conſiderable part of the French army was drawn up, with a narrow paſs before them, the village of Dettingen on their right, a wood on their left, and a moraſs in the centre. Thus environed, the confederates muſt either have fought at a very great diſadvantage, or ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war, had not the duke de Gramont, who commanded the enemy, been inſtigated by the ſpirit of madneſs to forego theſe advantages. He paſſed the defile, and advancing towards the allies, a battle enſued. The French horſe charged with great impetuoſity, and ſome regiments of Britiſh cavalry were put in diſorder: but the infantry of the allies behaved with ſuch intrepidity and deliberation, under the eye of their ſovereign, as ſoon determined the fate of the day: the French were obliged to give way, and repaſs the Mayne with great precipitation, having loſt about 5000 men killed, wounded, or taken. Had they been properly purſued before they recollected themſelves from their firſt confuſion, in all probability they would have ſuſtained a total overthrow. The earl of Stair propoſed that a body of cavalry ſhould be detached on this ſervice; but his advice was over-ruled. The loſs of the allies in this action amounted to 2000 men. The generals Clayton and Monroy were killed: the duke of Cumberland, who exhibited uncommon proofs of courage, was ſhot through the calf of the leg: the earl of Albermarle, general Huſke, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction, were wounded. The king expoſed his perſon to a ſevere fire of cannon as well as muſquetry: he rode between the firſt and ſecond lines with his ſword drawn, and encouraged the troops to fight for the honour of England. Immediately after the action he continued his march to Hanau, where he was joined by the re-enforcement. The earl of Stair ſent a trumpet to mareſchal de Noailles, recommending to his protection the ſic and wounded that were left on the field of battle; and theſe the French general treated with great care and tenderneſs. Such generoſity ſoftens the rigours of war, and does honour to humanity.

The two armies continued on different ſides of the river till the 12th day of July, when the French general receiving intelligence that prince Charles of Lorraine had approached the Neckar, he ſuddenly retired, and repaſſed the Rhine between Worms and Oppenheim. The king of Great-Britain was viſited by prince Charles and count Khevenhuller at Hanau, where the future operations of the campaign were regulated. On the 27th day of Auguſt, the allied army paſſed the Rhine at Mentz, and the king fixed his head-quarters in the eſpiſcopal palace at Worms. Here the forces lay encamped till the latter end of September, when they advanced to Spire, where they were joined by 20,000 Dutch auxiliaries from the Netherlands. Mareſchal Noailles having retreated into Upper-Alſace, the allies took poſſeſſion of Germeſheim, and demoliſhed the entrenchment which the enemy had raiſed on the Queich: then they returned to Mentz: and in October were diſtributed into winter-quarters, after an inactive campaign that redounded very little to the honour of thoſe by whom the motions of the army were conducted. In September a treaty had been concluded at Worms between his Britannic majeſty, the king of Sardinia, and the queen of Hungary. She engaged to maintain 30,000 men in Italy: the king of Sardinia obliged himſelf to employ 40,000 infantry and 5000 horſe, in conſideration of his commanding the combined army, and receiving an annual ſubſidy of 200,000l. from Great-Britain. As a further gratification, the queen yielded to him the city of Placentia, with ſeveral diſtricts in the duchy of Pavia, and in the Novareſe; and all her right and pretenſions to Final, at preſent poſſeſſed by the republic of Genoa, which, they hoped, would give it up, on being repaid the purchaſe-money, amounting to 300,000l. This ſum the king of England promiſed to diſburſe; and moreover to maintain a ſtrong ſquadron in the Mediterranean, the commander of which ſhould act in concert with his Sardinian majeſty. Finally, the contracting powers agreed, that Final ſhould be conſtituted a free-port, like that of Leghorn. Nothing could be more unjuſt than this treaty, by which the Genoeſe were negotiated out of their property. They had purchaſed the marquiſate of Final of the late emperor for a valuable conſideration, and the purchaſe had been guaranteed by Great-Britain. It could not, therefore, be expected that they would part with this acquiſition to a prince whoſe power they thought already too formidable; eſpecially, on condition of its being made a free-port, to the prejudice of their own commerce. They preſented remonſtrances againſt this article, by their miniſters at the courts of London, Vienna, and Turin; and as very little regard was paid to their repreſentations, they threw themſelves into the arms of France and Spain for protection.

After the battle of Dettingen, colonel Mentzel, at the head of a large body of irregulars belonging to the queen of Hungary, made an irruption into Lorraine, part of which they ravaged without mercy. In September prince Charles, with the Auſtrian army, entered the Briſgaw, and attempted to paſs the Rhine; but mareſchal Coigny had taken ſuch precautions for guarding it on the other ſide, that he was obliged to abandon his deſign, and marching bac into the Upper-Palatinate, quartered his troops in that country, and in Bavaria. By this time the earl of Stair had ſollicited and obtained leave to reſign his command. He had for ſome time thought himſelf neglected; and was unwilling that his reputation ſhould ſuffer on account of meaſures in which he had no concern. In October the king of Great-Britain returned to Hanover, and the army ſeparated. The troops in Britiſh pay marched bac to the Netherlands, and the reſt took the rout to their reſpective countries. The ſtates-general ſtill wavered between their own immediate intereſt and their deſire to ſupport the houſe of Auſtria. At length, however, they ſupplied her with a ſubſidy, and ordered 20,000 men to march to her aſſiſtance, notwithſtanding the intrigues of the marquis de Fenelon, the French ambaſſador at the Hague, and the declaration of the king of Pruſſia, who diſapproved of this meaſure, and refuſed them a paſſage through his territories to the Rhine.

Sweden was filled with diſcontents, and divided into factions. The generals Bodenbrock and Lewenhaupt were beheaded, having been ſacrificed as ſcape-goats for the miniſtry. Some unſucceſsful efforts by ſea and land were made againſt the Ruſſians. At laſt the peace of Abo was concluded; and the duke of Holſtein-Utin, uncle to the ſucceſſor of the Ruſſian throne, was choſen as next heir to the crown of Sweden. A party had been formed in favour of the prince of Denmark; and the order of the peaſants actually elected him as ſucceſſor. The debates in the college of nobles roſe to a very dangerous degree of animoſity, and were appeaſed by an harangue in Swediſh verſe, which one of the ſenators pronounced. The peaſants yielded the point, and the ſucceſſion was ſettled on the duke of Holſtein. Denmark, inſtigated by French councils, began to make preparations of war againſt Sweden: but, a body of Ruſſian auxiliaries arriving in that kingdom, under the command of general Keith, and the czarina declaring ſhe would aſſiſt the Swedes with her whole force, the king of Denmark thought proper to diſarm. It had been an old maxim of French policy to embroil the courts of the North, that they might be too much employed at home to intermeddle in the affairs of Germany, while France was at war with the houſe of Auſtria. The good underſtanding between the czarina and the queen of Hungary was at this period deſtroyed, in conſequence of a conſpiracy which had been formed by ſome perſons of diſtinction at the court of Peterſburgh, for removing the empreſs Elizabeth, and recalling the princeſs Anne to the adminiſtration. This deſign being diſcovered, the principal conſpirators were corporally puniſhed, and ſent in exile to Siberia. The marquis de Botta, the Auſtrian miniſter, who had reſided at the court of the czarina, was ſuſpected of having been concerned in the plot; though the grounds of this ſuſpicion did not appear until after he was recalled and ſent as ambaſſador to the court of Berlin. The empreſs demanded ſatisfaction of the queen of Hungary, who appointed commiſſioners to enquire into his conduct, and he was acquitted: but the czarina was not at all ſatisfied of his innocence. In February a defenſive treaty of alliance was concluded between this princeſs and the king of Great-Britain.

By this time France was deprived of her ableſt miniſter, in the death of the cardinal de Fleury, who had for many years managed the affairs of that kingdom. He is ſaid to have poſſeſſed a lively genius, and an inſinuating addreſs; to have been regular in his deportment, and moderate in his diſpoſition; but at the ſame time he has been branded as deceitful, diſſembling, and vindictive. His ſcheme of politics was altogether pacific; he endeavoured to accompliſh his purpoſes by raiſing and fomenting intrigues at foreign courts; he did not ſeem to pay much regard to the military glory of France: and he too much neglected the naval power of that kingdom. Since Broglio was driven out of Germany, the French court affected uncommon moderation. They pretended that their troops had only acted as auxiliaries while they remained in the empire: being, however, apprehenſive of an irruption into their own dominions, they declared, that thoſe troops were no longer to be conſidered in that light, but as ſubjects acting in the ſervice of France. The campaign in Italy proved unfavourable to the Spaniards, In the beginning of February count Gages, who commanded the Spaniſh army in the Bologneſs, amounting to 24,000 men, paſſed the Panaro and advanced to Campo-Santo, where he encountered the imperial and Piedmonteſe forces, commanded by the counts Traun and Aſpremont. The ſtrength of the two armies was nearly equal. The action was obſtinate and bloody, though indeciſive. The Spaniards loſt about 4000 men, killed, wounded, or taken. The damage ſuſtained by the confederates was not quite ſo great. Some cannon and colours were taken on both ſides; and each claimed the victory. Count Gages repaſſed the Panaro; retreated ſuddenly from Bologna; and marched to Rimini in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, where he fortified his camp in an advantageous ſituation, after having ſuffered ſeverely by deſertion. Count Traun remained inactive in the Modeneſe till September, when he reſigned his command to prince Lobkowitz. This general entered the Bologneſe in October, and then advanced towards count Gages, who, with his forces, now reduced to 7000, retreated to Fano; but afterwards took poſſeſſion of Peſaro, and fortified all the paſſes of the river Foglia. The ſeaſon was far advanced before the Spaniſh troops, commanded by don Philip, in Savoy, entered upon action. In all probability, the courts of Verſailles and Madrid carried on ſome private negociation with the king of Sardinia. This expedient failing, don Philip decamped from Chamberri in the latter end of Auguſt, and defiling through Dauphiné towards Briançon, was joined by the prince of Conti, at the head of 20,000 French auxiliaries. Thus re-enforced he attacked the Piedmonteſe lines at Chateau-Dauphiné; but was repulſed in ſeveral attempts, and obliged to retreat with conſiderable loſs. The French eſtabliſhed their winter-quarters in Dauphiné and Provence; and the Spaniards maintained their footing in Savoy.

The Britiſh fleet commanded by admiral Matthews overawed all the ſtates that bordered on the Miditerranean. This officer, about the end of June, underſtanding that fourteen xebecks, laden with artillery and ammunition for the Spaniſh army, had arrived at Genoa, ſailed thither from the road of Hieres, and demanded of the re-publie that they would either oblige theſe veſſels with the ſtores to quit their harbour, or ſequeſter their lading until a general peace ſhould be eſtabliſhed. After ſome diſpute, it was agreed that the cannon and ſtores ſhould be depoſited in the caſtle of Boniface, ſituated on a roc at the ſouth-end of Corſica; and that the xebecks ſhould have leave to retire without moleſtation. The Corſicans had ſome years before revolted, and ſhaken off the dominion of the Genoeſe, under which their iſland had remained for many centuries. They found themſelves oppreſſed, and reſolved to aſſert their freedom. They conferred the ſovereign authority on a German adventurer, who was ſolemnly proclaimed, by the name of king Theodore. He had ſupplied them with ſome arms and ammunition, which he had brought from Tunis; and amuſed them with promiſes of being aſſiſted by foreign powers in retrieving their independency: but as theſe promiſes were not performed, they treated him ſo roughly, that he had thought proper to quit the iſland, and they ſubmitted again to their old maſters. The troubles of Corſica were now revived. Theodore reviſited his kingdom, and was recognized by the principal chiefs of the iſland. He publiſhed a manifeſto: he granted a general pardon to all his ſubjects who ſhould return to their obedience: he pretended to be countenanced and ſupported by the king of Great-Britain and the queen of Hungary. He was certainly thought a proper inſtrument to perplex and harras the Genoeſe, and ſupplied at this juncture with a ſum of money to purchaſe arms for the Corſicans: but a change ſoon happened in the Britiſh miniſtry, and then he was ſuffered to relapſe into his original obſcurity. Admiral Matthews, though he did not undertake any expedition of importance againſt the maritime towns of Spain, continued to aſſert the Britiſh empire at ſea through the whole extent of the Mediterranean. The Spaniſh army under don Philip was no ſooner in motion, than the Engliſh admiral ordered ſome troops and cannon to be diſembarked for the ſecurity of Villa-Franca. Some ſtores having been landed at Civita-Vecchia, for the uſe of the Spaniſh forces under count Gages, Matthews interpreted this tranſaction into a violation of the neutrality which the pope had profeſſed; and ſent thither a ſquadron to bombard the place. The city of Rome was filled with conſternation; and the pope had recourſe to the good offices of his Sardinian majeſty, in conſequence of which the Engliſh ſquadron was ordered to withdraw. The captains of ſingle cruſing ſhips, by their activity and vigilance, wholly interrupted the commerce of Spain; cannonaded and burned ſome towns on the ſea-ſide; and kept the whole coaſt in continual alarm.[1]

In the Weſt-Indies ſome unſucceſsful efforts were made by an Engliſh ſquadron, commanded by commodore Knowles. He attacked La Gueira on the coaſt of Carraccas, in the month of February; but met with ſuch a warm reception, that he was obliged to deſiſt, and make the best of his way for the Dutch iſland Curaçoa, where he repaired the damage he had ſuſtained. His ſhips being refitted, he made another attempt upon Porto-Cavallo in April, which like the former miſcarried. Twelve hundred marines being landed in the neighbourhood of the place, were ſeized with ſuch a panic, that it was found neceſſary to re-embark them without delay. Then the commodore abandoned the enterprize, and ſailed bac to his ſtation at the Leeward-iſlands, without having added much to his reputation, either as to conduct or reſolution. On the continent of America the operations of the war were very inconſiderable. General Oglethorpe having received intelligence, that the Spaniards prepared for another invaſion from St. Auguſtine, aſſembled a body of Indians, as a re-enforcement to part of his own regiment, with the Highlanders and rangers, and in the ſpring began his march, in order to anticipate the enemy. He encamped for ſome time in the neighbourhood of St. Auguſtine, by way of defiance: but they did not think proper to hazard an engagement; and as he was in no condition to undertake a ſiege, he returned to Georgia. In October the princeſs Louiſa, youngeſt daughter of his Britannic majeſty, was married by proxy, at Hanover, to the prince-royal of Denmark, who met her at Altena, and conducted her to Copenhagen.

The diſcontents of England were artfully inflamed by antiminiſterial writers, who not only exaggerated the burthens of the people, and drew frightful pictures of the diſtreſs and miſery which, they ſaid, impended over the nation, but alſo employed the arts of calumny and miſrepreſentation, to excite a jealouſy and national quarrel between the Engliſh and Hanoverians. They affirmed, that in the laſt campaign the Britiſh general had been neglected and deſpiſed; while the councils of foreign officers, greatly inferior to him in capacity, quality, and reputation, had been followed, to the prejudice of the common cauſe: that the Britiſh troops ſuſtained daily inſults from their own mercenaries, who were indulged with particular marks of royal favour: that the ſovereign himſelf appeared at Dettingen in a Hanoverian ſcarf; and that his electoral troops were of very little ſervice in that engagement. Though the moſt material of theſe aſſertions were certainly falſe, they made a ſtrong impreſſion on the minds of the people, already irritated by the enormous expence of a continental war maintained for the intereſt of Germany. When the parliament met in the beginning of December, a motion was made in the houſe of peers, by the earl of Sandwich, for an addreſs, beſeeching his majeſty to diſcontinue the Hanoverian troops in Britiſh pay, in order to remove the popular diſcontent, and ſtop the murmurs of the Engliſh troops abroad. He was ſupported by the duke of Bedford, the earl of Cheſterfield, and all the leaders in the oppoſition, who did not fail to enumerate, and inſiſt upon all the circumſtances we have mentioned. They moreover obſerved, that better troops might be hired at a ſmaller expence: that it would be a vain and endleſs taſk to exhauſt the national treaſure, in enriching a hungary and barren electorate: that the popular diſſatisfaction againſt theſe mercenaries was ſo general, and raiſed to ſuch violence, as nothing but their diſmiſſion could appeaſe: that if ſuch hirelings ſhould be thus continued from year to year, they might at laſt become a burthen entailed upon the nation, and be made ſubſervient, under ſome ambitious prince, to purpoſes deſtructive of Britiſh liberty. Theſe were the ſuggeſtions of ſpleen and animoſity: for, granting the neceſſity of a land war, the Hanoverians were the moſt natural allies and auxiliaries which Great-Britain could engage and employ. How inſolent ſoever ſome few individual generals of that electorate might have been in their private deportment, certain it is, their troops behaved with great ſobriety, diſcipline, and decorum; and in the day of battle did their duty with as much courage and alacrity as any body of men ever diſplayed on the like occaſion. The motion was rejected by the majority; but, when the term for keeping them in the Britiſh pay was nearly expired, and the eſtimates for their being continued the enſuing year were laid before the houſe, the earl of Sandwich renewed his motion. The lord-chancellor, as ſpeaker of the houſe, interpoſing, declared, that by their rules a queſtion once rejected could not be revived during the ſame ſeſſion. A debate enſued, and the ſecond motion was over-ruled. The Hanoverian troops were voted in the houſe of commons: nevertheleſs, the ſame nobleman moved in the upper-houſe, that the continuing 16,000 Hanoverians in Britiſh pay was prejudicial to his majeſty's true intereſt, uſeleſs to the common cauſe, and dangerous to the welfare and tranquillity of the nation. He was ſeconded by the duke of Marlborough, who had reſigned his commiſſion in diſguſt; and the propoſal gave birth to another warm diſpute: but victory declared, as uſual, for the miniſtry.

[1] In May a dreadful plague broke out at Meſſina in Sicily. It was imported in cotton and other commodities brought from the Morea; and ſwept off ſuch a multitude of people, that the city was almoſt depopulated: all the galley-ſlaves, who were employed in burying the dead, periſhed by the contagion; and this was the fate of many prieſts and monks who adminiſtred to thoſe who were infected. The dead bodies lay in heaps in the ſtreets, corrupting the air, and adding freſh fuel to the rage of the peſtilence. Numbers died miſerably, for want of proper attendance and neceſſaries; and all was horror and deſolation. At the beginning of winter it ceaſed, after having deſtroyed near 50,000 inhabitants of Meſſina, and of the garriſons in the citadel and caſtle. It was prevented from ſpreading in Sicily, by a ſtrong barricado drawn from Melazzo to Taormina: but it was conveyed to Reggio in Calabria, by the avarice of a broker of that place, who bought ſome goods at Meſſina. The king of Naples immediately ordered lines to be formed, together with a chain of troops which cut off all communication between that place and the reſt of the continent.

In the houſe of commons they ſuſtained divers attacs. A motion was made for laying a duty of 8s. in the pound on all places and penſions. Mr Grenville moved for an addreſs, to beſeech his majeſty, that he would not engage the Britiſh nation any further in the war on the continent, without the concurrence of the States-general on certain ſtipulated proportions of force and expence, as in the late war. Theſe propoſals begat vigorous debates, in which the country-party were always foiled by dint of ſuperior number. Such was the credit and influence of the miniſtry in parliament, that although the national debt was increaſed by above ſix millions ſince the commencement of the war, the commons indulged them with an enormous ſum for the expence of the enſuing year. The grants ſpecified in the votes amounted to ſix millions and an half: to this ſum were added three millions and an half paid to the ſinking-fund in perpetual taxes; ſo that this year's expence roſe to ten millions. The funds eſtabliſhed for the annual charge were the land and malt-taxes; one million paid by the Eaſt-India company for the renewal of their charter, 1200,000l. by annuities, one million from the ſinking-fund, 36,000l. from the coinage, and 600,000l. by a lottery: an expedient which for ſome time had been annually repeated: and which, in a great meaſure contributed to debauch the morals of the public, by introducing a ſpirit of gaming, deſtructive of all induſtry and virtue.

The diſſenſions of the Britiſh parliament were ſuddenly ſuſpended by an event that ſeemed to unite both parties in the proſecution of the ſame meaſures. This was the intelligence of an intended invaſion. By the parliamentary diſputes, the loud clamours, and the general diſſatisfaction of the people in Great-Britain, the French miniſtry were perſuaded that the nation was ripe for a revolt. This belief was corroborated by the aſſertions of their emiſſaries in different parts of Great-Britain and Ireland. Theſe were papiſts and jacobites of ſtrong prejudices and warm imaginations, he ſaw things through the medium of paſſion and party, and ſpoke rather from extravagant zeal than from ſober conviction. They gave the court of Verſailles to underſtand, that if the chevalier de St. George, or his eldeſt ſon, Charles-Edward, ſhould appear at the head of a French army in Great-Britain, a revolution would inſtantly follow in his favour. This intimation was agreeable to cardinal de Tencoin, who, ſince the death of Fleury, had borne a ſhare in the adminiſtration of France. He was of a violent enterpriſing temper. He had been recommended to the purple by the chevalier de St. George, and was ſeemingly attached to the Stuart family. His ambition was flattered with the proſpect of giving a king to Great-Britain; of performing ſuch eminent ſervice to his benefactor; and of reſtoring to the throne of their anceſtors a family connected by the ties of blood with all the greateſt princes of Europe. The miniſtry of France foreſaw, that even if this aim ſhould miſcarry, a deſcent upon Great-Britain would make a conſiderable diverſion from the continent in favour of France, and embroil and embarraſs his Britannic majeſty, who was the chief ſupport of the houſe of Auſtria, and all its allies. Actuated by theſe motives, he concerted meaſures with the chevalier de St. George at Rome, who being too much advanced in years to engage perſonally in ſuch an expedition, agreed to delegate his pretenſions and authority to his ſon Charles, a youth of promiſing talents, ſage, ſecret, brave, and enterpriſing, amiable in his perſon, grave, and even reſerved in his deportment. He approved himſelf in the ſequel compoſed and moderate in ſucceſs, wonderfully firm in adverſity; and though tenderly nurſed in all the delights of an effeminate country, and gentle climate, patient almoſt beyond belief of cold, hunger, and fatigue. Such was the adventurer now deſtined to fill the hope which the French miniſtry had conceived from the projected invaſion of Great-Britain.

Count Saxe was appointed by the French king commander of the troops deſigned for this expedition, which amounted to 15,000 men. They began their march to Picardy, and a great number of veſſels was aſſembled for their embarkation at Dunkirk, Calais, and Bologne. It was determined that they ſhould be landed in Kent, under convoy of a ſtrong ſquadron equipped at Breſt, and commanded by monſieur de Roquefuille, an officer of experience and capacity. The chevalier de St. George is ſaid to have required the perſonal ſervice of the duke of Ormond, who excuſed himſelf on account of his advanced age: be that as it will, prince Charles departed from Rome about the end of December, in the diſguiſe of a Spaniſh courier, attended by one ſervant only, and furniſhed with paſſports by cardinal Aquavia. He travelled through Tuſcany to Genoa, from whence he proceeded to Savona, where he embarked for Antibes, and proſecuting his journey to Paris, was indulged with a private audience of the French king: then he ſet out incognito for the coaſt of Picardy. The Britiſh miniſtry being appriſed of his arrival in France, at once comprehended the deſtination of the armaments prepared at Breſt and Boulogne. Mr Thompſon, the Engliſh reſident at Paris, received orders to make a remonſtrance to the French miniſtry, on the violation of thoſe treaties by which the pretender to the crown of Great-Britain was excluded from the territories of France. But he was given to underſtand, that his moſt chriſtian majeſty would not explain himſelf on that ſubject, until the king of England ſhould have given ſatisfaction on the repeated complaints which had been made to him, touching the infractions of thoſe very treaties which had been ſo often violated by his orders. In the month of January, M. de Roquefeuille ſailed from Breſt, directing his courſe up the Engliſh channel, with twenty ſhips of war. They were immediately diſcovered by an Engliſh cruiſer, which ran into Plymouth; and the intelligence was conveyed by land to the board of Admiralty. Sir John Norris was forthwith ordered to take the command of the ſquadron at Spithead, with which he ſailed round to the Downs, where he was joined by ſome ſhips of the line from Chatham, and then he found himſelf at the head of a ſquadron conſiderably ſtronger than that of the enemy.

Several regiments marched to the ſouthern coaſt of England: all governors and commanders were ordered to repair immediately to their reſpective poſts: the forts at the mouths of the Thames and Medway were put in a poſture of defence; and directions were iſſued to aſſemble the Kentiſh militia, to defend the coaſt in caſe of an invaſion. On the 15th day of February, the king ſent a meſſage to both houſes of parliament, intimating the arrival of the pretender's ſon in France, the preparations at Dunkirk, and the appearance of a French fleet in the Engliſh channel. They joined in an addreſs, declaring their indignation and abhorrence of the deſign formed in favour of a popiſh pretender; and aſſuring his majeſty, that they would, with the warmeſt zeal and unanimity, take ſuch meaſures as would enable him to fruſtrate and defeat ſo deſperate and inſolent an attempt. Addreſſes of the ſame kind were preſented by the city of London, both univerſities, the principal towns of Great-Britain, the clergy, the diſſenting miniſters, the quakers, and almoſtall the corporations and communities of the kingdom. A requiſition was made of the 6000 auxiliaries which the ſtates-general were by treaty obliged to furniſh on ſuch occaſions; and theſe were granted with great alacrity and expedition. The earl of Stair, forgetting his wrongs, took this opportunity of offering his ſervice to government, and was re-inveſted with the chief command of the forces in Great-Britain. His example was followed by ſeveral noblemen of the firſt rank. The duke of Montague was permitted to raiſe a regiment of horſe; and orders were ſent to bring over 6000 of the Britiſh troops from Flanders, in caſe the invaſion ſhould actually take place. His majeſty was, in another addreſs from parliament, exhorted to augment his forces by ſea and land: the habeas corpus act was ſuſpended for ſix months, and ſeveral perſons of diſtinction were apprehended on ſuſpicion of treaſonable practices: a proclamation was iſſued for putting the laws in execution againſt papiſts and non-jurors, who were commanded to retire 10 miles from London, and every precaution was taken which ſeemed neceſſary for the preſervation of the public tranquillity.

Mean while the French court proceeded with their preparations at Boulogn and Dunkirk, under the eye of the young pretender; and 7000 men were actually embarked. M. de Roquefeuille ſailed up the channel as far as Dungeneſs, a promontory on the coaſt of Kent, after having detached M. de Barreil, with five ſhips to haſten the embarkation at Dunkirk. While the French admiral anchored off Dungeneſs, he perceived, on the 24th day of February, the Britiſh fleet, under ſir John Norris, doubling the South-Foreland from the Downs; and though the wind was againſt him, taking the opportunity of the tide to come up and engage the French ſquadron. Roquefeuille, who little expected ſuch a viſit, could not be altogether compoſed, conſidering the great ſuperiority of his enemies: but the tide failing, the Engliſh admiral was obliged to anchor two leagues ſhort of the enemy. In this interval, M. Roquefeuille called a council of war, in which it was determined to avoid an engagement, weigh anchor at ſun-ſet, and make the beſt of their way to the place from whence they had ſet ſail. This reſolution was favoured by a very hard gale of wind, which began to blow from the north-eaſt, and carried them down the channel with incredible expedition. But the ſame ſtorm which, in all probability, ſaved their fleet from deſtruction, utterly diſconcerted the deſign of invading England. A great number of their tranſports was driven aſhore and deſtroyed, and the reſt were ſo damaged that they could not be ſpeedily repaired. The Engliſh were now maſters at ſea, and their coaſt was ſo well guarded, that the enterprize could not be proſecuted with any probability of ſucceſs. The French generals nominated to ſerve in this expedition returned to Paris, and the young pretender reſolved to wait a more favourable opportunity. In the mean time he remained in Paris, or that neighbourhood, incognito, and almoſt totally neglected by the court of France. Finding himſelf in this diſagreeable ſituation, and being viſited by John Murray of Broughton, who magnified the power of his friends in Great-Britain, he reſolved to make ſome bold effort, even without the aſſiſtance of Louis, in whoſe ſincerity he had no faith, and forthwith took proper meaſures to obtain exact information touching the number, inclinations, and influence of his father's adherents in England and Scotland. The French king no longer preſerved any meaſures with the court of London: the Britiſh reſident at Paris was given to underſtand, that a declaration of war muſt enſue; and this was actually publiſhed on the 20th day of March. The king of Great-Britain was taxed with having diſſuaded the court of Vienna from entertaining any thoughts of an accommodation; with having infringed the convention of Hanover; with having exerciſed piracy upon the ſubjects of France, and with having blocked up the harbour of Toulon. On the 31ſt day of March, a like denunciation of war againſt France was publiſhed at London, amidſt the acclamations of the people.

[1744] The commons of England, in order to evince their loyalty, brought in a bill denouncing the penalties of high-treaſon againſt thoſe who ſhould maintain correſpondence with the ſons of the pretender. In the upper-houſe, lord Hardwicke, the chancellor, moved that a clauſe ſhould be inſerted, extending the crime of treaſon to the poſterity of the offenders, during the lives of the pretender's ſons. The motion was ſupported by the whole ſtrength of the miniſtry, produced a warm debate, in which the duke of Bedford, the earl of Cheſterfield, the lord Talbot and Hervey, argued againſt it in the moſt pathetic manner, as an illiberal expedient, contrary to the dictates of humanity, the law of nature, the rules of common juſtice and the precepts of religion; an expedient that would involve the innocent with the guilty, and tend to the augmentation of miniſterial power, for which purpoſe it was undoubtedly calculated. Notwithſtanding theſe ſuggeſtions, the clauſe was carried in the affirmative, and the bill ſent bac to the commons, where the amendment was vigorouſly oppoſed by lord Strange, lord Guernſey, mr. W. Pitt, and other members, by whom the original bill had been countenanced: [m] the majority, however declared for the amendment, and the bill obtained the royal aſſent. The ſeſſion of parliament was cloſed in May, when the king told them that the French had made vaſt preparations on the ſide of the Netherlands; and that the ſtates-general had agreed to furniſh the ſuccours ſtipulated by treaties.

By this time an action had happened in the Mediterranean between the Britiſh fleet commanded by admiral Matthews, and the combined ſquadrons of France and Spain, which had been for ſome time blocked up in the harbour of Toulon. On the 9th of February they were perceived ſtanding out of the road, to the number of 34 ſail: the Engliſh admiral immediately weighed from Hieres-bay; and on the 11th, part of the fleets engaged. Matthews attacked the Spaniſh admiral, don Novarro, whoſe ſhip, the Real, was a firſt rate, mounted with above 100 guns. Rear-admiral Rowley ſingled out M. de Court, who commanded the French ſquadron: and very few captains followed the example of their commanders: but vice-admiral Leſtock, with his whole diviſion, remained at a great diſtance aſtern; and ſeveral captains who were immediately under the eye of Matthews behaved in ſuch a manner as reflected diſgrace upon their country. The whole tranſaction was conducted without order or deliberation. The French and Spaniards would have willingly avoided an engagement, as the Britiſh ſquadron was ſuperior to them in ſtrength and number. M. de Court, therefore, made the beſt of his way towards the Straits mouth, probably with intentention to join the Breſt ſquadron: but he had orders to protect the Spaniſh fleet; and as they ſailed heavily, he was obliged to wait for them, at the hazard of maintaining a battle with the Engliſh. Thus circumſtanced he made ſail and lay to by turns; ſo that the Britiſh admiral could not engage them in proper order; and as they outſailed his ſhips, he began to fear they would eſcape him altogether, ſhould he wait for vice-admiral Leſtock, who was ſo far aſtern. Under this apprehenſion he made the ſignal for engaging, while that for the line of battle was ſtill diſplayed; and this inconſiſtency naturally introduced confuſion. The fight was maintained with great vivacity by the few who engaged. The Real being quite diſabled, and lying like a wreck upon the water, mr. Matthews ſent a fire-ſhip to deſtroy her; but the expedient did not take effect. The ſhip ordered to cover this machine did not obey the ſignal; ſo that the captain of the fire-ſhip was expoſed to the whole fire of the enemy. Nevertheleſs, he continued to advance until he found the veſſel ſinking; and being within a few yards of the Real, he ſet fire to the fuſees. The ſhip was immediately in flames, in the midſt of which he and his lieutenant, with twelve men periſhed. This was likewiſe the fate of a Spaniſh launch, which had been manned with fifty ſailors, to prevent the fire-ſhip from running on board the Real. One ſhip of the line belonging to the Spaniſh ſquadron ſtruc to captain Hawke, who ſent a lieutenant to take poſſeſſion of her: ſhe was afterwards retaken by the French ſquadron; but was found ſo diſabled, that they left her deſerted, and ſhe was next day burned by order of admiral Matthews. At night the action ceaſed; and the admiral found his own ſhip ſo much damaged, that he moved his flag into another. Captain Cornwall fell in the engagement, after having exhibited a remarkable proof of courage and intrepidity: but the loſs of men was very inconſiderable. Next day the enemy appeared to leeward, and the admiral gave chaſe till night, when he brought to, that he might be joined by the ſhips a-ſtern. They were perceived again on the 13th at a conſiderable diſtance, and purſued till the evening. In the morning of the 14th, twenty ſail of them were ſeen diſtinctly, and Leſtock with his diviſion had gained ground of them conſiderably by noon; but admiral Matthews diſplayed the ſignal for leaving off chaſe, and bore away for Port-Mahon, to repair the damage he had ſuſtained.

Mean while the combined ſquadrons continued their coaſt towards the coaſt of Spain. M. de Court, with his diviſion, anchored in the road of Alicant; and don Navarro ſailed into the harbour of Carthagena. Admiral Matthews, on his arrival at Minorca, accuſed Leſtock of having miſbehaved on the day of action; ſuſpended him from his office, and ſent him priſoner to England, where in his turn, he accuſed his accuſer. Long before the engagement, theſe two officers had expreſſed the moſt violent reſentment againſt each other. Matthews was brave, open, and undiſguiſed; but proud, imperious, and precipitate. Leſtock had ſignalized his courage on many occaſions, and perfectly underſtood the whole diſcipline of the navy; but he was cool, cunning, and vindictive. He had been treated ſuperciliouſly by Matthews, and in revenge took advantage of his errors and precipitation. To gratify this paſſion, he betrayed the intereſt and glory of his country; for it is not to be doubted, but that he might have come up in time to engage; and, in that caſe, the fleets of France and Spain would in all likelihood have been deſtroyed: but he entrenched himſelf within the punctilios of diſcipline, and ſaw with pleaſure his antagoniſt expoſe himſelf to the hazard of death, ruin, and diſgrace. Matthews himſelf, in the ſequel, ſacrificed his duty to his reſentment, in reſtraining Leſtock from purſuing and attacking the combined ſquadrons on the third day after the engagement, when they appeared diſabled, and in manifeſt diſorder, and would have fallen an eaſy prey, had they been vigorouſly attacked. One can hardly, without indignation, reflect upon theſe inſtances, in which a community has ſo ſeverely ſuffered from the perſonal animoſity of individuals. The miſcarriage of Toulon became the ſubject of a parliamentary enquiry in England. The commons, in an addreſs to the throne, deſired that a court-martial might be appointed to try the delinquents. By this time Leſtock had accuſed Matthews, and all the captains of his diviſion who miſbehaved on the day of battle. The court-martial was conſtituted, and proceeded to tryal. Several commanders of ſhips were caſhiered: vice-admiral Leſtock was honourably acquitted; and admiral Matthews rendered incapable of ſerving for the future in his majeſty's navy. All the world knew that Leſtock kept aloof, and that Matthews ruſhed into the hotteſt part of the engagement. Yet the former triumphed on his tryal, and the latter narrowly eſcaped the ſentence of death for cowardice and miſconduct. Such deciſions are not to be accounted for, except from prejudice and faction.

[m] The oppoſition had ſuſtained a heavy blow in the death of the duke of Argyle, a nobleman of ſhining qualifications for the ſenate and the field, whoſe character would have been ſtill more illuſtrious, had not ſome parts of his conduct ſubjected him to the ſuſpicion of ſelfiſhneſs and inconſtancy. He was ſucceeded in that title by his brother, Archibald earl of Ilay.

The war in Germany, which had been almoſt extinguiſhed in the laſt campaigne, began to revive, and raged with redoubled violence. The emperor had ſollicited the mediation of his Britannic majeſty for compromiſing the differences between him and the court of Vienna. Prince William of Heſſe-Caſſel had conferred with the king of England on this ſubject; and a negotiation was begun at Hanau. The emperor offered to diſmiſs the French auxiliaries, provided the Auſtrians would evacuate his hereditary dominions. Nay, prince William and lord Carteret, as plenipotentiaries, actually agreed to preliminaries, by which his imperial majeſty engaged to renounce the alliance of France, and throw himſelf into the arms of the maritime powers: to reſign all pretenſions to the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Auſtria; and to revive the vote of Bohemia in the electoral college, on condition of his being re-eſtabliſhed in the poſſeſſion of his dominions; recognized as emperor by the queen of Hungary, and accommodated with a monthly ſubſidy for his maintenance, as his own territories were exhauſted and impoveriſhed by the war. By a ſeparate article, the king of Great-Britain promiſed to furniſh him with 300,000 crowns, and to interpoſe his good offices with the queen of Hungary, that his electoral dominions ſhould be favourably treated. Theſe preliminaries, though ſettled, were not ſigned. The court of Vienna was unwilling to part with their conqueſts in Bavaria and the Upper Palatinate. The queen truſted too much to the valour of her troops, and the wealth of her allies, to liſten to ſuch terms of accommodation; and whatever arguments were uſed with the king of Great-Britain, certain it is the negotiation was dropped, on pretence that the articles were diſapproved by the miniſtry of England. The emperor, environed with diſtreſs, renewed his application to the king of Great-Britain; and even declared that he would refer his cauſe to the determination of the maritime powers: but all his advances were diſcountenanced; and the treaty of Worms diſpelled all hope of accommodation. In this manner did the Britiſh miniſtry reject the faireſt opportunity that could poſſibly occur of terminating the war in Germany with honour and advantage, and of freeing their country from that inſufferable burthen of expence under which ſhe groaned.

The inflexibility of the houſe of Auſtria, and its chief ally, proved ſerviceable to the emperor. The forlorn ſituation of this unfortunate prince excited the compaſſion of divers princes: they reſented the inſolence with which the head of the empire had been treated by the court of Vienna; and they were alarmed at the increaſing power of a family noted for pride, tyranny, and ambition. Theſe conſiderations gave riſe to the treaty of Franckfort, concluded in May between the emperor, the king of Pruſſia, the king of Sweden as landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, and the elector-palatine. They engaged to preſerve the conſtitutions of the empire, according to the treaty of Weſtphalia, and to ſupport the emperor in his rank and dignity. They agreed to employ their good offices with the queen of Hungary, that ſhe might be induced to acknowledge the emperor, to reſtore his hereditary dominions, and give up the archives of the empire that were in her poſſeſſion. They guaranteed to each other their reſpective territories: the diſputes about the ſucceſſion of the late emperor, they referred to the deciſion of the ſtates of the empire: they promiſed to aſſiſt one another in caſe of being attacked; and they invited the king of Poland, the elector of Cologn, and the biſhop of Leige, to accede to this treaty. Such was the confederacy that broke all the meaſures which had been concerted between the king of Great-Britain and her Hungarian majeſty for the operations of the campaigne. In the mean time, the French king declared war againſt this princeſs, on pretence that ſhe was obſtinately deaf to all terms of accommodation, and determined to carry the war into the territories of France. In her counter-declaration ſhe taxed Louis with having infringed the moſt ſolemn engagement with reſpect to the pragmatic ſanction; with having ſpirited up different pretenders to lay claim to the ſucceſſion of the late emperor; with having endeavoured to inſtigate the common enemy of Chriſtendom againſt her; and with having acted the incendiary in the north of Europe, that the czarina might be prevented from aſſiſting the houſe of Auſtria, while his numerous armies overſpread the empire, and deſolated her hereditary countries. Theſe recriminations were literally true. The houſes of Bourbon and Auſtria have for many centuries, been the common diſturbers and plagues of Europe.

The king of France, though in himſelf pacific and unenterpriſing, was ſtimulated by his miniſtry to taſte the glory of conqueſt in the Netherlands, where he had aſſembled an army of 120,000 men, provided with a very formidable train of artillery. The chief command was veſted in the mareſcal count de Saxe, who poſſeſſed great military talents, and proved to be one of the moſt fortunate generals of the age in which he lived. The allied forces, conſiſting of Engliſh Hanoverians, Dutch, and Auſtrians, to the number of 70,000 effective men, were in the month of May aſſembled in the neighbourhood of Bruſſels, from whence they marched towards Oudenard, and poſted themſelves behind the Schelde, being unable to retard their progreſs of the enemy. The French monarch, attended by his favourite ladies, with all the pomp of eaſtern luxury, arrived at Liſle on the twelfth day of the ſame month; and in the adjacent plain reviewed his army. The ſtates-general, alarmed at his preparations, had, in a conference with his ambaſſador at the Hague, expreſſed their apprehenſions, and entreated his moſt chriſtian majeſty would deſiſt from his deſign of attacking their barrier. Their remonſtrances having proved ineffectual, they now ſent a miniſter to wait upon that monarch, to enforce their former repreſentations, and repeat their entreaties: but no regard was paid to his requeſt. The French king told him, he was determined to proſecute the war with vigour, as his moderation hitherto had ſerved to no other purpoſe but that of rendering his enemies more intractable. Accordingly, his troops inveſted Menin, which was in ſeven days ſurrendered upon capitulation. Ypres, Fort-Knocke, and Furnes underwent the ſame fate; and on the 29th day of June the king of France entered Dunkirk in triumph.

He had taken ſuch precautions for the defence of Alſace, which was guarded by conſiderable armies under the command of Coigny and Seckendorf, that he thought he had nothing to fear from the Auſtrians in that quarter: beſides, he had received ſecret aſſurances that the king of Pruſſia would declare for the emperor; ſo that he reſolved to purſue his conqueſts in the Netherlands. But all his meaſures were defeated by the activity of prince Charles of Lorraine, and his officers, who found means to paſs the Rhine, and oblige the French and Bavarian generals to retire to Lampertheim, that they might cover Straſburgh. The Auſtrians made themſelves maſters of Haguenau and Saverne:

they ſecured the paſſes of Lorraine; and laid all the country of Lower-Alſace under contribution. The king of France was no ſooner appriſed of the prince's having paſſed the Rhine, and penetrated into this province, than he ſent off a detachment of 30,000 men from his army in Flanders to re-enforce that under the mareſchal de Coigny; and he himſelf began his journey from the Rhine, that he might in perſon chec the progreſs of the enemy: but this deſign was anticipated by a ſevere diſtemper that overtook him at Metz in Lorraine. The phyſicians deſpaired of his life. The queen, with her children, and all the princes of the blood, haſtened from Verſailles to pay the laſt duties to their dying ſovereign, who, as a true penitent, diſmiſſed his concubines, and began to prepare himſelf for death: yet the ſtrength of his conſtitution triumphed over the fever, and his recovery was celebrated all over his dominions with uncommon marks of joy and affection.

In the mean time the ſchemes of the Auſtrian general were fruſtrated by the king of Pruſſia, who, in the month of Auguſt, entered the electorate of Saxony, at the head of a numerous army. There he declared, in a public manifeſto, that his aims were only to re-eſtabliſh the peace of the empire, and to ſupport the dignity of its head. He aſſured the inhabitants that they might depend upon his protection, in caſe they ſhould remain quiet; but threatened them with fire and ſword ſhould they preſume to oppoſe his arms. In a reſcript addreſſed to his miniſters at foreign courts, he accuſed the queen of Hungary of obſtinacy, in refuſing to acknowledge the emperor, and reſtore his hereditary dominions: he ſaid he had engaged in the league of Franckfort, to hinder the head of the empire from being oppreſſed: that he had no intention to violate the peace of Breſlau, or enter as a principal into this war: he affirmed, that his deſign was to act as auxiliary to the emperor, and eſtabliſh the quiet of Germany. He penetrated into Bohemia and undertook the ſiege of Prague, the governor of which ſurrendered himſelf and his garriſon priſoners of war on the 16th day of September. He afterwards reduced Tabor, Bodweis, and Teyn, and in a word ſubdued the greateſt part of the kingdom: and Auſtrian forces in that country being in no condition to ſtop his progreſs. Nevertheleſs he was ſoon obliged to relinquiſh his conqueſts. Prince Charles of Lorraine was recalled from Alſace, and repaſſed the Rhine in the face of the French army, commanded by the mareſchals de Coigni, Noailles, and Belleiſle. Then he marched to the Danube, laid the Upper-Palitinate under contribution, and entering Bohemia, joined the troops under Bathiani at Merotitz. The king of Poland elector of Saxony, at this juncture, declared in favour of her Hungarian majeſty. A convention for the mutual guarantee of their dominions had been ſigned between thoſe two powers in December; and now prince Charles of Lorraine was re-enforced by 20,000 Saxon troops, under the conduct of the duke of Saxe-Weſſenfels. The combined army was ſuperior to that of Pruſſian majeſty whom they reſolved to engage. But he retired before them, and having evacuated all the places he had garriſoned in Bohemia, retreated with precipitation into Sileſia. There his troops were put into winter-quarters; and he himſelf returned to Berlin, extremely mortified at the iſſue of the campaign.

During theſe tranſactions, count Seckendorf marched into Bavaria, at the head of a ſtrong army, drove the Auſtrians out of that electorate, and the emperor regained poſſeſſion of Munich, his capital, on the 22d day of October. In Auguſt the French army paſſed the Rhine at Fort-Louis, and inveſted the ſtrong and important city of Fribourg, defended by general Demnitz, at the head of 9000 veterans. The king of France arrived in the camp on the 11th day of October; and the ſiege was carried on with uncommon vigour. The Auſtrian governor made incredible efforts in the defence of the place, which he maintained until it was reduced to a heap of ruins, and one-half of the garriſon deſtroyed. At length, however, they were obliged to ſurrender themſelves, priſoners of war, after the trenches had been open 45 days, during which they had killed above 15,000 of the beſiegers. With this conqueſt, the French king cloſed the campaign, and his army was cantoned along the Rhine, under the inſpection of the count de Maillebois. By the detachments drawn from the French army in Flanders, count Saxe had found himſelf conſiderably weaker than the confederates: he threw up ſtrong entrenchments behind the Lys, where he remained on the defenſive, until he was re-enforced by the count de Clemont, who commanded a ſeparate body on the ſide of Newport. The allies, to the number of 70,000, paſſed the Schelde, and advanced towards Helchin: but the enemy being ſo advantageouſly poſted, that they could not attac him with any proſpect of advantage, they filed on in ſight of Tourney; and on the 8th day of Auguſt encamped in the plains of Liſle, in hope of drawing count Saxe from the ſituation in which he was ſo ſtrongly fortified. Here they foraged for ſeveral days, and laid the open country under contribution: however, they made no attempt on the place itſelf, which in all probability would have fallen into their hands had they inveſted it at their firſt approach: for then there was no other garriſon but two or three battalions of militia; but count Saxe ſoon threw in a conſiderable re-enforcement. The allies were unprovided with a train of battering cannon; and their commanders would not deviate from the uſual form of war. Beſides, they were divided in their opinions, and deſpiſed one another. General Wade, who commanded the Engliſh and Hanoverians, was a vain, weak man, without confidence, weight, or authority; and the Auſtrian general, the duke d'Aremberg, who was a proud, rapacious glutton, devoid of talents and ſentiment. After having remained for ſome time in ſight of Liſle, and made a general forage without moleſtation, they retired to their former camp on the Schelde, from whence they ſoon marched into winter-quarters. Count Saxe at length quitted his lines; and by way of retaliation, ſent out detachments to ravage the Low-countries, to the very gates of Ghent and Bruges. The conduct of the allied generals was ſeverely cenſured in England, and ridiculed in France, not only in private converſation but alſo on their public theatres, where it became the ſubject of farces and pantomimes.

The campaign in Italy produced divers viciſſitudes of fortune. The king of Naples having aſſembled an army, joined count Gages, and publiſhed a manifeſto in vindication of his conduct, which was a direct violation of the neutrality he had promiſed to obſerve. He maintained, that his moderation had been undervalued by the courts of London and Vienna; that his frontiers were threatened with the calamities of war; and that the queen of Hungary made no ſecret of her intention to invade his dominions. This charge was not without foundation. The emiſſaries of the houſe of Auſtria endeavoured to excite a rebellion in Naples, which prince Lobkowitz had orders to favour by an invaſion. This general was encamped at Monte Rotundo, in the neighbourhood of Rome, when, in the month of June, the confederates advanced to Velletri. While the two armies remained in ſight of each other, prince Lobkowitz detached a ſtrong body of forces, under count Soro, and general Gorani, who made an irruption into the province of Abruzzo, and took the city of Aquilla, where they diſtributed a manifeſto, in which the queen of Hungary exhorted the Neapolitans to ſhake off the Spaniſh yoke, and ſubmit again to the houſe of Auſtria. This ſtep, however, produced little or no effect; and the Auſtrian detachment retired at the approach of the duke of Vieuville, with a ſuperior number of forces. In Auguſt, count Brown, at the head of an Auſtrian detachment, ſurpriſed Velletri in the night; and the king of the two Sicilies, with the duke of Modena, were in the utmoſt danger of being taken. They eſcaped by a poſtern with great difficulty, and repaired to the quarters of count Gages, who performed the part of a great general on this occaſion. He rallied the fugitives, diſpelled the panic and confuſion which had begun to prevail in his camp, and made a diſpoſition for cutting off the retreat of the Auſtrians. Count Brown, finding himſelf in danger of being ſurrounded, thought proper to ſecure his retreat, which he effected with great art and gallantry, carrying off a prodigious booty. Three thouſand Spaniards are ſaid to have fallen in this action; and 800 men were taken, with ſome ſtandards and colours. Count Mariani, a Neapolitan general, was among the priſoners. The Auſtrians loſt about 600 men; and general Novati fell into the hands of the enemy: but the exploit produced no conſequence of importance. The heats of autumn proved ſo fatal to the Auſtrians who were not accuſtomed to the climate, that prince Lobkowitz ſaw his army moulder away, without any poſſibility of its being recruited: beſides, the country was ſo drained that he could no longer procure ſubſiſtence. Impelled by theſe conſiderations, he meditated a retreat. On the 11th day of November, he decamped from Faiola, marched under the walls of Rome, paſſed the Tyber at Ponte Molle, formerly known by the name of Pons Milvius, which he had juſt time to break down behind him, when the van-guard of the Spaniards and Neapolitans appeared. Part of his rear-guard, however, was taken, with count Soro who commanded it, at Nocera; and his army ſuffered greatly by deſertion. Nevertheleſs, he continued his retreat with equal ſkill and expedition, paſſed the mountains of Gubio, and by the way of Viterbo reached the Bologneſe. The pope was altogether paſſive. In the beginning of the campaigne he had careſſed Lobkowitz; and now he received the king of the two Sicilies with marks of the warmeſt affection. That prince having viſited the chief curioſities of Rome, returned to Naples, leaving part of his troops under the command of count Gages.

Fortune likewiſe favoured his brother don Philip in Savoy and Piedmont. He was early in the ſeaſon joined at Antibes by the French army, under the conduct of the prince of Conti. In the latter end of March, the combined forces paſſed the Var, reduced the caſtle of Aſpremont, and entered the city of Nice, without oppoſition. In April, they attacked the king of Sardinia, who, with 20,000 men, was ſtrongly entrenched among the mountains at Villa-Franca. The action was obſtinate and bloody; but their numbers and perſeverance prevailed. He was obliged to abandon his poſts, and embark on board of the Britiſh ſquadron, which tranſported him and his troops to Vado. The intention of don Philip was to penetrate through the territories of Genoa into the Milaneſe; but admiral Matthews, who hovered with a ſtrong ſquadron on that coaſt, ſent a meſſage to the republic, declaring, that ſhould the combined army be ſuffered to paſs through her dominions, the king of Great-Britain would conſider ſuch a ſtep as a breach of their neutrality. The ſenate, intimidated by this intimation, entreated the princes to deſiſt from their deſign; and they reſolved to chooſe another route. They defiled towards Piedmont, and aſſaulted the ſtrong poſt of Chateau-Dauphiné, defended by the king of Sardinia in perſon. After a deſperate attac, in which they loſt 4000 men, the place was taken: the garriſon of Demont ſurrendered at diſcretion, and the whole country of Piedmont was laid under contribution. His Sardinian majeſty was not in a condition to hazard a battle; and, therefore, poſted himſelf at Saluzzes, in order to cover his capital. The combined army advanced to the ſtrong and important town of Coni, which was inveſted in the beginning of September. Baron Leutrum the governor made an obſtinate defence, and the ſituation of the place was ſuch as rendered the ſiege difficult, tedious, and bloody. The king of Sardinia being re-enforced by 10,000 Auſtrians, under general Palavicini, advanced to its relief, and a battle enſued. The action was maintained with great vigour on both ſides, till night, when his majeſty finding it impracticable to force the enemy's entrenchment, retired in good order to his camp at Muraſſo. He afterwards found means to throw a re-enforcement and ſupply of proviſions into Coni; and the heavy rains that fell at this period, not only retarded, but even diſpirited the beſiegers. Nevertheleſs, the princes perſiſted in their deſign, notwithſtanding a dearth of proviſions, and the approach of winter, till the latter end of November, when the chevalier de Soto entered the place with 600 freſh men. This incident was no ſooner known, than the princes abandoned their enterprize; and leaving their ſic and wounded to the mercy of the Piedmonteſe, marched bac to Demont. Having diſmantled the fortifications of this place, they retreated with great precipitation to Dauphiné, and were dreadfully harraſſed by the Vaudois and light troops in the ſervice of his Sardinian majeſty, who now again ſaw himſelf in poſſeſſion of Piedmont. The French troops were quartered in Dauphiné; but don Philip ſtill maintained his footing in Savoy, the inhabitants of which he fleeced without mercy.

After the action of Toulon, nothing of conſequence was achieved by the Britiſh ſquadron in the Mediterranean; and indeed the naval power of Great-Britain was, during the ſummer, quite inactive. In the month of June, commodore Anſon returned from his voyage of three years and nine months, in which he had ſurrounded the terraqueous globe. We have formerly obſerved, that he ſailed with a ſmall ſquadron to the South-ſea, in order to annoy the Spaniſh ſettlements of Chili and Peru. Two of his large ſhips having been ſeparated from him in a ſtorm before he weathered Cape-Horn, had put in at Rio de Janiero, on the coaſt of Braſil, from whence they returned to Europe. A frigate commanded by captain Cheap, was ſhipwrecked on a deſolate iſland in the South-ſea. Mr Anſon having undergone a dreadful tempeſt, which diſperſed his fleet, arrived at the iſland of Juan Fernandez, where he was joined by the Glouceſter, a ſhip of the line, a ſloop, and a pink loaded with proviſions. Theſe were the remains of his ſquadron. He made prize of ſeveral veſſels; took and burned the little town of Payta; ſet ſail from the coaſt of Mexico, for the Phillippine iſles; and in this paſſage the Glouceſter was abandoned and ſunk: the other veſſels had been deſtroyed for want of men to navigate them, ſo that nothing now remained but the commodore's own ſhip, the Centurion, and that but very indifferently manned; for the crews had been horribly thinned by ſicneſs. Incredible were the hardſhips and miſery they ſuſtained from the ſhattered condition of the ſhips, and the ſcorbutic diſorder, when they reached the plentiful iſland of Tinian, where they were ſupplied with the neceſſary refreſhments. Thence they proſecuted their voyage to the river Canton in China, where the commodore ordered the ſhip to be ſheathed, and found means to procure a re-enforcement of ſailors. The chief object of his attention was the rich annual ſhip that ſails between Acapulco in Mexico, and Manilla, one of the Phillippine iſlands. In hopes of intercepting her, he ſet ſail from Canton, and ſteered his courſe bac to the ſtraits of Manilla, where ſhe actually fell into his hands, after a ſhort but vigorous engagement. The prize was called Neuſtra Signora de Cabodonga, mounted with forty guns, manned with 600 ſailors, and loaded with treaſure and effects to the value of 330,000l. ſterling: with this windfall, he returned to Canton; from whence he proceeded to the Cape of Good-Hope, and proſecuted his voyage to England, where he arrived in ſafety. Though this fortunate commander enriched himſelf by an occurrence that may be termed almoſt accidental, the Britiſh nation was not indemnified for the expence of the expedition; and the original deſign was entirely defeated. Had the Manilla ſhip eſcaped the vigilance of the Engliſh commodore, he might have been, at his return to England, laid aſide as a ſuperannuated captain, and died in obſcurity: but his great wealth inveſted him with conſiderable influence, and added luſtre to his talents. He ſoon became the oracle which was conſulted in all naval deliberations; and the king raiſed him to the dignity of a peerage. In July, ſir John Balchen, an admiral of approved valour and great experience, ſailed from Spithead with a ſtrong ſquadron, in queſt of an opportunity to attac the French fleet at Breſt, under the commmand of M. de Rochambault. In the bay of Biſcay he was overtaken by a violent ſtorm, that diſperſed the ſhips, and drove them up the Engliſh channel. Admiral Stewart, with the greater part of them, arrived at Plymouth; but ſir John Balchen's own ſhip, the Victory, which was counted the moſt beautiful firſt-rate in the world, foundered at ſea; and this brave commander periſhed, with all his officers, volunteers, and crew, amounting to 1100 choice ſeamen.

On the 4th day of October, after the ſiege of Friburg, the marſhal de Belleiſle, and his brother happened, in their way to Berlin, to halt at a village in the foreſt of Hartz, dependant on the electorate of Hanover. There they were appredended by the bailiff of the place, and conducted as priſoners to Oſterode; from whence they were removed to Stade on the Elbe, where they embarked for England. They reſided at Windſor till the following year, when they were allowed the benefit of the cartel which had been eſtabliſhed between Great-Britain and France at Frankfort, and releaſed accordingly, after he had been treated by the Britiſh nobility with that reſpect and hoſpitality which was due to their rank and merit.[n]

The diſſentions in the Britiſh cabinet were now ripened into another revolution in the miniſtry. Lord Carteret, who was by this time earl Granville in conſequence of his mother's death, had engroſſed the royal favour ſo much, that the duke of N——— and his brother are ſaid to have taken umbrage at his influence and greatneſs. He had incurred the reſentment of thoſe who were diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of patriots, and entirely forfeited his popularity. The two brothers were very powerful by their parliamentary intereſt: they knew their own ſtrength, and engaged in a political alliance with the leading men in the oppoſition, againſt the prime miniſter and his meaſures. This coalition was digniſied with the epithet of 'The Broad Bottom,' as if it had been eſtabliſhed on a true conſtitutional foundation, comprehending individuals of every claſs, without diſtinction of party. The appellation, however, which they aſſumed was afterwards converted into a term of deriſion. The earl of Granville perceiving the gathering ſtorm, and foreſeeing the impoſſibility of withſtanding ſuch an oppoſition in parliament, wiſely avoided the impending danger and diſgrace, by a voluntary reſignation of his employments. The earl of Harrington ſucceeded him as ſecretary of ſtate. The duke of Bedford was appointed firſt lord of the admiralty, and the earl of Cheſterfield declared lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The lords Gower and Cobham were re-eſtabliſhed in the offices they had reſigned: mr. Lyttelton was admitted as a commiſſioner of the treaſury; even ſir John Hynde Cotton accepted of a place at court; and ſir John Philips ſat at the board of trade and plantations, though he ſoon renounced this employment. This was rather a change of men than of meaſures, and turned out to the eaſe and advantage of the ſovereign; for his views were no longer thwarted by an obſtinate oppoſition in parliament.

[n] Mr Pope, the celebrated poet, died in the month of June. In October, the old duchoſs of Marlborough reſigned her breath, in the 85th year of her age; immenſely rich, and very little regretted, either by her own family, or the world in general.

The ſeſſion was opened on the 28th day of November, in the uſual manner. The commons unanimouſly granted about ſix millions and a half for the ſervice of the enſuing year, to be raiſed by the land, the malt, and the ſalt-taxes, the ſinking-fund, and an additional duty on wines. In January, the earl of Cheſterfield ſet out for the Hague, with the character of an ambaſſador extraordinary, to perſuade, if poſſible, the ſtates-general to engage heartily in the war. About the ſame time, a treaty of quadruple alliance was ſigned at Warſaw by the queen of Hungary, the king of Poland, and the maritime powers. This was a mutual guarantee of the dominions belonging to the contracting parties: but his Poliſh majeſty was paid for his concurrence, with an annual ſubſidy of 150,000l. two-thirds of which were defrayed by England, and the remainder was diſburſed by the United Provinces. °

[1745] The buſineſs of the Britiſh parliament being diſcuſſed, the ſeſſion was cloſed in the beginning of May; and immediately after the prorogation the king ſet out for Hanover. The death of the emperor Charles VII. which happened in the month of January, had entirely changed the face of affairs in the empire, and all the princes of Germany were in commotion. The grand-duke of Tuſcany, conſort to her Hungarian majeſty, was immediately declared a candidate for the imperial crown; while his pretenſions were warmly oppoſed by the French king and his allies. The court of Vienna, taking advantage of the late emperor's death, ſent an army to invade Bavaria in the month of March, under the conduct of general Bathiani, who routed the French and Palatine troops at Pfiffenhoven; took poſſeſſion of Rain; ſurrounded and diſarmed 6000 Heſſians in the neighbourhood of Ingoldſtadt: and drove the Bavarian forces out of the electorate. The young elector was obliged to abandon his capital, and retire to Augſburgh, where he found himſelf in danger of loſing all his dominions. In this emergency, he yielded to the earneſt ſollicitations of the empreſs his mother, enforced by the advice of his uncle, the elector of Cologne, and of his general, count Seckendorff, who exhorted him to be reconciled to the court of Vienna. A negotiation was immediately begun at Fueſſen, where in April the treaty was concluded. The queen conſented to recognize the imperial dignity, as having been veſted in the perſon of his father; to acknowledge his mother as empreſs dowager; to reſtore his dominions, with all the fortreſſes, artillery, ſtores, and ammunition, which ſhe had taken: on the other hand, he renounced all claim to the ſucceſſion of her father, and became guarantee of the pragmatic ſanction: he acknowledged the validity of the electoral vote of Bohemia in the perſon of the queen; and engaged to give his voice for the grand-duke, at the enſuing election of a king of the Romans. Until that ſhould be determined, both parties agreed that Ingoldſtaldt ſhould be garriſoned by neutral troops: and that Braunau and Schardingen, with all the country lying between the Inn and the Saltza, ſhould remain in the queen's poſſeſſion, though without prejudice to the civil government, or the elector's revenue. In the mean time he diſmiſſed the auxiliaries that were in his pay, and they were permitted to retire without moleſtation.

The court of Vienna had now ſecured the votes of all the electors, except thoſe of Brandenburgh and the Palatinate. Nevertheleſs, France aſſembled a powerful army in the neighbourhood of Franckfort, in order to influence the election. But the Auſtrian army, commanded by the grand-duke in perſon, marched thither from the Danube; and the prince of Conti was obliged to re-paſs the Rhine at Nordlingen. Then the grand-duke repaired to Franckfort, where, on the 2d day of September, he was by a majority of voices declared king of the Romans, and emperor of Germany. Mean while the king of Pruſſia had made great progreſs in the conqueſt of Sileſia. The campaign began in January, when the Hungarian inſurgents were obliged to retire into Moravia. In the following month the Pruſſian general Lehwald defeated a body of 12,000 Auſtrians, commanded by general Helſrich: the town of Ratibor was taken by aſſault; and the king entered Sileſia in May, at the head of 70,000 men. Prince Charles of Lorraine, being joined by the duke of Saxe-Weſſenfels and 20,000 Saxons, penetrated into Sileſia by the defiles of Landſhut: and were attacked by his Pruſſian majeſty in the plains of Striegen, near Friedberg. The battle was maintained from morning till noon, when the Saxons giving way, prince Charles was obliged to retire with the loſs of 12,000 men, and a great number of colours, ſtandards, and artillery. This victory, obtained on the 4th day of June, complete as it was, did not prove deciſive; for, though the victor transferred the ſeat of the war into Bohemia, and maintained his army by raiſing contributions in that country, the Auſtrians reſolved to hazard another engagement. Their aim was to ſurpriſe him in his camp at Sohr, which they attacked on the 30th of September, at day-break; but they met with ſuch a warm reception, that notwithſtanding their repeated efforts during the ſpace of four hours, they were repulſed with conſiderable damage, and retreated to Jeromire, leaving 5000 killed upon the ſpot, beſides 2000 that were taken, with many ſtandards, and twenty pieces of cannon. The loſs of this battle was in a great meaſure owing to the avarice of the irregulars, who having penetrated into the Pruſſian camp, began to pillage with great eagerneſs, giving the king an opportunity to rally his diſordered troops, and reſtore the battle: nevertheleſs, they retired with the plunder of his baggage, including his military cheſt, the officers of his chancery, his own ſecretary, and all the papers of his cabinet.

After this action his Pruſſian majeſty returned to Berlin, and breathed nothing but peace and moderation. In Auguſt he had ſigned a convention with the king of Great-Britain, who became guarantee of his poſſeſſions in Sileſia, as yielded by the treaty of Breſlau; and he promiſed to vote for the grand-duke of Tuſcany at the election of an emperor. This was intended as the baſis of a more general accommodation. But he now pretended to have received undoubted intelligence, that the king of Poland and the queen of Hungary had agreed to invade Brandenburgh with three different armies; and that for this purpoſe his Poliſh majeſty had demanded of the czarina the ſuccours ſtipulated by the treaty between the two crowns. Alarmed, or ſeemingly alarmed, at this information, he ſollicited the maritime powers to fulfil their engagements, and interpoſe their good offices with the court of Peterſburgh. Yet, far from waiting for the reſult of theſe remonſtrances, he made a ſudden irruption into Luſatia, took poſſeſſion of Gorlitz, and obliged prince Charles of Lorraine to retire before him into Bohemia. Then he entered Leipſick, and laid Saxony under contribution. The king of Poland, unable to reſiſt the torrent, quitted his capital, and took refuge in Prague. His troops, re-enforced by a body of Auſtrians, were defeated at Pirna on the 15th day of December: and his Pruſſian majeſty became maſter of Dreſden without further oppoſition. The king of Poland, thus deprived of his hereditary dominions, was fain to acquieſce in ſuch terms as the conqueror thought proper to impoſe; and the treaty of Dreſden was concluded, under the mediation of his Britannic majeſty. By this convention the king of Pruſſia retained all the contributions he had levied in Saxony; and was entitled to a million of German crowns, to be paid by his Poliſh majeſty at the next fair of Leipſick. He and the elector Palatine conſented to acknowledge the grand-duke as emperor of Germany; and this laſt confirmed to his Pruſſian majeſty certain privileges, de non evocando, which had been granted by the late emperor, with regard to ſome territories poſſeſſed by the king of Pruſſia, though not belonging to the electorate of Brandenburgh. Immediately after the ratification of this treaty, the Pruſſian troops evacuated Saxony; and the peace of Germany was reſtored.

Though the French king could not prevent the elevation of the grand-duke to the imperial throne, he reſolved to humble the houſe of Auſtria, by making a conqueſt of the Netherlands. A prodigious army was there aſſembled, under the auſpices of mareſchal count de Saxe; and his ° Robert earl of Orford, late prime-miniſter, died in March, after having for a very ſhort time enjoyed a penſion of 4000l. granted by the crown, in conſideration of his paſt ſervices. Though he had for ſuch a length of time directed the application to the public treaſure, his circumſtances were not affluent: he was liberal in his diſpoſition, and had ſuch a number of rapacious dependents to gratify, that little was left for his own private occaſions.

moſt chriſtian majeſty, with the Dauphin, arriving in the camp, they inveſted the ſtrong town of Tournay on the 30th day of April. The Dutch garriſon conſiſted of 8000 men, commanded by the old baron Dorth, who made a vigorous defence. The duke of Cumberland aſſumed the command of the allied army aſſembled at Soignes: he was aſſiſted with the advice of the count Konigſeg, an Auſtrian general, and the prince of Waldeck, commander of the Dutch forces. Their army was greatly inferior in number to that of the enemy; nevertheleſs, they reſolved to march to the relief of Tournay. They accordingly advanced to Leuſe; and on the 28th day of April took poſt at Maulbre, in ſight of the French army, which was encamped on an eminence, from the village of Antoine to a large wood beyond Vezon, having Fontenoy in their front. Next day was employed by the allies in driving the enemy from ſome out-poſts, and clearing the defiles through which they were obliged to advance to the attac; while the French completed their batteries, and made the moſt formidable preparations for their reception. On the 30th day of April the duke of Cumberland having made the proper diſpoſitions, began his march to the enemy at two o'clock in the morning; a briſk cannonade enſued; and about nine both armies were engaged. The Britiſh infantry drove the French beyond their lines: but the left wing failing in the attac on the village of Fontenoy, and the cavalry forbearing to advance on the flanks, they meaſured bac their ground with ſome diſorder, from the prodigious fire of the French batteries. They rallied, however, and returning to the charge with redoubled ardour, repulſed the enemy to their camp with great ſlaughter: but, being wholly unſupported by the other wing, and expoſed both in front and flank to a dreadful fire, which did great execution, the duke was obliged to make the neceſſary diſpoſitions for a retreat about three o'clock in the afternoon; and this was effected in tolerable order. The battle was fought with great obſtinacy, and the carnage on both ſides was very conſiderable. The allies loſt about 12,000 men, including a good number of officers; among theſe were lieutenant-general Campbell, and major-general Ponſonby. The victory coſt the French almoſt an equal number of lives; and no honour was loſt by the vanquiſhed. Had the allies given battle on the preceding day, before the enemy had taken their meaſures, and received all their re-enforcements, they might have ſucceeded in their endeavours to relieve Tournay. Although the attac was generally judged raſh and precipitate, the Britiſh and Hanoverian troops fought with ſuch intrepidity and perſeverance, that if they had been properly ſuſtained by the Dutch forces, and their flanks covered by the cavalry, the French, in all likelihood, would have been obliged to abandon their enterprize. The duke of Cumberland left his ſic and wounded to the humanity of the victors; and retiring to Aeth, encamped in an advantageous ſituation at Leſſines. The garriſon of Tournay, though now deprived of all hope of ſuccour, maintained the place to the 21ſt day of June, when the governor obtained an honourable capitulation. After the conqueſt of this frontier, which was diſmantled, the duke of Cumberland, apprehending the enemy had a deſign upon Ghent, ſent a detachment of 4000 men to re-enforce the garriſon of that city: but they fell into an ambuſcade at Pas-dumêle; and were killed or taken, except a few dragoons that eſcaped to Oſtend; on that very night, which was the 12th of June, Ghent was ſurprized by a detachment of the French army. Then they inveſted Oſtend, which, though defended by an Engliſh garriſon, and open to the ſea, was after a ſhort ſiege, ſurrendered by capitulation on the 14th day of Auguſt. Dendermonde, Oudenarde, Newport, and Aeth underwent the ſame fate; while the allied army lay entrenched beyond the canal of Antwerp. The French king having ſubdued the greateſt part of the Auſtrian-Netherlands, returned to Paris, which he entered in triumph.

The campaign in Italy was unpropitious to the queen of Hungary and the king of Sardinia. Count Gages paſſed the Apennines, and entered the ſtate of Lucca: from thence he proceeded by the eaſtern coaſt of Genoa to Leſtride-Levante. The junction of the two armies was thus accompliſhed, and re-enforced with 10,000 Genoeſe: mean while prince Lobkowitz decamped from Modena and took poſt at Parma: but he was ſoon ſucceeded by count Schuylemberg, and ſent to command the Auſtrians in Bohemia. The Spaniards entered the Milaneſe without further oppoſition. Count Gages, with 30,000 men, took poſſeſſion of Serravalle; and advancing towards Placentia, obliged the Auſtrians to retire under the cannon of Tortona: but when don Philip, at the head of 40,000 troops, made himſelf maſter of Acqui, the king of Sardinia and the Auſtrian general, unable to ſtem the torrent, retreated behind the Tanaro. The ſtrong citadel of Tortona was taken by the Spaniards, who likewiſe reduced Parma and Placentia; and forcing the paſſage of the Tanaro, compelled his Sardinian majeſty to take ſhelter on the other ſide of the Po. Then Pavia was won by ſcalade; and the city of Milan ſubmitted to the infant, though the Auſtrian garriſon ſtill maintained the citadel: all Piedmont, on both ſides of the Po, as far as Turin, was reduced, and even that capital threatened with a ſiege: ſo that by the month of October the territories belonging to the houſe of Auſtria, in Italy, were wholly ſubdued; and the king of Sardinia ſtripped of all his dominions: yet he continued firm and true to his engagements, and deaf to all propoſals of a ſeparate accommodation.

The naval tranſactions of Great-Britain were in the courſe of this year remarkably ſpirited. In the Mediterranean, admiral Rowley had ſucceeded Matthews in the command; Savona, Genoa, Final, St. Remo, with Baſtia, the capital of Corſica, were bombarded: ſeveral Spaniſh ſhips were taken: but he could not prevent the ſafe arrival of their rich Havannah ſquadron at Corrunna. Commodore Barnet, in the Eaſt-Indies, made prize of ſeveral French ſhips richly laden; and commodore Townſhend, in the latitude of Martinico, took about thirty merchant ſhips belonging to the enemy, under convoy of four ſhips of war, two of which were deſtroyed. The Engliſh privateers likewiſe met with uncommon ſucceſs. But the moſt important achievement was the conqueſt of Louiſbourg on the iſle of Cape-Breton, in North-America; a place of great conſequence, which the French had fortified at a prodigious expence. The ſcheme of reducing this fortreſs was planned in Boſton, recommended by their general aſſembly, and approved by his majeſty, who ſent inſtructions to commodore Warren, ſtationed off the Leeward-Iſlands, to ſail for the northern parts of America, and co-operate with the forces of New-England in this expedition. A body of 6000 men was formed under the conduct of mr. Pepperel, a trader of Piſcataquay, whoſe influence was extenſive in that country; though he was a man of little or no education, and utterly unacquainted with military operations. In April mr. Warren arrived at Canſo with ten ſhips of war; and the troops of New-England being embarked in tranſports, ſailed immediately for the iſle of Cape-Breton, where they landed without oppoſition. The enemy abandoned their grand battery, which was detached from the town: and the immediate ſeiſure of it contributed in a good meaſure to the ſucceſs of the enterprize. While the American troops, re-enforced by 800 marines, carried on by their approaches by land, the ſquadron blocked up the place by ſea in ſuch a manner, that no ſuccours could be introduced. A French ſhip of the line, with ſome ſmaller veſſels deſtined for the relief of the garriſon, were intercepted and taken by the Britiſh cruiſers; and, indeed, the reduction of Louiſbourg was chiefly owing to the vigilance and activity of mr. Warren, one of the braveſt and beſt officers in the ſervice of England. The operations of the ſiege were wholly conducted by the engineers and officers who commanded the Britiſh marines; and the Americans being ignorant of war, were contented to act under their directions. The town being conſiderably damaged by the bombs and bullets of the beſiegers, and the garriſon deſpairing of relief, the governor capitulated on the 17th day of June, when the city of Louiſbourg, and the iſle of Cape-Breton, were ſurrendered to his Britannic majeſty. The garriſon and inhabitants engaged that they would not bear arms for twelve months againſt Great-Britain or her allies; and being embarked in 14 cartel ſhips, were tranſported to Rochefort. In a few days after the ſurrender of Louiſbourg, two French Eaſt-India ſhips, and another from Peru, laden with treaſure, ſailed into the harbour, on the ſuppoſition that it ſtill belonged to France, and were taken by the Engliſh ſquadron.

The news of this conqueſt being tranſmitted to England, mr. Pepperel was preferred to the dignity of a baronet of Great-Britain, and congratulatory addreſſes were preſented to the king on the ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms. The poſſeſſion of Cape-Breton was doubtleſs, a valuable acquiſition to Great-Britain. It not only diſtreſſed the French in their fiſhery and navigation, but removed all fears of encroachment and rivalſhip from the Engliſh fiſheries on the banks of Newfoundland. It freed New-England from the terrors of a dangerous neighbour; over-awed the Indians of that country; and ſecured the poſſeſſion of Acadia to the crown of Great-Britain. The plan of this conqueſt was originally laid by mr. Auchemuty, judge-advocate of the court of admiralty in New-England. He demonſtrated that the reduction of Cape-Breton would put the Engliſh in ſole poſſeſſion of the fiſhery of North-America, which would annually return to Great-Britain two millions ſterling for the manufactures yearly ſhipped to the plantations; employ many thouſand families that were otherwiſe unſerviceable to the public; increaſe the ſhipping and mariners; extend navigation; cut off all communication between France and Canada by the river St. Laurence; ſo that Quebeck would fall of courſe into the hands of the Engliſh, who might expel the French entirely from America, open a correſpondence with the remote Indians, and render themſelves maſters of the profitable fur-trade, which was now engroſſed by the enemy. The natives of New-England acquired great glory from the ſucceſs of this enterpriſe. Britain, which had in ſome inſtances behaved like a ſtep-mother to her own colonies, was now convinced of their importance; and treated thoſe as brethern whom ſhe had too long conſidered as aliens and rivals. Circumſtanced as the nation is, the legiſlature cannot too tenderly cheriſh the intereſts of the Britiſh plantations in America. They are inhabited by a brave, hardy, induſtrious people, animated with an active ſpirit of commerce; inſpired with a noble zeal for liberty and independence. The trade of Great-Britain, clogged with heavy taxes and impoſitions, has for ſome time languiſhed in many valuable branches. The French have underſold our cloths, and ſpoiled our markets in the Levant. Spain is no longer ſupplied as uſual with the commodities of England; the exports to Germany muſt be conſiderably diminiſhed by the miſunderſtanding between Great-Britain and the houſe of Auſtria; conſequently her greateſt reſource muſt be in her communication with her own colonies, which conſume her manufactures, and make immenſe returns in ſugar, rum, tobacco, fiſh, timber, naval ſtores, iron, furs, drugs, rice, and indigo. The ſouthern plantations likewiſe produce ſilk; and with due encouragement might furniſh every thing that could be expected from the moſt fertile ſoil and the happieſt climate. The continent of North-America, if properly cultivated, will prove an inexhauſtible fund of wealth and ſtrength to Great-Britain; and perhaps it may become the laſt aſylum of Britiſh liberty, when the nation is enſlaved by domeſtic deſpotiſm or foreign dominion; when her ſubſtance is waſted, her ſpirit broke, and the laws and conſtitution of England are no more: then thoſe colonies, ſent off by our fathers, may receive and entertain their ſons as hapleſs exiles, and ruined refugees.

While the continent of Europe and the iſles of America were thus expoſed to the ravages of war, and ſubjected to ſuch viciſſitudes of fortune, Great-Britain underwent a dangerous convulſion in her own bowels. The ſon of the chevalier de St. George, fired with ambition, and animated with the hope of aſcending the throne of his anceſtors, reſolved to make an effort for that purpoſe, which, though it might not be crowned with ſucceſs, ſhould at leaſt aſtoniſh all Chriſtendom. The jacobites in England and Scotland had promiſed, that if he would land in Britain at the head of a regular army, they would ſupply him with proviſions, carriages, and horſes, and a great number of them declared they would take up arms, and join his ſtandard: but they diſapproved of his coming over without forces, as a dangerous enterprize, that would in all probability end in the ruin of himſelf and all his adherents. This advice, including an exact detail of his father's intereſt, with the diſpoſitions of his particular friends in every town and county, was tranſmitted to London in January, in order to be forwarded to prince Charles: but the perſon with whom it was entruſted could find no ſafe method of conveyance; ſo that he ſent it bac to Scotland, from whence it was diſpatched to France; but before it reached Paris, Charles had left that kingdom. Had the paper come to his hands in due time, perhaps he would not have embarked in the undertaking, though he was ſtimulated to the attempt by many concurring motives. Certain it is, he was cajoled by the ſanguine miſrepreſentations of a few adventurers, who hoped to profit by the expedition. They aſſured him that the whole nation was diſaffected to the reigning family: that the people could no longer bear the immenſe load of taxes, which was daily increaſing; and that the moſt conſiderable perſons of the kingdom would gladly ſeize the firſt opportunity of crowding to his ſtandard. On the other hand, he knew the Britiſh government had taken ſome effectual ſteps to alienate the friends of his houſe from the principles they had hitherto profeſſed. Some of them had accepted poſts and penſions: others were preferred in the army; and the parliament were ſo attached to the reigning family, that he had nothing to hope from their deliberations. He expected no material ſuccour from the court of France: he foreſaw that delay would diminiſh the number of his adherents in Great-Britain; and, therefore, reſolved to ſeize the preſent occaſion, which in many reſpects was propitious to his deſign. Without doubt, had he been properly ſupported, he could not have found a more favourable opportunity of exciting an inteſtine commotion in Great-Britain: for Scotland was quite unfurniſhed with troops; king George was in Germany; the duke of Cumberland, at the head of the Britiſh army, was employed in Flanders and great part of the Highlanders were keen for inſurrection. The natural principles were on this occaſion ſtimulated by the ſuggeſtions of revenge. At the beginning of the war, a regiment of thoſe people had been formed, and tranſported with the reſt of the Britiſh troops to Flanders. Before they were embarked, a number of them deſerted with their arms, on pretence that they had been decoyed into the ſervice, by promiſes and aſſurances that they ſhould never be ſent abroad; and this was really the caſe. They were overtaken by a body of horſe, perſuaded to ſubmit, brought bac to London pinioned like maleſactors, and tried for deſertion. Three were ſhot to death, in terrorem; and the reſt were ſent in exile to the plantations. Thoſe who ſuffered were perſons of ſome conſequence in their own country; and their fate was deeply reſented by the clans to which they belonged. It was conſidered as a national outrage; and the Highlanders who are naturally vindictive, waited impatiently for an opportunity of vengeance.

The young pretender being furniſhed with a ſum of money, and a ſupply of arms, on his private credit, without the knowledge of the French court, wrote letters to his friends in Scotland, explaining his deſign and ſituation, intimating the place where he intended to land, communicating a private ſignal, and aſſuring them he ſhould be with them by the middle of June. Theſe precautions being taken, he embarked on board of a ſmall frigate at Port St. Nazaire, accompanied by the marquis of Tullibardine, ſir Thomas Sheridan, ſir John Macdonald, with a few other Iriſh and Scotiſh adventurers; and ſetting ſail on the 14th of July, was joined off Belleiſle by the Elizabeth a French ſhip of war, mounted with ſixty-ſix guns, as his convoy.[p] Their deſign was to ſail round Ireland, and land in the weſtern part of Scotland: but falling in with the Lion, an Engliſh ſhip of the line, a very obſtinate and bloody action enſued. The Elizabeth was ſo diſabled that ſhe could not proſecute the voyage, and with difficulty reached the harbour of Breſt: but the Lion was ſhattered to ſuch a degree, that ſhe floated like a wrec upon the water. The diſaſter of the Elizabeth was a great misfortune to the adventurer, as by her being diſabled he loſt a great quantity of arms, and about 100 able officers, who were embarked on board of her for the benefit of his expedition. Had this ſhip arrived in Scotland, ſhe could eaſily have reduced Fort-William, ſituated in the midſt of the clans attached to the Stuart family. Such a conqueſt, by giving luſtre to the prince's arms, would have allured many to his ſtandard, who were indifferent in point of principle; and encouraged a great number of Highlanders to join him, who were reſtricted by the apprehenſion, that their wives and families would be ſubject to inſults from the Engliſh garriſon of this fortreſs. Prince Charles in a frigate continued his courſe to the weſtern iſles of Scotland. After a voyage of 18 days he landed on a little iſland between Barra and South-Inſt, two of the Hebrides: then he reembarked, and in a few days arrived at Boradale in Arnſacy, on the confines of Lochnannach, where he was in a little time joined by a conſiderable number of hardy mountaineers, under their reſpective chiefs or leaders. On the 19th day of Auguſt, the marquis of Tullibardine erected the pretender's ſtandard at Glenſinna. Some of thoſe, however, on whom Charles principally depended, now ſtood aloof, either fluctuating in their principles, aſtoniſhed at the boldneſs of the undertaking, or ſtartled at the remonſtrances of their friends, who did not fail to repreſent, in aggravated colours, all the danger of embarking in ſuch a deſperate enterpriſe. Had the government acted with proper vigour when they received intelligence of his arrival, the adventurer muſt have been cruſhed in embrio, before any conſiderable number of his adherents could have been brought together: but the lords of the regency ſeemed to ſlight the information, and even to ſuſpect the integrity of thoſe by whom it was conveyed. They were ſoon convinced of their miſtake. Prince Charles having aſſembled about 1200 men, encamped in the neighbourhood of Fort-William; and immediately hoſtilities were commenced. A handful of Kepoch's clan, commanded by major Donald Mac Donald, even before they joined the pretender, attacked two companies of new-raiſed ſoldiers, who, with their officer, were diſarmed after an obſtinate diſpute; another captain of the king's forces, falling into their hands, was courteouſly diſmiſſed with one of the pretender's manifeſtos, and a paſſport for his perſonal ſafety.

The adminiſtration was now effectually alarmed. The lords of the regency iſſued a proclamation, offering a reward of 30,000l. who ſhould apprehend the prince-adventurer. The ſame price was ſet upon the head of the elector of Hanover, in a proclamation publiſhed by the pretender. A courier was diſpatched to Holland, to haſten the return of his majeſty, who arrived in England about the latter end of Auguſt. A requiſition was made of the 6000 Dutch auxiliaries; and ſeveral Britiſh regiments were recalled from the Netherlands. A loyal addreſs was preſented to the king by the city of London; and the merchants of the metropolis reſolved to raiſe two regiments at their own expence. Orders were iſſued to keep the trained-bands in readineſs; to array the militia of Weſtminſter: and inſtructions to the ſame effect were ſent to all the lords-lieutenants of the counties throughout the kingdom. The principal noblemen of the nation made a tender of their ſervices to their ſovereign; and ſome of them received commiſſions to levy regiments towards the ſuppreſſion of the rebellion. Bodies of volunteers were incorporated in London, and many other places; aſſociations were formed, large contributions raiſed in different towns, counties, and communities; and a great number of eminent merchants in London agreed to ſupport the public credit, by receiving, as uſual, bank-notes in payment, for the purpoſe of traffic. The proteſtant clergy of all denominations exerted themſelves with extraordinary ardour, in preaching againſt the religion of Rome and the pretender; and the friends of the government were encouraged, animated and confirmed in their principles, by ſeveral ſpiritual productions publiſhed for the occaſion.

In a word, the bulk of the nation ſeemed unanimouſly bent upon oppoſing the enterpiſe of the pretender, who, nevertheleſs, had already made ſurpriſing progreſs. His arrival in Scotland was no ſooner confirmed, than ſir John Cope, who commanded the troops in that kingdom, aſſembled what force he could bring together, and advanced againſt the rebels. Underſtanding, however, that they had taken poſſeſſion of a ſtrong paſs, he changed his route, and proceeded northwards as far as Inverneſs, leaving the capital and the ſouthern parts of North-Britain wholly expoſed to the incurſions of the enemy. The highlanders forthwith marched to Perth, where the chevalier de St. George was proclaimed king of Great-Britain, and the public money ſeized for his uſe: the ſame ſteps were taken at Dundee, and other places. Prince Charles was joined by the noblemen who aſſumed the title of the duke of Perth, the viſcount Strathallan, lord Nairn, lord George Murray, and many perſons of diſtinction, with their followers. The marquis of Tullibardine, who had accompanied him from France, took poſſeſſion of Athol, as heir of blood to the titles and eſtates which his younger brother enjoyed in conſequence of his attainder; and met with ſome ſucceſs in arming the tenants for the ſupport of that cauſe which he avowed.

The rebel army being conſiderably augmented, though very ill provided with arms, croſſed the Forth in the neighbourhood of Stirling, and advanced towards Edinburgh, where they were joined by lord Elcho, ſon of the earl of Wemys, and other perſons of ſome diſtinction. On the 16th day of September, Charles ſummoned the town to ſurrender. The inhabitants were divided by faction, and diſtracted by fear: the place was not in a poſture of defence, and the magiſtrates would not expoſe the people to the uncertain iſſue of an aſſault. Several deputations were ſent from the town to the pretender, in order to negotiate terms of capitulation. In the mean time, one of the gates being opened for the admiſſion of a coach, Cameron of Lochiel, one of the moſt powerful of the highland chiefs, ruſhed into the place with a party of his men, and ſecured it without oppoſition. Next morning the whole rebel army entered, and their prince took poſſeſſion of the royal palace of Holyrood-houſe in the ſuburbs. Then he cauſed his father to be proclaimed at the market-croſs: there alſo the manifeſto was read, in which the chevalier de St. George declared his ſon Charles regent of his dominions, promiſed to diſſolve the union, and redreſs the grievances of Scotland. His being in poſſeſſion of the capital encouraged his followers, and added reputation to his arms: but the treaſure belonging to the two banks of that kingdom had been previouſly conveyed into the caſtle, a ſtrong fortreſs, with a good garriſon, under the command of general Gueſt, an old officer of experience and capacity.

During theſe tranſactions, ſir John Cope marched bac from Inverneſs to Aberdeen, where he embarked with his troops, and on the 17th day of September landed at Dunbar, about 20 miles to the eaſtward of Edinburgh. Here he was joined by two regiments of dragoons, which had retired with precipitation from the capital at the approach of the highland army. With this re-enforcement, his troops mounted to near 3000 men; and he began to march to Edinburgh, in order to give battle to the enemy. On the 20th day of the month, he encamped in the neighbourhood of Preſton-pans, having the village of Trananent in his front, and the ſea in his rear. Early next morning he was attacked by the young pretender, at the head of about 2400 highlanders half-armed, who charged them ſword in hand with ſuch impetuoſity that in leſs than ten minutes after the battle began the king's troops were broken and totally routed. The dragoons fled in the utmoſt confuſion at the firſt onſet: the general officers having made ſome unſucceſsful efforts to rally them, thought proper to conſult their own ſafety by an expeditious retreat towards Coldſtream on the Tweed. All the infantry were either killed or taken; and the colours, artillery, tents, baggage, and military cheſt, fell into the hands of the victor, who returned in triumph to Edinburgh. Never was victory more complete, or obtained at a ſmaller expence; for not above 50 of the rebels loſt their lives in the engagement. Five hundred of the king's troops were killed on the field of battle; and among theſe Colonel Gardener, a gallant officer, who diſdained to ſave his life at the expence of his honour. When abandoned by his own regiment of dragoons he alighted from his horſe, joined the infantry, and fought on foot, until he fell covered with wounds, in ſight of his own threſhold. Prince Charles bore his good fortune with moderation. He prohibited all rejoicings for the victory he had obtained: the wounded ſoldiers were treated with humanity; and the officers were ſent into Fife and Angus, where they were left at liberty on their patrole, which the greater part of them ſhamefully broke in the ſequel. From this victory the pretender reaped manifold and important advantages. His followers were armed, his party encouraged, and his enemies intimidated. He was ſupplied with a train of field-artillery, and a conſiderable ſum of money, and ſaw himſelf poſſeſſed of all Scotland, except the fortreſſes, the reduction of which he could not pretend to undertake without proper implements and engineers. After the battle he was joined by a ſmall detachment from the highlands; and ſome chiefs, who had hitherto been on the reſerve, began to exert their influence in his favour. But he was not yet in a condition to take advantage of that conſternation, which his late ſucceſs had diffuſed through the kingdom of England.

Charles continued to reſide in the palace of Holyrood-houſe:[q] and took meaſures for cutting off the communication between the caſtle and the city. General Gueſt declared that he would demoliſh the city, unleſs the blockade would be raiſed, ſo as that proviſion might be carried into the caſtle. After having waited the return of an expreſs which he had found means to diſpatch to court, he began to put his threats in execution, by firing upon the town. Some houſes were beaten down, and ſeveral perſons killed even at the market-croſs. The citizens, alarmed at this diſaſter, ſent a deputation to the prince, entreating him to raiſe the blocade; and he complied with their requeſt. He levied a regiment in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood. He impoſed taxes; ſeiſed the merchandiſe that was depoſited in the king's warehouſes at Leith, and other places; and compelled the city of Glaſgow to accommodate him with a large ſum, to be repaid when the peace of the kingdom ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed. The number of his followers daily increaſed: and he received conſiderable ſupplies of money, artillery, and ammunition, by ſingle ſhips that arrived from France, where his intereſt ſeemed to riſe in proportion to the ſucceſs of his arms. The greater and richer part of Scotland was averſe to his family and pretenſions: but the people were unarmed and undiſciplined, conſequently paſſive under his dominion. By this time, however, the prince-pretender was joined by the earl of Kilmarnock, the lords Elcho, Balmerino, Ogilvie, Pitſligo; and the eldeſt ſon of lord Lovat had begun to aſſemble his father's clan, in order to re-enforce the victor, whoſe army lay encamped at Duddingſton, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh. Kilmarnock and Balmerino were men of broken and deſperate fortune: Elcho and Oglivie were ſons to the earls of Weyms and Airly; ſo that their influence was far from being extenſive. Pitſligo was a nobleman of a very amiable character, as well as of great perſonal intereſt; and great dependence was placed upon the power and attachment of lord Lovat, who had entered into private engagements with the chevalier de St. George, though he ſtill wore the maſk of loyalty to the government, and diſavowed the conduct of his ſon when he declared for the pretender. This old nobleman is the ſame Simon Fraſer whom we have had occaſion to mention as a partiſan and emiſſary of the court of St. Germains, in the year 1703. He had renounced his connexions with that family; and, in the rebellion immediately after the acceſſion of king George I. approved himſelf a warm friend to the proteſtant ſucceſſion. Since that period he had been induced, by diſguſt and ambition, to change his principles again, and was in ſecret an enthuſiaſt in jacobitiſm. He had greatly augmented his eſtate, and obtained a conſiderable intereſt in the Highlands, where, however, he was rather dreaded than beloved. He was bold, enterprizing, vain, arbitrary, rapacious, cruel, and deceitful: but his character was chiefly marked by a ſpecies of low cunning and diſſimulation, which, however, overſhot his purpoſe, and contributed to his own ruin. While Charles reſided at Edinburgh, the marquis de Guilles arrived at Montroſe, as envoy from the French king, with ſeveral officers, ſome cannon, and a conſiderable quantity of ſmall arms for the uſe of that adventurer.[r]

While the young pretender endeavoured to improve the advantages he had gained, the miniſtry of Great-Britain took every poſſible meaſure to retard his progreſs. Several powerful chiefs in the Highlands were attached to the government, and exerted themſelves in its defence. The duke of Argyle began to arm his vaſſals; but, not before he had obtained the ſanction of the legiſlature. Twelve hundred men were raiſed by the earl of Sutherland: the lord Rae brought a conſiderable number to the field: the Grants and Monroes appeared under their reſpective leaders for the ſervice of his majeſty: ſir Alexander Macdonald declared for king George, and the Laird of Macleod ſent 2000 hardy Highlanders from Skie, to ſtrengthen the ſame intereſt. Theſe gentlemen, though ſuppoſed to be otherwiſe affected, were governed and directed by the advice of Duncan Forbes, preſident of the college of juſtice at Edinburgh; a man of extenſive knowledge, agreeable manners, and unblemiſhed integrity. He procured commiſſions for raiſing 20 independent companies, and ſome of theſe he beſtowed upon individuals who were either attached by principle, or engaged by promiſe, to the pretender. He acted with indefatigable zeal for the intereſt of the reigning family; and greatly injured an opulent fortune in their ſervice. He confirmed ſeveral chiefs who began to waver in their principles: ſome he actually converted by the energy of his arguments, and brought over to the aſſiſtance of the government, which they had determined to oppoſe: others he perſuaded to remain quiet, without taking any ſhare in the preſent troubles. Certain it is, this gentleman, by his induſtry and addreſs, prevented the inſurrection of 10,000 Highlanders, who would otherwiſe have joined the pretender; and, therefore, he may be ſaid to have been one great cauſe of that adventurer's miſcarriage. The earl of Loudon repaired to Inverneſs, where he completed his regiment of Highlanders; directed the conduct of the clans who had taken arms in behalf of his majeſty; and, by his vigilance, over-awed the diſaffected chieftains of that country, who had not yet openly engaged in the rebellion. Immediately after the defeat of Cope, 6000 Dutch troops[s] arrived in England, and three battallions of guards, with ſeven regiments of infantry, were recalled from Flanders, for the defence of the kingdom. They forthwith began their march to the North, under the command of general Wade, who received orders to aſſemble an army, which proceeded to Newcaſtle. The parliament meeting on the 16th day of October, his majeſty gave them to underſtand, that an unnatural rebellion had broke out in Scotland, towards the ſuppreſſion of which he craved their advice and aſſiſtance. He found both houſes cordial in their addreſſes, and zealous in their attachment to his perſon and government. The commons forthwith ſuſpended the Habeas Corpus act; and ſeveral perſons were apprehended on ſuſpicion of treaſonable practices. Immediately after the ſeſſion was opened the duke of Cumberland arrived from the Netherlands, and was followed by another detachment of dragoons and infantry. The trained bands of London were reviewed by his majeſty: the country regiments were completed: the volunteers, in different parts of the kingdom, employed themſelves induſtriouſly in the exerciſe of arms; and the whole Engliſh nation ſeemed to riſe up as one man againſt this formidable invader. The government being apprehenſive of a deſcent from France, appointed admiral Vernon to command a ſquadron in the Downs, to obſerve the motions of the enemy by ſea, eſpecially in the harbours of Dunkirk and Boulogn; and his cruiſers took ſeveral ſhips laden with ſoldiers, officers, and ammunition, deſtined for the ſervice of the pretender in Scotland.

This enterpriſing youth, having collected about five thouſand men, reſolved to make an irrruption into England, which he accordingly entered by the weſt border on the 6th day of November. Carliſle was inveſted, and in leſs than three days ſurrendered: the keys were delivered at Brampton, by the mayor and aldermen on their knees. Here he found a conſiderable quantity of arms: his father was proclamed king of Great-Britain and himſelf regent, by the magiſtrates in their formalities. General Wade being appriſed of his progreſs, decamped from Newcaſtle, and advanced acroſs the country as far as Hexham, though the fields were covered with ſnow, and the roads almoſt impaſſable. There he received intelligence that Carliſle was reduced, and forthwith returned to its former ſtation. In the mean time, orders were iſſued for aſſembling another army in Staffordſhire, under the command of ſir John Ligonier. Prince Charles, notwithſtanding this formidable oppoſition, determined to proceed. He had received aſſurances from France, that a conſiderable body of troops would be landed on the ſouthern coaſt of Britain, to make a diverſion in his favour; and he never doubted but that he ſhould be joined by all the Engliſh mal-contents, as ſoon as he could penetrate into the heart of the kingdom. Leaving a ſmall garriſon in the caſtle of Carliſle, he advanced to Penrith, marching on foot in the Highland garb, at the head of his forces: and continued his route through Lancaſter and Preſton to Mancheſter, where, on the the 29th day of the month, he eſtabliſhed his head quarters. There he was joined by about two-hundred Engliſhmen, who were formed into a regiment, under the command of colonel Townley. The inhabitants ſeemed to receive him with marks of affection; and his arrival was celebrated by illuminations, and other public rejoicings. His ſuppoſed intention was to proſecute his march by the way of Cheſter into Wales, where he hoped to find a great number of adherents: but all the bridges over the river Merſe being broken down, he chooſe the route to Stockport, and forded the river at the head of his diviſion, though the water roſe to his middle. He paſſed through Macclesfield and Congleton; and on the 4th of December entered the town of Derby, in which his army was quartered, and his father proclaimed with great formality. He had now advanced within 100 miles of the capital, which was filled with terrour and confuſion. Wade lingered in Yorkſhire: the duke of Cumberland had aſſumed the command of the other army aſſembled in the neighbourhood of Lichfield. He had marched from Stafford to Stone; ſo that the rebels, in turning off from Aſhborne to Derby, had gained a march between him and London. Had Charles proceeded in his career with that expedition which he had hitherto uſed, he might have made himſelf maſter of the metropolis, where he would have been certainly joined by a conſiderable number of his well-wiſhers, who waited impatiently for his approach: yet this exploit could not have been achieved without hazarding an engagement, and running the riſque of being encloſed within three armies, each greatly ſuperior to his own in number and [s] They were compoſed of the forces who had been in garriſon at Tournay and Dendermonde when thoſe places were taken, and engaged by capitulation, that they ſhould not perform any military function before the 1ſt day of January in the year 1747; ſo they could not have acted in England without the infringement of a ſolemn treaty.

artillery. Orders were given for forming a camp on Finchley-common, where the king reſolved to take the field in perſon, accompanied by the earl of Stair, field-mareſcal and commander in chief of the forces in South-Britain. Some Romiſh prieſts were apprehended: the militia of London and Middleſex were kept in readineſs to march: double watches were poſted at the city-gates, and ſignals of alarm appointed. The volunteers of the city were incorporated into a regiment: the practitioners of the law, headed by the judges, the weavers of Spitalfields, and other communities, engaged in aſſociations; and even the managers of the theatres offered to raiſe a body of their dependents for the ſervice of the government. Notwithſtanding theſe precautions and appearances of unanimity, the trading part of the city, and thoſe concerned in the money-corporations were overwhelmed with fear and and dejection. They repoſed very little confidence in the courage or diſcipline of their militia and volunteers: they had received intelligence that the French were employed in making preparations at Dunkirk and Calais for a decent upon England: they dreaded an inſurrection of the Roman catholics, and other friends of the houſe of Stuart; and they reflected that the Highlanders, of whom by this time they had conceived a moſt terrible idea, were within four days march of the capital. Alarmed by theſe conſiderations, they prognoſticated their own ruin in the approaching revolution; and their countenances exhibited the plaineſt marks of horrour and deſpair. On the other hand, the jacobites were elevated to an inſolence of hope, which they were at no pains to conceal: while many people, who had no private property to loſe, and though no change would be for the worſe, waited the iſſue of this criſis with the moſt calm indifference.

This ſtate of ſuſpence was of ſhort duration. The young pretender found himſelf miſerably diſappointed in his expectations. He had now advanced into the middle of the kingdom, and except a few that joined him at Mancheſter, not a ſoul appeared in his behalf: one would have imagined that all the jacobites of England had been annihilated. The Welch took no ſtep to excite an inſurrection in his favour: the French made no attempt towards an invaſion: his court was divided into factions: the Highland chiefs began to murmur, and their clans to be unruly: he ſaw himſelf with a handful of men hemmed in between two conſiderable armies, in the middle of winter, and in a country diſaffected to his cauſe. He knew he could not proceed to the metropolis without hazarding a battle, and that a defeat would be attended with the inevitable deſtruction of himſelf and all his adherents; and he had received information that his friends and officers had aſſembled a body of forces in the North, ſuperior in number to thoſe by whom he was attended. He called a council at Derby; and propoſed to advance towards London: the propoſal was ſupported by lord Nairn with great vehemence; but, after violent diſputes, the majority determined that they ſhould retreat to Scotland with all poſſible expedition. Accordingly, they abandoned Derby on the 6th day of December, early in the morning, and meaſured bac the route by which they had advanced. On the 9th their van-guard arrived at Mancheſter: on the 12th they entered Preſton, and continued their march northwards. The duke of Cumberland, who was encamped at Meriden, when firſt appriſed of their retreat, detached the horſe and dragoons in the purſuit of them; while general Wade began his march from Ferry-bridge into Lancaſhire, with a view of intercepting them in their route: but at Wakefield he underſtood that they had already reached Wigan: he, therefore, repaired to his old poſt at Newcaſtle, after having detached general Oglethorpe, with his horſe and dragoons, to join thoſe who had been ſent off from the duke's army. They purſued with ſuch alacrity, that they overtook the rear of the rebels, with which they ſkirmiſhed, in Lancaſhire. The militia of Cumberland and Weſtmorland were raiſed and armed by the duke's order, to harraſs them in their march. The bridges were broken down, the roads damaged, and the beacons lighted to alarm the country. Nevertheleſs, they retreated regularly with their ſmall train of artillery. They were overtaken at the village of Cliſton, in the neighbourhood of Penrith, by two regiments of dragoons. Theſe alighted, and lined the hedges, in order to harraſs part of the enemy's rear-guard, commanded by lord John Murray; who, at the head of the Macphersons, attacked the dragoons ſword in hand, and repulſed them with ſome loſs. On the 19th day of the month, the Highland army reached Carliſle, where the majority of the Engliſh in the ſervice of the pretender were left, at their own deſire. Charles, having re-enforced the garriſon of the place, croſſed the rivers Eden and Solway into Scotland, having thus accompliſhed one of the moſt ſurpriſing retreats that ever was performed. But the moſt remarkable circumſtance of this expedition, was the moderation and regularity with which thoſe ferocious people conducted themſelves in a country abounding with plunder. No violence was offered; no outrage committed; and they were effectually reſtrained from the exerciſe of rapine. Notwithſtanding the exceſſive cold, the hunger, and fatigue to which they muſt have been expoſed, they left behind no ſic, and loſt a very few ſtragglers; but retired with deliberation, and carried off their cannon in the face of their enemy. The duke of Cumberland inveſted Carliſle with his whole army on the 21ſt day of December, and on the 30th the garriſon ſurrendered on a ſort of capitulation made with the duke of Richmond. The priſoners, amounting to about 400, were impriſoned in different gaols in England, and the duke returned to London.

The pretender proceeded by way of Dumfries to Glaſgow, from which laſt city he exacted ſevere contributions, on account of its attachment to the government, for whoſe ſervice it had raiſed a regiment of 900 men, under the command of the earl of Home. Having continued ſeveral days at Glaſgow, he advanced towards Stirling, and was joined by ſome forces which had been aſſembled in his abſence by lords Lewis Gorden and John Drummond, brothers to the dukes of Gordon and Perth. This laſt nobleman had arrived from France in November, with a ſmall re-enforcement of French and Iriſh, and a commiſſion as general of theſe auxiliaries. He fixed his head-quarters at Perth, where he was re-enforced by the earl of Cromartie, and other clans, to the number of 2000, and he was accommodated with a ſmall train of artillery. They had found means to ſurpriſe a ſloop of war at Montroſe, with the guns of which they fortified that harbour. They had received a conſiderable ſum of money from Spain. They took poſſeſſion of Dundee, Dumblaine, Downcaſtle, and laid Fife under contribution. The earl of Loudon remained at Inverneſs, with about 2000 Highlanders in the ſervice of his majeſty. He conveyed proviſions to Fort-Auguſtus and Fort-William: he ſecured the perſon of lord Lovat, who ſtill temporiſed, and at length this cunning veteran accompliſhed his eſcape. The laird of Macleod, and mr. Monro of Culcairn, being detached from Inverneſs towards Aberdeenſhire, were ſurpriſed and routed by lord Lewis Gordon at Inverary; and that intereſt ſeemed to preponderate in the north of Scotland. Prince Charles being joined by lord John Drummond, inveſted the caſtle of Stirling, in which general Blakeney commanded: but, his people were ſo little uſed to enterpriſes of this kind, that they made very little progreſs in their operations.

By this time, a conſiderable body of forces was aſſembled at Edinburgh, under the conduct of general Hawley, who determined to leave Stirling-caſtle, and advanced to Linlithgow, on the 17th day of January: next day his whole army rendezvouſed at Falkirk, while the rebels were cantoned about Bannockburn. On the 17th day of the month, they began their march in two columns to attac the king's forces, and had forded the water of Carven, within three miles of Hawley's camp, before he diſcovered their intention. Such was the obſtinancy, ſelf-conceit, or contempt of the enemy, that he ſlighted the repeated intelligence he had received of their motions and deſign, firmly believing they durſt not hazard an engagement. At length, perceiving they had occupied the riſing ground to the ſouthward of Falkirk, he ordered his cavalry to advance, and drive them from the eminence; while his infantry formed, and were drawn up in order of battle. The Highlanders kept up their fire, and took aim ſo well, that the aſſailans were broke by the firſt volley: they retreated with precipitation, and fell in amongſt the infantry, which were likewiſe diſcompoſed by the wind and rain beating with great violence in their faces, wetting their powder, and diſturbing their eye-ſight. Some of the dragoons rallied and advanced again to the charge, with part of the infantry which had not been engaged: then the pretender marched up at the head of his corps de reſerve, conſiſting of the regiment of lord John Drummond, and the Iriſh piquets. Theſe re enforcing the Camerons and the Stuarts in the front line, immediately obliged the dragoons to give way a ſecond time; and they again diſordered the foot in their retreat. They ſet fire to the camp, and abandoned Falkirk with their baggage and train, which laſt had never reached the field of battle. The rebels followed their firſt blow, and great part of the royal army, after one irregular diſcharge, turned their bacs, and fled in the utmoſt conſternation.

In all probability few or none of them would have eſcaped, had not general Huſk, and brigadier Cholmondeley, rallied part of ſome regiments, and made a gallant ſtand, which favoured the retreat of the reſt to Falkirk, from whence they retired in confuſion to Edinburgh, leaving the field of battle, with part of their tents and artillery, to the rebels; but the loſs of men did not exceed 300, including ſir Robert Monro, colonel Whitney, and ſome other officers of diſtinction. It was at this period, that the officers who had been taken at the battle of Preſton-pans, and conveyed to Angus and Fife, finding themſelves unguarded, broke their parole, and returned to Edinburgh, on pretence of having been forcibly releaſed by the inhabitants of thoſe parts.[t]

General Hawley, who had boaſted that, with two regiments of dragoons, he would drive the rebel army from one end of the kingdom to the other, incurred abundance of cenſure for the diſpoſition he made, as well as for his conduct before and after the action; but he found means to vindicate himſelf to the ſatisfaction of his ſovereign. Nevertheleſs, it was judged neceſſary that the army in Scotland ſhould be commanded by a general in whom the ſoldiers might have ſome confidence; and the duke of Cumberland was choſen for this purpoſe. Over and above his being beloved by the army, it was ſuggeſted, that the appearance of a prince of the blood in Scotland might have a favourable effect upon the minds of people in that kingdom: he, therefore, began to prepare for his northern expedition. Mean while, the French miniſter at the Hague having repreſented to the ſtates-general, that the auxiliaries which they had ſent into Great-Britain were part of the garriſons of Tournay and Dendermonde, and reſtricted by the capitulation from bearing arms againſt France for a certain term, the States thought proper to recal them, rather than come to an open rupture with his moſt chriſtian majeſty. In the room of thoſe troops 6000 Heſſians were tranſported from Flanders to Leith, where they arrived in the beginning of February, under the command of their prince, Frederick of Heſſe, ſon-in-law to his Britannic majeſty. By this time the duke of Cumberland had put himſelf at the head of the troops in Edinburgh, conſiſting of 14 battalions of infantry, two regiments of dragoons, and 1200 Highlanders from Argyleſhire, under the command of colonel Cambell.

[1746] On the laſt day of January, his royal highneſs began his march to Linlithgow; and the enemy who had renewed the ſiege of Stirling-caſtle, not only abandoned that enterpriſe, but croſſed the river Forth with precipitation. Their prince found great difficulty in maintaining his forces, that part of the country being quite exhauſted. He hoped to be re-enforced in the Highlands, and to receive ſupplies of all kinds from France and Spain: he, therefore, retired by Badenoch towards Inverneſs, which the earl of Loudon abandoned at his approach. The fort was ſurrendered to him almoſt without oppoſition, and here he fixed his head-quarters. His next exploit was the ſiege of Fort-Auguſtus, which he in a little time reduced. The duke of Cumberland having ſecured the important poſts of Sterling and Perth, with the Heſſian battalions, advanced with the army to Aberdeen, where he was joined by the duke of Gordon, the earls of Aberdeen and Findlater, the laird of Grant, and other perſons of diſtinction.

While he remained in this place, refreſhing his troops, and preparing magazines, a party of the rebels ſurprized a detachment of Kingſton's horſe, and about ſeventy Argyleſhire Highlanders, at Keith, who were either killed or taken. Several advanced parties of that militia met with the ſame fate in different places. Lord George Murray inveſted the caſtle of Blair, which was defended by ſir Andrew Agnew, until a body of Heſſians marched to its relief, and obliged the rebels to retire. The prince-pretender ordered all his forces to aſſemble, in order to begin their march for Aberdeen, to attac the duke of Cumberland: but, in conſequence of a remonſtrance from the clans, who declined leaving their families at the mercy of the king's garriſon in Fort-William, he reſolved previouſly to reduce that fortreſs, the ſiege of which was undertaken by brigadier Stapleton, an engineer in the French ſervice: but the place was ſo vigorouſly maintained by captain Scot, that in the beginning of April they thought proper to relinquiſh the enterprize. The earl of Loudon had retired into Sutherland, and taken poſt at Dornoch, where his quarters were beat up by a ſtrong detachment of the rebels, commanded by the duke of Perth; a major and ſixty men were taken priſoners; and the earl was obliged to take ſhelter in the iſle of Skye. Theſe little checs were counter-balanced by ſome advantages which his majeſty's arms obtained. The ſloop of war which the rebels had ſurprized Montroſe was re-taken in Sutherland, with a conſiderable ſum of money, and a great quantity of arms on board, which ſhe had brought from France for the uſe of the pretender. In the ſame country, the earl of Cromartie fell into an ambuſcade, and was taken by the militia of Sutherland, who likewiſe defeated a body of the rebels at Goldſpie. This action happened on the very day which has been rendered famous by the victory obtained at Culloden.

In the beginning of April the duke of Cumberland began his march from Aberdeen and on the 12th paſſed the deep and rapid river Spey, without oppoſition from the rebels, though a detachment of them appeared on the oppoſite ſide. Why they did not diſpute the paſſage is not eaſy to be conceived: but, indeed, from this inſtance of neglect, and their ſubſequent conduct, we may conclude they were under a total infatuation. His royal highneſs proceeded to Nairn, where he received intelligence, that the enemy had advanced from Inverneſs to Culloden, about the diſtance of nine miles from the royal army, with intention to give him battle. The deſign of Charles, was to march in the night from Culloden, and ſurprize the duke's army at daybreak: for this purpoſe the Engliſh camp had been reconnoitred; and on the night of the 15th the Highland army began to march in two columns. Their deſign was to ſurround the enemy, and attac them at once on all quarters: but the length of the columns embarraſſed the march, ſo that the army was obliged to make many halts: the men had been under arms during the whole preceding night, were faint with hunger and fatigue, and many of them overpowered with ſleep. Some were unable to proceed: others dropped off unperceived in the dark; and the march was retarded in ſuch a manner, that it would have been impoſſible to reach the duke's camp before ſun-riſe. The deſign being thus fruſtrated, the prince-pretender was with great reluctance prevailed upon by his general officers to meaſure bac his way to Culloden; at which place he had no ſooner arrived, than great numbers of his followers diſperſed in queſt of proviſions; and many, overcome with wearineſs and ſleep, threw themſelves down on the heath, and along the park walls. Their repoſe, however, was ſoon interrupted in a very diſagreeable manner. Their prince receiving intelligence that his enemies were in full march to attac him, reſolved to hazard an engagement, and ordered his troops to be formed for that purpoſe. On the 16th day of April, the duke of Cumberland having made the proper diſpoſitions, decamped from Nairn early in the morning, and after a march of nine miles perceived the Highlanders drawn up in order of battle, to the number of 4000 men, in 13 diviſions, ſupplied with ſome pieces of artillery. The royal army, which was much more numerous, the duke immediately formed into three lines, diſpoſed in excellent order; and about one o'clock in the afternoon the cannonading began. The artillery of the rebels was ill ſerved, and did very little execution: but that of the king's troops made dreadful havoc among the enemy. Impatient of this fire, their front-line advanced to the attac, and about 500 of the clans charged the duke's left wing with their uſual impetuoſity. One regiment was diſordered by the weight of this column: but two battallions advancing from the ſecond line, ſuſtained the firſt, and ſoon put a ſtop to their career, by a ſevere fire, that killed a great number. At the ſame time, the dragoons under Hawley, and the Argyleſhire militia, pulled down a park-wall that covered their right flank, and the cavalry falling in among the rebels, ſword in hand, completed their confuſion. The French piquets on their left covered the retreat of the Highlanders by a cloſe and regular fire; and then retired to Inverneſs, where they ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war. An entire body of the rebels marched off the field in order, with their pipes playing, and the pretender's ſtandard diſplayed: the reſt were routed with great ſlaughter; and their prince was with reluctance prevailed upon to retire. In leſs than 30 minutes they were totally defeated, and the field covered with ſlain. The road, as far as Inverneſs, was ſtrewed with dead bodies; and a good number of people, who, from motives of curioſity, had come to ſee the battle, were ſacrificed to the undiſtinguiſhing vengeance of the victors. Twelve hundred rebels were ſlain or wounded on the field, and in the purſuit. The earl of Kilmarnock was taken; and in a few days lord Balremino ſurrendered to a country gentleman, at whoſe houſe he preſented himſelf for this purpoſe. The glory of the victory was ſullied by the barbarity of the ſoldiers. They had been provoked by their former diſgraces to the moſt ſavage thirſt of revenge. Not contented with the blood which was ſo profuſely ſhed in the heat of action, they traverſed the field after the battle, and maſſacred thoſe miſerable wretches who lay maimed and expiring: nay, ſome officers acted a part in this cruel ſcene of aſſaſſination: the triumph of low illiberal minds, uninſpired by ſentiment, untinctured by humanity. The vanquiſhed adventurer rode off the field, accompanied by the duke of Perth, lord Elcho, and a few horſemen: he croſſed the water of Nairn, and retired to the houſe of a gentleman in Strutharrick, where he conferred with old lord Lovat; then he diſmiſſed his followers, and wandered about a wretched and ſolitary fugitive among the iſles and mountains, for the ſpace of five months, during which he underwent ſuch a ſeries of dangers, hardſhips, and miſery, as no other perſon ever outlived. Thus, in one ſhort hour, all his hopes vaniſhed, and the rebellion was entirely extinguiſhed. One would almoſt imagine the conductors of this deſperate enterprize had conſpired their own deſtruction, as they certainly neglected every ſtep that might have contributed to their ſafety or ſucceſs. They might have oppoſed the duke of Cumberland at the paſſage of the Spey: they might, by proper conduct, have afterwards attacked his camp in the night, with a good proſpect of ſucceſs. As they were greatly inferior to him in number, and weakened with hunger and fatigue, they might have retired to the hills and faſtneſſes, where they would have found plenty of live cattle for proviſion, recruited their regiments, and been joined by a ſtrong re-enforcement, which was actually in full march to their aſſiſtance. But they were diſtracted by diſſentions and jealouſies: they obeyed the dictates of deſpair, and wilfully devoted themſelves to ruin and death. When the news of the battle arrived in England, the nation was tranſported with joy, and extolled the duke of Cumberland as a hero and deliverer. Both houſes of parliament congratulated his majeſty on the auſpicious event. They decreed, in the moſt ſolemn manner, their public thanks to his royal highneſs, which were tranſmitted to him by the ſpeakers; and the commons, by bill, added 25,000l. per annum to his former revenue.

Immediately after the deciſive action at Culloden, the duke took poſſeſſion of Inverneſs, where 36 deſerters, convicted by a court-martial, were ordered to be executed: then he detached ſeveral parties to ravage the country. One of theſe apprehended the lady Mackintoſh who was ſent priſoner to Inverneſs. They did not plunder her houſe, but drove away her cattle, though her huſband was actually in the ſervice of government. The caſtle of lord Lovat was deſtroyed. The French priſoners were ſent to Carliſle and Penrith: Kilmarnock, Balmerino, Cromartie, and his ſon, the lord Macleod, were conveyed by ſea to London; and thoſe of an inferior rank were confined in different priſons. The marquis of Tullibardin, together with a brother of the earl of Dunmore, were ſeiſed, and tranſported to the Tower of London, to which the earl of Traquaire had been committed on ſuſpicion: in a few months after the battle of Culloden, Murray, the pretender's ſecretary, was apprehended; and the eldeſt ſon of lord Lovat, having ſurrendered himſelf, was impriſoned in the caſtle of Edinburgh. In a word, all the gaols of Great-Britain, from the capital northwards, were filled with thoſe unfortunate captives; and great numbers of them were crowded together in the holds of ſhips, where they periſhed in the moſt deplorable manner, for want of neceſſaries, air, and exerciſe. Some rebel chiefs eſcaped in two French frigates, which had arrived on the coaſt of Lochaber about the end of April, and engaged three veſſels belonging to his Britannic majeſty, which they obliged to retire. Others embarked on board of a ſhip on the coaſt of Buchan; and were conveyed to Norway, from thence they travelled to Sweden. In the month of May, the duke of Cumberland advanced with the army into the Highlands, as far as Fort-Auguſtus, where he encamped; and ſent off detachments on all hands, to hunt down the fugitives, and lay waſte the country with fire and ſword. The caſtles of Glengary and Lochiel were plundered and burned: every houſe, hut, or habitation, met with the ſame fate, without diſtinction: all the cattle and proviſion were carried off: the men were either ſhot upon the mountains, like wild beaſts, or put to death in cold blood, without form of trial: the women, after having ſeen their huſbands and fathers murdered, were ſubjected to brutal violation, and then turned out naked, with their children, to ſtarve on the barren heaths. One whole family was encloſed in a barn, and conſumed to aſhes. Thoſe miniſters of vengeance were ſo alert in the execution of their office, that in a few days there was neither houſe, cottage, man, nor beaſt, to be ſeen in the compaſs of 50 miles: all was ruin, ſilence, and deſolation.

The humane reader cannot reflect upon ſuch a ſcene without grief and horrour: what then muſt have been the ſenſation of the fugitive prince, when he beheld theſe ſpectacles of woe, the diſmal fruit of his ambition? He was now ſurrounded by armed troops, that chaſed him from hill to dale, from roc to cavern, and from ſhore to ſhore. Sometimes he lurked in caves and cottages, without attendants, or any other ſupport but that which the pooreſt peaſant could ſupply. Sometimes he was rowed in fiſher-boats from iſle to iſle, among the Hebrides and often in ſight of his purſuers. For ſome days he appeared in woman's attire, and even paſſed through the midſt of his enemies unknown. But, underſtanding his diſguiſe was diſcovered, he aſſumed the habit of a travelling mountaineer, and wandered about among the woods and heaths, with a matted beard and ſqualid looks, expoſed to hunger, thirſt, and wearineſs, and in continual danger of being apprehended. He was obliged to truſt his life to the fidelity of above fifty individuals, and many of theſe were in the loweſt paths of fortune. They knew that a price of thirty thouſand pounds was ſet upon his head; and that, by betraying him, they ſhould enjoy wealth and affluence: but they deteſted the thought of obtaining riches on ſuch infamous terms, and miniſtred to his neceſſities, with the utmoſt zeal and fidelity, even at the hazard of their own deſtruction. In the courſe of theſe peregrinations, he was more than once hemmed in by his purſuers, in ſuch a manner as ſeemed to preclue all poſſibility of eſcaping: yet, he was never abandoned by his hope and recollection: he ſtill found ſome expedient that ſaved him from captivity and death; and through the whole courſe of his diſtreſſes maintained the moſt amazing equanimity and good humour. At length a privateer of St. Malo, hired by the young Sheridan and ſome other Iriſh adherents, arrived in Lochnannach; and on the 20th day of September this unfortunate prince embarked in the habit which he whore for diſguiſe. His eye was hollow, his viſage wan, and his conſtitution greatly impaired by famine and fatigue. He was accompanied by Cameron of Lochiel, and his brother, with a few other exiles. They ſet ſail for France, and after having paſſed unſeen, by means of a thic fog, through a Britiſh ſquadron commanded by admiral Leſtock, and been chaſed by two Engliſh ſhips of war, arrived in ſafety at Roſcau, near Morlaix, in Bretagne. Perhaps he would have found it ſtill more difficult to eſcape, had not the vigilance and eagerneſs of the government been relaxed, in conſequence of a report, that he had already fallen among ſome perſons that were ſlain by a volley from one of the duke's detachments.

Having thus explained the riſe, progreſs, and extinction of the rebellion, it will be neceſſary to take a retroſpective view of the proceedings in parliament. The neceſſary ſteps being taken for quieting the inteſtine commotions of the kingdom, the two houſes began to convert their attention to the affairs of the continent. On the 14th day of January, the king repaired to the houſe of peers, and in a ſpeech from the throne gave his parliament to underſtand, that the ſtates-general had made preſſing inſtances for his aſſiſtance in the preſent conjuncture, when they were in ſuch danger of being oppreſſed by the power of France in the Netherlands: that he had promiſed to co-operate with them towards oppoſing the further progreſs of their enemies; and even concerted meaſures for that purpoſe. He declared it was with regret that he aſked any furthur aids of his people: he exhorted them to watch over the public credit; and expreſſed his entire dependance on their zeal and unanimity. He was favoured with loyal addreſſes, couched in the warmeſt terms of duty and affection: but the ſupplies were retarded by new convulſions in the miniſtry. The earl of Granville had made an effort to retrieve his influence in the cabinet, and his ſovereign favoured his pretenſions. The two brothers, who knew his aſpring genius, and dreaded his ſuperior talents, refuſed to admit ſuch a colleague into the adminiſtration: they even reſolved to ſtrengthen their party, by introducing freſh auxiliaries into the offices of ſtate. Some of theſe were perſonally diſagreeble to his majeſty, who accordingly rejected the ſuit by which they were recommended. The duke of Newcaſtle and his brother, with all their adherents, immediately reſigned their employments.

The earl of Granville was appointed ſecretary of ſtate, and reſumed the reins of adminiſtration: but, finding himſelf unequal to the accumulated oppoſition that preponderated againſt him: for ſeeing that he ſhould not be able to ſecure the ſupplies in parliament; and dreading the conſequences of that confuſion which his reſtoration had already produced, he, in three days, voluntarily quitted the helm; and his majaſty acquieſced in the meaſures propoſed by the oppoſite party. The ſeals were re-delivered to the duke of Newcaſtle and the earl of Harrington: Mr Pelham, and all the reſt who had reſigned, were reinſtated in their reſpective employments; and offices were conferred on ſeveral individuals who had never before been in the ſervice of the government. William Pitt, eſq. was appointed vice-treaſurer of Ireland, and ſoon promoted to the place of paymaſter-general of the forces; at the ſame time the king declared him a privy-counſellor. This gentleman had been originally deſigned for the army, in which he actually bore a commiſſion; but fate reſerved him for a more important ſtation. In point of fortune he was barely qualified to be elected member of parliament, when he obtained a ſeat in the houſe of commons, where he ſoon outſhone all his compatriots. He diſplayed a ſurpriſing extent and preciſion of political knowledge, an irreſiſtible energy of argument, and ſuch power of elocution, as ſtruc his hearers with aſtoniſhment and admiration. It flaſhed like the lightening of heaven againſt the miniſters and ſons of corruption, blaſting were it ſmote, and withering the nerves of oppoſition: but his more ſubſtantial praiſe was founded upon his diſintereſted integrity, his incorruptible heart, his unconquerable ſpirit of independence, and his invariable attachment to the intereſt and liberty of his country.

The quiet of the miniſtry being re-eſtabliſhed, the houſe of commons provided for 40,000 ſeamen, nearly the ſame number of land-forces, beſides 15 regiments raiſed by the nobility, on account of the rebellion, and about 12,000 marines. They ſettled funds for the maintenace of the Dutch and Heſſian troops that were in England, as well as for the ſubſidy to the landgrave. They granted 300,000l. to the king of Sardinia; 400,000l. to the queen of Hungary; 310,000l. to defray the expence of 18,000 Hanoverians; about 33,000l. in ſubſidies to the elector of Mentz and Cologn; and 500,000l. in a vote of credit and confidence to his majeſty. The whole charge of the current year amounted to 7,250,000l. which was raiſed by the land and malt-taxs, annuities on the additional duties impoſed on glaſs, and ſpirituous liquors, a lottery, a deduction from the ſinking-fund, and exchequer bills, chargeable on the firſt aids that ſhould be granted in the next ſeſſion of parliament.

The rebellion being quelled, the legiſlature reſolved to make examples of thoſe who had been concerted in diſturbing the peace of their country. In June an act of attainder was paſſed againſt the principal perſons who had embarked in that deſperate undertaking; and courts were opened in different parts of England, for the trial of the priſoners. Seventeen perſons who had borne arms in the rebel army were executed at Kenington-common, in the neighbourhood of London, and ſuffered with great conſtancy under the dreadful tortures which their ſentence preſcribed: nine were put to death, in the ſame manner, at Carliſle; ſix at Brumton, ſeven at Penrith, and eleven at York: of theſe a conſiderable number were gentlemen, and acted as officers: about fifty had been executed as deſerters in different parts of Scotland: eighty-one ſuffered the pains of the law as traitors. A few obtained pardons, and a conſiderable number were tranſported to the plantations. Bills of indictment for high-treaſon were found by the county of Surry againſt the earls of Kilmarnock and Cromartie, and lord Balmerino. Theſe noblemen were tried by their peers in Weſtminſter-hall, the lord-chancellor preſiding as lord high-ſteward for the occaſion. The two earls confeſſed their crimes and in pathetic ſpeeches recommended themſelves to his majeſty's mercy. Lord Balmerino pleaded not guilty: he denied his having been at Carliſle at the time ſpecified in the indictment, but this exception was over-ruled: then he moved a point of law in arreſt of judgment, and was allowed to be heard by his counſel. They might have expatiated on the hardſhip of being tried by an ex poſt facto law, and claimed the privilege of trial in the county where the act of treaſon was ſaid to have been committed. The ſame hardſhip was impoſed upon all the impriſoned rebels: they were dragged in captivity to a ſtrange country, far from their friends and connexions, deſtitute of means to produce evidence in their favour, even if they had been innocent of the charge. Balmerino waved this plea, and ſubmitted to the court, which pronounced ſentence of death upon him and his two aſſociates. Cromartie's life was ſpared; but the other two were beheaded, in the month of Auguſt, on Tower-hill. Kilmarnock was a nobleman of fine perſonal accompliſhments: he had been educated in revolution principles, and engaged in the rebellion, partly from the deſperate ſituation of his fortune, and partly from reſentment to the government, on his being deprived of a penſion which he had for ſome time enjoyed. He was convinced of his having acted criminally, and died with marks of penitence and contrition. Balmerino had been bred to arms, and acted upon principle: he was gallant, brave, rough, and reſolute: he eyed the implements of death with the moſt careleſs familiarity, and ſeemed to triumph in his ſufferings.

In November, mr. Ratcliffe, the titular earl of Derwentwater, who had been taken in a ſhip bound to Scotland, was arraigned on a former ſentence, paſſed againſt him in the year 1716: he refuſed to acknowledge the authority of the court, and pleaded that he was a ſubject of France, honoured with a commiſſion, in the ſervice of his moſt chriſtian majeſty. The identity of his perſon being proved, a rule was made for his execution; and on the 8th day of December he ſuffered decapitation, with the moſt perfect compoſure and ſerenity.

Lord Lovat, now turned of 80, was impeached by the commons, and tried in Weſtminſter-hall before the lord high-ſteward. John Murray, ſecretary to the prince-pretender, and ſome of his own domeſtics appearing againſt him, he was convicted of high-treaſon, and condemned. Notwithſtanding his age, infirmities, and the recollection of his conſcience, which was ſuppoſed to be not altogether void of offence, he died like an old Roman, exclaiming 'dulce et decorum pro patria mori.' He ſurveyed the crowd with attention, examined the ax, jeſted with the executioner, and laid his head upon the bloc with the utmoſt indifference. From this laſt ſcene of his life one would have concluded, that he had approved himſelf a patriot from his youth, and never deviated from the paths of virtue.

The flame of war on the continent did not expire at the election of an emperor, on the re-eſtabliſhment of peace among the princes of the empire. On the contrary, it raged with double violence in conſequence of theſe events; for the force that was before divided being now united in one body, exerted itſelf with greater vigour and rapidity. The ſtates-general were overwhelmed with conſternation. Notwithſtanding the pains they had taken to avoid a war, and the condeſcention with which they had ſoothed and ſupplicated the French monarch in repeated embaſſes and memorials, they ſaw themſelves ſtripped of their barrier, and once more in danger of being overwhelmed by that ambitious nation. The city of Bruſſels had been reduced during the winter; ſo that the enemy were in poſſeſſion of all the Auſtrian netherlands, except a few fortreſſes. Great part of the forces belonging to the republic were reſtricted from action by capitulations, to which they had ſubſcribed. The ſtates were divided in their councils between the two factions which had long ſubſiſted. They trembled at the proſpect of ſeeing Zealand invaded in the ſpring. The Orange party loudly called for an augmentation of their forces by ſea and land, that they might proſecute the war with vigour. The common people, fond of novelty, dazzled by the ſplendor of greatneſs, and fully perſuaded that nothing but a chief was wanting to their ſecurity, demanded the prince of Orange as a ſtadtholder; and even mingled menaces with their demands. The oppoſite faction dreaded alike the power of a ſtadtholder, the neighbourhood of a French army, and the ſeditious diſpoſition of the populace. An ambaſſador was ſent to London with repreſentations of the imminent dangers which threatened the republic, and he was ordered to ſollicit in the moſt preſſing terms the aſſiſtance of his Britannic majeſty, that the allies might have a ſuperiority in the Netherlands by the beginning of the campaign. The king was very well diſpoſed to comply with their requeſt; but the rebellion in his kingdom, and the diſſentions in his cabinet, had retarded the ſupplies, and embarraſſed him ſo much, that he found it impoſſible to make thoſe early preparations that were neceſſary to chec the career of the enemy.

The king of France, with his general, the count de Saxe, took the field in the latter end of April, at the head of 120,000 men, and advanced towards the allies; who, to the number of 44000, were entrenched behind the Demer, under the conduct of the Auſtrian general Bathiani, who retired before them, and took poſt in the neighbourhood of Breda, the capital of Dutch Brabant. Mareſchal Saxe immediately inveſted Antwerp, which in a few days was ſurrendered. Then he appeared before the ſtrong town of Mons in Hainault, with an irreſiſtible train of artillery, an immenſe quantity of bombs and warlike implements. He carried on his approaches with ſuch unbating impetuoſity, that, notwithſtanding a very vigorous defence, the garriſon was obliged to capitulate on the 27th day of June, in about 28 days after the place had been inveſted. Sieges were not now carried on by the tedious method of ſapping. The French king found it much more expeditious and effectual to bring into the field a prodigious train of battering cannon, and enormous mortars, that kept up ſuch a fire as no garriſon could ſuſtain, and diſcharged ſuch an inceſſant hail of bombs and bullets, as in a very little time reduced to ruins the place, with all its fortifications. St. Guiſlain and Charleroy met with the fates of Mons and Antwerp: ſo that by the middle of July the French king was abſolute maſter of Flanders, Brabant, and Hainault.

Prince Charles of Lorraine had by this time aſſumed the command of the confederate army at Terheyde, which being re-enforced by the Heſſian troops from Scotland, and a freſh body of Auſtrians under count Palfi, amounted to 87,000 men, including the Dutch forces commanded by the prince of Waldeck. The generals, ſuppoſing the next ſtorm would fall upon Namur, marched towards that place, and took poſt in an advantageous ſituation on the 18th day of July, in ſight of the French army, which was encamped at Gemblours. Here they remained till the 8th day of Auguſt, when a detachment of the enemy, commanded by count Lowendahl, took poſſeſſion of Huy, where he found a large magazine belonging to the confederates; and their communication with Maeſtricht was cut off. Mareſchal Saxe, on the other ſide, took his meaſures ſo well, that they were utterly deprived of all ſubſiſtence. Then prince Charles, retiring acroſs the Maeſe, abandoned Namur to the efforts of the enemy, by whom it was immediately inveſted. The trenches were opened on the 2d day of September; and the garriſon, conſiſting of 7000 Auſtrians, defended themſelves with equal ſkill and reſolution: but the cannonading and bombardment were ſo terrible, that in a few days the place was converted into a heap of rubbiſh; and on the 23d day of the month the French monarch took poſſeſſion of this ſtrong fortreſs, which had formerly ſuſtained ſuch dreadful attacs. Mean while the allied army encamped at Maeſtricht were joined by ſir John Ligonier, with ſome Britiſh and Bavarian battalions; and prince Charles reſolved to give the enemy battle. With this view he paſſed the Maeſe on the 13th day of September, and advanced towards Mareſchal Saxe, whom he found ſo advantageouſly poſted at Tongres, that he thought proper to march bac to Maeſtricht. On the 26th day of September he croſſed the Jaar in his retreat; and his rear was attacked by the enemy, who were repuiſed. But count Saxe being reenforced by a body of troops under the count de Clermont, determined to bring the confederates to an engagement. On the 13th day of the month he paſſed the Jaar, while they took poſſeſſion of the villages of Liers, Warem, and Roucoux, drew up their forces in order of battle, and make preparations for giving him a warm reception. On the 1ſt day of October the enemy advanced in three columns; and a terrible cannonading began about noon. At two o'clock prince Waldeck on the left was charged with great fury; and after an obſtinate defence overpowered by numbers. The villages were attacked in columns, and as one brigade was repulſed another ſucceeded; ſo that the allies were obliged to abandon theſe poſts, and retreat towards Maeſtricht, with the loſs of 5000 men, and 30 pieces of artillery. The victory, however, coſt the French general a much greater number of lives; and was attended with no ſolid advantage. Sir John Ligonier, the earls of Crawford [u] and Rothes, brigadier Douglas, and other officers of the Britiſh troops, diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their gallantry and conduct on this occaſion. This action determined the campaign. The allies paſſing the Meaſe, took up their winter quarters in the duchies of Limburgh and Luxembourg; while the French cantoned their troops in the places which they had newly conquered.

The campaign in Italy was altogether unfavourable to the French and Spaniards. The houſe of Auſtria being no longer preſſed on the ſide of Germany, was enabled to make the ſtronger efforts in this country; and the Britiſh ſubſidy encouraged the king of Sardinia to act with redoubled vivacity. Mareſchal Maillebois occupied the greater part of Piedmont with about 30,000 men. Don Philip and the count de Gages were at the head of a greater number in the neighbourhood of Milan; and the duke of Modena, with 8000, ſecured his own dominions. The king of Sardinia augmented his forces to 36,000; and the Auſtrian army, under the prince of Lichtenſtein, amounted to a much greater number; ſo that the enemy were reduced to the neceſſity of acting on the defenſive, and retired towards the Mantuan. In February baron Leutrum, the Piedmonteſe general, inveſted and took the ſtrong fortreſſes of Aſte. He afterwards relieved the citidel of Alexandria, which the Spaniards had bloced up in the winter, reduced Caſal, recovered Valencia, and obliged Maillebois to retire to the neighbourhood of Genoa. On the other ſide, don Philip and count Gages abandoned Milan, Pavia, and Parma, retreating before the Auſtrians with the utmoſt precipitation to Placentia, where they were joined on the 3d of June by the French forces under Maillebois.

Before this junction was effected, the Spaniſh general, Pignatelli, had paſſed the river Po in the night with a ſtrong detachment, and beaten up the quarters of 7000 Auſtrians poſted at Codogno. Don Philip, finding himſelf at the head of 52,000 men by his junction with the French general, reſolved to attac the Auſtrians in their camp at San-Lazaro, before they ſhould be re-enforced by his Sardinian majeſty. Accordingly, on the fourth day of June in the evening, he marched with equal ſilence and expedition, and entered the Auſtrian trenches about eleven, when a deſperate battle enſued. The Auſtrians were prepared for the attac, which they ſuſtained with great vigour till morning. Then they quitted their entrenchments, and charged the enemy in their turn with ſuch fury, that after an obſtinate reſiſtance the combined army was broke, and retired with precipitation to Placentia, leaving on the field 15,000 men killed, wounded, and taken, together with ſixty colours, and ten pieces of artillery. In a few weeks the Auſtrians were joined by the Piedmonteſe: the king of Sardinia aſſumed the chief command; and prince Lichtenſtein being indiſpoſed, his place was ſupplied by the marquis de Botta. Don Philip retired to the other ſide of the Po, and extended his conqueſts in the open country of the Milaneſe. The king of Sardinia called a council of war, in which it was determined that he ſhould paſs the river with a ſtrong body of troops, in order to ſtraighten the enemy on one ſide; while the marquis de Botta ſhould march up the Tydone, to cut off their communication with Placentia. They forthwith quitted all the poſts they had occupied between the Lambro and Adda, reſolving to repaſs the Po, and retreat to Tortona. With this view they threw bridges of boats over that river, and began to paſs on the 9th day of Auguſt in the evening. They were attacked at Rotto-Freddo by a detachment of Auſtrians, under general Serbelloni, who maintained the engagement till ten in the morning, when Botto arrived: the battle was renewed with doubled rage, and laſted till four in the afternoon, when the enemy retired in great diſorder to Tortona, with the loſs of 8000 men, a good number of colours and ſtandards, and 18 pieces of cannon. This victory coſt the Auſtrians 4000 men killed upon the ſpot, including the gallant general Bernclau. The victors immediately ſummoned Placentia to ſurrender; and the garriſon, conſiſting of 9000 men, were made priſoners of war: don Philip continued his retreat, and of all his forces brought 26,000 only into the territories of Genoa.

The Piedmonteſe and Auſtrians rejoining in the neighbourhood of Pavia, advanced to Tortona, of which they took poſſeſſion without reſiſtance, while the enemy ſheltered themſelves under the cannon of Genoa. They did not long continue in this ſituation: for on the 22d day of Auguſt they were again in motion, and retired into Provence. The court of Madrid imputing the bad ſucceſs of this campaign to the miſconduct of count Gages, recalled that [u] This nobleman, ſo remarkable for his courage and thirſt of glory, exhibited a very extraordinary inſtance of preſence of mind on the morning that preceded this battle. He and ſome volunteers, accompanied by his aide de-camp, and attended by two orderly dragoons, had rode out before day to reconnoitre the ſituation of the enemy; and fell in upon one of their advanced guards. The ſerjeant who commanded it immediately turned out his men, and their pieces were preſented when the earl firſt perceived them. Without betraying the leaſt mark of diſorder, he rode up to the ſerjeant, and aſſuming the character of a French general, told him in that language, that there was no occaſion for ſuch ceremony. Then he aſked, if they had perceived any of the enemy's parties? and being anſwered in the negative, 'Very well (ſaid he) be upon your guard; and if you ſhould be attacked, I will take care that you ſhall be ſuſtained.' So ſaying, he and his company retired before the ſerjeant could recollect himſelf from the ſurpriſe occaſioned by this unexpected addreſs. In all probability he was ſoon ſenſible of his miſtake; for the incident was that very day publicly mentioned in the French army. The prince of Tingray, an officer in the Auſtrian ſervice, having been taken priſoner in the battle that enſued, dined with mareſchal count Saxe, who diſmiſſed him on his parole, and deſired he would charge himſelf with a facetious compliment to his old friend, the earl of Crawford. He wiſhed his lordſhip joy of being a French general, and ſaid he could not help being diſpleaſed with the ſerjeant, as he had not procured him the honour of his lordſhip's company at dinner.

general, and ſent the marquis de las Minas to reſume the command of the forces. In the mean time, the victorious confederates appeared before Genoa on the 4th day of December: and the ſenate of that city thinking it incapable of defence, ſubmitted to a very mortifying capitulation, by which the gates were delivered up to the Auſtrians, together with all their arms, artillery, and ammunition: and the city was ſubjected to the moſt cruel contributions. The marquis de Botta being left at Genoa with 16,000 men, the king of Sardinia reſolved to paſs the Var, and purſue the French and Spaniards into Provence: but, that monarch being ſeiſed with the ſmall-pox, the conduct of this expedition was entruſted to count Brown, an Auſtrian general of Iriſh extract, who had given repeated proofs of uncommon valour and capacity. He was on this occaſion aſſiſted by vice-admiral Medley, who commanded the Britiſh ſquadron in the Mediterranean. The French forces had fortified the paſſes of the Var, under the conduct of the mareſchal de Belleiſle, who thought proper to abandon his poſts at the approach of count Brown; and this general, at the head of 50,000 men, paſſed the river, without oppoſition, on the 9th day of November. While he advanced as far as Draguignan, laying the open country under contribution, baron Roth, with 24 battalions, inveſted Antibes, which was at the ſame time bombarded on the ſide of the ſea by the Britiſh ſquadron. The trenches were opened on the 20th day of September: but Belleiſle having aſſembled a numerous army, ſuperior to that of the confederates, and the Genoeſe having expelled their Auſtrian gueſts, count Brown abandoned the enterpriſe, and repaſſed the Var, not without ſome damage from the enemy.

The court of Vienna, which has always patroniſed oppreſſion, exacted ſuch heavy contributions from the Genoeſe, and its directions were ſo rigorouſly put in execution, that the people were reduced to deſpair; and reſolved to make a laſt effort for the recovery of their liberty and independence. Accordingly, they took arms in ſecret, ſeized ſeveral important poſts of the city; ſurprized ſome battalions of the Auſtrians; ſurrounded others, and cut them in pieces; and, in a word, drove them out with great ſlaughter. The marquis de Botta acted with caution and ſpirit: but being overpowered by numbers, and apprehenſive of the peaſants in the country, who were in arms, he retreated to the paſs of the Bochetta on the ſide of Lombardy, where he ſecured himſelf in an advantageous ſituation, until he could receive re-enforcements. The loſs he had ſuſtained at Genoa did not hinder him from reducing Savona, a ſea-port town belonging to that republic; and he afterwards made himſelf maſter of Gavi. The Genoeſe, on the contrary, exerted themſelves with wonderful induſtry in fortifying their city, raiſing troops, and in taking other meaſures for a vigorous defence, in caſe they ſhould again be inſulted.

The naval tranſactions of this year reflected very little honour on the Britiſh nation. Commodore Peyton, who commanded ſix ſhips of war in the Eaſt-Indies, ſhamefully declined a deciſive engagement with a French ſquadron of inferior force; and abandoned the important ſettlement of Madras on the coaſt of Coromandel, which was taken without oppoſition in the month of September by the French commodore, de la Bourdonnais. Fort St. David, and the other Britiſh factories in India, would have probably ſhared the ſame fate, had not the enemy's naval force in that country been ſhattered and partly deſtroyed by a terrible tempeſt. No event of conſequence happened in America, though it was a ſcene that ſeemed to promiſe the greateſt ſucceſs to the arms of England. The reduction of Cape-Breton had encouraged the miniſtry to project the conqueſt of Quebeck, the capital of Canada, ſituated upon the river of St. Laurence. Commiſſions were ſent to the governors of the Britiſh colonies in North-America, empowering them to raiſe companies to join the armament from England; and 8000 troops were actually raiſed in conſequence of theſe directions; while a powerful ſquadron and tranſports, having ſix regiments on board, were prepared at Portſmouth for this expedition. But their departure was poſtponed by unaccountable delays, until the ſeaſon was judged too far advanced to riſque the great ſhips on the boiſterous coaſt of North-America. That the armament, however, might not be wholly uſeleſs to the nation, it was employed in making a deſcent upon the coaſt of Bretagne, on the ſuppoſition that Port L'Orient, the repoſitory of all the ſtores and ſhips belonging to the French Eaſt-India company, might be ſurprized; or, that this invaſion would-alarm the enemy, and, by making a diverſion, facilitate the operations of the Auſtrian general in Provence.

The naval force intended for this ſervice conſiſted of ſixteen great ſhips, and eight frigates, beſides bomb-ketches and ſtore-ſhips, commanded by Richard Leſtock, appointed admiral of the blue diviſion. Six battalions of land troops, with a detachment of matroſſes and bombardiers, were embarked in 30 tranſports, under the conduct of lieutenant-general Sinclair; and the whole fleet ſet ſail from Plymouth on the 14th day of September. On the 20th the troops were landed in Quimperlay-bay, at the diſtance of ten miles from Port-L'Orient. The militia, re-enforced by ſome detachments from different regiments, were aſſembled to the number of 2000, and ſeemed reſolved to oppoſe the diſembarkation: but, ſeeing the Britiſh troops determined to land at all events, they thought proper to retire. Next day general Sinclair advanced into the country, ſkirmiſhing with the enemy in his route; and arriving at the village of Plemure, within half a league from Port-L'Orient, ſummoned that place to ſurrender. He was viſited by a deputation from the town, which offered to admit the Britiſh forces, on condition that they ſhould be reſtrained from pillaging the inhabitants, and touching the magazines; and that they ſhould pay a juſt price for their proviſions. Theſe terms being rejected, the inhabitants prepared for a vigorous defence; and the Engliſh general reſolved to beſiege the place in form, though he had neither time, artillery, nor forces ſufficient for ſuch an enterprize. This ſtrange reſolution was owing to the declaration of the engineers, who promiſed to lay the place in aſhes in the ſpace of 24 hours. All his cannon amounted to no more than a few field-pieces; and he was obliged to wait for two iron guns, which the ſailors dragged up from the ſhipping. Had he given the aſſault on the firſt night after his arrival, when the town was filled with terrour and confuſion, and deſtitute of regular troops, in all probability it would have been eaſily taken by ſcalade: but the reduction of it was rendered impracticable by his delay. The ramparts were mounted with cannon from the ſhips in the harbour: new works were raiſed with great induſtry: the garriſon was re-enforced by ſeveral bodies of regular troops; and great numbers were aſſembling from all parts; ſo that the Britiſh forces were in danger of being ſurrounded in an enemy's country. Notwithſtanding theſe diſcouragements, they opened a ſmall battery againſt the town, which was ſet on fire in ſeveral places by their bombs and red-hot bullets: they likewiſe repulſed part of the garriſon which had made a ſally to deſtroy their works: but their cannon producing no effect upon the fortifications, the fire from the town daily increaſing, the engineers owning they could not perform their promiſe, and admiral Leſtock declaring, in repeated meſſages, that he could no longer expoſe the ſhips on an open coaſt at ſuch a ſeaſon of the year, general Sinclair abandoned the ſiege. Having cauſed the two iron pieces of cannon and the mortars to be ſpiked, he retreated in good order to the ſea-ſide, where his troops were re-embarked, having ſuſtained very inconſiderable damage ſince their firſt landing. He expected re-enforcements from England, and was reſolved to wait a little longer for their arrival, in hopes of being able to annoy the enemy more effectually. In the beginning of October the fleet ſailed to Quiberon-Bay, where they deſtroyed the Ardent, a French ſhip of war of 64 guns; and a detachment of the forces being landed, took poſſeſſion of a fort on the peninſula: while the little iſlands of Houat and Heydic were reduced by the ſailors. In this ſituation the admiral and general continued till the 17th day of the month, when the forts being diſmantled, and the troops re-embarked, the fleet ſailed from the French coaſt: the admiral returned to England, and the tranſports with the ſoldiers proceeded to Ireland, where they arrived in ſafety.

This expedition, weak and frivolous as it may ſeem, was reſented by the French nation as one of the greateſt inſults they had ever ſuſtained; and demonſtrated the poſſibility of hurting France in her tendereſt parts, by means of an armament of this nature, well-timed, and vigorouſly conducted. Indeed, nothing could be more abſurd or precipitate than an attempt to diſtreſs the enemy by landing a handful of troops, without draft-horſes, tents, or artillery, from a fleet of ſhips lying on an open beach, expoſed to the uncertainty of weather in the moſt tempeſtuous ſeaſon of the year, ſo as to render the retreat and re-embarkation altogether precarious. The Britiſh ſquadrons in the Weſt-Indies performed no exploit of conſequence in the courſe of this year. The commerce was but indifferently protected. Commodore Lee, ſtationed off Martinico, allowed a French fleet of merchant-ſhips, and their convoy, to paſs by his ſquadron unmoleſted; and commodore Mitchel behaved ſcandalouſly in a rencontre with the French ſquadron, under the conduct of monſieur de Conflans, who in his return to Europe took the Severn, an Engliſh ſhip of 50 guns. The cruiſers on all ſides, Engliſh, French, and Spaniards, were extremely alert; and though the Engliſh loſt the greater number ſhips, this difference was more than overbalanced by the ſuperior value of the prizes taken from the enemy. In the courſe of this year 22 Spaniſh privateers, and 66 merchant veſſels, including 10 regiſter-ſhips, fell into the hands of the Britiſh cruiſers: from the French [x] they took ſeven ſhips of war, 90 privateers, and about 300 ſhips of commerce. The new king of Spain being ſuppoſed well affected to the Britiſh nation, an effort was made to detach him from the intereſts of France, by means of the marquis de Tabernega, who had formerly been his favourite, and reſided many years as a refugee in England. This nobleman proceeded to Liſbon, were a negotiation was ſet on foot with the court of Madrid. But his effort miſcarried; and the influence of the queen-mother continued to predominate in the Spaniſh councils. The ſtates-general had for ſome years endeavoured to promote a pacification by remonſtrances, and even entreaties, at the court of Verſailles: the French king at length diſcovered an inclination of peace, and in September a congreſs was opened at Breda, the capital of Dutch Brabant, where the plenipotentiaries of the emperor, Great-Britain, France, and Holland, were aſſembled: but the French were ſo inſolent in their demands, that the conferences were ſoon interrupted.

The parliament of Great-Britain meeting in November, the king exhorted them to concert with all poſſible expedition the proper meaſures for purſuing the war with vigour, that the confederate army in the Netherlands might be ſeaſonably augmented: he, likewiſe, gave them to underſtand, that the funds appropriated for the ſupport of his civil government had for ſome years paſt fallen ſhort of the revenue intended and granted by parliament; and ſaid he relied on their known affection to find out ſome method to make good this deficiency. As all thoſe who had conducted the oppoſition were now concerned in the adminiſtration, little or no objection was made to any demand or propoſal of the government and its miniſters. The commons having conſidered the eſtimates, voted 40,000 ſeamen for the ſervice of the enſuing year, and about 60,000 land-forces, including 11,500 marines. They granted 433,000l. to the empreſs queen of Hungary; 300,000l. to the king of Sardinia; 410,000l. for the maintenance of 18,000 Hanoverian auxiliaries; 161,607l. for 6000 Heſſians; ſubſidies to the electors of Cologn, Mentz, and Bavaria; and the ſum of 500,000l. to enable his majeſty to proſecute the war with advantage. In a word, the ſupplies amounted to 9,425,254l. a ſum almoſt incredible, if we conſider how the kingdom had been drained of its treaſures. It was raiſed by the uſual taxes, re-enforced with new impoſitions on windows, carriages, and ſpirituous liquors, a lottery, and a loan from the ſinking-fund. The new taxes mortgaged for four millions by transferrable annuities, at an intereſt of four, and a premium of ten per centum. By reflecting on theſe enormous grants, one would imagine the miniſtry had been determined to impoveriſh the nation: but, from the eagerneſs and expedition with which the people ſubſcribed for the money, one would conclude that the riches of the kingdom were inexhauſtible. It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that the ſupplies of this year exceeded, by two millions and a half, the greateſt annual ſum that was raiſed during the reign of queen Anne, though ſhe maintained as great a number of troops as was now in the pay of Great-Britain, and her armies and fleets acquired every year freſh harveſts of glory and advantage: whereas this war had proved an almoſt uninterrupted ſeries of events big with diſaſter and diſhonour. During the laſt two years, the naval expence of England had exceeded that of France about five millions ſterling; though her fleets had not obtained one ſignal advantage over the enemy at ſea, nor been able to protect her commerce from their depredations. She was at once a pray to her declared adverſaries and profeſſed friends. Before the end of ſummer, ſhe numbered among her mercenaries two empreſſes, five German princes, and a powerful monarch, whom ſhe hired to aſſiſt her in trimming the balance of Europe, in which they themſelves were immediately intereſted, and ſhe had no more than a ſecondary concern. Had theſe fruitleſs ſubſidies been ſaved: had the national revenue been applied with œconomy to national purpoſes: had it been employed in liquidating gradually the public incumbrances; in augmenting the navy, improving manufactures, encouraging and ſecuring the colonies, and extending trade and navigation, corruption would have become altogether unneceſſary, and diſaffection would have vaniſhed: the people would have been eaſed of their burthens, and ceaſed to complain: commerce would have floriſhed, and produced ſuch affluence as muſt have raiſed Great-Britain to the higheſt pinnacle of maritime power, above all rivalſhip or competition. She would have been dreaded by her enemies; revered by her neighbours; oppreſſed nations would have crept under her wings for protection; contending potentates would have appealed to her deciſion; and ſhe would have ſhone the univerſal arbitreſs of Europe. How different is her preſent ſituation! her debts are enormous, her taxes intolerable, her people diſcontented, and the ſinews of her government relaxed. Without conduct, confidence, or concert, ſhe engages in blundering negotiations: ſhe involves herſelf raſhly in foreign quarrels, and laviſhes her ſubſtance with the moſt dangerous precipitation: ſhe is even deſerted by her wonted vigour, ſteadineſs, and intrepidity: ſhe grows vain, fantaſtical, and puſillanimous; her arms are deſpiſed by her enemies; and her councils ridiculed through all Chriſtendom.

The king, in order to exhibit a ſpecimen of his deſire to diminiſh the public expence, ordered the third and fourth troops of his life-guards to be diſbanded, and reduced three regiments of horſe to the quality of dragoons. The houſe of commons preſented an addreſs of thanks for this inſtance of œconomy, by which the annual ſum of 70,000l. was ſaved to the nation. Notwithſtanding this ſeeming harmony between the king and the great council of the nation, his majeſty reſolved, with the advice of his council, to diſſolve the preſent parliament, though the term of ſeven years was not yet expired ſince its firſt meeting.

[1747] The miniſtry affected to inſinuate, that the ſtates-general were unwilling to concur with his majeſty in vigorous meaſures againſt France, during the exiſtence of a parliament which had undergone ſuch a viciſſitude of complexion. The allies of Great-Britain, far from being ſuſpicious of this aſſembly, which had ſupplied them ſo liberally, ſaw with concern, that, according to law, it would ſoon be diſmiſſed; and they doubted whether another could be procured equally agreeable to their purpoſes. In order to remove this doubt, the miniſtry reſolved to ſurpriſe the kingdom with a new election, before the mal-contents ſhould be prepared to oppoſe the friends of the government. Accordingly, when the buſineſs of the ſeſſion was diſpatched, the king having given the royal aſſent to the ſeveral acts they had prepared, diſmiſſed them in the month of June, with an affectionate ſpeech, that breathed nothing but tenderneſs and gratitude. The parliament was immediately diſſolved by proclamation, and new writs were iſſued for convoking another. Among the laws paſſed in this ſeſſion, was an act aboliſhing the heritable juriſdictions, and taking away the tenour of wardholdings in Scotland, which were reckoned among the principal ſources of thoſe rebellions that had been excited ſince the revolution. In the Highlands they certainly kept the common people in ſubjection to their chiefs, whom they implicitly followed and obeyed in all their undertakings. By this act theſe mountaineers were legally emancipated from ſlavery: but as the tenants enjoyed no leaſes, and were at all times liable to be ejected from their farms, they ſtill depended on the pleaſure of their lords, notwithſtanding this interpoſition of the legiſlature, which granted a valuable conſideration in money to every nobleman and petty baron, who was thus deprived of one part of his inheritance. The forfeited eſtates, indeed, were divided into ſmall farms, and let by the government on leaſes at an under value; ſo that thoſe who had the good fortune to obtain ſuch leaſes taſted the ſweets of independence: but the Highlanders in general were left in their original indigence and incapacity, at the mercy of their ſuperiors. Had manufactures and fiſheries been eſtabliſhed in different parts of their country, they would have ſeen and felt the happy conſequences of induſtry, and in a little time been effectually detached from all their ſlaviſh connexions.

[x] In the month of July, Philip V. king of Spain dying, in the 63d year of his age, was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Ferdinand, born of Maria Louiſa Gabriela, ſiſter to the late king of Sardinia. He eſpouſed Donna Maria Magdalena, infanta of Portugal, but had no iſſue. Philip was but two days ſurvived by his daughter, the dauphineſs of France. The ſame month was remarkable for the death of Chriſtiern VI. king of Denmark, ſucceeded by his ſon Frederick V. who had married the princeſs Louiſa, youngeſt daughter to the king of Great-Britain.

The operations of the campaign had been concerted in the winter at the Hague, between the duke of Cumberland and the ſtates-general of the United-Provinces, who were by this time generally convinced of France's deſign to encroach upon their territories. They, therefore, determined to take effectual meaſures againſt that reſtleſs and ambitious neighbour. The allied powers agreed to aſſemble a vaſt army in the Netherlands; and it was reſolved that the Auſtrians and Piedmonteſe ſhould once more penetrate into Provence. The Dutch patriots, were not rouſed into this exertion, until all their remonſtrances had failed at the court of Verſailles; until they had been urged by repeated memorials of the Engliſh ambaſſador, and ſtimulated by the immediate danger to which their country was expoſed: for France was by this time poſſeſſed of all the Auſtrian Netherlands, and ſeemed bent upon penetrating into the territories of the United-Provinces. In February, the duke of Cumberland began to aſſemble the allied forces; and in the latter end of March they took the field in three ſeperate bodies. His royal highneſs with the Engliſh, Hanoverians, and Heſſians, fixed his head-quarters at the village of Tilbergh: the prince of Waldeck was poſted with the Dutch troops at Breda; and mareſchal Bathiani collected the Auſtrians and Bavarians in the neighbourhood of Venlo. The whole army amounted to 120,000 men, who lay inactive ſix weeks expoſed to the inclemency of the weather, and almoſt deſtitute of forage and proviſion. Count Saxe, by this time created mareſchal-general of France, continued his troops within their cantonments at Brûges, Antwerp, and Bruſſels, declaring, that when the allied army ſhould be weakened by ſickneſs and mortality, he would convince the duke of Cumberland, that the firſt duty of a general is to provide for the health and preſervation of his troops. In April this fortunate commander took the field, at the head of 140,000 men; and the count de Clermont commanded a ſeperate body of 19 battalions and 30 ſquadrons. Count Lowendahl was detached on the 16th day of the month, with 27,000 men, to invade Dutch Flanders: at the ſame time, the French miniſter at the Hague preſented a memorial to the ſtates, intimating, that his maſter was obliged to take this ſtep by the neceſſity of war: but that his troops ſhould obſerve the ſtricteſt diſcipline, without interfering with the religion, government, or commerce of the republic: he likewiſe declared, that the countries and places of which he might be obliged to take poſſeſſion ſhould be detained no otherwiſe than as a pledge, to be reſtored as ſoon as the United-Provinces ſhould give convincing proofs that they would no longer furniſh the enemies of France with ſuccours.

While the ſtates deliberated upon this declaration, count Lowendahl entered Dutch Brabant, and inveſted the town and fortreſs of Sluys, the garriſon of which ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war on the 19th day of April. This was likewiſe the fate of Sas-van-Ghent; while the marquis de Contades, with another detachment, reduced the forts Perle and Leitkenſhoek, with the town of Philippine, even within hearing of the confederate army. The fort of Sanberg was vigorouſly defended by two Engliſh battalions: but they were overpowered, and obliged to retire to Welſthoorden; and count Lowendahl undertook the ſiege of Huſſt, which was ſhamefully ſurrendered by La Roque, the Dutch governor, though he knew that a re-enforcement of nine battalions was on the march to his relief. Then the French general took poſſeſſion of Axel and Terneueſe, and began to prepare flat-bottomed boats for a deſcent on the iſland of Zealand. The Dutch people were now ſtruc with conſternation. They ſaw the enemy at their doors, and owed their immediate preſervation to the Britiſh ſquadron ſtationed at the Swin, under the command of commodore Mitchel, [y] who, by means of his ſloops, tenders, and ſmall craft, took ſuch meaſures as defeated the intention of Lowendahl. The common people in Zealand being reduced to deſpair, began to clamour loudly againſt their governors, as if they had not taken the proper meaſures for their ſecurity. The friends of the prince of Orange did not neglect this opportunity of promoting his intereſt. They encouraged their diſcontent; and exaggerated the danger; they reminded them of the year 1672, when the French king was at the gates of Amſterdam, and the republic was ſaved by the choice of a ſtadtholder: they exhorted them to turn their eyes on the deſcendant of thoſe heroes who had eſtabliſhed the liberty and independence of the United-Provinces: they extolled his virtue and ability; his generoſity, his juſtice, his unſhaken love to his country. The people in ſeveral towns, inflamed by ſuch repreſentations to tumult and ſedition, compelled their magiſtrates to declare the prince of Orange ſtadtholder. He himſelf, in a letter to the ſtates of Zealand, offered his ſervices for the defence of the province. On the 28th day of April he was nominated captain-general and admiral of Zealand. Their example was followed by Rotterdam and the whole province of Holland; and on the 2d day of May, the prince of Orange was, in the aſſembly of the ſtates-general, inveſted with the power and dignity of ſtadtholder, captain-general, and admiral of the United-Provinces. The vigorous conſequences of this reſolution immediately appeared. All commerce and contracts with the French were prohibited: the peaſants were armed and exerciſed: a reſolution paſſed for making a conſiderable augmentation of the army: a council of war was eſtabliſhed for enquiring into the conduct of the governors who had given up the frontier places; and orders were iſſued to commence hoſtilities againſt the French, both by ſea and land.

Mean while, the duke of Cumberland took poſt with his whole army between the two Nethes, to cover Bergen-op-zoom and Maeſtricht; and mareſchal Saxe called in his detachments, with a view to hazard a general engagement. In the latter end of May, the French king arrived at Bruſſels; and his general reſolved to undertake the ſiege of Maeſtricht. For this purpoſe he advanced towards Louvain; and the confederates perceiving his drift, began their march to take poſt between the town and the enemy. On the 20th day of June, they took poſſeſſion of their ground, and were drawn up in order of battle, with their right at Bilſen, and their left extending to Wirle, within a mile of Maeſtricht, having in the front of their left-wing the village of Laffeldt, in which they poſted ſeveral battalions of Britiſh infantry. The French had taken poſſeſſion of the heights of Herdeeren, immediately above the allies; and both armies cannonaded each other till the evening. In the morning, the enemy's infantry marched down the hill, in a prodigious column, and attacked the village of Laffeldt, which was well fortified, and defended with amazing obſtinacy. The aſſailants ſuffered terribly in their approach, from the cannon of the confederates, which was ſerved with ſurprizing dexterity and ſucceſs; and they met with ſuch a warm reception from the Britiſh muſquetry as they could not withſtand: but, when they were broken and diſperſed, freſh brigades ſucceeded with aſtoniſhing perſeverance. The confederates were driven out of the village: yet being ſuſtained by three regiments, they meaſured bac their ground, and repulſed the enemy with great ſlaughter. Nevertheleſs, counte Saxe continued pouring in other battalions, and the French regained and maintained their footing in the village, after it had been three times loſt and carried. The action was chiefly confined to this poſt, where the field exhibited a horrible ſcene of carnage. At noon the duke of Cumberland ordered the whole left-wing to advance againſt the enemy, whoſe infantry gave way: prince Waldeck led up the centre: mareſchal Bathiani made a motion with the right-wing towards Herdeeren, and victory ſeemed ready to declare for the confederates, when the fortune of the day took a ſudden turn to their prejudice. Several ſquadrons of Dutch horſe, poſted in the centre, gave way, and flying at full gallop, overthrew five battalions of infantry that were advancing from the body of reſerve. The French cavalry charged them with great impetuoſity, increaſing the confuſion that was already produced, and penetrating through the lines of the allied army, which was thus divided about the centre. The duke of Cumberland, who exerted himſelf with equal courage and activity in attempting to remedy this diſorder, was in danger of being taken; and the defeat would in all probability have been total, had not Sir John Ligonier taken the reſolution of ſacrificing himſelf and a part of the troops to the ſafety of the army. At the head of three Britiſh regiments of dragoons, and ſome ſquadrons of imperial horſe, he charged the whole line of the French cavalry, with ſuch intrepidity and ſucceſs, that he overthrew all that oppoſed him, and made ſuch a diverſion as enabled the duke of Cumberland to effect an orderly retreat to Maeſtricht. He himſelf was taken by a French carabineer, after his horſe had been killed: but the regiments he commanded retired with deliberation. The confederates retreated to Maeſtricht, without having ſuſtained much damage from the purſuit, and even brought off all their artillery, except 16 pieces of cannon. Their loſs did not exceed 6000 men killed and taken; whereas the French general purchaſed the victory at a much greater expence. The common cauſe of the confederate powers is ſaid to have ſuffered from the pride and ignorance of their generals. On the eve of the battle, when the detachment of the count de Clermont appeared on the hill of Herdeeren, mareſchal Bathiana aſked permiſſion of the commander in chief to attac them before they ſhould be re-enforced, declaring he would anſwer for the ſucceſs of the enterprize. No regard was paid to this propoſal: but the ſuperior aſked in his turn where the mareſchal would be in caſe he ſhould be wanted? He replied, 'I ſhall always be found at the head of my troops,' and retired in diſguſt. The ſubſequent diſpoſition has likewiſe been blamed, inaſmuch as not above one-half of the army could act, while the enemy exerted their whole force.

The confederates paſſed the Maeſe, and encamped in the duchy of Limburg, ſo as to cover Maeſtricht; while the French king remained with his army in the neighbourhood of Tongres. Mareſchal Saxe, having amuſed the allies with marches and counter-marches, at length detached count Lowendahl with 36,000 men to beſiege Bergen-op-zoom, the ſtrongeſt fortification of Dutch Brabant, the favourite work of the famous engineer Coehorn, never conquered, and generally eſteemed invincible. It was ſecured with a garriſon of 3000 men, and well provided with artillery, ammunition, and magazines. The enemy appeared before it on the 12th day of July, and ſummoned the governor to ſurrender. The prince of Saxe Hildburghauſen was ſent to its relief, with 20 battalions and 14 ſquadrons of the troops that could be moſt conveniently aſſembled: he entered the lines of Bergen-op-zoom, where he remained in expectation of a ſtrong re-enforcement from the confederate army; and the old baron Cronſtrom, whom the ſtadtholder had appointed governor of Brabant, aſſumed the command of the garriſon. The beſiegers carried on the operations with great vivacity; and the troops in the town defended it with equal vigour. The eyes of all Europe were turned upon this important ſiege: count Lowendahl received divers re-enforcements; and a conſiderable body of troops was detached from the allied army, under the command of baron Schwartzemberg, to co-operate with the prince of Saxe-Hildburghauſen. The French general loſt a great number of men by the cloſe and continual fire of the beſieged; while he, in his turn, opened ſuch a number of batteries, and plied them ſo warmly, that the defenſes began to give way. From the 16th day of July to the 15th of September, the ſiege produced an unintermitting ſcene of horror and deſtruction: deſperate ſallies were made, and mines ſprung with the moſt dreadful effects: the works began to be ſhattered: the town was laid in aſhes; the trenches were filled with carnage: nothing was ſeen but fire and ſmoke; nothing heard but one continual roar of bombs and cannon. But, ſtill the damage fell chiefly on the beſiegers, who were ſlain in heaps; while the garriſon ſuffered very little, and could be occaſionally relieved or re-enforced from the lines. In a word, it was generally believed that count Lewendhalt would be baffled in his endeavours; and by this belief the governor of Bergen-op-zoom ſeems to have been lulled into a blind ſecurity. At length, ſome inconſiderable breaches were made in one ravelin and two baſtions, and theſe the French general reſolved to ſtorm, though Conſtrom believed they were impracticable; and on that ſuppoſition preſumed that the enemy would not attempt an aſſault. For this very reaſon count Lowendahl reſolved to hazard the attac, before the preparations ſhould be made for his reception. He accordingly regulated his diſpoſitions, and at four o'clock in the morning, on the 16th day of September, the ſignal was made for the aſſault. A prodigious quantity of bombs being thrown into the ravelin, his troops threw themſelves into the foſſé, mounted the breaches, forced open a ſally-port, and entered the place, almoſt without reſiſtance. In a word, they had time to extend themſelves along the curtains, and form in order of battle, before the garriſon could be aſſembled. Cronſtrom was aſleep, and the ſoldiers upon duty had been ſurpriſed by the ſuddenneſs and impetuoſity of the attac. Though the French had taken poſſeſſion of the ramparts, they did not gain the town without oppoſition. Two battalions of the Scottiſh troops, in the pay of the ſtates-general were aſſembled in the market-place, and attacked them with ſuch fury, that they were driven from ſtreet to ſtreet, until freſh re-enforcements arriving, compelled the Scots to retreat in their turn: yet, they diſputed every inch of ground, and fought until two-thirds of them were killed upon the ſpot. Then they brought off the old governor, abandoning the town to the enemy: the troops that were encamped in the lines retreating with great precipitation, all the forts in the neighbourhood immediately ſurrendered to the victors, who now became maſters of the whole navigation of the Schelde. The French king was no ſooner informed of Lowendahl's ſucceſs, then he promoted him to the rank of mareſchal of France; appointed count Saxe governor of the conquered netherlands; and returned in triumph to Verſailles. In a little time after this tranſaction, both armies were diſtributed into winter-quarters, and the duke of Cumberland embarked for England.

In Italy the French arms did not triumph with equal ſucceſs, though the mareſchal de Belleiſle ſaw himſelf at the head of a powerful army in Provence. In April he paſſed the Var without oppoſition, and took poſſeſſion of Nice. He met with little or no reſiſtance in reducing Montalban, Villafranca, and Vantimiglia; while general Brown, with 28,000 Auſtrians, retired towards Final and Savona. In the mean time, another large body, under count Schuylemberg, who had ſucceeded the marquis de Botta, co-operated with 15,000 Piedmonteſe in an attempt to recover the city of Genoa. The French king had ſent thither ſupplies, ſuccours, and engineers, with the duke of Boufflers, as ambaſſador to the republic, who likewiſe acted as commander in chief of the forces employed for its defence. The Auſtrian general aſſembled his troops in the Milaneſe: having forced the paſſage of the Rochetta on the 13th of January, he advanced into the territories of Genoa, and the Riviera was ravaged without mercy. On the laſt day of March he appeared before the city, at the head of 40,000 men, and ſummoned the revolters to lay down their arms. The anſwer he received was, that the republic had 54,000 men in arms, 260 cannon, 34 mortars, with abundance of ammunition and proviſion; that they would defend their liberty with their laſt blood, and be buried in the ruins of their capital, rather than ſubmit to the clemency of the court of Vienna, except by an honourable capitulation, guaranteed to the king of Great-Britain and Sardinia, the republic of Venice, and the United Provinces. In the beginning of May, Genoa was inveſted on all ſides; a furious ſally was made by the duke de Boufflours, who drove the beſiegers from their poſts; but the Auſtrians rallying, he was repulſed in his turn, with the loſs of 700 men. General Schuylemberg carried on his operations with ſuch ſkill, vigour, and intrepedity, that he made himſelf maſter of the ſuburbs of Biſagno; and in all probability would have reduced the city, had not he been obliged to deſiſt, in conſequence of the repeated remonſtrances made by the king of Sardinia and count Brown, who preſented the neceſſity of his abandoning his enterpriſe, and drawing off his army, to cover Piedmont and Lombardy from the efforts of mareſchal de Belleiſle. Accordingly, he raiſed the ſiege on the 10th day of June, and returned in the Milaneſe, in order to join his Sardinian majeſty: while the Genoeſe made an irruption into the Parmeſan and Placentin, where they committed terrible outragee, in revenge for the miſchiefs they had undergone.

While the mareſchal de Belliſle remained at Ventimiglia, his brother, at the head of 34,000 French and Spaniards, attempted to penetrate into Piedmont; on the 6th day of July he arrived at the paſs of Exilles, a ſtrong fortreſs on the frontiers of Dauphiné, ſituated on the north ſide of the river Doria. The defence of this important poſt the king of Sardinia had committed to the care of the count de Brigueras, who formed an encampment behind the lines, with 14 battalions of Piedmonteſe and Auſtrians, while divers detachments were poſted along all the paſſes of the Alps. On the 8th day of the month the Piedmonteſe entrenchments were attacked by the chevalier de Belleiſle, with incredible intrepidity: but the columns were repulſed with great loſs in three ſucceſſive attacs. Impatient of this obſtinate oppoſition, and determined not to ſurvive a miſcarriage, this impetuous general ſeiſed a pair of colours, and advancing at the head of his troops, through a prodigious fire, pitched them with his own hand on the enemy's entrenchments. At that inſtant he fell dead, having received two muſquet balls and the thruſt of a bayonet in his body. The aſſailants were ſo much diſpirited by the death of their commander, that they forthwith gave way, and reteated with precipitation towards Seſtrieres, having loſt near 5000 men in the attac. The mareſchal was no ſooner informed of his brother's misfortune than he retreated towards the Var, to join the troops from Exilles: while the king of Sardinia, having aſſembled an army of 70,000 men, threatened Dauphiné with an invaſion: but the exceſſive rains prevented the execution of his deſign. General Leutrum was detached with 20 battalions to drive the French from Ventimiglia; but, Belleiſle marching bac, that ſcheme was likewiſe fruſtrated: and thus ended the campaign.

In this manner was the French king baffled in his projects upon Italy: nor was he more fortunate in his naval operations. He had, in the preceding year, equipped an expenſive armament, under the command of the duke d'Anville, for the recovery of Cape-Breton: but it was rendered ineffectual by ſtorms, diſtempers, and the death of the commander. Not yet diſcouraged by theſe diſaſters, he reſolved to renew his efforts againſt the Britiſh colonies in North-America, and their ſettlements in the Eaſt-Indies. For theſe purpoſes two ſquadrons were prepared at Breſt, one to be commanded by the commodore De la Jonquiere; and the other, deſtined for India, by monſieur de St. George. The miniſtry of Great-Britain, being appriſed of theſe meaſures, reſoved to intercept both ſquadrons, which were to ſet ſail together. For this purpoſe vice-admiral Anſon and rear-admiral Warren took their departure from Plymouth with a formidable fleet, and ſteered their courſe to Cape-Finiſterre, on the coaſt of Gallacia. On the 3d day of May they fell in with the French ſquadrons commanded by la Jonquiere and St. George, conſiſting of 6 large ſhips of war, as many frigates and 4 armed veſſels equipped by their Eaſt-India company, having under their convoy about 30 ſhips laden with merchandize. Thoſe prepared for war immediately ſhortened ſail, and formed a line of battle; while the reſt under the protection of the 6 frigates, proceeded on their voyage with all the ſail they could carry. The Britiſh ſquadron was likewiſe drawn up in line of battle but mr. Warren perceiving that the enemy began to ſheer off, now their convoy was at a conſiderable diſtance, adviſed admiral Anſon to haul in the ſignal for the line, and hoiſt another for giving chaſe and engaging, otherwiſe the French would in all probability eſcape by favour of the night. The propoſal was embraced; and in a little time the engagement began with great fury, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The enemy ſuſtained the battle with equal conduct and valour, until they were overpowered by numbers and then they ſtruc their colours. The admiral detached 3 ſhips in purſuit of the convoy, 9 ſail of which were taken; but the reſt were ſaved by the intervening darkneſs. About 700 of the French were killed and wounded in this action. The Engliſh loſt about 500; and among theſe, captain Grenville, commander of the ſhip Defiance. He was nephew to the lord viſcount Cobham, a youth of the moſt amiable character and promiſing genius, animated with the nobleſt ſentiments of honour and patriotiſm. Eager in the purſuit of glory he ruſhed into the midſt of the battle, where both his legs were cut off by a cannon-ball. He ſubmitted to his fate with the moſt heroic reſignation, and died univerſally lamented and beloved. The ſucceſs of the Britiſh arms in this engagement was chiefly owing to the conduct, activity, and courage of the rear-admiral. A conſiderable quantity of bullion was found in the prizes, which were brought to Spithead in triumph; and the treaſure being landed, was conveyed in 20 waggons to the Bank of London. Admiral Anſon was enobled, and mr. Warren honoured with the order of the Bath.

About the middle of June, commodore Fox, with 6 ſhips of war, cruiſing in the latitude of Cape Ortegal in Gallacia, took above 40 French ſhips, richly laden from St. Domingo, after they had been abandoned by their convoy. But the French king ſuſtained another more important loſs at ſea, in the month of October. Rear-admiral Hawke ſailed from Plymouth in the beginning of Auguſt, with 14 ſhips of the line, to intercept a fleet of French merchants ſhips bound for the Weſt-Indies. He cruiſed for ſometime on the coaſt of Bretagne; and at length the French fleet ſailed from iſle the of Aix, under convoy of 9 ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, commanded by monſieur de Letendeur. On the 14th day of October the two ſquadrons were in ſight of each other, in the latitude of Belleiſle. The French commodore immediately ordered one of his great ſhips and the frigates to proceed with the trading ſhips, while he formed the line of battle, and waited the attac. At 11 in the forenoon admiral Hawke diſplayed the ſignal to chaſe, and in half an hour both fleets were engaged. The battle laſted till night, when all the the French ſquadron, except the Intrepide and Tonant, had ſtruc to the Engliſh flag. Theſe two capital ſhips eſcaped in the dark, and returned to Breſt in a ſhattered condition. The French captains ſuſtained the unequal fight with uncommon bravery and reſolution, and did not yield until their ſhips were diſabled. Their loſs in men amounted to 800: the number of Engliſh killed in this engagement did not exceed 200, including captain Saumarez, a gallant officer, who had ſerved under lord Anſon in his expedition to the Pacific Ocean. Indeed, it muſt be owned, for the honour of that nobleman, that all the officers formed under his example, and raiſed by his influence, approved themſelves in all reſpects worthy of the commands to which they were preferred. Immediately after the action, admiral Hawke diſpatched a ſloop to commodore Legge, whoſe ſquadron was ſtationed at the Leeward Iſlands, with intelligence of the French fleet of merchant-ſhips, outward bound, that he might take the proper meaſures for intercepting them in their paſſage to Martinique, and the other French iſlands. In conſequence of this advice, he redoubled his vigilance, and a good number of them fell into his hands. Admiral Hawke conducted his prizes to Spithead; and in his letter to the board of admiralty declared that all his captains behaved like men of honour during the engagement, except mr. Fox, whoſe conduct he deſired might be ſubjected to an enquiry. That gentleman was accordingly tried by a court-martial, and ſuſpended from his command, for having followed the advice of his officers, contrary to his own better judgment: but he was ſoon reſtored, and afterwards promoted to the rank of admiral: while mr. Matthews, whoſe courage never incurred ſuſpicion, ſtill laboured under a ſuſpenſion for that which had been ſucceſsfully practiſed in both theſe late actions, namely, engaging the enemy without any regard to the line of battle.

In the Mediterranean, vice-admiral Medley blocked up the Spaniſh Squadron in Carthagena; aſſiſted the Auſtrian general on the coaſt of Villafranca; and intercepted ſome of the ſuccours ſent from France to the aſſiſtance of the Genoeſe. At his death, which happened in the beginning of Auguſt, the command of that ſquadron devolved upon rear-admiral Byng, who proceeded upon the ſame plan of operation. In the ſummer, two Britiſh ſhips of war, having under their convoy a fleet of merchant-ſhips bound to North America, fell in with the Glorioſo, a Spaniſh ſhip of 80 guns, in the latitude of the Weſtern Iſles. She had ſailed from the Havannah, with an immenſe treaſure on board, and muſt have fallen a prize to the Engliſh ſhips, had each captain done his duty. Captain Erſkine, in the Warwick, of 60 guns, attacked her with great intrepidity, and fought until his ſhip was entirely diſabled: but being unſuſtained by his conſort, he was obliged to haul off, and the Glorioſo arrived in ſafety at Ferrol: there the ſilver was landed, and ſhe proceeded on her voyage to Cadiz, which however, ſhe did not reach. She was encountered by the Dartmouth, a Britiſh frigate of 40 guns, commanded by captain Hamilton, a gallant youth, who, notwithſtanding the inequality of force, engaged her without heſitation: but in the heat of the action, his ſhip being ſet on fire by accident, was blown up, and he periſhed with all his crew, except a midſhipman and ten or eleven ſailors, who were taken up alive by a privateer that happened to be in ſight. Favourable as this accident may ſeem to the Glorioſo, ſhe did not eſcape. An Engliſh ſhip of 80 guns, under the command of captain Buckle, came up and obliged the Spaniards to ſurrender, after a ſhort but vigorous engagement. Commodore Griffin had been ſent, with a re-enforcement of ſhips to aſſume the command of the ſquadron in the Eaſt-Indies; and although his arrival ſecured Fort St. David's, and the other Britiſh ſettlements in that country, from the inſults of Monſieur de la Bourdonnais, his ſtrength was not ſufficient to enable him to undertake any enterpriſe of importance againſt the enemy: the miniſtry of England, therefore, reſolved to equip a freſh armament, that when joined by the ſhips in India ſhould be in a condition to beſiege Pondicherry, the principal ſettlement belonging to the French on the coaſt of Coromandel. For this ſervice, a good number of independent companies was raiſed, and ſet ſail, in the ſequel, with a ſtrong ſquadron under the conduct of rear-admiral Boſcowen, an officer of unqueſtioned valour and capacity. In the courſe of this year, the Britiſh cruiſers were ſo alert and ſucceſsful, that they took 644 prizes from the French and Spaniards; whereas the loſs of Great-Britain in the ſame time, did not exceed 550.

All the billigerent powers were by this time heartily tired of a war which had conſumed an immenſity of treaſure, had been productive of ſo much miſchief, and in the events of which all, in their turns, had found themſelves diſappointed. Immediately after the battle of Laffeldt, the king of France had in a perſonal converſation with ſir John Ligonier, expreſſed his deſire of a pacification; and afterwards his miniſter at the Hague preſented a declaration on the ſame ſubject to the deputies of the ſtates-general. The ſignal ſucceſs of the Britiſh arms at ſea confirmed him in theſe ſentiments, which were likewiſe re-enforced by a variety of other conſiderations. His finances were almoſt exhauſted, and his ſupplies from the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies rendered ſo precа-

rious by the vigilance of the Britiſh cruiſers, that he could no longer depend upon their arrival. The trading part of his ſubjects had ſuſtained ſuch loſſes, that his kingdom was filled with bankruptcies; and the beſt part of his navy now contributed to ſtrengthen the fleets of his enemies. The election of a ſtadtholder had united the whole power of the ſtates-general againſt him, in taking the moſt reſolute meaſures for their own ſafety: his views in Germany were entirely fruſtrated by the elevation of the grand-duke to the imperial throne, and the re-eſtabliſhment of peace between the houſes of Auſtria and Brandenburgh: the ſucceſs of his arms in Italy had not at all anſwered his expectation; and Genoa was become an expenſive ally. He had the mortification to ſee the commerce of Britain flouriſh in the midſt of war, while his own people were utterly impoveriſhed. The parliament of England granted, and the nation paid ſuch incredible ſums as enabled their ſovereign not only to maintain invincible navies and formidable armies, but likewiſe to give ſubſidies to all the powers of Europe. He knew that a treaty of this kind was actually upon the anvil between his Britannick majeſty and the czarina, and he began to be apprehenſive of ſeeing an army of the Ruſſians in the Netherlands. His fears from this quarter were not without foundation. In the month of November, the earl of Hyndford, embaſſador from the king of Great-Britain at the court of Ruſſia, concluded a treaty of ſubſidy, by which the czarina engaged to hold in readineſs 30,000 men, and 40 gallies: to be employed in the ſervice of the confederates, on the firſt requiſition. The ſtates-general acceded to this agreement, and even conſented to pay one-fourth of the ſubſidy. His moſt chriſtian majeſty, moved by theſe conſiderations, made further advances towards an accommodation both at the Hague and in London; and the contending powers agreed to another congreſs, which was actually opened in March at Aix-la-Chapelle, where the earl of Sandwich and ſir Thomas Robinſon aſſiſted as plenipotentiaries from the king of Great-Britain

The elections for the new parliament in England had been conducted ſo as fully to anſwer the purpoſes of the duke of Newcaſtle, and his brother mr. Pelham, who had for ſome time wholly engroſſed the adminiſtration. Both houſes were aſſembled on the 10th day of November, when mr. Onſlow was unanimouſly re-elected ſpeaker of the commons. The ſeſſion was opened, as uſual, by a ſpeech from the throne, congratulating them on the ſignal ſucceſſes of the Britiſh navy, and the happy alteration in the government of the United-Provinces. His majeſty gave them to underſtand, that a congreſs would ſpeedily be opened at Aix-la-Chapelle, to concert the means for effecting a general pacification; and reminding them that nothing would more conduce to the ſucceſs of this negotiation than the vigour and unanimity of their proceedings. He received ſuch addreſſes as the miniſters were pleaſed to dictate. Oppoſition now languiſhed at their feet. The duke of Bedford was become a courtier, and in a little time appointed ſecretary of ſtate, in the room of the earl of Cheſterfield, who had lately executed that office which he now reſigned; and the earl of Sandwich no longer harangued againſt the adminiſtration. This new houſe of commons, in imitation of the liberality of their predeceſſors, readily gratified all the requeſts of the government. They voted 40,000 ſeamen, 49,000 land-forces, beſides 11,500 marines; the ſubſidies for the queen of Hungary, the czarina, the king of Sardinia, the electors of Mentz and Bavaria, the Heſſians, and the duke of Wolfenbuttel: the ſum of 235,749l. was granted to the provinces of New-England, to re-imburſe them for the expence of reducing Cape-Breton: 500,000l. were given to his majeſty for the vigorous proſecution of the war; and about 152,000l. to the Scottiſh claimants, in lieu of their juriſdiction. The ſupplies for the the enſuing year fell very little ſhort of nine millions, of which the greater part was raiſed on a loan by ſubſcription, chargeable on a new ſubſidy of poundage exacted from all merchandiſe imported into Great-Britain. Immediately after the rebellion was ſuppreſſed the legiſlature had eſtabliſhed ſome regulations in Scotland, which were thought neceſſary to prevent ſuch commotions for the future. The Highlanders were diſarmed, and an act paſſed, for aboliſhing their peculiarity of garb, which was ſuppoſed to keep up party-diſtinctions, to encourage their martial diſpoſition, and preſerve the memory of the exploits achieved by their anceſtors. In this ſeſſion a bill was brought in to enforce the execution of that law, and paſſed with another act, for the more effectual puniſhment of high-treaſon in the Highlands of Scotland.

[1478] The practice of inſuring French and Spaniſh ſhips at London being deemed the ſole circumſtance that prevented a total ſtagnation of commerce in thoſe countries, it was appropriated by law under ſevere penalties; and this of the Britiſh parliament accelerated the concluſion of the treaty. Several other prudent meaſures were taken in the courſe of this ſeſſion, for the benefit of the public; and among theſe we may reckon an act for encouraging the manufacture of indigo in the Britiſh plantations of North-America; an article for Great-Britain uſed to pay 200,000l. yearly to the ſubjects of France. The ſeſſion was cloſed on the 13th day of May, when the king declared to both houſes, that the preliminaries of a general peace were actually ſigned at Aix-la-Chapelle by the miniſters of Great-Britain, France, and the United-Provinces; and that the baſis of this accommodation was a general reſtitution of the conqueſts which had been made during the war. Immediately after the prorogation of parliament his majeſty ſet out for his German dominions, after having appointed a regency to rule the realm in his abſence.

The articles might have been made much leſs unfavourable to Great-Britain and her allies, had the miniſtry made a proper uſe of the treaty with the czarina; and if the confederates had acted with more vigour and expedition in the beginning of the campaign. The Ruſſian auxiliaries might have been tranſported by ſea to Lubeck before the end of the preceeding ſummer, in their own gallies which had been lying ready for uſe ſince the month of July. Had this expedient been uſed, the Ruſſian troops would have joined the confederate army before the concluſion of the laſt campaign. But this eaſy and expeditious method of conveyance was rejected for a march by land, of incredible length and difficulty, which could not be begun before the month of January, nor accompliſhed till Midſummer. The operations of the campaign had been concerted at the Hague in January, by the reſpective miniſters of the allies, who reſolved to bring an army of 190,000 men into the Netherlands, in order to compel the French to abandon the barrier which they had conquered. The towns of Holland became the ſcenes of tumult and inſurrection. The populace plundered the farmers of the revenue, aboliſhed the taxes, and inſulted the magiſtrates; ſo that the ſtates-general, ſeeing their country on the brink of anarchy and confuſion, authorized the prince of Orange to make ſuch alterations as he ſhould ſee convenient. They preſented him with a diploma, by which he was conſtituted hereditary ſtadtholder and captain-general of Dutch Brabant, Flanders, and the upper quarter of Guelderland; and the Eaſt-India company appointed him director and governor-general of their commerce and ſettlements in the Indies. Thus inveſted with an authority unknown to his anceſtors, he exerted himſelf with equal induſtry and diſcretion in new-modelling, augmenting, and aſſembling the troops of the republic. The confederates knew that the count de Saxe had a deſign upon Maeſtricht; the Auſtrian general Bathiani made repeated remonſtrances to the Britiſh miniſtry, entreating them to take ſpeedy meaſures for the preſervation of that fortreſs. He in the month of January propoſed that the duke of Cumberland ſhould croſs the ſea, and confer with the prince of Orange on this ſubject: he undertook, at the peril of his head, to cover Maeſtricht with 70,000 men, from all attacs of the enemy: but his repreſentation ſeemed to have made very little impreſſion on thoſe to whom they were addreſſed. The duke of Cumberland did not depart from England till towards the latter end of February: part of March was elapſed, before the tranſports ſailed from the Nore with the additional troops and artillery; and the laſt drafts from the foot-guards were not embarked till the middle of Auguſt.

The different bodies of the confederate forces joined each other, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Ruremond, to the number of 110,000 men; and the French army inveſted Maeſtricht, without oppoſition, on the 3d day of April. The garriſon conſiſted of imperial and Dutch troops, under the conduct of the governor, Baron d'Aylva, who defended the place with extraordinary ſkill and reſolution. He annoyed the beſiegers in repeated ſallies; but they were determined to ſurmount all oppoſition, and proſecuted their approaches with incredible ardour. They aſſaulted the covered-way, and there effected a lodgement, after an obſtinate diſpute, in which they loſt 2000 of their beſt troops: but, next day they were entirely diſlodged by the gallantry of the garriſon. Theſe hoſtilities were ſuddenly ſuſpended, in conſequence of the preliminaries ſigned at Aix-la-Chapelle. The plenipotentiaries agreed, that, for the glory of his chriſtian majeſty's arms, the town of Maeſtricht ſhould be ſurrendered to his general, on condition that it ſhould be reſtored, with all the magazines and artillery. He accordingly took poſſeſſion of it on the 3d day of May, when the garriſon marched out with all the honours of war, and a ceſſation of arms immediately enſued. By this time the Ruſſian auxiliaries, to the number of 37,000, commanded by prince Repnin, had arrived in Moravia, where they were reviewed by their imperial majeſties: then they proceeded to the confines of Franconia, where they were ordered to halt, after they had marched 700 miles ſince the beginning of the year. The French king declared, that ſhould they advance farther, he would demoliſh the fortifications of Maeſtricht and Bergen-op-zoom. This diſpute was referred to the plenipotentiaries, who, in the beginning of Auguſt, concluded a convention, importing, that the Ruſſian troops ſhould return to their own country; and that the French king ſhould diſband an equal number of his forces. The ſeaſon being far advanced, the Ruſſians were provided with winter-quarters in Bohemia and Moravia, where they continued till the ſpring, when they marched bac to Livonia. In the mean time 37,000 French troops were withdrawn from Flanders into Picardy, and the two armies remained quiet till the concluſion of the definitive treaty. The ſuſpenſion of arms was proclaimed at London, and in all the capitals of the contracting powers: orders were ſent to the reſpective admirals in different parts of the world, to refrain from hoſtilities; and a communication of trade and intelligence was again opened between the nations which had been at variance. No material tranſaction diſtinguiſhed the campaign in Italy. The French and Spaniſh troops, who had joined the Genoeſe in the territories of the republic, amounted to 30,000 men, under the direction of the duke de Richelieu, who was ſent from France to aſſume that command, on the death of the duke de Boufflers; while mareſchal de Belleiſle, at the head of 50,000 men, covered the weſtern Riviera, which was threatened with an invaſion by 40,000 Auſtrians and Piedmonteſe, under general Leutrum. At the ſame time general Brown, with a more numerous army, prepared to re-enter the eaſtern Riviera, and re-commence the ſiege of Genoa. But theſe intended operations were prevented by an armiſtice, which took place as ſoon as the belligerent powers had acceeded to the preliminaries.

In the Eaſt-Indies, rear-Admiral Boſcawen undertook the ſiege of Pondicherry, which, in the month of Auguſt, he blocked up by ſea with his ſquadron, and inveſted by land with a ſmall army of 4000 Europeans, and about 2000 natives of that country. He proſecuted the enterpriſe with great ſpirit, and took the fort of Area-Coupan, at the diſtance of three miles from the town: then he made his approaches to the place, againſt which he opened batteries, while it was bombarded and cannonaded by the ſhipping. But the fortifications were ſo ſtrong, the garriſons ſo numerous, and the engineers of the enemy ſo expert in their profeſſion, that he made very little progreſs, and ſuſtained conſiderable damage. At length, his army being diminiſhed by ſickneſs, and the rainy ſeaſon approaching he ordered the artillery and ſtores to be re-embarked; and raiſing the ſiege on the 6th day of October, returned to fort St. David, after having loſt about a thouſand men in this expedition. In the ſequel, ſeveral ſhips of his ſquadron, and above 1200 ſailors, periſhed in a hurricane. The naval force of Great-Britain was more ſucceſsful in the Weſt-Indies. Rear-admiral Knowles, with a ſquadron of eight ſhips, attacked Fort Louis, on the ſouth ſide of Hiſpaniola, which after a warm action of three hours was ſurrendered on capitulation, and diſmantled. Then he made an abortive attempt upon St. Jago de Cuba, and returned to Jamaica, extremely chagrined at his diſappointment, which he imputed to the miſconduct of captain Dent, who was tried in England by a court-martial, and honourably acquitted. On the 1ſt day of October, the ſame admiral cruiſing in the neighbourhood of the Hvannah, with eight ſhips of the line, encountered a Spaniſh ſquadron of nearly the ſame ſtrength, under the command of the admirals Reggio and Spinola. The engagement began between two and three o'clock in the afternoon, and continued with intervals till eight in the evening, when the enemy retired to the Havannah, with the loſs of two ſhips; one of which ſtruc to the Britiſh admiral, and the other was, two days after, ſet on fire by her own commander, that ſhe might not fall into the hands of the Engliſh. Mr Knowles taxed ſome of his captains with miſbehavour, and they recriminated on his conduct. On their return to England, a court-martial was the conſequence of their mutual accuſations. Thoſe who adhered to the commander, and the others whom he impeached, were inflamed againſt each other with the moſt rancorus reſentment. The admiral himſelf did not eſcape uncenſured: two of his captains were reprimanded: but captain Holmes, who had diſplayed uncommon courage, was honourably acquitted. Their animoſity did not end with the court-martial. A bloodleſs encounter happened between the admiral and captain Powlet: but captain Innes and captain Clarke, meeting by appointment in Hyde-park with piſtols, the former was mortally wounded, and died next morning; the latter was tried, and condemned for murder, but indulged with his majeſty's pardon. No naval tranſaction of any conſequence happened in the European ſeas, during the courſe of this ſummer. In January, indeed, the Magnanine, a French ſhip of the line, was taken in the channel by two Engliſh cruiſers, after an obſtinate engagement; and the privateers took a conſiderable number of merchant ſhips from the enemy.

The plenipotentiaries ſtill continued at Aix-la-Chapelle, diſcuſſing all the articles of the definitive treaty, which was at length concluded and ſigned on the 7th day of October. It was founded on former treaties, which were now expreſsly confirmed, from that of Weſtphalia to the laſt concluded at London and Vienna. The contracting parties agreed, That all priſoners on each ſide ſhould be mutually releaſed, without ranſom, and all conqueſts reſtored: that the duchies of Parma, Placentia, and Guaſtalla ſhould be ceded as a ſettlement to the infant don Philip, and the heirs-male of his body; but in caſe of his aſcending the throne of Spain, or of the two Sicilies, or his dying without male-iſſue, that they ſhould revert to the houſe of Auſtria: that the king of Great-Britain ſhould, immediately after the ratification of this treaty, ſend two perſons of rank and diſtinction, to reſide in France, as hoſtages, until reſtitution ſhould be made of Cape-Breton, and all the other conqueſts which his Britannic majeſty ſhould have achieved in the Eaſt or Weſt-Indies, before or after the preliminaries were ſigned: that the aſſiento-contract, with the article of the annual ſhip, ſhould be confirmed for four years, during which the enjoyment of that privilege was ſuſpended ſince the commencement of the preſent war: that Dunkirk ſhould remain fortified on the land ſide, and towards the ſea continue on the footing of former treaties. All the contracting powers became guarantees to the king of Pruſſia for the duchy of Sileſia and the country of Glatz as he at preſent poſſeſſed them; and they likewiſe engaged to ſecure the empreſs-queen of Hungary and Bohemia in poſſeſſion of her hereditary dominions, according to the pragmatic ſanction. The other articles regulated the forms and times fixed for this mutual reſtitution, as well as for the termination of hoſtilities in different parts of the world. But the right of Engliſh ſubjects to navigate in the American ſeas, without being ſubject to ſearch, was not once mentioned, though this claim was the original ſource of the differences between Great-Britain and Spain: nor were the limits of Acadia aſcertained. This and all other diſputes were left to the diſcuſſion of commiſſaries. We have already obſerved, that after the troubles of the empire began, the war was no longer maintained on Britiſh principles. It became a continental conteſt, and was proſecuted on the ſide of the allies without conduct, ſpirit, or unanimity. In the Netherlands they were out-numbered and outwitted by the enemy. They never hazarded a battle without ſuſtaining a defeat. Their vaſt armies, paid by Great-Britain, lay inactive, and beheld one fortreſs reduced after another, until the whole country was ſubdued; and as their generals fought their plenipotentiaries negotiated. At a time when their affairs began to wear the moſt promiſing aſpect; when the arrival of the Ruſſian auxiliaries would have ſecured an undoubted ſuperiority in the field; when the Britiſh fleets had trampled on the naval power of France and Spain, intercepted their ſupplies of treaſure, and cut off all their reſources of commerce; the Britiſh miniſters ſeemed to treat, without the leaſt regard to the honour and advantage of their country. They left her moſt valuable and neceſſary rights of trade unowned and undecided: they ſubſcribed to the inſolent demand of ſending the nobles of the realm to grace the court, and adorn the triumphs of her enemy: and they tamely gave up her conqueſts in North-America, of more conſequence to her traffic than all the other dominions for which the powers at war contended: they gave up the important iſle of Cape-Breton, in exchange for a petty factory in the Eaſt-Indies, belonging to a private company, whoſe exiſtence had been deemed prejudicial to the common-wealth. What then were the fruits which Britain reaped from this long and deſperate war? A dreadful expence of blood and treaſure,[z] diſgrace upon diſgrace, an additional load of grievous impoſitions, and the national debt accumulated to the enormous ſum of eighty millions ſterling.

The peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, however unſtable or inglorious it might appear to thoſe few who underſtood the intereſts, and felt for the honour of their country, was nevertheleſs not unwelcome to the nation in general. The Britiſh miniſtry will always find it more difficult to ſatisfy the people at the end of a ſucceſsful campaign, than at the concluſion of an unfortunate war. The Engliſh are impatient of miſcarriage and diſappointment, and too apt to be intoxicated with victory. At this period they were tired of the burthens, and ſic of the diſgraces, to which they had been expoſed in the courſe of ſeven tedious campaigns. They had ſuffered conſiderable loſſes and interruption in the article of commerce, which was the ſource of their national opulence and power: they knew it would neceſſarily be clogged with additional duties, for the maintenance of a continental war, and the ſupport of foreign ſubſidiaries; and they drew very fain preſages of future ſucceſs either from the conduct of their allies, or the capacity of their commanders. To a people influenced by theſe conſiderations, the reſtoration of a free trade, the reſpite from that anxiety and ſuſpence which the proſecution of a war never fails to engender, and the proſpect of a ſpeedy deliverance from diſcouraging reſtraint and oppreſſive impoſitions, were advantages that ſweetened the bitter draught of a diſhonourable treaty, and induced the majority of the nation to acquieſce in the peace, not barely without murmuring, but even with ſome degree of ſatisfaction and applauſe.

Immediately after the exchange of ratification at Aix-la-Chapelle the armies were broke up: the allies in the Netherlands withdrew their ſeveral proportions of troops; the French began to evacuate Flanders; and the Engliſh forces were re-embarked for their own country. His Britannick majeſty returned from his German dominions in November, having landed near Margate, in Kent, after a dangerous paſſage; and on the 29th of the ſame month he opened the ſeſſion of parliament. By this time the miſunderſtanding between the two firſt perſonages of the royal family had been increaſed by a freſh acceſſion of matter. The prince of Wales had held a court of ſtannary, in quality of duke of Cornwall; and revived ſome claims attached to that dignity, which, had they been admitted, would have greatly augmented his influence among the Corniſh boroughs. Theſe efforts rouſed the jealouſy of the adminiſtration, which had always conſidered them as an intereſt wholly dependent on the crown; and therefore, the pretenſions of his royal highneſs were oppoſed by the whole weight of the miniſtry. His adherents, reſenting theſe hoſtilities as an injury to their royal maſter, immediately joined the remnant of the former oppoſition in parliament, and reſolved to counteract all the miniſterial meaſures that ſhould fall under their cognizance; at leaſt, they determined to ſeiſe every opportunity of thwarting the ſervants of the crown, in every ſcheme or propoſal that had not an evident tendency to the advantage of the nation. This band of auxiliaries was headed by the earl of E—t, dr. Lee, and mr. N—t. The firſt poſſeſſed a ſpecies of eloquence rather plauſible than powerful: he ſpoke with fluency and fire: his ſpirit was bold and enterpriſing, his apprehenſion quic, and his repartee ſevere. Dr Lee was a man of extenſive erudition and irreproachable morals, particularly verſed in the civil law, which he profeſſed, and perfectly well acquainted with the conſtitution of his country, mr. N—t was an orator of midling abilities, who harangued upon all ſubjects indiſcriminately, and ſupplied with confidence what he wanted in capacity: he had been at ſome pains to ſtudy the buſineſs of the houſe, as well as to underſtand the machine of government; and was tolerably well heard, as he generally ſpoke with an appearance of good humour, and hazarded every whimſical idea, as it roſe in his imagination. But lord Bolingbrooke is ſaid to have been the chief ſpring which, in ſecret, actuated the deliberations of the princes, court. That nobleman, ſeemingly ſequeſtered from the tumults of a public life, reſided at Batterſea, where he was viſited like a ſainted ſhrine by all the diſtinguiſhed votaries of wit, eloquence, and political ambition. There he was cultivated and admired for the elegance of his manners, and the charms of his converſations The prince's curioſity was firſt captivated by his character, and his eſteem was afterwards ſecured by the irreſiſtible addreſs of that extraordinary perſonage, who continued in a regular progreſſion to inſinuate himſelf ſtill farther and farther into the good graces of his royal patron. How far the conduct of his royal highneſs was influenced by the private advice of this nobleman we ſhall not pretend to determine; but, certain it is, the friends of the miniſtry propagated a report, that he was the dictator of thoſe meaſures which the prince adopted; and that, under the ſpecious pretext of attachment to the heir apparent of the crown, he concealed his real aim, which was to perpetuate the breach in the royal family. Whatever his ſentiments and motives might have been, this was no other than a revival of the old miniſterial clamour, that a man cannot be well affected to the king, if he pretends to cenſure any meaſure of the adminiſtation.

The weight which the oppoſition derived from theſe new confederates in the houſe of commons was ſtill greatly overbalanced by the power, influence, and ability that ſuſtained every miniſterial project. Mr Pelham, who chiefly managed the helm of affairs, was generally eſteemed as a man of honeſty and candour, actuated by a ſincere love for his country, though he had been educated in erroneous principles of government, and in ſome meaſure obliged to proſecute a fatal ſyſtem, which deſcended to him by inheritance. At this time he numbered mr. Pitt among his fellow-miniſters. and was moreover ſupported by many other individuals of diſtinguiſhed abilities; among whom the firſt place, in point of genius, was due to mr. M. who executed the office of ſollicitor-general. This gentleman, the ſon of a noble family in North-Britain, had raiſed himſelf to great eminence at the bar, by a moſt keen intuitive ſpirit of apprehenſion, that ſeemed to ſeize every object at firſt glance, an innate ſagacity, that ſaved the trouble of intenſe application, and an irreſiſtible ſtream of eloquence, that flowed pure and claſſical, ſtrong and copious, reflecting, in the moſt conſpicuous point of view, the ſubjects over which it rolled, and ſweeping before it all the ſlime of formal heſitation, and all the entangling weeds of chicanery. Yet, the ſervants of the crown were not ſo implicitly attached to the firſt miniſter as to acquieſce in all his plans, and dedicate their time and talents to the ſupport of every court-meaſure indiſcriminately. This was one material point in which mr. Pelham deviated from the maxims of his predeceſſor, who admitted of no contradiction from any of his adherents or fellow-ſervants, but inſiſted on ſacrificing their whole perception and faculties to his conduct and diſpoſal. That ſordid deference to a miniſter no longer characteriſed the ſubordinate inſtruments of the adminiſtration. It was not unuſual to ſee the great officers of the government divided in a parliamentary debate, and to hear the ſecretary at war oppoſing with great vehemence a clauſe ſuggeſted by the chancellor of the exchequer. After all, if we coolly conſider thoſe arguments which have been bandied about, and retorted with ſuch eagerneſs and acrimony in the houſe of commons, and diveſt them of thoſe paſſionate tropes and declamatory metaphors which the ſpirit of oppoſition alone had produced, we ſhall find very little left for the ſubject of diſpute, and ſometimes be puzzled to diſcover any material ſource of diſagreement.

In the month of November his majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament; with a ſpeech, acquainting them, That the definitive treaty of peace was at length ſigned by all the parties concerned: That he had made the moſt effectual proviſion for ſecuring the rights and intereſts of his own ſubjects; and procured for his allies the beſt conditions, which, in the preſent ſituation of affairs, could be obtained. He ſaid he had found a general good diſpoſition in all parties to bring the negotiation to a happy concluſion; and obſerved, that we might promiſe ourſelves a long enjoyment of the bleſſings of peace. Finally, after having remarked that times of tranquillity were the proper ſeaſons for leſſening the national debt, and ſtrengthening the kingdom againſt future events, he reccommended to the commons the improvement of the public revenue, the maintenance of a conſiderable naval force, the advancement of commerce, and the cultivation of the arts of peace. This ſpeech, as uſual, was echoed bac by an addreſs to the throne from both houſes, containing general expreſſions of the warmeſt loyalty and gratitude to his majeſty, and implying the moſt perfect ſatisfaction and acquieſcence in the articles of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle.

[z] Such an expenſive war could not be maintained without a very extraordinary exertion of a commercial ſpirit: accordingly, we find that Great-Britain, ſince the death of king William, has riſen under her preſſures with increaſed vigour and perſeverance. Whether it be owing to the natural progreſſion of trade extending itſelf from its origin to its acme or ne plus ultra, or to the encouragement given by the adminiſtration to monied men of all denominations; or to neceſſity, impelling thoſe who can no longer live on ſmall incomes to riſque their capitals in traffic, that they may have a chance for bettering their fortunes; or, laſtly, to a concurrence of all theſe cauſes; certain it is, the national exports and imports have been ſenſibly increaſing for theſe forty years: the early medium of woolen exports, from the year 1738 to 1743 incluſive, amounted to about three millions and an half, which was a yearly increaſe on the medium, of 500,000l. above the medium from 1718 to 1724. From this article, the reader will conceive the prodigious extent and importance of the Britiſh commerce.

The members in the oppoſition, according to cuſtom, cavilled at the nature of this addreſs. They obſerved, that the late pacification was the worſt and moſt inglorious of all the bad treaties to which the Engliſh nation had ever ſubſcribed: that it was equally diſgraceful, indefinite and abſurd: they ſaid the Britiſh navy had gained ſuch an aſcendancy over the French at ſea, that the ſources of their wealth were already choaked up; that the ſiege of Maeſtricht would have employed their arms in the Low-Countries till the arrival of the Ruſſians; and that the acceſſion of theſe auxiliaries would have thrown the ſuperiority into the ſcale of the allies. They did not fail to take notice, that the moſt important and original object of the war was left wholly undecided; and demonſtrated the abſurdity of their promiſing, in the addreſs, to make good ſuch engagements as his majeſty had entered into with his allies, before they knew what thoſe engagements were. In anſwer to theſe objections, the miniſters replied, That the peace was in itſelf rather better than could be expected; and that the ſmalleſt delay might have proved fatal to the liberties of Europe. They affirmed, that the Dutch were upon the point of concluding a neutrality, in conſequence of which their troops would have been withdrawn from the allied army; and, in that caſe, even the addition of the Ruſſian auxiliaries would not have rendered it a match for the enemy. They aſſerted, that if the war had been prolonged another year, the national credit of Great-Britain muſt have been entirely ruined, many of the public funds having ſunk below par in the preceding ſeaſon, ſo that the miniſtry had begun to deſpair of ſeeing the money paid in on the new ſubſcription. With reſpect to the reſtoration of Cape-Breton, the limits of Nova Scotia, and the right of navigating without ſearch in the American ſeas, which right had been left uneſtabliſhed in the treaty, they declared, that the firſt was an unneceſſary expence, of no conſequence to Great-Britain; and that the other two were points in diſpute, to be amicably ſettled in private conferences by commiſſaries duly authoriſed; but by no means articles to be eſtabliſhed by a general treaty.

What the oppoſition wanted in ſtrength it endeavoured to make up with ſpirit and perſeverance. Every miniſterial motion and meaſure was canvaſſed, ſifted, and decried with uncommon art and vivacity: but all this little availed againſt the ſingle article of ſuperior numbers; and accordingly this was the ſource of certain triumph in all debates in which the ſervants of the crown were united. The nation had reaſon to expect an immediate mitigation in the article of annual expence, conſidering the number of troops and ſhips of war which had been reduced at the ratification of the treaty: but they were diſagreeably undeceived in finding themſelves again loaded with very extraordinary impoſitions, for the payment of a vaſt debt which government had contracted in the courſe of the war, notwithſtanding the incredible aids granted by parliament. The committee of ſupply eſtabliſhed four points of conſideration in their deliberations concerning the ſums neceſſary to be raiſed; namely, for fulfilling the engagements which the parliaments had entered into with his majeſty, and the ſervices undertaken for the ſucceſs of the war; for diſcharging debts contracted by government; for making good deficiencies; and for defraying the current expence of the year. It appeared that the nation owed 44,000l. to the elector of Bavaria; above 30,000 to the duke of Brunſwick; the like ſum to the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel; and near 9000l. to the elector of Mentz. The queen of Hungary claimed an arrear of 100,000l. The city of Glaſgow, in North-Britain, preſented a petition, praying to be reimburſed the ſum of 10,000l, extorted from that corporation by the ſon of the pretender, during the rebellion. One hundred and twelve thouſand pounds were owing to the forces in North-America and the Eaſt-Indies; beſides near half a million due on extraordinary expence incurred by the land-forces in America, Flanders, and North-Britain, by the office of Ordinance, and other ſervices of the laſt year, to which the parliamentary proviſion did not extend. The remaining debt of the ordinance amounted to above 230,000l: but the navy-bills could not be diſcharged for leſs than four millions. An addition of 2,374,333l. 15s 2d. was alſo required for the current ſervice of the year. In a word, the whole annual ſupply exceeded eight millions ſterling—a ſum at which the whole nation expreſſed equal aſtoniſhment and diſguſt. It was charged upon the duties on malt, mum, cyder, and perry, the land-tax at four ſhillings in the pound, annuities on the ſinking-fund, an application of one million from that depoſit, and a loan of the like ſum to be charged on the firſt aids of next ſeſſion. The number of ſeamen was reduced to 17000, and that of the land-forces to 18,857, including guards and garriſons.

Every article of expence, however, was warmly diſputed by the anti-courtiers; eſpecially the demand of the queen of Hungary, which was deemed unreaſonably exorbitant and rapacious, conſidering the ſeas of blood which we had ſhed, and the immenſity of treaſure we had exhauſted for her benefit: and ſurely the ſubjects of this nation had ſome reaſon to complain of an indulgence of this nature, granted to a power which they had literally ſnatched from the brink of ruin—a power whoſe quarrel they had eſpouſed with a degree of enthuſiaſm that did much more honour to their gallantry than to their diſcretion—a power that kept aloof, with a ſtatelineſs of pride peculiar to herſelf and family, and beheld her Britiſh auxiliaries fighting her battles at their own expence; while ſhe ſquandered away, in the idle pageantry of barbarous magnificence, thoſe ample ſubſidies which they advanced in order to maintain her armies, and furniſh out her proportion of the war. The leaders of the oppoſition neglected no opportunity of embittering the triumphs of their adverſaries: they inveighed againſt the extravagance of granting 16000l. for the pay of general and ſtaff officers during a peace that required no ſuch eſtabliſhment, eſpecially at a juncture when the national incumbrances rendered it abſolutely neceſſary to practice every expedient of œconomy. They even combated the requeſt of the city of Glaſgow to be indemnified for the extraordinary exaction it underwent from the rebels, though it appeared, from unqueſtionable evidence, that this extraordinary contribution was exacted on account of that city's peculiar attachment to the reigning family: that it had always invariably adhered to revolution principles; and, with an unequalled ſpirit of loyalty and zeal for the proteſtant ſucceſſion, diſtinguiſhed itſelf both in the laſt and preceding rebellion.

But the moſt violent conteſt aroſe on certain regulations which the miniſtry wanted to eſtabliſh in two bills, relating to the ſea and land ſervice. The firſt, under the title of a bill for amending, explaining, and reducing into one act of parliament the laws relating to the navy, was calculated ſolely with a view of ſubjecting half-pay officers to martial law—a deſign which not only furniſhed the oppoſition with a plauſible handle for accuſing the miniſters, as intending to encroach upon the conſtitution, in order to extend the influence of the crown; but alſo alarmed the ſea-officers to ſuch a degree, that they aſſembled to a conſiderable number, with a view to deliberate upon the proper means of defending their privileges and liberties from invaſion. The reſult of their conſultations was a petition to the houſe of commons, ſubſcribed by three admirals and forty-ſeven captains, not members of parliament, repreſenting, that the bill in agitation contained ſeveral clauſes tending to the injury and diſhonour of all naval officers, as well as to the detriment of his majeſty's ſervice; and that the laws already in force had been always found effectual for ſecuring the ſervice of officers on half-pay, upon the moſt preſſing occaſions: they, therefore, hoped, that they ſhould not be ſubjected to new hardſhips and diſcouragements; and begged to be heard by their counſel, before the committee of the whole houſe, touching ſuch parts of the bill as they apprehended would be injurious to themſelves and the other officers of his majeſty's navy. This petition was preſented to the houſe by ſir John Norris, and the motion for its being read was ſeconded by ſir Peter Warren, whoſe character was univerſally eſteemed and beloved in the nation. This meaſure had like to have produced very ſerious conſequences. Many commanders and ſubalterns had repaired to the admiralty, and threatened, in plain terms, to throw up their commiſſions in caſe the bill ſhould paſs into a law; and a general ferment was begun among all the ſubordinate members of the navy. A motion was made, that the petitioners, according to their requeſt, ſhould be heard by their counſel; and this propoſal was ſtrongly urged by the firſt orators of the anti-miniſterial aſſociation; but the miniſter, confiding in his own ſtrength, re-enforced by the abilities of mr. Pitt, mr. Littelton, and mr. Fox, the ſecretary at war, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the motion, which, upon a diviſion, was thrown out by a great majority. The ſeveral articles of the bill were afterwards ſeparately debated with great warmth; and though mr. Pelham had, with the moſt diſintereſted air of candour, repeatedly declared that he required no ſupport, even from his own adherents, but that which might ariſe from reaſon unreſtrained, and full conviction, he, on this occaſion, reaped all the fruit from their zeal and attachment which could be expected from the moſt implicit complaiſance. Some plauſible amendments of the moſt exceptionable clauſes were offered, particularly of that which impoſed an oath upon the members of every court-martial, that they ſhould not, on any account diſcloſe the opinions or tranſactions of any ſuch tribunal. This was conſidered as a ſanction under which any court-martial might commit the moſt flagrant acts of injuſtice and oppreſſion, which even parliament itſelf could not redreſs, becauſe it would be impoſſible to aſcertain the truth, eternally ſealed up by this abſurd obligation. The amendment propoſed was, that the member of a court-martial might reveal the tranſactions and opinions of it, in all caſes wherein the courts of juſtice, as the law now ſtands, have a right to interfere, if required thereto by either houſe of parliament: a very reaſonable mitigation, which, however, was rejected by the majority. Nevertheleſs, the ſuſpicion of an intended encroachment had raiſed ſuch a clamour without doors, and diffuſed the odium of this meaſure ſo generally, that the miniſter thought proper to drop the projected article of war, ſubjecting the reformed officers of the navy to the juriſdictions of courts-martial; and the bill being alſo ſoftened in other particulars, during its paſſage through the upper houſe, at length received the royal aſſent.

The flame which this act had kindled was rather increaſed than abated on the appearance of a new mutiny-bill replete with divers innovations, tending to augment the influence of the crown, as well as the authority and power of a military juriſdiction. All the articles of war eſtabliſhed ſince the reign of Charles II. were ſubmitted to the inſpection of the commons; and in theſe appeared a gradual ſpirit of encroachment, almoſt imperceptibly deviating from the civil inſtitutes of the Engliſh conſtitution towards the eſtabliſhment of a military dominion. By this new bill a power was veſted in any commander in chief to reviſe and correct any legal ſentence of a court-martial, by which the members of ſuch a court, correſponding with the nature of a civil jury, were rendered abſolutely uſeleſs, and a commander in a great meaſure abſolute; for he had not only the power of ſummoning ſuch officers as he might chooſe to ſit on any trial, a prerogative unknown to any civil court of judicature: but he was alſo at liberty to review and alter the ſentence; ſo that a man was ſubject to two trials for the ſame offence, and the commander in chief was judge both of the guilt and the puniſhment. By the final clauſe of this bill, martial law was extended to all officers on half-pay; and the ſame arguments which had been urged againſt this article in the navy-bill were now repeated and re-enforced with redoubled fervour. Many reaſons were offered to prove that the half-pay was allotted as a recompenſe for paſt ſervice; and the opponents of the bill affirmed, that ſuch an article, by augmenting the dependents of the crown, might be very dangerous to the conſtitution. On the other hand, the partiſans of the miniſtry aſſerted that the half-pay was granted as a retaining fee; and that originally all thoſe who enjoyed this indulgence were deemed to be in actual ſervice, conſequently ſubject to martial law. Mr Pitt, who at this time exerciſed the office of paymaſter-general with a rigour of integrity unknown to the moſt diſintereſted of all his predeceſſors in that department, eſpouſed the clauſe in diſpute, as a neceſſary extenſion of military diſcipline, which could never be attended with any bad conſequence to the liberty of the nation. The remarks which he made on this occaſion implied an opinion that our liberties wholly exiſted in dependence upon the direction of the ſovereign, and the virtue of the army. 'To that virtue (ſaid he) we truſt even at this hour, ſmall as our army is———to that virtue we muſt have truſted, had this bill been modelled as its warmeſt oppoſers could have wiſhed; and without this virtue, ſhould the lords, the commons, and the people of England entrench themſelves behind parchment up to the teeth, the ſword will find a paſſage to the vitals of the conſtitution.' All the diſputed articles of the bill being ſuſtained on the ſhoulders of a great majority, it was conveyed to the upper houſe, where it excited another violent conteſt. Upon the queſtion whether officers on half-pay had not been ſubject to martial law, the judges were conſulted and divided in their ſentiments. The earl of Bath declared his opinion, that martial law did not extend to reformed officers; and opened all the ſluices of his ancient eloquence. He admitted a caſe which was urged of ſeven officers on half-pay, who, being taken in actual rebellion at Preſton, in the year 1715, had been executed on the ſpot by martial law, in conſequence of the king's expreſs order. He candidly owned, that he himſelf was ſecretary at war at that period: that he had approved of this order, and even tranſmitted it to general Carpenter, who commanded at Preſton; but now his opinion was entirely changed. He obſerved, that when the forementioned rebellion firſt broke out, the houſe preſented an addreſs to the king, deſiring his majeſty would be pleaſed to employ all half-pay officers, and gratify them with whole pay; and, indeed, all ſuch officers were voted on whole pay, by the houſe of commons. They were afterwards appriſed of this vote, by an advertiſement in the Gazette, and ordered to hold themſelves in readineſs to repair to ſuch places as ſhould be appointed; and finally commanded to repair by ſuch a day to thoſe places, on pain of being ſtruck off the half-pay liſt. Theſe precautions would have been unneceſſary, had they been deemed ſubject to martial law; and the penalty for non-obedience would not have been merely a privation of their penſions, but they would have fallen under the puniſhment of death, as deſerters from the ſervice. His lordſhip diſtinguiſhed, with great propriety and preciſion, between a ſtep which had been precipitately taken in a violent criſis, when the public was heated with apprehenſion and reſentment, and a ſolemn law concerted at leiſure, during the moſt profound tranquillity. Notwithſtanding the ſpirited oppoſition of this nobleman, and ſome attempts to inſert additional clauſes, the bill having undergone a few inconſiderable amendments, paſſed by a very conſiderable majority.

Immediately after the mutiny-bill had paſſed the lower houſe, another fruitleſs effort was made by the oppoſition. The danger of a ſtanding army, on whoſe virtue the conſtitution of Great-Britain ſeemed to depend, did not fail to alarm the minds of many who were zealouſly attached to the liberties of their country, and gave birth to a ſcheme, which, if executed would have enabled the legiſlature to eſtabliſh a militia that muſt have anſwered many national purpoſes, and acted as a conſtitutional bulwark againſt the exceſſes and ambition of a military ſtanding force, under the immediate influence of government. The ſcheme which patriotiſm conceived was, in all probability, adopted by party. A bill was brought in, limiting the time beyond which no ſoldier, or non-commiſſioned officers, ſhould be compelled to continue in the ſervice. Had this limitation taken place, ſuch a rotation of ſoldiers would have enſued among the common people, that in a few years every peaſant labourer and inferior tradeſman in the kingdom would have underſtood the exerciſe of arms: and perhaps the people in general would have concluded that a ſtanding army was altogether unneceſſary. A project of this nature could not, for obvious reaſons, be agreeable to the adminiſtration, and therefore the bill was rendered abortive; for, after having been twice read, it was poſtponed from time to time, till the parliament was prorogued, and never appeared in the ſequel. Such were the chief ſubjects of debate between the miniſtry and the oppoſition, compoſed as we have already obſerved, of the prince's ſervants and the remains of the country party, this laſt being headed by lord Strange, ſon of the earl of Derby, and ſir Francis Daſhwood; the former a nobleman of diſtinguiſhed abilities, keen, penetrating, eloquent, and ſagacious; the other frank, ſpirited and ſenſible.

It muſt be owned, however, for the honour of the miniſtry, that, if they carried a few unpopular meaſures with a high hand, they ſeemed earneſtly deſirous of making amends to the nation, by promoting divers regulations for the benefit and improvement of commerce, which actually took place in the enſuing ſeſſion of parliament. One of the principal objects of this nature, which fell under their cognizance, was the trade to the coaſt of Guinea; a very important branch of traffic, whether conſidered as a market for Britiſh manufactures, or as the ſource that ſupplied the Engliſh plantations with negroes. This was originally monopoliſed by a joint-ſtoc company, which had from time to time derived conſiderable ſums from the legiſlature, for enabling them the better to ſupport certain forts or caſtles on the coaſt of Africa, to facilitate the commerce and protect the merchants. In the ſequel, however, the excluſive privilege having been judged prejudicial to the national trade, the coaſt was laid open to all Britiſh ſubjects indiſcriminately, on condition of their paying a certain duty towards defraying the expence of the forts and factories. This expedient did not anſwer the purpoſes for which it had been contrived. The ſeperate traders, inſtead of receiving any benefit from the protection of the company, induſtriouſly avoided their caſtles, as the receptacles of tyranny and oppreſſion. The company, whether from the miſconduct or knavery of their directors, contracted ſuch a load of debts their credit being exhauſted, and their creditors growing clamorous, they preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, diſcloſing their diſtreſſes, and imploring ſuch aſſiſtance as ſhould enable them not only to pay their debts, but alſo to maintain the forts in a defenſible condition. This petition, recommended to the houſe in a meſſage from his majeſty, was corroborated by another in behalf of the company's creditors. Divers merchants of London, intereſted in the trade to Africa and the Britiſh plantations in America, petitioned the houſe, that as the African trade was of the utmoſt importance to the nation, and could not be ſupported without forts and ſettlements, ſome effectually means ſhould be ſpeedily taken for protecting and extending this valuable branch of commerce. A fourth was offered by the merchants of Liverpool, repreſenting, that the ſecurity and protection of the trade to Africa muſt always principally depend upon his majeſty's ſhips of war being properly ſtationed on that coaſt, and ſeaſonably relieved; and that ſuch forts, and ſettlements as might be judged neceſſary for marks of ſovereignty and poſſeſſion would prove a nuiſance, and a burthen to the trade, ſhould they remain in the hands of any joint-ſtoc company, whoſe private intereſt always had been, and ever would be, found incompatible with the intereſt of the ſeparate and open trader. They, therefore, prayed that the ſaid forts might either be taken into his majeſty's immediate poſſeſſion, and ſupported by the public, or committed to the merchants trading on that coaſt, in ſuch a manner as the houſe ſhould judge expedient, without veſting in them any other advantage, or right to the commerce, but what ſhould be common to all his majeſty's ſubjects. This remonſtrance was ſucceeded by another, to the ſame effect, from the maſter, wardens, aſſiſtants, and commonalty of the ſociety of merchant adventurers within the city of Briſtol. All theſe petitions were referred to a committee appointed to deliberate on this ſubject; who agreed to certain reſolutions, implying, that the trade to Africa ſhould be free and open; that the Britiſh forts and ſettlements on that coaſt ought to be maintained, and put under proper direction; and, that, in order to carry on the African trade in the moſt beneficial manner to theſe kingdoms, all the Britiſh ſubjects trading to Africa ſhould be united in one open company, without any joint-ſtoc, or power to trade as a corporation. A bill was immediately founded on theſe reſolutions, which alarmed the company to ſuch a degree, that they had recourſe to another petition, demonſtrating their right to the coaſt of Africa, and expreſſing their reliance on the juſtice, of the houſe, that they ſhould not be deprived of their property without an adequate conſideration. In a few days a ſecond addreſs was offered by their creditors, complaing of the company's miſmanagement, promiſing to ſurrender their right, as the wiſdom of parliament ſhould preſcribe; praying that their debts might be enquired into; and that the equivalent to be granted for the company's poſſeſſions might be ſecured and applied, in the firſt place, for their benefit. The commons, in conſequence of this petition, ordered the company to produce a liſt of their debts, together with a copy of their charter, and two remonſtrances which their creditors had preſented to them before this application to parliament. A committee of the whole houſe, having deliberated on theſe papers and petitions, and heard the company by their counſel, reſolved to give them a reaſonable compenſation for their charter, lands, forts, ſettlements, ſlaves, and effects, to be, in the firſt place, applied towards the payment of their creditors. A bill being formed accordingly, paſſed the commons, and was conveyed to the upper-houſe, where a great many objections were ſtarted; and for the preſent it was dropped, until a more unexceptionable plan ſhould be concerted. In the mean time their lordſhips addreſſed his majeſty, that the lords commiſſioners for trade and plantations might be directed to prepare a ſcheme on this ſubject, to be laid before both houſes of parliament at the beginning of next ſeſſion; that inſtant orders ſhould be given for preſerving and ſecuring the forts and ſettlements on the coaſt of Guinea belonging to Great-Britain; and, that proper perſons ſhould be appointed to examine into the condition of thoſe forts, as well as of the military ſtores, ſlaves and veſſels belonging to the African company, ſo as to make a faithful report of theſe particulars, with all poſſible expedition.

The miniſtry having profeſſed an inclination, and indeed ſhown a diſpoſition, to promote and extend the commerce of the kingdom, the commons reſolved to take ſome ſteps for encouraging the white fiſhery along the nothern coaſt of the iſland, which is an exhauſtible ſource of wealth to our induſtrious neighbours the Dutch, who employ annually a great number of hands and veſſels in this branch of commerce. The ſenſible part of the Britiſh people, reflecting on this ſubject, plainly foreſaw that a fiſhery under due regulations, undertaken with the protection and encouragement of the legiſlature, would not only prove a fund of national riches and a nurſery of ſeamen, but likewiſe, in a great meaſure, prevent any future inſurrections in the Highlands of Scotland, by diffuſing a ſpirit of induſtry among the natives of that country, who, finding it in their power to become independent, on the fruits of their own labour, would ſoon infranchiſe themſelves from that ſlaviſh attachment by which they had been ſo long connected with their landlords and chieftains. Accordingly, a committee was appointed to deliberate on the ſtate of the Britiſh fiſhery; and upon their report a bill was founded for encouraging the whale fiſhery on the coaſt of Spitſbergen, by a bounty of 40s. per ton for every ſhip equipped for that undertaking. The bill having made its way through both houſes, and obtained the royal aſſent, the merchants in different parts of the kingdom, particularly in North-Britain, began to build and fit out ſhips of great burthen, and peculiar ſtructure, for the purpoſes of that fiſhery, which ever ſince hath been carried on with equal vigour and ſucceſs. Divers merchants and traders of London having preſented to the houſe of commons a petition, repreſenting the benefits that would accrue to the community from a herring and cod fiſhery, eſtabliſhed on proper principles, and carried on with ſkill and integrity; this remonſtrance was referred to a committee, upon whoſe reſolutions a bill was formed; but, before this could be diſcuſſed in the houſe, the parliament was prorogued, and of conſequence this meaſure proved abortive.

The next regulation propoſed in favour of trade, was that of laying open the commerce of Hudſon's-Bay, in the moſt northern parts of America, where a ſmall monopoly maintained a few forts and ſettlements, and proſecuted a very advantageous fur-trade with the Indians of that continent. It was ſuggeſted, that the company had long ago enriched themſelves by their excluſive privilege; that they employed no more than four annual ſhips; that, contrary to an expreſs injunction in their charter, they diſcouraged all attempts to diſcover a north-weſt paſſage to the Eaſt-Indies; that they dealt cruelly and perfidiouſly with the poor Indians, who never traded with them, except when compelled by neceſſity, ſo that the beſt part of the fur-trade had devolved to the enemies of Great-Britain; and that their excluſive patent reſtricted to very narrow limits a branch of commerce, which might be cultivated to a prodigious extent, as well as to the infinite advantage of Great-Britain. Petitions, that the trade of Hudſon's-Bay might be laid open, were preſented to the houſe by the merchants of London, Great-Yarmouth, and Wolverhampton; and a committee was appointed to deliberate upon this ſubject. On the other hand, the company exerted themſelves in petitions and private applications for their own preſervation. The committee examined many papers and records; and the report was taken into conſideration by the whole houſe. Many evidences were interrogated, and elaborate ſpeeches made, on both ſides of the queſtion. At length the majority ſeemed ſatisfied that the traffic on the coaſt of Hudſon's-Bay could not be preſerved without forts and ſettlements, which muſt be maintained either by an excluſive company, or at the public expence; and, as this was not judged a proper juncture to encumber the nation with any charge of that kind, the deſign of diſſolving the company was laid aſide till a more favourable opportunity.

The government had, during the war, found great difficulty in preſſing men for the ſervice of the navy—a practice, which, however ſanctioned by neceſſity, is nevertheleſs a flagrant encroachment on the liberty of the ſubject, and a violent outrage againſt the conſtitution of Great-Britain. The miniſtry, therefore, had employed ſome of their agents to form a ſcheme for retaining in time of peace, by means of a certain allowance, a number of ſeamen, who ſhould be regiſtered for the purpoſe, and be ready to man a ſquadron upon any emergency. Such a plan, properly regulated, would have been a great advantage to commerce, which is always diſtreſſed by the practice of preſſing ſeamen; and, at the ſame time, a great ſecurity to the kingdom in dangerous conjunctures, when it may be neceſſary to equip an armament at a minute's warning. The houſe of commons being moved upon this ſubject, agreed to divers reſolutions, as a foundation for the bill: but the members in the oppoſition affecting to repreſent this meaſure in an odious light, as an imitation of the French method of regiſtering ſeamen without their own conſent, mr. Pelham dropped it, as an unpopular project.

Information having been received, that the French intended to ſettle the neutral iſlands of St. Lucia, Dominica, St. Vincent, and Tobago in the Weſt-Indies, the nation had taken the alarm in the beginning of the year; and a motion was made in the houſe of commons to addreſs his majeſty, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to give directions for laying before the houſe copies of the inſtructions given to the governors of Barbadoes for ten years laſt paſt, ſo far as they related to theſe neutral iſlands: but whether the miniſter was conſcious of a neglect in this particular, or thought ſuch enquiries trenched upon the prerogative, he oppoſed the motion with all his might; and, after ſome debate, the previous queſtion paſſed in the negative. This was alſo the fate of another motion made by the earl of E—t for an addreſs, entreating his majeſty would ſubmit to the inſpection of the houſe all the propoſals of peace that had been made by the French king ſince the year which preceded the laſt rebellion, to that in which the definitive treaty was concluded at Aix-la-Chapelle. This they propoſed as a previous ſtep to the parliament's forming any opinion concerning the utility or neceſſity of the peace which had been eſtabliſhed. Violent debates enſued, in which the oppoſition was as much excelled in oratory as out-numbered in votes. Such were the material tranſactions of this ſeſſion, which in the month of June was cloſed as uſual with a ſpeech from the throne; in which his majeſty ſignified his hope, that the parliament, at their next meeting, would be able to perfect what they had now begun for advancing the trade and navigation of the kingdom. He likewiſe expreſſed his ſatisfaction at ſeeing public credit flouriſh at the end of an expenſive war; and recommended unanimity, as the ſureſt bulwark of national ſecurity.

While the miniſtry, on ſome occaſions, exhibited all the external ſigns of moderation and good humour, they, on others, manifeſted a ſpirit of jealouſy and reſentment, which ſeems to have been childiſh and illiberal. Two or three young riotous ſtudents at Oxford, trained up in prejudice, and heated with intemperance, uttered ſome expreſſions over their cups, implying their attachment to the family of the pretender. The report of this indiſcretion was induſtriouſly circulated by certain worthleſs individuals, who, having no reliance on their own intrinſic merit, hoped to diſtinguiſh themſelves as the tools of party, and to obtain favour with the miniſtry by acting as volunteers in the infamous practice of information. Though neither their age, rank, nor connexions of the delinquents were ſuch as ought to have attracted the notice of the public, the vice-chancellor, heads of houſes, and proctors of the univerſity, knowing the invidious ſcrutiny to which their conduct was ſubjected, thought proper to publiſh a declaration, ſignifying their abhorrence of all ſeditious practices, their determined reſolution to puniſh all offenders to the utmoſt ſeverity and rigour of the ſtatutes; and containing peremptory orders for the regulation of the univerſity. Notwithſtanding theſe wiſe and ſalutary precautions, the three boys, who in the heat of their intoxication, had drunk the pretender's health, were taken into cuſtody by a meſſenger of ſtate; and two of them being tried in the court of King's-Bench, and found guilty, were ſentenced to walk through the courts of Weſtminſter, with a ſpecification of their crime fixed to their foreheads; to pay a fine of five nobles each; to be impriſoned for two years, and find ſecurity for their good behaviour for the term of ſeven years after their enlargement. Many people thought they ſaw the proceedings of the ſtar-chamber revived in the ſeverity of this puniſhment. The adminiſtration, not yet ſatisfied with the vengeance which had been taken on theſe three ſtriplings, ſeemed determined to ſtigmatize the univerſity to which they belonged. The cry of jacobitiſm was loudly trumpeted againſt the whole community. The addreſs of the univerſity, congratulating his majeſty on the eſtabliſhment of the peace, was rejected with diſdain, and an attempt was made to ſubject their ſtatutes to the inſpection of the king's council; but this rule, being argued in the court of King's-Bench, was diſmiſſed, in conſequence of the opinions given by the judges. Finally, the ſame tribunal granted an information againſt dr. Purnel, the vice-chancellor, for his behaviour in the caſe of the rioters above-mentioned: but this was countermanded in the ſequel, his conduct appearing unexceptionable upon a more cool and impartial enquiry.

In proportion as Oxford declined, her ſiſter univerſity roſe in the favour of the adminiſtration, which ſhe at this period cultivated by an extraordinary mark of compliance and attachment. The dignity of chancellor of the univerſity being vacated by the death of the duke of Somerſet, the nation in general ſeemed to think it would naturally devolve upon the prince of Wales, as a compliment at all times due to that rank; but more eſpecially to the then heir apparent, who had eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the virtues of a patriot and a prince. He had even pleaſed himſelf with the hope of receiving this mark of attachment from a ſeminary for which he entertained a particular regard. But the ruling members, ſeeing no immediate proſpect of advantage in glorifying even a prince, who was at variance with the miniſtry, wiſely turned their eyes upon the illuſtrious character of the duke of Newcaſtle, whom they elected without oppoſition, and inſtalled with great magnificence; learning, poetry, and eloquence, joining their efforts in celebrating the ſhining virtues and extraordinary talents of their new patron.

Although oppoſition lay gaſping at the feet of power in the houſe of commons, the people of England did not yet implicitly approve all the meaſures of the adminiſtration; and the dregs of faction, ſtill agitated by an internal ferment, threw up ſome ineffectual bubbles in different parts of the kingdom. Some of thoſe who made no ſecret of their diſaffection to the reigning family determined to manifeſt their reſentment and contempt of certain noblemen, and others, who were ſaid to have abandoned their ancient principles, and to have ſacrificed their conſciences to their intereſt. Many individuals, animated by the fumes of inebriation, now loudly extolled that cauſe which they durſt not avow when it required their open approbation and aſſiſtance; and, though they induſtriouſly avoided expoſing their lives and fortunes to the chance of war in promoting their favourite intereſt when there was a poſſibility of ſucceſs, they betrayed no apprehenſion in celebrating the memory of its laſt effort, amidſt the tumult of a riot, and the clamours of intemperance. In the neighbourhood of Lichfield the ſportſmen of the party appeared in the Highland taſte of variegated drapery; and their zeal deſcending to a very extraordinary exhibition of practical ridicule, they hunted, with hounds clothed in plaid, a fox dreſſed in a red uniform. Even the females at their aſſembly, and the gentlemen at the races, affected to wear the checquered ſtuff by which the prince-pretender and his followers had been diſtinguiſhed. Divers noblemen on the courſe were inſulted as apoſtates; and one perſonage, of high rank, is ſaid to have undergone a very diſagreeable flagellation.

As the public generally ſuffers at the end of a war, by the ſudden diſmiſſion of a great number of ſoldiers and ſeamen, who, having contracted a habit of idleneſs, and finding themſelves without employment and the means of ſubſiſtance, engage in deſperate courſes, and prey upon the community, it was judged expedient to provide an opening, through which theſe unquiet ſpirits might exhale without damage to the common-wealth. The moſt natural was that of encouraging them to become members of a new colony in North-America, which, by being properly regulated, ſupported, and improved, might be the ſource of great advantages to its mother country. Many diſputes had ariſen between the ſubjects of England and France, concerning the limits of Nova-Scotia, which no treaty had as yet properly aſcertained. A fort had been raiſed, and a ſmall garriſon maintained, by the king of Great-Britain, at a part of this very country, called Annapolis-Royal, to over-awe the French neutrals ſettled in the neighbourhood: but this did not anſwer the purpoſe for which it was intended. Upon every rupture or diſpute between the two crowns, theſe planters, forgetting their neutrality, intrigued with the Indians, communicated intelligence to their own countrymen ſettled at St. John's and Cape-Breton, and did all the ill-offices their hatred could ſuggeſt againſt the colonies and ſubjects of Great-Britain. A ſcheme was now formed for making a new eſtabliſhment on the ſame peninſula, which ſhould further confirm and extend the property and dominion of the crown of Great-Britain in that large tract of country, clear the uncultivated grounds, conſtitute communities, diffuſe the benefits of population and agriculture, and improve the fiſhery of that coaſt. which might be rendered a new ſource of wealth and commerce to Old-England. The particulars of the plan being duly conſidered, it was laid before his majeſty, who approved of the deſign, and referred the execution of it to the board of trade and plantations, over which the earl of Halifax preſided. This nobleman, endued by nature with an excellent capacity, which had been diligently and judiciouſly cultivated, animated with liberal ſentiments, and fired with an eager ſpirit of patriotiſm, adopted the plan with the moſt generous ardour, and cheriſhed the infant colony with paternal affection. The commiſſioners for trade and plantations immediately adverti ſed, under the ſanction of his majeſty's authority, that proper encouragement would be given to ſuch of the officers and private men, lately diſmiſſed from the land and ſea-ſervice, as were willing to ſettle, with or without families, in the province of Nova-Scotia: that the fee-ſimple, or perpetual property, of 50 acres of land ſhould be granted to every private ſoldier or ſeaman, free from the payment of any quit-rents or taxes, for the term of 10 years; at the expiration of which no perſon ſhould pay more than 1s. per annum for every 50 acres ſo granted: that, over and above theſe 50, each perſon ſhould receive a grant of 10 acres for every individual, including women and children, of which his family ſhould conſiſt; that further grants ſhould be made to them as the number ſhould increaſe, and in proportion as they ſhould manifeſt their abilities in agriculture: that every officer, under the rank of enſign in the land-ſervice, or lieutenant in the navy, ſhould be gratified with 80 acres on the ſame conditions: that 200 acres ſhould be beſtowed upon enſigns, 300 upon lieutenants, 400 upon captains, and 600 on every officer above that degree, with proportionable conſiderations for the number and increaſe of every family: that the lands ſhould be parcelled out as ſoon as poſſible after the arrival of the coloniſts, and a civil government eſtabliſhed; by virtue of which they ſhould enjoy all the liberties and privileges of Britiſh ſubjects, with proper ſecurity and protection: that the ſettlers, with their families, ſhould be conveyed to Nova-Scotia, and maintained for 12 months after their arrival at the expence of the government; which ſhould alſo ſupply them with arms and ammunition, as far as ſhould be judged neceſſary for their defence, with proper materials and utenſils for clearing and cultivating their lands, erecting habitations, exerciſing the fiſhery, and ſuch other purpoſes as ſhould be judged neceſſary for their ſupport.

The ſcheme was ſo feaſible, and the encouragement ſo inviting, that in a little time about 4000 adventurers, with their families, were entered, according to the directions of the board of trade, who in the beginning of May ſet ſail from England, under the command of colonel Cornwallis, whom the king had appointed their governor, and towards the latter end of June arrived at the place of their deſtination, which was the harbour of Chebuctou, on the ſea-coaſt of the peninſula, about midway between Cape-Canſeau and Cape-Sable. It is one of the moſt ſecure and commodious havens in the whole world, and well ſituated for the fiſhery: yet the climate is cold, the ſoil barren, and the whole country covered with woods of birch, fir, pine, and ſome oak, unfit for the purpoſes of timber; but at the ſame time extremely difficult to remove and extirpate. Governor Cornwallis no ſooner arrived in this harbour than he was joined by two regiments of infantry from Cape-Breton, and a company of rangers from Annapolis. Then he pitched upon a ſpot for the ſettlement, and employed his people in clearing the ground for laying the foundations of a town; but ſome inconveniencies being diſcovered in this ſituation, he choſe another to the northward, hard by the harbour, on an eaſy aſcent, commanding a proſpect of the whole peninſula, and well ſupplied with rivulets of freſh and wholeſome water. Here he began to build a town on a regular plan, to which he gave the name of Halifax, in honour of the nobleman who had the greateſt ſhare in founding the colony; and before the approach of winter, above 300 comfortable wooden houſes were built, the whole ſurrounded by a ſtrong palliſade. This colony, however, has by no means anſwered the ſanguine expectations of the projectors; for, notwithſtanding the ardour with which the intereſts of it were promoted by its noble patron, and the repeated indulgence it has reaped from the bounty of the legiſlature, the inhabitants have made little or no progreſs in agriculture: the fiſhery is altogether neglected, and the ſettlement entirely ſubſiſts on the ſums expended by the individuals of the army and navy, whoſe duty obliges them to reſide in this part of North-America.

The eſtabliſhment of ſuch a powerful colony in Nova-Scotia could not fail giving umbrage to the French in that neighbourhood, who, though they did not think proper to promulgate their jealouſy and diſguſt, nevertheleſs employed their emiſſaries clandeſtinely in ſtimulating and exciting the Indians to harraſs the coloniſts with hoſtilities, in ſuch a manner as ſhould effectually hinder them from extending their plantations, and perhaps induce them to abandon the ſettlement. Nor was this the only part of America in which the French court countenanced ſuch perfidious practices. More than ever convinced of the importance of a conſiderable navy, and an extenſive plantation trade, they not only exerted uncommon induſtry in re-eſtabliſhing their marine, which had ſuffered ſo ſeverely during the war; but they reſolved, if poſſible, to extend their plantations in the Weſt-Indies, by ſettling the neutral iſlands, which we have already mentioned. In the beginning of the year the governor of Barbadoes, having received intelligence that the French had begun to ſettle the iſland of Tobago, ſent captain Tyrrel thither in a frigate, to learn the particulars. That officer found above 300 men already landed, ſecured by two batteries and two ſhips of war, and in daily expectation of a further re-enforcement from the marquis de Caylus, governor of Martinique; who had publiſhed an ordonnance, authoriſing the ſubjects of the French king to ſettle the iſland of Tobago, and promiſing to defend them from the attempts of all their enemies. This aſſurance was in anſwer to a proclamation iſſued by mr. Grenville, governor of Barbadoes, and ſtuc up in different parts of the iſland, commanding all the inhabitants to remove in thirty days, on pain of undergoing military execution. Captain Tyrrel, with a ſpirit that became a commander in the Britiſh navy, gave the French officers to underſtand, that his moſt chriſtian majeſty had no right to ſettle the iſland, which was declared neutral by treaties; and that, if they would not deſiſt, he ſhould be obliged to employ force in driving them from their new ſettlement. Night coming on, and mr. Tyrrel's ſhip falling to leeward, the French captains ſeiſed that opportunity of ſailing to Martinique; and the next day the Engliſh commander returned to Barbadoes, having no power to commit hoſtilities. Theſe tidings, with a copy of the French governor's ordonnance, were no ſooner tranſmitted to the miniſtry than they diſpatched a courier to the Engliſh envoy at Paris, with directions to make repreſentations to the court of Verſailles on this ſubject. The miniſtry of France, knowing they were in no condition to ſupport the conſequences of an immediate rupture, and underſtanding how much the merchants and people of Great-Britain were alarmed and incenſed at their attempts to poſſeſs theſe iſlands, thought proper to diſown the proceedings of the marquis de Caylus, and to grant the ſatisfaction that was demanded, by ſending him orders to diſcontinue the ſettlement and evacuate the iſland of Tobago. At the ſame time, however, that the court of Verſailles made this ſacrifice for the ſatisfaction of England, the marquis de Puyſieux, the French miniſter, obſerved to the Engliſh reſident, that France was undoubtedly in poſſeſſion of that iſland towards the middle of the laſt century. He ought in candour to have added, that although Louis XIV. made a conqueſt of this iſland from the Hollanders, during his war with that republic, it was reſtored to them by the treaty of Nimeguen; and ſince that time France could not have the leaſt ſhadow of a claim to number it among her ſettlements. It was before this anſwer could be obtained from the court of Verſailles that the motion, of which we have already taken notice, was made in the houſe of commons, relating to the ſubject of the neutral iſlands; a motion diſcouraged by the court, and defeated by the majority.

The peace of Aix-le-Chapelle was celebrated by fireworks, illuminations, and rejoicings, in which the Engliſh, French, and Dutch ſeemed to diſplay a ſpirit of emulation, in point of taſte and magnificence; and, in all probability, theſe three powers were ſincerely pleaſed at the ceſſation of the war. England enjoyed a reſpite from intolerable ſupplies, exorbitant inſurance, and uninterrupted commerce: Holland was delivered from the brink of a French invaſion; and France had obtained a breathing time for re-eſtabliſhing her naval power, for exerting that ſpirit of intrigue, by dint of which ſhe had often embroiled her neighbours, and for executing plans of inſenſible encroachment, which might prove more advantageous than the progreſs of open hoſtilities. In the affair of Tobago the French king had manifeſted his inclination to avoid immediate diſputes with England; and had exhibited another proof of the ſame diſpoſition in his behaviour to the prince-pretender, who had excited ſuch a dangerous rebellion in the iſland of Great-Britain.

Among thoſe princes and powers who excepted againſt different articles of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, the chevalier de St. George, foreſeeing that none of the plenipotentiaries would receive his proteſt, employed his agents to fix it up in the public places of Aix-la-Chapelle; a precaution of very little ſervice to his cauſe, which all the ſtates of Chriſtendom ſeemed now to have abandoned. So little was the intereſt of his family conſidered in this negotiation, that the contracting powers agreed, without reſerve, to a literal inſertion of the fifth article of the quadruple alliance; by which it was ſtipulated, that neither the pretender nor any of his deſcendants ſhould be allowed to reſide within the territories belonging to any of the ſubſcribing parties. At the ſame time the plenipotentiaries of France promiſed to thoſe of Great-Britain, that prince Charles-Edward ſhould be immediately obliged to quit the dominions of his moſt chriſtian majeſty. Notice of this agreement was accordingly given by the court of Verſailles to the young adventurer; and as he had declared he would never return to Italy, monſieur de Courteille, the French envoy to the cantons of Switzerland, was directed by his ſovereign to demand an aſylum for prince Edward in the city of Fribourg. The regency having complied in this particular with the earneſt requeſt of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, mr. Burnaby, the Britiſh miniſter to the Helvetick body, took the alarm, and preſented the magiſtracy of Fribourg with a remonſtrance, couched in ſuch terms as gave offence to that regency, and drew upon him a ſevere anſwer. In vain had the French king exerted his influence in procuring this retreat for the young pretender, who being preſſed with repeated meſſages to withdraw, perſiſted in refuſing to quit the place, to which he had been ſo cordially invited by his couſin the king of France; and where he ſaid that monarch had ſolemnly promiſed, on the word of a king, that he would never forſake him in his diſtreſs, nor abandon the intereſt of his family. Louis was not a little perplexed at this obſtinancy of prince Edward, which was the more vexatious, as that youth appeared to be the darling of the Pariſans; who not only admired him for his own accompliſhments, and pitied him for his ſufferings, but alſo revered him, as a young hero linially deſcended from the renowned Henry the fourth. At length, the two Engliſh noblemen arriving at Paris, as hoſtages for the performance of the treaty, and ſeeing him appear at all public places of diverſion, complained of this circumſtance, as an inſult to their ſovereign, and an infringement of the treaty ſo lately concluded. The French king, after ſome heſitation between punctilio and convenience, reſolved to employ violence upon the perſon of this troubleſome ſtranger, ſince milder remonſtrances had not been able to influence his conduct: but this reſolution was not taken till the return of a courier whom he diſpatched to the chevalier de St. George: who being thus informed of his ſon's deportment, wrote a letter to him, laying ſtrong injunctions upon him, to yield to the neceſſity of the times, and acquieſce with a good grace in the ſtipulation which his couſin of France had found it neceſſary to ſubſcribe, for the intereſt of his realm. Edward, far from complying with this advice and injunction, ſignified his reſolution to remain in Paris; and even declared that he would piſtol any man who ſhould preſume to lay violent hands on his perſon. In conſequence of this bold declaration, an extraordinary council was held at Verſailles, when it was determined to arreſt him without further delay, and the whole plan of this enterpriſe was finally adjuſted. That ſame evening, the prince entering the narrow lane that leads to the Opera, the barrier was immediately ſhut, and the ſerjeant of the guard called 'to arms,' on which monſieur de Vaudreuil, exempt of the French guards, advancing to Edward, 'prince (ſaid he) I arreſt you in the king's name, by virtue of this order.' At that inſtant the youth was ſurrounded by four grenadeers, in order to prevent any miſchief he might have done with a caſe of pocket piſtols which he always carried about him; and a guard was placed at all the avenues and doors of the Opera-houſe, leſt any tumult ſhould have enſued among the populace. Theſe precautions being taken, Vaudreuil, with an eſcorte, conducted the priſoner through the garden of the Palais-royal to houſe where the duke de Biron waited with a coach and ſix to convey him to the caſtle of Vincennes, whither he was immediately accompanied by a detachment from the regiment of French guards, under the command of that nobleman. He had not remained above three days in this confinement when he gave the French miniſtry to underſtand, that he would conform himſelf to the king's intentions; and was immediately enlarged, upon giving his word and honour that he would, without delay, retire from the dominions of France. Accordingly, he ſet out in four days from Fontainebleau, attended by three officers, who conducted him as far as Pont-Beauveſion on the frontiers, where they took their leave of him, and returned to Verſailles. He proceeded for ſome time in the road to Chamberri; but ſoon returned into the French dominions, and, paſſing through Dauphné, repaired to Avignon, where he was received with extraordinary honours by the pope's legate. In the mean time, his arreſt excited great murmurings at Paris; the inhabitants blaming, without ſcruple, their king's conduct in this inſtance, as a ſcandalous breach of hoſpitality, as well as a mean proof of condeſcenſion to the king of England; and many ſevere paſquinades, relating to this tranſaction, were fixed up in the moſt public places of that metropolis.

Although peace was now re-eſtabliſhed among the principal powers of the continent, yet another ſtorm ſeemed ready to burſt upon the northern parts of Europe, in a freſh rupture between Ruſſia and Sweden. Whether the czarina had actually obtained information that the French faction meditated ſome revolution of government at Stockholm, or ſhe wanted a pretence for annexing Findland to her empire; certain it is, ſhe affected to apprehend that the prince-ſucceſſor of Sweden waited only for the deceaſe of the reigning king, who was very old and infirm, to change the form of government, and reſume that abſolute authority which ſome of the monarchs his predeceſſors had enjoyed. She ſeemed to think that a prince thus veſted with arbitrary power, and guided by the councils of France and Pruſſia, with which Sweden had lately engaged in cloſe alliance, might become a very troubleſome and dangerous neighbour to her in the Baltic: ſhe, therefore, recruited her armies, repaired her fortifications, filled her magazines, ordered a ſtrong body of troops to advance towards the frontiers of Finland, and declared in plain terms to the court of Stockholm, that if any ſtep ſhould be taken to alter the government, which ſhe had bound herſelf by treaty to maintain, her troops ſhould enter the territory of Sweden, and ſhe would act up to the ſpirit of her engagements. The Swediſh miniſtry, alarmed at theſe peremptory proceedings, had recourſe to their allies; and, in the mean time, made repeated declarations to the court of Peterſburgh, that there was no deſign to make the leaſt innovation in the nature of their eſtabliſhed government: but little or no regard being paid to theſe repreſentations, they began to put the kingdom in a poſture of defence; and the old king gave the czarina to underſtand, that if, notwithſtanding the ſatisfaction he had offered, her forces ſhould paſs the frontiers of Finland, he would conſider their march as an hoſtile invaſion, and employ the means which God had put in his power for the defence of his dominions.

This declaration, in all probability, did not produce ſuch effect as the interpoſition of his Pruſſian majeſty, the moſt enterpriſing prince of his time, at the head of 140,000 of the beſt troops that Germany ever trained. Perhaps he was not ſorry that the empreſs of Muſcovy furniſhed him with a plauſible pretence for maintaining ſuch a formidable army, after the peace of Europe had been aſcertained by a formal treaty, and all the ſurrounding ſtates had diminiſhed the number of their forces. He now wrote a letter to his uncle the king of Great-Britain, complaining of the inſults and menaces which had been offered by the czarina to Sweden; declaring, that he was bound by a defenſive alliance, to which France had acceded, to defend the government at preſent eſtabliſhed in Sweden: and that he would not ſit ſtill, and tamely ſee that kingdom attacked by any power whatſoever, without acting up to his engagements; he therefore entreated his Britannic majeſty to interpoſe his good offices, in conjunction with France and him, to compromiſe the diſputes which threatened to embroil the northern parts of Europe. By this time the Ruſſian army had approached the frontiers of Finland: the Swedes had aſſembled their troops, repleniſhed their magazines, and repaired their marine; and the king of Denmark, jealous of the czarina's deſigns with regard to the duchy of Sleſwich which was conteſted with him by the prince-ſucceſſor of Ruſſia, kept his army and navy on the moſt reſpectable footing. At this critical juncture the courts of London, Verſaillies, and Berlin co-operated ſo effectually by remonſtrances and declarations at Peterſburgh and Stockholm, that the empreſs of Ruſſia thought proper to own herſelf ſatisfied, and all thoſe clouds of trouble were immediately diſperſed. Yet, in all probability, her real aim was diſappointed; and, however ſhe might diſſemble her ſentiments, ſhe never heartily forgave the king of Pruſſia for the ſhare he had in this tranſaction. That monarch, without relaxing in his attention to the ſupport of a very formidable military power, exerted very extraordinary endeavours in cultivating the civil intereſts of his country. He reformed the laws of Brandenburgh, and reſcued the adminiſtration of juſtice from the frauds of chicanery. He encouraged the arts of agriculture and manufacture: and even laid the foundation of naval commerce, by eſtabliſhing an Eaſt-India company in the port of Embden.

Nor did the French miniſtry neglect any meaſure that might contribute to repair the damage which the kingdom had ſuſtained in the courſe of the war. One-half of the army was diſbanded: the ſevere impoſition of the 10th penny was ſuſpended by the king's edict: a ſcheme of œconomy was propoſed, with reſpect to the finances; and the utmoſt diligence uſed in procuring materials, as well as workmen, for ſhip-building, that the navy of France might ſpeedily retrieve its former importance. In the midſt of theſe truely patriotic ſchemes, the court of Verſailles betrayed a littleneſs of genius, and a ſpirit of tyranny, joined to fanaticiſm, in quarelling with their parliament about ſuperſtitious forms of religion. The ſacraments had been denied to a certain perſon on his death-bed, becauſe he refuſed to ſubſcribe to the bull Unigenitus. The nephew of the defunct preferred a complaint to the parliament, whoſe province it was to take cognizance of the affair: a deputation of that body attended the king with the report of the reſolutions; and his majeſty commanded them to ſuſpend all proceedings relating to a matter of ſuch conſequence, concerning which he would take an opportunity of ſignifying his royal pleaſure. This interpoſition was the ſources of diſputes between the crown and parliament, which had like to have filled the whole kingdom with inteſtine troubles.

At Vienna the empreſs-queen was not more ſollicitous in promoting the trade and internal manufactures of her dominions, by ſumptuary regulations, neceſſary reſtrictions on foreign ſuperfluities, by opening her ports in the Adriatick, and giving proper encouragement to commerce, than ſhe was careful and provident in reforming the œconomy of her finances, maintaining a reſpectable body of forces, and guarding, by defenſive alliances, againſt the enterpriſes of his Pruſſian majeſty, on whoſe military power ſhe looked with jealouſy and diſtruſt. In Holland all the authority and influence of the ſtadtholder were ſcarcely ſufficient to allay the ferments excited among the people, by the proviſional taxation which had ſucceeded the abolition of the pachters, and was indeed very grievous to the ſubject. As this was no more than a temporary expedient, the prince of Orange propoſed a more equitable plan, which was approved by the ſtates, and eſtabliſhed with great difficulty. In Italy the ſyſtem of politics ſeemed to change its complexion. The king of Sardinia effected a match between one of the infantas of Spain and the prince of Piedmont; and whether irritated by the conduct of the Auſtrians in the laſt war, or apprehenſive of ſuch a powerful neighbour in the Milaneſe, he engaged with the kings of France and Spain in a defenſive alliance, comprehending the king of the two Sicilies, the republic of Genoa, and the dukes of Modena and Parma. His moſt catholic majeſty, ſincerely diſpoſed to cultivate the arts of peace, and encourage every meaſure that could contribute to the advantage of his country, was no ſooner releaſed from the embarraſſments of war, than he began to execute plans of eternal œconomy; to reduce unneceſſary penſions, diſcharge the debts contracted in the war, repleniſh his arſenals, augment his navy, promote manufactures, and encourage an active commerce by ſea, the benefits of which the kingdom of Spain had not known ſince the firſt diſcovery and conqueſt of the Weſt-Indies.

The preparations for refitting and increaſing the navy of Spain were carried on with ſuch extraordinary vigour, that other nations believed an expedition was intended againſt the Corſairs of Algiers, who had for ſome time grievouſly infeſted the trade and coaſts of the Mediterranean. The exiſtence of this and other predatory republics, which entirely ſubſiſt upon piracy and rapine, petty ſtates of barbarous ruffians, maintained, as it were, in the midſt of powerful nations, which they inſult with impunity, and of which they even exact an annual contribution, is a flagrant reproach upon Chriſtendom; a reproach the greater, as it is founded upon a low, ſelfiſh, illiberal maxim of policy. All the powers that border on the Mediterranean, except France and Tuſcany, are at perpetual war with the Moors of Barbary, and, for that reaſon, obliged to employ foreign ſhips for the tranſportation of their merchandiſe. This employment naturally devolves to thoſe nations whoſe veſſels are in no danger from the depredations of the barbarians; namely, the ſubjects of the maritime powers, who, for this puny advantage, not only tollerate the piratical ſtates of Barbary, but even ſupply them with arms and ammunition, ſollicit their paſſes, and purchaſe their forbearance with annual preſents, which are, in effect, equivalent to a tribute: whereas, by one vigorous exertion of their power, they might deſtroy all their ſhips, lay their towns in aſhes, and totally extirpate thoſe pernicious broods of deſperate banditti. Even all the condeſcenſion of thoſe who diſgrace themſelves with the title of allies to theſe miſcreants is not always ſufficient to reſtrain them from acts of cruelty and rapine. At this very period four cruiſers from Algiers made a capture of an Engliſh packet-boat, in her voyage from Liſbon, and conveyed her to their city, where ſhe was plundered of money and effects to the amount of 100,000l. and afterwards diſmiſſed. In conſequence of this outrage, commodore Keppel was ſent with ſeven ſhips of war to demand ſatisfaction, as well as to compromiſe certain differences which had ariſen on account of arrears claimed of the Engliſh by the dey of Algiers. The muſſulman frankly owned, that the money having been divided among the captors, could not poſſibly be refunded. The commodore returned to Gibraltar; and, in the ſequel, an Algerine ambaſſador arrived in London, with ſome preſents of wild beaſts for his Britannic majeſty. This tranſaction was ſucceeded by another injurious affront, offered by the governor or alcayde of Tetuan to mr. Latton, an Engliſh ambaſſador, ſent thither to redeem the Britiſh ſubjects, who had been many years enſlaved in the dominions of the king of Morocco. A revolution having lately happened in this empire, Muley Abdallah, the reigning ruffian, inſiſted upon the ambaſſador's paying a pretended balance for the ranſom of the captives, as well as depoſiting a conſiderable ſum, which had already been paid to a deceaſed baſhaw; alledging, that as he (the emperor) received no part of it, the payment was illegal. Mr Latton refuſing to comply with this arbitrary demand, his houſe was ſurrounded by a detachment of ſoldiers, who violently dragged his ſecretary from his preſence, and threw him into a diſmal ſubterranean dungeon, where he continued 20 days. The Engliſh ſlaves, to the number of 27, were condemned to the ſame fate: the ambaſſador himſelf was degraded from his character, deprived of his allowance, and ſequeſtered from all communication. All the letters directed to him were intercepted, and interpreted to the alcayde: two negro porters were entruſted with the keys of all his apartments, and a couple of ſoldiers poſted at his chamber-door; nay, this Mooriſh governor threatened to load him with irons, and violently ſeiſed part of the preſents deſigned by his Britannic majeſty for the emperor. At length, finding that neither mr. Latton nor the governor of Gibraltar, to whom he had written, would depoſit the money, without freſh inſtructions from the court of London, the barbarian thought proper to relax in his ſeverity: the priſoners were enlarged, the reſtrictions removed from the perſon of the ambaſſador, and, after all theſe indignities offered to the honour of the Britiſh nation, the balance was paid, and the affair quietly adjuſted.

Britain, in the mean while, was altogether barren of events which might deſerve a place in a general hiſtory. Commerce and manufacture flouriſhed again, to ſuch a degree of increaſe as had never been known in the iſland: but this advantage was attended with an irreſiſtible tide of luxury and exceſs, which flowed through all degrees of the people, breaking down all the mounds of civil policy, and opening a way for licenſe and immorality. The highways were infeſted with rapine and aſſaſſination; the cities teemed with the brutal votaries of lewdneſs, intemperance, and profligacy. The whole land was overſpread with a ſucceſſion of tumult, riot, and inſurrection, excited in different parts of the kingdom by the erection of new turnpikes, which the legiſlature judged neceſſary for the convenience of inland carriage. In order to quell theſe diſturbances, recourſe was had to the military power; ſeveral individuals were ſlain, and ſome were executed as examples.

In the month of November the ſeſſion of parliament was opened with a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty expreſſed a particular pleaſure in meeting them at a time when the perfect re-eſtabliſhment of a general peace had reſtored to his people the bleſſings of quiet and tranquillity. He ſaid, the good effects of theſe already appeared in the flouriſhing condition of national commerce, and in the riſe of public credit, which were the foundations of ſtrength and proſperity of theſe kingdoms. He declared, That, during the ſummer, he had uſed every opportunity of cementing and ſecuring the peace; that it was his firm reſolution to do every thing in his power for the preſervation of it, and religiouſly adhere to the engagements into which he had entered. Finally, he took notice of the good diſpoſition he had found in the other contracting parties to the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle to cheriſh the public tranquillity of Europe; and he earneſtly recommended to the two houſes the maintenance of a ſtrong naval power, as the bulwark of national ſecurity.

When the motion was made for an addreſs of thanks in the houſe of commons, the firſt paragraph of his majeſty's ſpeech furniſhed the oppoſition with a handle to declaim againſt the late treaty. Sir John Hinde Cotton obſerved, That the peace could not be properly ſtiled complete, as nothing had been ſtipulated with reſpect to the article of 'no ſearch;' alluding to the interruption our commerce had ſuſtained from the Spaniards in the Weſt-Indies: a ſtipulation, without which both houſes of parliament had formerly voted that there ſhould be no peace with that kingdom.

[1749] In the preſent conjuncture of affairs, ſuch an objection favoured rather of party than of patriotiſm; and indeed ſir John declared, that the remarks he made upon the occaſion were rather in diſcharge of the duty he owed to his country, than in hope of ſeeing his ſentiments eſpouſed by the majority. Some ſharp altercation was uſed in the debate which aroſe on this ſubject; and many ſevere invectives were levelled at thoſe who negotiated, as well as at thoſe who approved and confirmed the treaty. But mr. Pelham, who ſuſtained the whole weight of the debeat on the ſide of adminiſtration, anſwered every objection with equal candour and ability; and if he failed in proving that the terms of peace were as favourable as could be expected, conſidering the unfortunate events of the war, and the ſituation of the contending powers; he at laſt demonſtrated, that it would be the intereſt of the kingdom to acquieſce for the preſent in the treaty which had been concluded, and endeavour to remedy its imperfections by ſubſequent conventions, amicably opened among thoſe powers between whom any cauſe of diſpute remained. With reſpect to the vote of both houſes, mentioned by ſir John Hinde Cotton, he declared that he had never approved of that ſtep, when it was firſt taken; or if it had, times and circumſtances, which could not be foreſeen, would have juſtified his deviating from it in the re-eſtabliſhment of peace. He reminded them, that a parliament of Great-Britain had once voted 'no peace while any part of the Weſt-Indies ſhould remain in poſſeſſion of the Spaniſh king,' yet a train of incidents, which they could not poſſibly foreſee, afterwards rendered it expedient to adopt a peace without inſiſting upon the accompliſhment of that condition. In a word, we muſt own, that, in the majority of debates excited in the courſe of this ſeſſion, the miniſtry derived their triumphs from the force of reaſon, as well as from the weight of influence. We ſhall always, however, except the efforts that were made for reducing the number of land-forces to 15,000, and maintaining a greater number of ſeamen than the miniſtry propoſed. On theſe conſtitutional points the earl of Egmont, and other chiefs of the oppoſition, expatiated with all the energy of eloquence; which, however, was fruſtrated by the power of ſuperior numbers. Ten thouſand ſeamen were voted for the ſervice of the enſuing year, notwithſtanding his majeſty's injunction to maintain a conſiderable navy; and the number of land-forces was continued at 18,857. The ſums granted for making good his majeſty's engagements with the electors of Bavaria and Mentz, and the duke of Brunſwick Wolfenbuttel, amounted to 53,225l. ſterling. The ſervices done by the colonies in North-America, during the war, were gratified with the ſum 122,246l. The expence incurred by the new colony of Nova-Scotia exceeded 76,000l. A ſmall ſum was voted for the improvement of Georgia; and 10,000l. was granted towards the ſupport of the Britiſh forts and ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa. The ſum total granted in this ſeſſion aroſe to 4,141,661l. 9s. 11½d. to be raiſed by the land-tax, at 3s. in the pound; the malt and other duties, the ſurplus of divers impoſitions remaining in the Bank and Exchequer; one million by annuities, at three per cent. charged on the ſinking-fund, until redeemed by parliament; and 900,000l. out of the exceſs or over-plus of monies denominated the ſinking fund.

But the capital meaſure which diſtinguiſhed this ſeſſion of parliament was the reduction of the intereſt on the public funds; a ſcheme was planned and executed by the miniſter, without any national diſturbance or diſquiet, to the aſtoniſhment of all Europe; the different nations of which could not comprehend how it would be poſſible for the government, at the cloſe of a long expenſive war, which had ſo conſiderably drained the country, and augmented the enormous burthen of national debt, to find money for paying off ſuch of the public creditors as might chooſe to receive their principal, rather than ſubmit to a reduction of the intereſt. It was not very much for the honour of the oppoſition, that ſome of its leading members endeavoured to impede this great machine of civil œconomy, by taking opportunities of affirming in parliament, in oppoſition to his majeſty's ſpeech, that the nation, far from being in a flouriſhing condition, was almoſt entirely exhauſted; that commerce drooped and declined; that public credit ſtood tottering on the brink of ruin; and that all the treaties lately concluded among the different powers of Europe were, in effect, diſadvantageous and prejudicial to the intereſts of Great-Britain. In anſwer to theſe aſſertions, Mr Pelham undertook to prove, from the regiſter of exports and imports, that the commerce of the kingdom was more extenſive at this than at any former period; and that the public credit was ſtrong enough to admit of an experiment, which he would not preſume to hazard, except upon a moral certainty of its being firmly rooted, beyond the power of accident and faction to ſhake or overturn. He declared, that his deſign of reducing the intereſt upon the the funds was the reſult of the love he bore his country, and an opinion that it was the duty of the ſervants of the crown to eaſe the burthens of the people. He ſaid, he had conferred on this ſubject with perſons of the moſt approved knowledge, and undoubted experience; and choſe to promulgate the method propoſed for alleviating the load of the national debt, that the public, in knowing the particulars of the ſcheme, might have time to conſider them at leiſure, and ſtart ſuch objections as ſhould occur to their reflection, before it might be too late to adobt amendments. He obſerved, that nothing could more clearly demonſtrate the vigour of public credit, and the augmentation of national commerce, than the price of ſtoc, which had within three years riſen to a very conſiderable increaſe; and the duties on imports, which in nine months had added one million to the ſinking-fund, notwithſtanding a very extraordinary ſum which had been paid as bounties for exported corn. He expreſſed great tenderneſs and regard for the intereſt of thoſe who had advanced their money for the ſervice of the government; declaring that his aim was to contrive a fair, honeſt, and equitable method for leſſening the national incumbrances, by lowering the intereſt, conformable to parliamentary faith, and agreeable to the rules of eternal juſtice. His plan was accordingly communicated, canvaſſed, and approved in the houſe of commons, and an act paſſed for reducing the intereſt of the funds which conſtitute the national debt. [a]. In purſuance of this act, for the reduction of the intereſt, the greater part of the creditors complied with the terms propoſed, and ſubſcribed their reſpective annuities before the end of February; but the three great companies at firſt kept aloof, and refuſed to ſubſcribe any part of their capital.

[1750] About the middle of march the commons ordered the proper officers to lay before them an account of the ſums which had been ſubſcribed, and theſe were taken into conſideration by a committee of the whole houſe. It was then that mr. Pelham, as chancellor of the exchequer, obſerved, that, beſides the debts due to the three great companies in their corporate capacity, all the reſt, carrying four per centum intereſt, had been ſubſcribed, except about eight or nine millions, the proprietors of which had forfeited the favour deſigned them by parliament: but as many of theſe had been miſled by evil counſellors, who perhaps were more intent on diſtreſſing the government, than ſollicitious to ſerve their friends; and as many were foreigners, reſiding beyond ſea, who had not time to take proper advice, and give the neceſſary inſtructions; and as theſe could not poſſibly be diſtinguiſhed from ſuch as refuſed to ſubſcribe from mere obſtinancy or diſaffection, it might be thought cruel to take the moſt rigorous advantage of the forfeiture they had incurred. With reſpect to the proprietors of the ſtoc or capital belonging to the three great companies; he aſſerted, that many of them would willingly have ſubſcribed their properties within

[a] The reſolutions of the commons on this head were printed by authority in the London Gazette, ſignifying, That thoſe who were, or ſhould be, proprietors of any part of the public debt, redeemable by law, incurred before Michaelmas, in the year 1749, carrying an intereſt of four per centum per annum, who ſhould, on or before the 28th day of February in that year, ſubſcribe their names, ſignifying their conſent to accept of an intereſt of three pounds per centum, to commence from the 25th day of December, in the year 1757, ſubject to the ſame proviſions, notices, and clauſes of redemption, to which their reſpective ſums at four per centum were then liable, ſhould, in lieu of their preſent intereſt, be intitled to four per centum till the 25th day of December, in the year 1750; and after that day to 3l. 10s. per centum per annum, till the 25th of December 1757; and no part of that debt, except what was due to the Eaſt-India company, ſhould be redemable to this period; That if any part of the national debt, incurred before laſt Michaelmas, redeemable by law, and carrying an intereſt of four per centum, ſhould remain unſubſcribed on or before the 30th day of May, the government ſhould pay off the principal. For this purpoſe his majeſty was enabled to borrow of any perſon or perſons, bodies politic or corporate, any ſum or ſums of money, not exceeding that part of the national debt which might remain unſubſcribed, to be charged on the ſinking-fund, upon any terms not exceeding the rate of intereſt in the foregoing propoſal.

All the duties appropriated to the payment of the intereſt were ſtill continued, and the ſurplus of theſe incorporated with the ſinking-fund for the diſcharge of the principal. Books were opened for the ſubſcription at the Exchequer, Bank of England, and the South-ſea-houſe; and copies of theſe reſolutions tranſmitted to the directors of all the monied corporations.

the time limited, but were neceſſarily excluded by the majority on the ballot; and as it was equally impoſſible to know thoſe who were againſt the queſtion on the ballot, he thought that ſome tenderneſs was due even to the proprietors of thoſe three companies; his opinion, therefore, was, that they and the uncomplying annuitants ſhould be indulged with further time to complete their ſubſcription; but, in order to preſerve the authority of parliament, and the reſpect due to that auguſt aſſembly, they ought not to be gratified with ſuch advantageous terms as were allowed to the annuitants who at firſt chearfully complied with the propoſals offered by the legiſlature. For theſe reaſons he propoſed, that although the time of ſubſcribing ſhould be protracted till the 30th day of May the encouragement of 3l. 10s. per centum per annnum ſhould not be continued to the ſecond ſubſcribers longer than till the 5th of December, in year 1755. The propoſal being approved, a bill was framed for this purpoſe, as well as for redeeming ſuch annuities as ſhould not be ſubſcribed, which paſſed through both houſes, and was enacted into a law, after having received an additional clauſe, empowering the Eaſt-India company, in caſe they ſhould ſubſcribe all their ſtoc bearing an intereſt of four per centum, or borrow, with the conſent of the treaſury, any ſum not exceeding 4,200,000l. after the ſeveral rates of intereſt before propoſed to be paid by the public, and one million more at three per centum per annum. They were alſo veſted with a power to raiſe money by bonds, as formerly; yet ſo as the whole, including the annuities, ſhould not exceed what they were by former acts empowered to borrow. The objections to the execution of this project, which by many were deemed inſurmountable, entirely vaniſhed before the fortitude, perſeverance, and caution of the miniſter; who had ſecured, among the moneyed men of the nation, the promiſe of ſuch ſums as would have been ſufficient to pay off the capital belonging to thoſe creditors who might refuſe to accept the intereſt thus reduced. The ſecond ſubſcription had the deſired effect. The three great companies acquieſced, and their example was followed by the other ſcrupulous annuitants: the national burthen was comfortable lightened, and the ſinking-fund conſiderably increaſed, without producing the leaſt perplexity or diſturbance in the common-wealth; a circumſtance that could not fail to excite the admiration and envy of all Chriſtendom.

The mutiny-bill for the enſuing year was mitigated with an eſſential alteration, relating to the oath of ſecreſy impoſed upon the members of every court-martial, who were now releaſed from this reſerve if required to give evidence, by due courſe of law, in any court of judicature; and whereas, by the former mutiny-bill, a general was empowered to order the reviſal of any ſentence by a court-martial as often as he pleaſed, and, on that pretence, to keep in confinement a man who had been acquitted upon a fair trial, it was now enacted, that no ſentence pronounced by any court-martial, and ſigned by the preſident, ſhould be more than once liable to reviſal. Colonel George Townſhend, ſon of lord viſcount Townſhend, who had equally diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his civil and military accompliſhments, propoſed another clauſe, for preventing any non-commiſſioned officer's being broke, or reduced into the ranks; or any ſoldier's being puniſhed, but by the ſentence of a court-martial. He gave the houſe to underſtand, that certain perſons attended at the door, who from the ſtation of non-commiſſioned officers had been broke, and reduced into the ranks, without trial, or any cauſe aſſigned; and he expatiated not only upon the iniquity of ſuch proceedings, but alſo upon the danger of leaving ſuch arbitrary power in the hands of any individual officer. A warm debate was the conſequence of this motion, which, however, was over-ruled by the majority.

Among other regulations made in the courſe of this ſeſſion for the encouragement of the Britiſh manufactures, a large duty was laid upon Iriſh ſail-cloth, which being ſold at an under price, was found to interfere with the ſame ſpecies of commodity fabricated in the iſland of Great-Britain; and, for the further benefit of this laſt, the bounty upon the exportation of it, which had been deducted from a defective fund, was now made payable out of the cuſtoms. This meaſure, however, was not of ſuch importance to the nation as the act which they paſſed for encouraging the importation of pig and bar-iron from the Britiſh colonies in North-America. Every well-wiſher to his country reflected with concern on the nature of the Britiſh trade with Sweden, from which kingdom the ſubjects of his Britannick majeſty imported more iron and ſteel than all the other countries in Europe. For this article they paid a very great balance in ready money, which the Swedes again expended in purchaſing from the French, and other mercantile powers, thoſe neceſſaries and ſuperfluities with which they might have been as cheaply furniſhed by Great-Britain. In the mean time, the Engliſh colonies in America were reſtricted by ſevere duties from making advantage of their own produce, in exchanging their iron for ſuch commodities as they were under the neceſſity of procuring from their mother-country. Such reſtriction was not only a cruel grievance upon our own ſettlements, but alſo attended with manifeſt prejudice to the intereſt of Great-Britain, annually drained of great ſums, in favour of an ungrateful nation, from which no part of them returned; whereas the iron imported from America muſt of neceſſity come in exchange for our own manufactures. The commons having appointed a day for taking this affair into conſideration, carefully examined into the ſtate of the Britiſh commerce carried on with Sweden, as well as into the accounts of iron imported from the plantations in America; and a committee of the whole houſe having reſolved, that the duties on American pig and and bar-iron ſhould be removed, a bill[b] was brought in for that purpoſe, containing a clauſe, however, to prevent his majeſty's ſubjects from making ſteel, and eſtabliſhing mills for ſlitting and rolling iron within the Britiſh colonies of America; this precaution being taken, that the coloniſts might not interfere with the manufactures of their mother-country.

The next commercial improvement, of which we ſhall take notice, was the bill for the encouragement of the Britiſh white-herring and cod fiſheries. This was likewiſe the reſult of mature deliberation, importing, that a bounty of 30s. per ton ſhould be granted, and paid out of the cuſtoms, to all new veſſels from 20 to 80 tons burthen, which ſhould be built for that purpoſe, and actually employed in the fiſhery: that a ſociety ſhould be incorporated, under the name of the Free Britiſh Fiſhery, by a charter, not excluſive, with power to raiſe a capital not exceeding 500,000l. and that 3l. 10s. per centum per annum ſhould be granted and paid out of the cuſtoms to the proprietors for 14 years, for ſo much of the capital as ſhould be actually employed in the ſaid fiſheries. Correſponding chambers were propoſed to be erected in remote parts of North-Britain, for taking in ſubſcriptions, and proſecuting the trade, under the directions of the company at London; and the nation in general ſeemed eager to diſpute this branch of commerce with the ſubjects of Holland, whom they conſidered as ungrateful interlopers. In the houſe of peers, however, the bill met with a formidable oppoſition from the earl of Winchelſea

[b] The moſt remarkable circumſtance attending the progreſs of this bill, which made its way through both houſes, and obtained the royal aſſent, was the number of contradictory petitions in favour and in prejudice of it, while it remained under conſideration. The tanners of leather in and about the town of Sheffield, in Yorkſhire, repreſented, that if the bill ſhould paſs, the Engliſh iron would be underſold; conſequently a great number of furnaces and forges would be diſcontinued: in that caſe the woods uſed for fuel would ſtand uncut, and the tanners be deprived of oak-bark ſufficient for the continuance and ſupport of their occupation. They nevertheleſs owned, that ſhould the duty be removed from pig-iron only, no ſuch conſequence could be apprehended; becauſe, ſhould the number of furnaces be leſſened, that of forges would be increaſed. This was likewiſe the plea urged in divers remonſtrances by maſters of iron-works, gentlemen, and freeholders, who had tracts of wood-land in their poſſeſſion. The owners, proprietors, and farmers of furnaces and iron-forges, belonging to Sheffield and its neighbourhood, enlarged upon the great expence they had incurred in erecting and ſupporting iron-works, by means of which great number of his majeſty's ſubjects were comfortably ſupported. They expreſſed their apprehenſion, that ſhould the bill paſs into a law, it could not in any degree leſſen the conſumption of Swediſh iron, which was uſed for purpoſes which neither the American nor Britiſh iron would anſwer: but that the propoſed encouragement, conſidering the plenty and cheapneſs of wood in America, would enable the colonies to underſell the Britiſh iron, a branch of traffic which would be totally deſtroyed, to the ruin of many thouſand labourers, who would be compelled to ſeek their livelihood in foreign countries. They likewiſe ſuggeſted, that if all the iron manufacturers of Great-Britain ſhould be obliged to depend upon a ſupply of iron from the plantations, which muſt ever be rendered precarious by the hazard of the ſeas and the enemy, the manufactures would probably decay for want of materials, and many thouſand families be reduced to want and miſery. On the other hand, the ironmongers and ſmiths belonging to the flouriſhing town of Birmingham, in Warwickſhire, preſented a petition, declaring, that the bill would be of great benefit to the trade of the nation, as it would enable the coloniſts to make larger returns of their own produce, and encourage them to take a greater quantity of the Britiſh manufactures. They affirmed, that all the iron-works in the iſland of Great-Britain did not ſupply half the quantity of that metal ſufficient to carry on the manufacture; that if this deficiency could be ſupplied from the colonies in America, the importation would ceaſe, and conſiderable ſums of money be ſaved to the nation. They obſerved, that the importation of iron from America could no more affect the iron-works and freeholders of the kingdom than the like quantity imported from any other country; but they prayed that the people of America might be reſtrained from erecting ſlitting or rolling-mills, or forges for plating iron, as they would interfere with the manufactures of Great-Britain.

Many remonſtrances to the ſame effect were preſented from different parts of the kingdom; and it appeared, upon the moſt exact enquiry, that the encouragement of American iron would prove extremely beneficial to the kingdom, as it had been found, upon trial, applicable to all the uſes of Swediſh iron, and as good in every reſpect as the produce of that country.

and lord Sandys, who juſtly obſerved, that it was a crude, indigeſted ſcheme, which, in the execution, would never anſwer the expectations of the people: that in contending with the Dutch, who are the patterns of unwearied induſtry, and the moſt rigid œconomy, nothing could be more abſurd than a joint-ſtoc company, which is always clogged with extraordinary expence: and the reſolution of fitting out veſſels at the port of London, where all ſorts of materials, labour, and ſeamen are ſo much dearer than in any other part of the united kingdom, excluſive of the great diſtance and dangerous voyage between the metropolis and the ſound of Braſſa in Shetland, the rendezvous at which all the herring-buſſes were to aſſemble in the beginning of the fiſhing ſeaſon. They likewiſe took notice of the heavy duty on ſalt, uſed in curing the fiſh for ſale, and the beef for proviſion to the mariners; a circumſtance of itſelf ſufficient to diſcourage adventurers from embarking in a commerce which, at beſt, yields but very ſlender profits to the trader in particular, how important ſoever it might prove to the community in general. Theſe objections were anſwered by the duke of Argyle and the earl of Granville, who ſeemed to think that this branch of trade could not be fairly ſet on foot, without ſuch a conſiderable ſum of money as no ſingle individual would care to advance; that a joint-ſtoc company would be able to proſecute the fiſhery at a ſmaller expence than that which particular traders muſt neceſſarily incur; that the preſent ſpirit of the nation, which was eagerly bent upon trying the experiment, ought not to be baulked by delay, leſt it ſhould evaporate; and that though the plan was not unexceptionable, the defects of it might in the ſequel be remedied by the legiſlature. In a word, the bill was adopted by the majority, with a ſmall amendment in the title, which produced ſome diſquiets in the lower-houſe: but this diſpute was compromiſed, and it was enacted into a law towards the cloſe of the ſeſſion. Nothing could be more agreeable to the public than a ſanction of the legiſlature to this favourite plan, which was ardently promoted, and patroniſed by men of the greateſt eminence for wealth and popularity. The company choſe for their governor the prince of Wales, who received this proof of their attachment and reſpect with particular marks of ſatisfaction: the preſident and vice-preſident were both aldermen of London; and the council was compoſed of 30 gentlemen, the majority of whom were members of parliament. Great pains were taken, and ſome artifice was uſed, to learn the Dutch method of curing the fiſh. People crowded with their ſubſcriptions; a number of hands were employed in building and equipping the buſſes or veſſels uſed in the fiſhery; and the moſt favourable conſequences were expected from the general vigour and alacrity which animated theſe preparations. But the ſucceſs did not gratify the ſanguine hopes of the projectors and adventurers. The objections made in the houſe of lords ſoon appeared to have been well founded: theſe co-operating with miſmanagement in the directors, the ſpirit of the company began to flag, the natural conſequences of commercial diſappointment, and now the Britiſh fiſhery ſeems to languiſh under the neglect of the legiſlature.

Touching the trade to the coaſt of Africa, petitions were renewed by the company and its creditors, the merchants of Briſtol, Liverpool, and Lancaſter; and a remonſtrance was preſented by the planters and merchants intereſted in the Britiſh ſugar ſettlements in America: but the commons adhered to their former reſolutions of laying open the trade, maintaining the forts at the public expence, and regulating the commerce by a committee of merchants, repreſenting the chief trading towns in the kingdom, to be ſuperintended by the board of trade and plantations. The bill was accordingly framed and preſented, and having proceeded through both houſes without oppoſition, obtained the royal aſſent. Over and above theſe wiſe, ſalutary, and patriotic meaſures for the improvement of commerce, they encouraged the importation of raw ſilk by an act, reducing the duties, formerly payable on that which was the growth of China, to the ſame that is raiſed on the raw ſilk from Italy, and allowing the ſame drawbac upon the exportation of the one which had been uſually granted on the other. A ſecond bill was brought in for the encouragement of the growth and culture of ſilk in Carolina and Georgia, where it had been lately produced with extraordinary ſucceſs, by freeing from all duties that which ſhould be imported from his majeſty's dominions in America: and a third was framed, permitting raw ſilk of the growth or produce of Perſia, purchaſed in Ruſſia, to be imported into Great-Britain, from any port or place belonging to the empire of Ruſſia. Divers efforts were made, by different members in the oppoſition, to rectify certain abuſes in the army and adminiſtration: ſome bills were brought in, and ſeveral petitions were left on the table; but all of them proved abortive, from the power and influence of the miniſter, who ſeemed reſolved that no benefit ſhould flow upon the nation through any channel but his own. Nevertheleſs, it muſt be acknowledged, for the honour of his memory, that there is no ſeſſion on record ſo productive as this was of meaſures advantageous to the community.

The people, however, were not entirely ſatisfied with the conduct of the adminiſtration, if we may judge from the ferment and commotions raiſed during the progreſs of an election for a citizen to repreſent the city of Weſtminſter in parliament. The ſeat which had been filled by lord Trentham, eldeſt ſon of earl Gower, having become vacant, in conſequence of that nobleman's accepting a place at the board of Admiralty, he again declared himſelf a candidate, and met with a violent oppoſition. Thoſe, who ſtiled themſelves the independent electors of Weſtminſter, being now incenſed to an uncommon degree of turbulence by the interpoſition of miniſterial influence, determined to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to baffle the deſigns of the court, and at the ſame time take vengeance on the family of earl Gower, who had entirely abandoned the oppoſition, of which he was formerly one of the moſt reſpected leaders. With this view they held conſultations, agreed to reſolutions, and ſet up a private gentleman, named ſir George Vandeput, as the competitor of lord Trentham, declaring that they would ſupport his pretenſions at their own expence, being the more encouraged to this enterpriſe by the countenance and aſſiſtance of the prince of Wales and his adherents. They accordingly opened houſes of entertainment for their partiſans, ſollicited votes, circulated remonſtrances, and propagated abuſe: in a word, they canvaſſed, with ſurpriſing ſpirit and perſeverance, againſt the whole intereſt of St. James's. Mobs were hired and proceſſions made on both ſides, and the city of Weſtminſter was filled with tumult and uproar. The mutual animoſity of the parties ſeemed every day to increaſe during the election, and a great number of unqualified votes were preſented on both ſides: all the powers of inſinuation, obloquy, and ridicule were employed to vilify and depriciate both candidates. At length the poll being cloſed, a majority of votes appeared in behalf of lord Trentham; but a ſcrutiny being demanded by the other ſide, the returning officer complied with their requeſt. The ſpeaker of the lower-houſe had iſſued his warrant for a new writ of election about the middle of November; and towards the end of February mr. Fox, ſecretary at war, ſtanding up, and obſerving that no return had yet been made, thought proper to move, that the clerk of the crown, the meſſenger extraordinary attending the great ſeal, the under-ſheriff of Middleſex, and the high-bailiff of Weſtminſter, ſhould attend next morning, and give an account of their iſſuing, delivering, and executing the writ of election. Theſe being examined, and the high-bailiff declaring that he would proceed with all poſſible diſpatch in the ſcrutiny, which had been demanded and was begun, mr. ſpeaker explained to him ſome particulars of his duty; in the diſcharge of which, he was given to underſtand he might depend upon the protection of the houſe, ſhould he meet with any obſtruction which he could not otherwiſe ſurmount. By the violence and caprice with which a great number of votes were conteſted on both ſides, the ſcrutiny was protracted a long time, and the return attended with ſome extraordinary conſequences, which ſhall be particulariſed among the tranſactions of the next year.

In the mean time, the preſent ſeſſion of parliament was cloſed on the 12th day of April, with a ſpeech from the throne, commending the commons for having ſeiſed the very firſt opportunity of reducing the intereſt of the national debt, without the leaſt infringement upon thr faith of parliament; and congratulating them on the flouriſhing ſtate of the public credit, which could not fail to add ſtrength and reputation to the government, both at home and abroad. Immediately after the riſing of the parliament his majeſty appointed a regency to govern the kingdom in his abſence, and embarked for the continent, in order to viſit his German dominions.

The month of January and the beginning of February were diſtinguiſhed, the firſt day by a very remarkable Aurora Boreales, appearing at night to the north-eaſt, of a deep and duſky red colour, like the reflexion of ſome great fire, for which it was by many people miſtaken; and the corruſcations, unlike thoſe that are generally obſerved, did not meet in the zenith, but in a point ſome degrees to the ſouthward. February was uſhered in by terrible peals of thunder, flaſhes of lightning, and ſuch a tempeſt of wind, hail, and rain, as overwhelmed with fear and conſternation the inhabitants of Briſtol, where it chiefly raged. On the 8th day of the ſame month, between twelve and one in the afternoon, the people of London were ſtill more dreadfully alarmed by the ſhoc of an earthquake, which ſhook all the houſes with ſuch violence, that the furniture rocked on the floors, the pewter and porcelaine rattled on the ſhelves, the chamber bells rang, and the whole of this commotion was attended with a clap or noiſe reſembling that produced by the fall of ſome heavy piece of furniture. The ſhoc extended through the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and was felt on both ſides the river Thames, from Greenwich to the weſtward of London; but not perceptible at any conſiderable diſtance. On the very ſame day of the next month, between five and ſix o'clock in the morning, the inhabitants of the metropolis were again affrighted by a ſecond ſhoc, more violent than the firſt, and abundantly more alarming, as it waked the greater part of the people from their repoſe. It was preceded by a ſucceſſion of thic low flaſhes of lightning, and a rumbling noiſe, like that of a heavy carriage rolling over a hollow pavement. The ſhoc itſelf conſiſted of repeated vibrations, which laſted ſome ſeconds, and violently ſhook every houſe from top to bottom. Again the chairs rocked, the ſhelves clattered, the ſmall bells rang, and in ſome places public clocks were heard to ſtrike. Many perſons rouſed by this terrible viſitation, ſtarted naked from their beds, and ran to their doors and windows in diſtraction: yet no life was loſt, and no houſe overthrown by this concuſſion, though it was ſo dreadful as to threaten an immediate diſſolution of the globe. The circumſtance, however, did not fail to make a deep impreſſion upon ignorant, weak and ſuperſtitious minds, which were the more affected by the conſideration that the two ſhocs were periodical; that the ſecond, which happened exactly one month after the firſt, had been the more violent; and that the next increaſing in proportion, might be attended with the moſt diſmal conſequences. This general notion was confirmed, and indeed propogated among all ranks of people by the admonitions of a fanatic ſoldier, who publicly preached up repentance, and boldly propheſied that the next ſhoc would happen on the ſame day of April, and totally deſtroy the cities of London and Weſtminſter. Conſidering the infectious nature of fear and ſuperſtition, and the emphatic manner in which the imagination had been prepared and prepoſſeſſed, it was no wonder that the prediction of this illiterate enthuſiaſt ſhould have contributed in a great meaſure to augment the general terrour. The churches were crowded with penitent ſinners: the ſons of riot and profligacy were over-awed into ſobriety and decorum. The ſtreets no longer reſounded with execrations, or the noiſe of brutal licentiouſneſs; and the hand of charity was liberally opened. Thoſe, whom fortune enabled to retire from the devoted city, fled to the country with hurry and precipitation, inſomuch that the highways were encumbered with horſes and carriages. Many who had in the beginning, combated theſe groundleſs fears with the weapons of reaſon and ridicule, began inſenſibly to imbibe the contagion, and felt their hearts fail, in proportion as the hour of probation approached: even ſcience and philoſophy were not proof againſt the unaccountable effects of this communication. In after-ages it will hardly be believed, that on the evening of the 8th day of April the open fields that ſkirt the metropolis were filled with an incredible number of people, aſſembled in chairs, in chaiſe, and coaches, as well as on foot, who waited in the moſt fearful ſuſpenſe until morning and the return of day diſproved the truth of the dreadful propheſy. Then their fears vaniſhed: they returned to their reſpective habitations in a tranſport of joy; and were ſoon reconciled to their abandoned vices, which they ſeemed to reſume with redoubled affection, and once more bade defiance to the vengeance of heaven.

By this time all the gaols in England were filled with the refuſe of the army and navy, which having been diſmiſſed at the peace, and either averſe to labour, or excluded from employment, had naturally preyed upon the commonwealth. Great numbers of thoſe wretches who, by proper regulations, might have been rendered ſerviceable to the community, were executed as examples; and the reſt periſhed miſerably, amidſt the ſtench and horrors of noiſome dungeons. Even the priſon of Newgate was rendered ſo infectious by the uncommon crowds of confined felons, ſtowed together in cloſe apartments, that the very air they breathed acquired a peſtilential degree of putrefaction. It was this putrified air, which, adhering to the clothes of the malefactors brought to trial at the bar of the Old Bailey in May, produced among the audience a peſtilential fever, which infected and proved fatal to the lord-mayor of London, to one alderman, two of the judges, divers lawyers who attended the ſeſſion, the greateſt part of the jury, and a conſiderable number of the ſpectators. In order to prevent ſuch diſaſters for the future, the gaols were cleanſed, and accommodated with ventilators, which exhauſt the foul and ſupply a circulation of freſh air; and other humane precautions were taken for the benefit of the priſoners.

The affairs of the continent underwent no remarkable alteration. An ambaſſador extraordinary being ſent to Peterſburgh from the court of London, declared to the czarina's miniſter, that in caſe of a rupture between Ruſſia and Sweden, occaſioned by the hoſtilities committed by the former power, his Britannic majeſty would conſider Ruſſia as the aggreſſor, and the czarina could not expect that he would ſupply her with the ſuccours which he was engaged by treaty to furniſh for her defence, in caſe ſhe ſhould be attacked. A declaration of the ſame nature was made by the ambaſſador of her imperial majeſty the queen of Hungary, while the miniſters of France and Pruſſia, who were in ſtrict alliance with Sweden, gave her to underſtand, that they would punctually fulfil their engagements with the court of Stockholm, ſhould ſhe actually invade the Swediſh territories of Finland. The ſpirit with which the king of Pruſſia exerted himſelf on this occaſion gave infinite umbrage to the czarina, who, indeed, expreſſed her reſentment, by treating the miniſter of Brandenburgh with contemptuous neglect, and even refuſed to favour him with an audience, till he ſhould be veſted with the character of ambaſſador. Thus were ſown the ſeeds of miſunderſtanding between thoſe two powers, which, in the ſequel, grew up to the moſt bitter animoſity, and ſerved to inflame thoſe diſſentions which have deſolated the faireſt provinces of Germany. The remonſtrance of his Pruſſian majeſty with reſpect to the troubles of the north was couched in ſuch terms as gave diſſatisfaction to the court of Peterſburgh. The Ruſſian miniſter retired from Berlin without the ceremony of taking leave, and the Pruſſian ambaſſador Warendorf was recalled from the court of the czarina.

The attention of his Britannick majeſty was not wholly engroſſed by the diſputes between Ruſſia and Sweden. He had another object in view, which more nearly concerned the intereſt of his German dominions; and had ſet on foot two negotiations of the utmoſt importance to the commerce and advantage of Great-Britain. His firſt and principal aim was, in conjunction with the court of Vienna, to take ſuch meaſures as would ſecure the ſucceſſion of the imperial dignity to the archduke Joſeph, eldeſt ſon and heir to the reigning emperor. As the previous ſtep to that elevation, it was propoſed to elect this young prince king of the Romans; and for this purpoſe it was neceſſary to procure a majority not only of the electors, but alſo in the diet of the empire, through which the propoſal muſt have paſſed. No ſtone was left unturned to reconcile this expedient to the German princes. Subſidies were offered by the maratime powers of England and the ſtates-general to the electors of Mentz and Cologn; and a treaty of the ſame nature was concluded with the elector of Bavaria, who, in conſideration of an annual ſubſidy, amounting to 40,000l. ſterling, two-thirds to be paid by Britain, and the reſt by the ſtates-general, engaged to keep in readineſs a body of 6000 infantry, as auxiliaries to the miratime powers, though not to act againſt the emperor or empire; and to join the intereſt of his Britannick majeſty in the diet, as well as in the electoral college. In order to render the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, propitious to this deſign, he was accommodated with the loan of a very conſiderable ſum, upon the mortgage of certain bailiwicks and lordſhips belonging to the Saxon dominions. Thus, a majority of the electors was ſecured, and ſuch foundations were laid for the ſucceſs of this project, that it was generally believed it would be accompliſhed in his Britannick majeſty's next viſit to his German dominions. Hopes, it was ſaid, were given to the king of Sweden, that his concurrence would be gratified by erecting the houſe of Heſſe-Caſſel, of which he was head, into a tenth electorate. Arguments of an intereſting nature were uſed with the king of Pruſſia, and the elector Palatine, that if poſſible, the diet might unanimouſly approve of this meaſure, ſo neceſſary for eſtabliſhing the peace of the empire, and preventing ſuch troubles as aroſe from a diſputed ſucceſſion at the death of Charles VI. Theſe endeavours, however, did not ſucceed in their full extent.

The king of Pruſſia, as elector of Bradenburgh, oppoſed the election as unneceſſary and improper, on account of the health and vigour of the reigning emperor, and the tender years of the archduke. This monarch had ſet himſelf up as a balance to the power of the houſe of Auſtria, which had long aſpired to abſolute dominion over its co-eſtates, and endeavoured to eſtabliſh an hereditary right of ſucceſſion to the empire: he, therefore, employed all his influence to fruſtrate the meaſure propoſed, either actuated by a ſpirit of pure patriotiſm, or inſpired with deſigns which he had not yet thought proper to declare. The oppoſition was joined by the elector Palatine, and countenanced by the French king; who, proteſted, that, for the ſake of peace, he would not oppoſe this election, though contrary to the Golden Bull, provided it ſhould be confirmed by the unanimous conſent of the electoral college: but, ſhould any one member ſignify his diſſent, and he or any ſtate of the empire claim the protection and aſſiſtance of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, he could not diſpenſe with granting both, in conſequence of his being guarantee of the treaty of Weſtphalia; an engagement by which he was obliged to ſuccour thoſe princes and ſtate of the empire who might have recourſe to him, in caſe of any grievance they ſuffered, contrary to what was ſtipulated in that conſtitution. This declaration co-operating with the known character of his Pruſſian majeſty, whoſe great army over-awed Hanover and Bohemia, in all probability damped that vigour with which the courts of Vienna and Herenhauſen had hitherto proſecuted this important negotiation.

The ſecond object that employed the attention of the Britiſh miniſtry was the eſtabliſhment of the preciſe limits of Acadia, or Nova-Scotia, where the new colony had ſuffered great miſchief and interruption from the incurſions of the Indians, excited to theſe outrages by the ſubjects and emiſſaries of France. Commiſſaries had been appointed, by both crowns, to meet at Paris, and compromiſe theſe diſputes: but the conferences were rendered abortive by every art of cavilling, chicanery, and procraſtination, which the French commiſſioners oppoſed to the juſtice and perſpicuity of the Engliſh claims. They not only miſinterpreted treaties, though expreſſed with the utmoſt preciſion, and perplexed the conferences with difficulties and matter foreign to the ſubject, but they carried the fineſſe of perfidy ſo far as to produce falſe charts and maps of the country, in which the rivers and boundaries were miſplaced and miſrepreſented. At this time alſo the inſincerity of the French court appeared in affected delays and artful objections, with reſpect to the evacuation of the neutral iſlands in the Weſt-Indies; and the governors of the Britiſh plantations, in different parts of North-America, tranſmitted intelligence, that the French had begun to make encroachments on the bac of the Engliſh colonies.

Perhaps the precarious footing on which the peace ſtood between Great-Britain and France at this juncture, and the critical ſituation of affairs in Germany, determined the miniſtry of England to compromiſe all differences with Spain, upon ſuch terms as at any other time they would hardly have embraced. In order to diſcuſs thoſe points between the two nations, which had not been ſettled by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, conferences were alſo begun at Madrid, and carried on by mr. Keene, plenipotentiary of his Britannic majeſty, and don Joſeph de Carvajal and Lancaſtro, the Spaniſh king's miniſter. At length a treaty was concluded on theſe conditions: the king of Spain engaged to pay, in three months to the South-ſea company of England 100,000l. ſterling, as an indemnification for all claims upon his crown, by virtue of the Aſſiento. In other reſpects, the trade and navigation of the Engliſh to the ports of Spain were regulated by former treaties. It was ſtipulated, that they ſhould pay no other duties than thoſe that were exacted of them in the reign of Charles II. of Spain: that they ſhould be treated on the footing of the moſt favoured nations; and continue to enjoy the privilege of taking ſalt at the iſland of Tortuga. But there was no article reſtricting the Spaniſh guarda-coſtas from ſearching the Britiſh veſſels on the high ſeas; although, as we have already obſerved, this inſolent prerogative, aſſumed without right, and exerciſed without humanity, was, in effect, the original and ſole cauſe of the late rupture, which had been attended with ſuch enormous expence to the nation. It muſt be owned, however, that his catholic majeſty was at this period extremely well diſpoſed to live upon good terms with Great-Britain. He was reſolved to indulge his people with the bleſſings of peace, to propagate a ſpirit of induſtry throughout his dominions, and in particular to encourage commerce, which he foreſaw would prove a much more certain and inexhauſtible ſource of wealth, power, and influence, than all the treaſures he could drain from the mines of Mexico and Peru. His reſolutions on this intereſting ſubject were chiefly directed by don Richardo Wall, who now acted as his miniſter at London; a gentleman of Iriſh extract, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the field as well as in the cabinet, and poſſeſſed the joint qualifications of a general and a ſtateſman. He had, by virtue of a paſſport, come over privately to England before the peace, in order to pave the way for the treaty, by a ſecret negotiation with the Engliſh miniſters; but, immediately after the peace was proclaimed, he appeared in the character of ambaſſador. He was poſſeſſed of the moſt inſinuating addreſs, ſhrewd, penetrating, and inquiſitive. While he reſided in London, he ſpared no pains in learning the nature of thoſe manufactures, and that commerce, by which Great-Britain had been ſo remarkably aggrandized; and on his return to Spain, where in a little time he was placed at the helm of affairs, he turned the knowledge he had thus acquired to the advantage of his country. He not only promoted the uſeful arts within the kingdom of Spain, but demonſtrated the infinite advantage that would accrue from an active trade, which the Spaniards had for many ages neglected; and in a few years their ſhips were ſeen to ſwarm in all the commercial ports of Europe. Of other foreign events which diſtinguiſhed this ſummer, the moſt remarkable was the death of John, king of Portugal, who perfectly underſtood, and ſteadily purſued, the true intereſts of his country, and in whom many princely qualities were debaſed by a cruel ſpirit of bigotry and ſuperſtition. He was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Joſeph, who, if he has fallen ſhort of his father in ſome reſpects, cannot be juſtly charged with having inherited this paternal weakneſs.

The king of Great-Britain having returned to England, opened the ſeſſion of parliament in January with a ſpeech, importing, that he had concluded a treaty with the king of Spain, and amicably adjuſted ſuch differences as could not be ſo properly compromiſed in a general treaty: that the commerce of this nation with that country was re-eſtabliſhed upon the moſt advantageous and ſure foundations; and that there was the greateſt reaſon to hope the ancient friendſhip between Great-Britain and Spain would, from mutual inclination as well as intereſt, be now effectually reſtored. He told them, that, in conjuction with the empreſs-queen and the ſtates-general, he had concluded a treaty with the elector of Bavaria; and was employed in taking ſuch further meaſures as might beſt tend to ſtrengthen and ſecure the tranquillity of the empire, ſupport its ſyſtem, and timely anticipate ſuch events as had been found by experience to endanger the common cauſe, involve Europe in the calamities of war, and occaſion the loſs of much blood and treaſure to theſe kingdoms. He promiſed, that both theſe treaties ſhould be ſubjected to their peruſal: he gave them to underſtand, that he had received from all the other contracting powers in the definitive treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle the moſt full and clear declarations of their reſolution to preſerve the general peace; and that he had taken care to conſolidate the ties of union and friendſhip between him and his allies, the better to ſecure their mutual intereſt, maintain the peace already ſubſiſting, and prevent the occaſion of any future rupture. Finally, he recommended unanimity, the improvement of commerce, and the effectual ſuppreſſion of ſuch outrages and violences as are inconſiſtent with good order and government, and endanger the lives and properties of the ſubject, whoſe happineſs and flouriſhing condition he had entirely at heart.

When the motion was made for an addreſs of thanks, couched in terms that favoured of the moſt implicit complaiſance, approbation, and acquieſcence in the meaſures which the crown had taken, the earl of Eg—t, and ſome other anti-courtiers, affirmed, that ſuch an addreſs would be equally ſervile and abſurd. They obſerved, that nothing could be more prepoſterous than a blind approbataion of meaſures which they did not know: that nothing could be more ridiculous than their congratulations on the preſent happy tranquillity, when almoſt every day's news-papers informed them of ſome Britiſh ſhips being ſeiſed by the Spaniards, or ſome new attac made by the French on our infant colony in Nova-Scotia. With reſpect to the continent of Europe, they affirmed, that the tranquillity of Germany would have been upon a much more ſolid foundation, had England never interpoſed in the affairs of the empire: in that caſe the princes would of themſelves have ſupported the conſtitution of their own country: that the election of an infant for king of the Romans was much more likely to diſturb than eſtabliſh the tranquillity of Europe; becauſe it would help to overturn the conſtitution of the empire, by rendering the imperial dignity hereditary in one houſe, inſtead of being the reſult of a free election. They took notice, that the conſtitution had provided vicars to govern the empire during the vacancy of the imperial throne; but had made no proviſion of regents, protectors, or guardians, for a minor emperor, becauſe it was never ſuppoſed that a minor would be choſen. They inveighed againſt the late treaty with Spain; in which, they ſaid, the miniſtry, for the paltry ſum of 100,000l. had given up the claims of the South-ſea company, and other Britiſh merchants, who had ſuffered from depredations to the amount of 1,300,000l. and bartered away the freedom of our trade and navigation, by leaving untouched that prerogative which the Spaniards have aſſumed of ſearching the Britiſh ſhips in the open ſeas, and confiſcating them, ſhould they find on board the leaſt particle of what they called contraband merchandiſe. They produced an inſtance of an Engliſh ſhip, lately driven by ſtreſs of weather into one of the ports of the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies, where ſhe was ſearched ſeiſed, and condemned, under this pretence. They recapitulated the conduct of the French, who, in the midſt of their declarations of peace and moderation, were ſtill employed in fortifying their ſettlements on the neutral iſlands, as well as in harraſſing and encroaching upon our plantations in North-America. They exclaimed againſt the treaty of ſubſidy with the elector of Bavaria, or any other prince in time of peace; obſerving, that for ſome years the nation had paid ſuch penſions to the Danes and the Heſſians; but, in the courſe of the late war the former abandoned our intereſts and the latter actually took arms againſt Great-Britain. They affirmed, that the ſubſidy was greater than the nation could ſpare; for, unleſs the land-tax ſhould be continued at four ſhillings in the pound, they could not afford a ſhilling to any prince in Germany, without encroaching upon the ſinking-fund. 'At ſuch a juncture (ſaid a certain member) will any gentleman preſume to propoſe the continuation of ſuch an impoſition on the land-holder, for the ſake of bribing the princes of Germany to do what?———to preſerve the freedom and independency of their native country. I ſay, princes of Germany, becauſe this ſubſidy to Bavaria will ſignify nothing, unleſs we take half a ſcore more of them into our pay; and when we have thus indulged them for ſeven years of peace, they may give us the ſlip, as others have done, whenever another war ſhould be declared.' Againſt theſe objections the motion was ſupported by mr. William Pitt, at this time an advocate for the miniſtry. He obſerved, that the addreſs was no more than the uſual compliment to the throne, which did not imply an obligation on the parliament to approve of meaſures which they might find cauſe to cenſure upon further enquiry. He ſaid, the trivial diſputes ſtill ſubſiſting between this nation and the Spaniards, or French, would ſoon be terminated amicably, and could never affect the general tranquillity of Europe, which was to be eſtabliſhed upon a firm alliance between his majeſty and ſuch a confederacy upon the continent as would be an over-match for the houſe of Bourbon. He expatiated upon his majeſty's wiſdom in taking off from the French intereſt ſuch a powerful prince as the elector of Bavaria, and concerting other ſalutary meaſures for preſerving the balance of power on the continent. He defended the articles of the late treaty with Spain; obſerving, that what remained of the Aſſiento contract was a matter of very little conſequence to the South-Sea company; that the demands of this company, and other Britiſh merchants, were all cancelled by the rupture with Spain, and more than recompenſed to the nation by a great balance of captures during the war, as well as by the great traffic carried on with the Spaniſh ſettlements in the Weſt-Indies, after it had been laid open by the demolition of their fortreſſes. He aſſerted, that by this treaty the court of Spain had made many important conceſſions: they had condeſcended to pay a great ſum to the South-ſea company: they had conſented to the re-eſtabliſhment of the Britiſh trade in Spain, upon a very advantageous and ſolid footing, by agreeing that the ſubjects of Great-Britain ſhould pay no other duties on merchandiſe than thoſe exacted of his Catholic majeſty's own ſubjects, and to aboliſh all innovations that had been introduced into the commerce.

He affirmed, that the article of No Search was a ſtipulation which it would have been ridiculous to inſiſt upon; and thought proper to obviate a reproach which he foreſaw the oppoſition would throw upon him, from the circumſtance of his having, upon a former occaſion, heartily concurred in a motion for an addreſs, that no treaty of peace with Spain ſhould be admitted, unleſs ſuch a ſtipulation ſhould be firſt obtained as a preleminary. He owned he had ſtrenuouſly contended for ſuch a motion, becauſe at that time, being very young and ſanguine, he thought it right and reaſonable: but he was now ten years older, had conſidered matters more coolly, and was convinced that the privilege of No Search, with reſpect to Britiſh veſſels ſailing near the American ſhore, would never be obtained, unleſs Spain ſhould be brought ſo low as to acquieſce in any terms we as victors might propoſe. He likewiſe ſignified his conviction, that all addreſſes from the houſe of commons, during the courſe of a war, for preſcribing terms of peace, were in themſelves ridiculous; and that every ſuch addreſs was an encroachment on the king's prerogative, which had always been attended with unlucky conſequences. How far theſe arguments are ſatisfactory, concluſive, and conſiſtent, we ſhall leave to the reader's determination. Certain it is, they were adobted by the majority, and the addreſs was preſented without further oppoſion.

The two grand committees appointed to diſguſs the ſupplies for the enſuing year, and the funds upon which they were to be raiſed, proceeded as uſual, under the direction of the miniſtry; yet not without ſome vehement oppoſition, in which certain ſervants of the crown expreſſed the moſt hearty concurrence. When a motion was made for reducing the number of ſeamen to 8000, mr. W. Pitt, mr. Lyttelton, and mr. G. Grenville oppoſed it with all their might of argument and elocution; but they were over-ruled. Annual debates were alſo revived, with the ſame ſucceſs, upon the number of troops conſtituting the ſtanding army; but the other reſolutions of the grand committees met with little or no oppoſition. The number of ſeamen for the enſuing year was limited to 8000; and that of the ſtanding forces continued to 18,857 effective men, including 1815 invalids. The commons granted a conſiderable ſum of money for paying off the principal of ſuch redeemable ſtocs as had not been ſubſcribed in purſuance of two acts paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion for reducing the intereſt of annuities. Thirty thouſand pounds were given for fulfilling the king's engagement with the elector of Bavaria: large grants were made for ſupplying deficiencies, and replacing ſums borrowed from the ſinking-fund. The expence incurred by the new colony in Nova-Scotia, not provided for by parliament, exceed 57,000l. and the maintenance of it for the enſuing year was fixed at 53,927l. 14s. 4d. An enormous charge! if we conſider to how little purpoſe all this bounty was beſtowed. A fund was eſtabliſhed under the ſanction of parliament, for the relief and maintenance of the widows and ſea-officers, by allowing, upon the books of every ſhip of war in ſea-pay, the wages and victuals of one man for every hundred of which the complement ſhall conſiſt, for ſuch time only as the number of men employed in the ſervice of the royal navy ſhall not exceed 20,000. This was an additional indulgence, over and above the allowance of one man granted by a former act of parliament. On the whole, the proviſions of this year amounted to 5,125,23l. 11s. 7d. to be raiſed by the uſual duties; the ſum of 1,26,476l. 4s. 6d. advanced by the bank of England, to pay off their own unſubſcribed annuities, for which they accepted exchequer-bills at 3 per cent. intereſt; by the land-tax at 3s. in the pound; a lottery and annuities, at the rate of 3 per cent. per ann. to be charged on the ſinking-fund, redeemable by parliament. The annual meaſure called the mutiny-bill was not paſſed without diſpute and altercation: ſome alterations were propoſed, but not adobted; and the ſentences of court-martials ſtill ſubjected to one reviſion.

In the midſt of theſe deliberations the kingdom was alarmed with an event which overwhelmed the people with grief and conſternation. His royal highneſs the prince of Wales, in conſequence of a cold caught in his garden at Kew, was ſeiſed with a pleuretic diſorder; and after a ſhort illneſs, expired on the 20th day of March, to the unſpeakable affliction of his royal conſort and the unfeigned ſorrow of all who wiſhed well to their country. This excellent prince, who now died in the 45th year of his age, was poſſeſſed of every amiable quality which could engage the affection of the people: a tender and obliging huſband, a fond parent, a kind maſter, liberal, generous, candid, and humane; a munificent patron of the arts, an unwearied friend to merit; well diſpoſed to aſſert the rights of mankind in general, and warmly attached to the intereſt of Great-Britain. The nation could not but be afflicted at ſeeing a prince of ſuch expectations raviſhed from their hopes; and their grief was the better founded, as the king had already attained to an advanced age, and the heir apparent George, now prince of Wales, was a minor.

[1751] His majeſty foreſeeing all the inconveniencies which might ariſe from a minority, deliberated with his council on this ſubject, and reſolved to obtain a parliamentary ſanction for the meaſures judged neceſſary to ſecure the ſucceſſion. With this view he ſent a meſſage to both houſes on the 26th day of April, importing, That nothing could conduce ſo much to the preſervation of the proteſtant ſucceſſion in his royal family, as proper proviſions for the tuition of the perſon of his ſucceſſor, and for the regular adminiſtration of the government, in caſe the ſucceſſor ſhould be of tender years: his majeſty, therefore, earneſtly recommended this weighty affair to the deliberation of parliament; and propoſed, that when the imperial crown of theſe realms ſhould deſcend to any of the late prince's ſons, being now under the age of 18 years, his mother, the princeſs dowager of Wales, ſhould be guardian of his perſon, and regent of theſe kingdoms, until he ſhould attain the age of majority, with ſuch powers and limitations as ſhould appear neceſſary and expedient for theſe purpoſes. This meſſage produced a very affectionate addreſs, promiſing to take the affair into their ſerious conſideration; and in the beginning of May the duke of Newcaſtle preſented to the houſe of peers a bill to provide for the adminiſtration of government, in caſe the crown ſhould deſcend to a minor. The bill was read a ſecond time, and committed, when a ſecond meſſage arrived from his majeſty, recommending, to their conſideration the ſettlement of ſuch a council of regency as the bill propoſed, conſiſting of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, who at that time commanded the army, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord-chancellor, the lord-high treaſurer, or firſt lord-commiſſioner of the treaſury, the preſident of the council, the lord privy-ſeal, the lord-high admiral of Great-Britain, or firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty, the two principal ſecretaries of ſtate, and the lord chief juſtice of the king's-bench, all theſe great officers, except his royal highneſs the duke, for the time being. This bill did not paſs through the lower-houſe without violent debate and bitter ſarcaſms. The council of regency, though eſpouſed by all the miniſtry, including the paymaſter-general, met with fierce oppoſition, as an unneceſſary and fatal reſtriction, that would impede the machine of government, and as the council was conſtituted, might be productive of the moſt pernicious conſequence. Some of the members ventured even to inſinuate the danger of leaving at the head of a large ſtanding army a prince of the blood, veſted with a ſhare of the regency, poſſeſſed of great perſonal influence, the darling of the ſoldiery, brave, popular, and enterpriſing; ſuppoſed not wholly devoid of ambition, and not at all remarkable for any ſymptoms of extraordinary affection towards the perſon of the heir apparent. The hiſtory of England was ranſacked for invidious inſtances of royal uncles and regents, who had injured the ſovereigns, and diſtreſſed the government, by their pride, cruelty, and ambition. The characters of John Lackland, and John of Ghent, Humphrey and Richard dukes of Glouceſter, were called in review, canvaſſed, compared, and quoted, with ſome odious applications: but the majority being convinced of the loyalty, virtue integrity, and great abilities of his royal highneſs, to whom the nation owed obligations of the moſt important nature, paſſed the bill with a few amendments, in which the lords acquieſced; and in a little time it received the royal ſanction.

The death of the prince of Wales was fatal to a bill which had been brought into the houſe of commons, for naturalizing all foreign proteſtants who ſhould ſettle within the dominions of Great-Britain. Political arithmeticians have generally taken it for granted, that to every commercial nation an increaſe of people is an increaſe of opulence; and this maxim is certainly true, on the ſuppoſition that every individual is induſtrious, and that there is a ſufficient field for employment; but all theſe general maxims ought to be received under certain qualifications. When all branches of manufacture are over-ſtocked, an addition of workmen will doubtleſs be an additional incumbrance on the community. In the debates which this bill produced, the members of the miniſtry were divided among themſelves. The meaſure was enforced by the chancellor of the exchequer, mr. W. Pitt, and mr. Lyttelton; and in oppoſing it the earl of Egmont was joined by mr. Fox, ſecretary at war. Petitions and counter-petitions were preſented by the merchants of London, Briſtol, and other trading towns of the kingdom. All merchants and traders of foreign extraction exerted themſelves vigorouſly in its behalf, and it was without doubt countenanced by the adminiſtration; but the project was odious to the people in general. The lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of London, in common council aſſembled, compoſed a remonſtrance to the lower-houſe, ſetting forth the danger and inutility of a general naturalization of foreign proteſtants. A petition of the merchants and principal inhabitants of Briſtol repreſented that ſuch a law would be prejudicial to the trade and commerce of this kingdom, by preventing many induſtrious artificers from procuring a ſufficient ſupport for themſelves and their families, and of conſequence increaſing the rates of the poor; that the introduction of ſuch a number of foreigners, inſtead of being a ſupport to the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, might endanger the very baſis of our conſtitution: that it would greatly tend to the diminution of our manufactures, as many ſtrangers would doubtleſs come and reſide in England for a time, in order to learn the methods and management of our manufacturers and artificers; and, after having obtained this inſtruction, return to their native countries, where they would eſtabliſh and carry on works of the ſame nature. The 20th day of March being appointed for the third reading of the bill, it was poſtponed, in conſequence of the unfortunate death of the prince of Wales; and other petitions from different cities of the kingdom being muſtered againſt it in the ſequel, the miniſtry did not think proper to perſiſt in any unpopular meaſure at ſuch a delicate conjuncture; ſo the bill was no more brought upon the carpet. Divers other regulations, relating to civil policy as well as to the commerce of Great-Britain, were propounded in the houſe of commons; but theſe propoſals proved abortive, either becauſe they appeared crude and indigeſted in themſelves, or the houſe could not obtain proper information touching the allegations they contained.

There were no other tranſactions in this ſeſſion except the concurrence of both houſes in ſtigmatiſing a printed paper, intituled, 'Conſtitutional Queries, earneſtly recommended to the ſerious conſideration of every true Briton;' and the ſteps taken by the commons, in conſequence of the commotions occaſioned by the Weſtminſter election. The above mentioned paper, which had been conveyed by letter to the majority of both houſes, was communicated to the lords in the month of January by the duke of Marlborough, who moved for reſolutions againſt it as a ſeditious libel, and that the concurrence of the commons might be deſired. A conference accordingly enſued, and both houſes concurred in voting the paper a falſe, malicious, ſcandalous, infamous, and ſeditious libel, containing the moſt falſe, audacious, and abominable calumnies and indignities upon his majeſty, and the moſt preſumptuous and wicked inſinuations that our laws, liberties, and properties, and the excellent conſtitution of this kingdom, were in danger under his majeſty's legal, mild, and gracious government, with intent to inſtill groundleſs ſuſpicions and jealouſies into the minds of his majeſty's good ſubjects, and to alienate their affections from his majeſty and the royal family. It was, therefore, reſolved by the lords ſpiritual and temporal and commons in parliament aſſembled, that, in abhorrence and deteſtation of ſuch abominable and ſeditious practices, the paper ſhould be burnt by the hands of the common hangman in the New Palace-yard of Weſtminſter; and this ſentence was executed accordingly. Then they preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, deſiring that the moſt effectual means might be taken for diſcovering the author, printer, or publiſher, that he or they might be brought to condign puniſhment. Directions were given for this purpoſe; but without effect. Thoſe concerned in writing, printing, and circulating the paper had acted with ſuch caution, that not one of them was ever diſcovered.

The proceedings of the commons with reſpect to the election of a burgeſs for Weſtminſter were attended with ſome extraordinary circumſtances, which we ſhall now record, for the edification of thoſe who pique themſelves on the privilege of a Britiſh ſubject. We have already obſerved, that a majority appearing on the poll for lord Trentham, the adherents of the other candidate, ſir George Vandeput, demanded a ſcrutiny, which was granted by the high-bailiff of Weſtminſter, the returning officer. During this tedious inveſtigation, which rolled chiefly on the qualifications of voters, he acted with ſuch addreſs and ſeeming candour as gave entire ſatisfaction to both parties, till at length he determined in favour of lord Trentham, whom he returned as duly elected. Thoſe who ſtiled themſelves the independent electors did not acquieſce in this determination without clamour, reproach, menaces, and riot. They taxed mr. Leigh, the high-bailiff, with partiality and injuſtice: they loudly affirmed, that miniſterial influence had been uſed in the moſt ſcandalous manner; and, finally, joined ſir George Vandeput in a petition to the lower-houſe, complaining of an undue election and return of a member for the city of Weſtminſter. The commons inſtead of enquiring into the merits of theſe petitions, ordered them to lie upon the table; and, without any complaint from any perſon whatever, a motion was made that Leigh, the high-bailiff, ſhould attend the houſe immediately, in order to make them acquainted with what he had done in purſuance of the directions he had formerly received from that houſe, touching the execution of the writ for electing a new member to repreſent the city of Weſtminſter. As this motion had been preconcerted, Leigh was attending in the lobby, and immediately called into the houſe to be examined on this ſubject. Having, in the courſe of his examination, alledged that the election had been protracted by affected delays, he was aſked by whom, and by what means; but, before he could anſwer, the earl of Egmont, interpoſing, objected to the queſtion as improper, and moved for the order of the day. A debate immediately enſued, in which the impropriety of the queſtion was demonſtrated by mr. Henley, now lord-keeper, dr. Lee, and ſome others, the moſt ſenſible and moderate members of the houſe: but they were oppoſed with great violence by lord viſcount Corke, Henry Fox, eſq. ſir William Yonge, colonel Lyttelton, and the weight of the miniſtry; ſo that the motion for the order of the day was carried in the negative, and the high-bailiff required to anſwer the queſtion. Thus interrogated, he declared that he had been impeded in the ſcrutiny, and mal-treated, by mr. Crowle, who had acted as counſel for ſir George Vandeput, by the honourable Alexander Murray, brother to lord Elibank, and one Gibſon, an upholſterer, who had been very active, zealous, and turbulent in his endeavours to promote the intereſt of ſir George Vandeput, or rather to thwart the pretenſions of the other candidate, who was ſuppoſed to be countenanced by the miniſtry. Theſe three perſons, thus accuſed, were brought to the bar of the houſe, notwithſtanding the ſtrenuous remonſtrances of ſeveral members, who oppoſed this method of proceeding, as a ſpecies of oppreſſion equally arbitrary and abſurd. They obſerved, that, as no complaint had been preferred, they had no right to take cognizance of the affair: that if any undue influence had been uſed, it would naturally appear when the merits of the election ſhould fall under their enquiry: that a complaint having been lodged already againſt the returning officer, it was their duty to inveſtigate his conduct, and puniſh him, if he ſhould be found delinquent; but that nothing could be more flagrantly unjuſt, and apparently partial, than their neglecting the petitions of the other candidate and electors, and encouraging the high-bailiff, who ſtood charged with iniquity, to recriminate upon his accuſers, that they might be diſabled from giving evidence on the enquiry into the merits of the election. What difference is it to the ſubject, whether he is oppreſſed by an arbitrary prince, or by the deſpotic inſolence of a miniſterial majority? Mr Crowle alledged, in his own vindication, that he had been employed as a counſel by the electors of Weſtminſter, and attended the ſcrutiny in that character; that after the high-bailiff had, in the courſe of the laſt ſeſſion, received the order of the houſe to expedite the election, he hurried on the ſcrutiny with ſuch precipitation as, he apprehended, was unjuſt, and prejudicial to his clients; that, in this apprehenſion, he (mr. Crowle) inſiſted upon the high-bailiff's proceeding with more deliberation, and in ſo doing he thought he did his duty to his employers. Some evidence being examined againſt him, declared he had not only protracted the ſcrutiny, but alſo ſpoken diſreſpectful words of the houſe of commons: he was, therefore, reprimanded on his knees by the ſpeaker, and diſcharged.

Mr Murray being charged with having uttered ſome threatening and affrontive expreſſions, the houſe adjourned the conſideration of this affair for ſome days, at the expiration of which mr. Murray was to be heard by his counſel: but, in the mean time, they ordered him to be taken into cuſtody by the ſerjeant at arms attending the houſe. This ſtep, however, was not taken without a warm oppoſition by ſome of the moſt ſedate and intelligent members of the houſe, who conſidered it as a cruel act of oppreſſion. They obſerved, that in caſes of breach of privilege no perſon complained of was ever taken into cuſtody, until after he had been fully heard in his defence: that this was literally prejudging the cauſe before it had been examined; and the oppreſſion was the greater, as the alledged offence conſiſted entirely of words, of which no complaint or information had been made for above eight months after the ſuppoſed offence had been committed; and, even then, not till an accuſation had been lodged againſt the informant, upon the trial of which accuſation the perſons informed againſt might very probably be the moſt material witneſſes. They obſerved, that in one of the higheſt offences which can be committed by words, namely, that of denying the king's right to the crown, or renouncing the Trinity the information muſt be brought in three or four days after the words are ſpoken; the words muſt be proved to have been ſpoken maliciouſly, directly, and adviſedly, and the proſecution muſt commence in three months after the information. Theſe ſuggeſtions made no more impreſſion than if they had been uttered in a deſart. Thoſe who were ſecure in their number aſſerted that the houſe of commons was not reſtricted by the forms of proceedings at common law; and that it was neceſſary to vindicate their own honour and dignity, by making examples of thoſe who ſeemed to hold them in contempt. Mr Murray was committed to the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms, and found bail; and Gibſon was ſent priſoner to Newgate, from whence he was in a few days releaſed, upon preſenting an humble petition, profeſſing his ſorrow for having incurred the diſpleaſure of the houſe, to the bar of which he was brought, and received a reprimand on his knees from the ſpeaker. In the mean time, divers witneſſes being examined before the houſe, declared, that mr. Murray had been ſeen, about the time of the return of a member for Weſtminſter, heading and exciting a tumult to acts of violence againſt the high-bailiff. The majority, therefore, after a long and warm debate, agreed, that for his dangerous and ſeditious practices, in violation and contempt of the privileges of the houſe, and of the freedom of elections, he ſhould be committed cloſe priſoner to Newgate. Then, in the cloſe of another violent debate, they reſolved, that he ſhould be brought to the bar of the houſe, to receive that ſentence on his knees. He accordingly appeared, and being directed by the ſpeaker to kneel, refuſed to comply. He knew that he could not be diſcharged from Newgate during the ſeſſion, without petitioning, acknowledging his offence, and making ſuch conceſſions as he thought would imply a conſciouſneſs of guilt: he conſidered this whole tranſaction as an oppreſſive exertion of arbitrary power, and, being appriſed of the extent of their authority, determined to bear the brunt of their indignation, rather than make ſubmiſſions which he deemed beneath the dignity of his character. When he refuſed to humble himſelf the whole houſe was in commotion; he was no ſooner removed from the bar than they reſolved, that his having in a moſt inſolent and audacious manner refuſed to be on his knees at the bar of that houſe, in conſequence of their former reſolution, was a high and moſt dangerous contempt of the authority and privilege of the commons: it was, therefore, ordered, that he ſhould be committed cloſe priſoner to Newgate, debarred the uſe of pen, ink, and paper; and that no perſon ſhould have acceſs to him, without the leave of the houſe. Finally, a committee was appointed to conſider what methods might be proper to be taken by them, in relation to this inſtance of contempt. Mean while, the petitioners againſt the return made by the high-bailiff, perceiving the temper of the houſe, and the complexion of the majority, withdrew their petition; and the order which had paſſed for hearing the merits of the election was diſcharged. Mr Murray being taken dangerouſly ill in Newgate, application was made to the commons, by ſome of his relations, that he might be removed to a more convenient ſituation; and his phyſician, being examined, gave it as his opinion that he was infected with the gaol diſtemper. Upon this repreſentation the houſe agreed that the ſpeaker ſhould iſſue a warrant for removing him from Newgate to the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms; but this favour he refuſed to accept, and expreſſed the warmeſt reſentment againſt thoſe relations who had applied to the commons in his behalf. Thus he remained ſequeſtered even from his own brother and ſiſter, under the diſpleaſure of the commons of England, who condeſcended ſo far as to make reſolutions touching the phyſician, apothecary, and nurſe who attended this priſoner. But the prorogation of parliament having put an end to their authority for that ſeſſion, mr. Murray was diſcharged of courſe, and conducted by the ſheriffs from Newgate to his own houſe, in proceſſion, with flags and ſtreamers, exhibiting the emblems of liberty.

In the month of June the ſeſſion was cloſed with a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty thanked both houſes for the zeal and affection they had manifeſted towards him and his government; and congratulated the commons in particular, upon their firmneſs and prudence in reducing the intereſt of the national debt, a meaſure as agreeable to him as eſſential to the ſtrength and welfare of the kingdom. The interior œconomy of Great-Britain produced, within

[c] One of the moſt remarkable acts which paſſed in the courſe of this ſeſſion, was that for regulating the commencement of the year, and correcting the calendar, according to the Gregorian computation, which had been adopted by all the other nations in Europe. By this new law it was decreed that the new year ſhould begin on the firſt day of January; and that eleven intermediate nominal days, between the ſecond and 14th days of September, 1752, ſhould for that time be omitted, ſo that the day ſucceeding the ſecond ſhould be denominated the 14th of that month. By this eſtabliſhment of the the circle of this year, nothing elſe worthy of hiſtorical regard, except a ſeries of enormous crimes, ariſing from the profligacy of individuals, which reflected diſgrace upon the morals and the polity of the nation. Rapine and robbery had domineered without intermiſſion ever ſince the return of peace, which was attended with a reduction of the army and navy; but no crimes of a deeper dye ſeemed to lift up their heads, in contempt of law and humanity[d]. Every day almoſt produced freſh inſtances of perjury, forgery, fraud, and circumvention; and the kingdom exhibited a moſt amazing jumble of virtue and vice, honour and infamy, compaſſion and obduracy, ſentiment and brutality.

The royal family of England had ſuſtained three ſevere ſhocs in the compaſs of a few months. Beſides the loſs of the prince of Wales, which the nation lamented as irreparable, his majeſty was deeply afflicted by the untimely death of his youngeſt daughter, the queen of Denmark, who died at Copenhagen, on the 19th day of December, in the prime of youth. She was one of the moſt amiable princeſſes of the age in which ſhe lived, whether we conſider the virtues of her heart, or the accompliſhments of her perſon; generous, mild, and tender-hearted; beloved even almoſt to adoration by her royal conſort, to whom ſhe had borne a prince and two princeſſes: and univerſally admired and revered by the ſubjects of his Daniſh majeſty. Her death had been preceded about two months by that of her brother-in-law, the prince of Orange, no leſs regretted by the ...tives of the United Provinces, for his candour, integrity, and hereditary love to his country. Though he had not diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the luſtre of a ſuperior genius, he had been at great pains to cultivate his underſtanding, and ſtudy the true intereſt of that community of which he was a member. He had always approved himſelf a good and zealous citizen, and ſince his elevation to the ſtadtholderſhip, taken many ſalutary ſteps for the advantage of his country. Among other excellent ſchemes which he ſuggeſted, he left a noble plan with the ſtates-general for reſtoring their commerce to its former luſtre, and lived long enough to receive their warmeſt acknowledgments for this laſt proof of his prudence and patriotiſm. His ſon and daughter being both infants, the adminiſtration of the government devolved upon the princeſs, as governante during her ſon's minority; and as ſuch ſhe ſucceeded to all the power which her huſband had enjoyed.

With reſpect to the affairs of the continent, the peace of the north ſeemed ſtill as precarious as ever: for though the difference between Ruſſia and Sweden had been compromiſed, the mutual diſguſt between the czarina and the king of Pruſſia had gained ſuch acceſſion from reciprocal inſults, ill offices, and inflammatory declarations, that theſe two powers ſeemed to be on the eve of a rupture, and each was employed in making extraordinary preparations for war. The courts of Vienna and Great-Britain, foreſeeing that ſuch a rupture would embroil the empire, and raiſe inſurmountable obſtructions to their favourite ſcheme of electing the archduke Joſeph king of the Romans, reſolved to employ all their influence, in order to effect a reconciliation between the courts of Peterſburgh and Berlin. His Pruſſian majeſty had ſignified to the king of Great-Britain, and the ſtates-general, the ſituation in which he ſtood with the czarina, and ſollicited their interpoſition, that the difference might be amicably accommodated. At the ſame time, he ſent an envoy-extraordinary to Verſailles, to negotiate with the French king a very conſiderable body of auxiliaries, in caſe he ſhould be attacked. Theſe circumſtances induced the maritime powers, and the court of Vienna, to uſe their utmoſt endeavours for the prevention of a rupture; and accordingly they made remonſtrances on this ſubject by their miniſters at Peterſburgh, propoſing that the quarrel ſhould be terminated without bloodſhed, and all cauſe of animoſity be buried in oblivion.

In the mean time, they eagerly proſecuted the deſign of the election; and the imperial miniſter at Berlin not only communicated to his Pruſſian majeſty the ſentiments of the king of England on this expedient, but even ſollicited his vote for the archduke Joſeph, when the election of a king of the Romans ſhould be propoſed in the electoral college. To this propoſal he replied, That he was extremely well diſpoſed to manifeſt his regard for their imperial majeſties, and to give them moſt genuine proofs of it, even in the propoſed election of a king of the Romans, conſidering the great merit of the preſent candidate, the archduke Joſeph: but he left it to the conſideration of their imperial majeſties, whether the election would not be a little premature, if tranſacted at a time when his imperial majeſty was in the flower of his age, enjoying perfect health; and when all Europe, particularly the empire, was huſhed in the boſom of tranquillity, ſo that no circumſtance ſeemed to prognoſticate the neceſſity of ſuch an election; or of putting in execution the motives mentioned in the capitulation of the reigning emperor's election; eſpecially as the examination of theſe motives belonged to the whole empire, and ought to precede the election, by virtue of the eighth article of the treaty of Weſtphalia. He obſerved, that, in caſe of the emperor's death, Germany would find herſelf in a very diſagreeable ſituation, under the government of a minor. For theſe reaſons, he ſaid, he could not help adviſing their imperial majeſties to wait until the archduke ſhould be of age, when his election might be carried on more conformably to the laws and conſtitutions of the empire, and more ſuitable to the majeſty of the whole Germanick body. This reply he circulated among the electors, and in particular tranſmitted it to the king of Great-Britain, deſiring they would deliberate maturely on this ſubject, and confer together in a body, as well as in private, that they might proceed accordingly to the ancient cuſtom of the electoral college, and take ſuch meaſures as ſhould be judged expedient for the honour and advantage of the community. This circular letter was anſwered both by the king of England and the elector of Bavaria, who demonſtrated, that it was the privilege of the electoral college only, without any participation of the other princes of the empire, to elect a king of the Romans during the life of the emperor, in order to maintain the peace and preſerve the liberties of Germany; and that the neglect of this wiſe precaution hath produced bloody wars, and many fatal conſequences to the empire. They obſerved, that nothing could more contribute to the eſtabliſhment of the public tranquillity than this meaſure, ſo ardently deſired by the majority of the German princes; and that, although the archduke Joſeph wanted a few years of being of age, and it might poſſibly happen that the reigning emperor ſhould die during that prince's minority, yet it would be much leſs prejudicial to the empire to have a minor chief, than to ſee the ſucceſſion altogether unſettled. His Pruſſian majeſty received a declaration to the ſame purpoſe from the elector of Mentz; and underſtanding that this prince, as arch-chancellor of the empire, intended to convoke an electoral diet, in order to propoſe the election of a king of the Romans, he wrote an elaborate letter to his electoral highneſs, explaining at more length, his reaſons for poſtponing the election. He quoted that ſentence of the treaty of Weſtphalia which expreſsly declares, that the election of a king of the Romans ſhall be diſcuſſed and ordained by the common conſent of the ſtates of the empire; and therefore he could not conceive what right the electorate college had to arrogate the privilege to themſelves, excluding the other ſtates of the empire. He obſerved, that the imperial capitulations, which were the only laws of the empire that treated of this ſubject, mentioned only three caſes in which it was lawful to proceed to ſuch an election; namely, the emperor's leaving and long abſence from Germany; his advanced age, or an indiſpoſition, rendering him incapable of managing the reins of government; and any caſe of emergency in which the preſervation of the empire's proſperity is intereſted. He affirmed, that none of theſe motives at preſent exiſted: that in caſe the imperial crown ſhould devolve to a minor, many miſchiefs and diſorders muſt enſue, as the conſtitution of the empire have eſtabliſhed no regulations nor regency in that event; that an election of this nature, carried on under the power, influence, and authority of the head of the empire, would ſtrike at the fundamental privileges of the princes and ſtates; conſequently, in time overturn the conſtitution of the empire, which, from being an elective dignity, conferred by the free and independent ſuffrages of the electoral college and the ſtates of Germany, new ſtile, the equinoxes and ſolſtices will happen nearly on the ſame nominal days on which they fell in the year 325, at the council of Nice; and the correſpondence between the Engliſh merchants and thoſe of foreign countries will be greatly facilitated, with reſpect to the dates of letters and accounts.

[d] An indulgent parent was poiſoned by his only daughter, on whom, beſides other marks of tenderneſs and paternal affection, he had beſtowed a liberal education, which greatly aggravated her guilt and ingratitude. Another young woman was concerned in the aſſaſſination of her own uncle, who had been her conſtant benefactor and ſole guardian. A poor old woman having from the ignorance and ſuperſtition of her neighbours, incurred the ſuſpicion of ſorcery and witchcraft, was murdered in Hertfordſhire by the populace, with all the wantonneſs of barbarity. Rape and murder were perpetrated upon an unfortunate woman in the neighbourhood of London, and an innocent man ſuffered death for this complicated outrage, while the real criminals aſſiſted at his execution, heard him appeal to heaven for his innocence, and in the character of friends, embraced him, while he ſtood on the brink of eternity.

under certain capitulations, obliging the prince thus choſen to govern according to law, would become an hereditary ſucceſſion, perpetuated in one family, which, of courſe, muſt be aggrandiſed to the prejudice of its co-eſtates, and the ruin of the Germanick liberties. In a word all Germany in general, and Ratiſbon in particular, was filled with writings publiſhed on both ſides; by the emperor and his adherents, to demonſtrate that the election of a king of the Romans, during the life of the emperor, had often happened, and at this preſent time was neceſſary, and would be advantageous to the empire: while the king of Pruſſia and his friends laboured to prove that ſuch an election, at the preſent juncture, would be ill-timed, irregular, and of dangerous conſequence. Perhaps, if the truth was known, this enterpriſing prince had projected ſome great ſcheme, with the execution of which this propoſed eſtabliſhment would have interfered. Certain it is, he exerted himſelf with that ſpirit and perſeverance which were peculiar to his character to fruſtrate the intention of the courts of Vienna and London in this particular, and was aſſiſted with all the intrigue of the French miniſtry. Their joint endeavours were ſo effectual that the elector of Cologn renounced his ſubſidiary treaty with the maritime powers, and once more threw himſelf into the arms of France. The elector Palatine being ſollicited by the empreſs-queen and his Britannick majeſty to co-operate with their views, inſiſted, as a preliminary article, upon being indemnified by the court of Vienna for the ravages committed in his territories by the Auſtrian troops, during the courſe of the laſt war: the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, made the ſame demand of the like indemnification, which was granted by the mediation of king George; and then he ſubſcribed to a ſubſidy-treaty, obliging himſelf to furniſh a body of 6000 auxiliaries, in caſe they ſhould be required by the maritime powers; and to act as elector, in concert with the houſe of Auſtria, in every thing relating to the welfare of his country that ſhould ſquare with the fundamental laws of the empire. The courts of London and Vienna had this election ſo much at heart, that they ſounded almoſt all the powers of Europe, to know how they ſtood affected towards the meaſure propoſed. The king of Spain declined intermeddling in a domeſtic affair of the empire. The French king returned an ambiguous anſwer; from whence it was concluded, that nothing but oppoſition could be expected from that quarter. The Swediſh monarch was rendered propitious to the project, by aſſurances that the houſe of Heſſe-Caſſel, of which he was the head, ſhould be elevated into an electorate. They even endeavoured to ſoften his Pruſſian majeſty, by conſenting at laſt, that the treaty of Dreſden, confirming to him the poſſeſſion of Sileſia, ſhould be guaranteed by the diet of the empire; a ſanction which he now actually obtained, together with the ratification of his imperial majeſty. Notwithſtanding this indulgence, he ſtill perſiſted in raiſing freſh objections to the favourite project, on pretence of concerting meaſures for preventing the inconveniences that might reſult from a minority; for regulating the capitulations to be agreed on with the king of the Romans; ſecuring the freedom of future elections, and preſerving the prerogatives and privileges of the Germanick body in all its members. In conſequence of theſe obſtacles, joined to the apoſtacy of the elector of Cologn, the obſtinacy of the elector Palatine, and the approaching diet of Hungary, at which their imperial majeſties were obliged perſonally to preſide, the meaſures for the election were ſuſpended till next ſummer, when his Britannick majeſty was expected at Hanover, to put the finiſhing ſtroke to this great event in favour of the houſe of Auſtria.

Another diſappointment with reſpect to this election the promoters of it ſuſtained in the death of his Swediſh majeſty, who expired in a good old age, and was ſucceeded by Adolphus Frederick duke of Holſtein Eutin, biſhop of Lubeck, upon whom the ſucceſſion had been ſettled for ſome years, by the unanimous concurrence of the ſtates of the kingdom. This prince aſcended the throne of Sweden without the leaſt diſturbance; and, of his own accord, took an oath in full ſenate, that he would never attempt to introduce a deſpotic authority; but maintain their liberties with his blood, and govern his ſubjects in all reſpects according to the laws, and the form of government eſtabliſhed in Sweden. This public act which was communicated to all the foreign miniſters, and particularly to the envoy from Peterſburgh, met with ſuch a favourable reception from the czarina, that ſhe expreſſed her ſatisfaction in a public declaration; and the good underſtanding between the two courts was perfectly reſtored.

When the parliament of England was opened, in the month of November, the king, in his ſpeech from the throne, gave them to underſtand, that for the ſame purpoſes which ſuggeſted the treaty with the elector of Bavaria, he had now, in conjunction with the ſtates-general, concluded another with the king of Poland, elector of Saxony. He told them, that the unfortunate death of the prince of Orange had made no alteration in the ſtate of affairs in Holland; and that he had received the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from the ſtates, of their firm reſolution to maintain the intimate union and friendſhip happily ſubſiſting between his majeſty and thoſe ancient and natural allies of his crown. He exhorted both houſes to conſider ſeriouſly of ſome effectual proviſions, to ſuppreſs thoſe audacious crimes of robbery and violence, grown ſo frequent about the capital, proceeding in a great meaſure from that profligate ſpirit of irreligion, idleneſs, gaming, and extravagance, which had of late extended itſelf in an uncommon degree, to the diſhonour of the nation, and the great offence and prejudice of the ſober and induſtrious part of the people. The paragraphs of this ſpeech were as uſual, echoed bac to the throne in addreſſes, replete with expreſſions of loyalty, affection, and approbation. Oppoſition was by this time almoſt extinguiſhed; and the proceedings of both houſes took place with ſuch unanimity as was hardly ever known before this period in a Britiſh parliament. The commons, however, ſeem to have aſſembled with ſuch ſentiments as did no great honour to their temper and magnanimity. In a few days after the ſeſſion opened, lord viſcount C———e, a young nobleman, whoſe character entitled him to very little regard or influence among men of ſenſe and probity, made a motion, that mr. Murray, who had been ſo ſeverely perſecuted in the laſt ſeſſion for refuſing to humble himſelf on his knees before them, ſhould be again committed cloſe priſoner to Newgate for the ſame offence. This propoſal, which ſuppoſed a power that the commons had never before exerciſed, was ſharply diſputed by the earl of Egmont, and others, who had not reſigned all ſenſe of moderation; but the majority adopted the meaſure with great eagerneſs, and the ſpeaker was ordered to iſſue his warrant accordingly. Then the houſe reſolved, that the ſaid Alexander Murray ſhould receive the ſentence, for his now being committed cloſe priſoner to his majeſty's goal of Newgate, at the bar of the houſe, upon his knees; and the ſerjeant at arms was commanded to take him into cuſtody for this purpoſe. Their indignation, however, was eluded by the caution of the delinquent, who, having foreſeen the effects of their reſentment, had prudently retired to another country. They determined, nevertheleſs to proceed againſt him as a perſon of ſome conſequence in the common-wealth; for, being informed of his retreat, they condeſcended ſo far as to preſent an addreſs to his majeſty, deſiring that his royal proclamation might be iſſued for apprehending the ſaid mr. Murray, promiſing a reward to him who ſhould have the good fortune to apprehend this fugitive—a requeſt with which his majeſty moſt graciouſly complied.

Nor was this the only addreſs preſented to the king upon ſuch an important ſubject. A pamphlet, intituled, 'The Caſe of the hon. Alexander Murray, eſquire, in an appeal to the people of Great-Britain,' was firſt ſtigmatized in a complaint to the houſe, and afterwards produced, and read at the table. The piece was written with great acrimony, and abounded with ſevere animadverſions, not only upon the conduct of the returning officer, but alſo on the proceedings of the commons. The violent members immediately took fire, and the flame extended itſelf to the majority. Nay, the houſe unanimouſly reſolved, that the pamphlet was an impudent, malicious, ſcandalous, and ſeditious libel, falſely and moſt injuriouſly reflecting upon, and aſperſing the proceedings of the houſe, tending to create miſapprehenſions in the minds of the people, to the great diſhonour of the ſaid houſe, and in violation of the privileges thereof. They furthermore preſented an addreſs to the king, deſiring his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to give directions to his attorney-general to proſecute the authors or author, the printers or printer, and the publiſhers or publiſher of the ſaid ſcandalous libel, that they might be brought to condign puniſhment. Directions were accordingly given for this purpoſe, and a proſecution commenced againſt the publiſher, who had ſome reaſon to be diſmayed, conſidering the great weight of influence he was doomed to encounter—influence ariſing from a proſecution of the crown, inſtituted at the requeſt, and founded on a vote of the houſe of commons. Nevertheleſs, when the cauſe was heard before the lord chief juſtice of England, a jury of free-born Engliſhmen, citizens of London, aſſerted their privilege of judging the law as well as the fact, and acquitted the defendant with a truly admirable ſpirit of independency. They conſidered the pamphlet as an appeal againſt oppreſſion; and, convinced that the contents were true, they could not in conſcience adjudge it a falſe libel, even though it had been ſo declared by one of the branches of the legiſlature.

The commons, in regulating the ſupplies of the enſuing year, voted the continuation of 18,857 men for the land-ſervice, though not without ſome oppoſition from certain patriots, who, rather from a ſenſe of duty than from any hope of influencing the majority, affirmed, that 16,000 men, in time of peace, would anſwer all the ends propoſed by a ſtanding army. The number of ſeamen was fixed at 10,000, large ſums were granted to make up deficiencies, and fulfil the engagements of the crown with the electors of Bavaria and Saxony, as well as for the maintenance of Nova-Scotia and Georgia, and the caſtles on the coaſt of Guinea; and 112,152l. 3s. 3d. were voted, as a full compenſation to the old royal African company for their excluſive charter and property, to be applied for the relief of their creditors[e].

[1752] The laws enacted for the encouragement of traffic, and the regulations of civil polity, conſiſted in an act for licenſing pawnbrokers, and for the more effectual preventing the receiving of ſtolen goods: another for preventing thefts and robberies, by which places of entertainment, dancing, and muſic in London, Weſtminſter, and within 20 miles of the capital, were ſuppreſſed and prohibited, unleſs the proprietors of them could obtain licences from the juſtices of the peace, empowered for that purpoſe: a third for annexing the forfeited eſtates in Scotland unalienably in the crown, after having made ſatisfaction to the lawful creditors; eſtabliſhing a method of leaſing theſe eſtates, and applying the rents and profits of them for the better civiliſing and improving the Highlands, and preventing future diſorders in that part of the united kingdom. Nothing could be more ſalutary than the purpoſes of theſe regulations. The ſuburbs of the metropolis abounded with an incredible number of public-houſes, which continually reſounded with the noiſe of riot and intemperance: they were the haunts of idleneſs, fraud, and rapine; and the ſeminaries of drunkenneſs, debauchery, extravagance, and every vice incident to human nature: yet the ſuppreſſion of theſe receptacles of infamy was attended with an inconvenience, which, in ſome caſes aroſe even to a degree of oppreſſion. The juſtices being veſted, by the legiſlature with the power of granting or refuſing licences, were conſtituted, in effect, the arbiters on whoſe deciſion the fortunes and livelihood of many individuals abſolutely depended. Many of thoſe who exerciſed this ſpecies of magiſtracy within the bills of mortality were, to the reproach of government, men of profligate lives, needy, mean, ignorant, and rapacious, and often acted from the moſt ſcandalous principles of ſelfiſh avarice.

The law relating to the Highlands of Scotland was well calculated for promoting, among the inhabitants of that country, ſuch a ſpirit of induſtry as might detach them from their dangerous connexions, and gradually ſupercede that military genius which had been ſo productive of danger and alarm to the ſouthern parts of Great-Britain. The king, by this act, was empowered to appoint commiſſioners for managing the forfeited eſtates; who were enabled to grant leaſes of ſmall farms, not above 20l. a year, to individuals, who ſhould take an oath to government to reſide upon and cultivate the lands thus let. It was alſo provided, that no leaſe ſhould be granted for a longer term than 21 years; and that the leſſees ſhould not pay above three-fourths of the annual value. Although theſe forfeited eſtates were generally encumbered with claims beyond their real value, and the act directed that they ſhould be diſpoſed of by public ſale; yet, as they lay in the moſt diſaffected parts of the Highlands, it was thought neceſſary that they ſhould remain in the poſſeſſion of the crown, becauſe, in caſe of their being publicly ſold, they might be purchaſed in truſt for the families of the perſons by whom they were forfeited, and thus the ſpirit of diſaffection would ſtill ſurvive. A valuation, therefore, was made by the court of ſeſſion in Scotland, at the joint ſuit of the crown and the creditors; and the value being aſcertained, the juſt claimants were paid out of the next aids granted by parliament. The bill met with conſiderable oppoſition in the houſe of peers from the duke of Bedford and the earl of Bath, who probably foreſaw that the good effects of this ſcheme, ſo laudable in itſelf, would be fruſtrated in the execution; and that the act, inſtead of anſwering the purpoſes for which it was intended, would ſerve only as a job to gratify the rapacious retainers to the government, and their emiſſaries, in that country. After a warm debate, however, it was adopted by a great majority, and obtained the royal aſſent

A third law related to certain articles of the national debt, which were now converted into ſeveral joint ſtocs of annuities, transferable at the Bank of England, to be charged on the ſinking-fund. A great number of different funds for annuities, eſtabliſhed at different times, and by different acts, ſubſiſted at this period; ſo that it was neceſſary to keep many different accounts, which could not be regulated without conſiderable trouble and expence, for the removal of which the bill was calculated.

In conſequence of petitions from the woolen manufacturers of Weſtmorland and Yorkſhire, two bills were brought in, and paſſed through both houſes, by which the ports of Lancaſter and Great Yarmouth were opened for the importation of wool and woolen yarn from Ireland; but why this privilege was not extended to all the frequented ports of the kingdom it is not eaſy to conceive, without ſuppoſing a little national jealouſy on one hand, and a great deal of grievous reſtraint on the other. Over and above theſe new laws, ſome unſucceſsful endeavours were uſed in behalf of commerce and police. A bill was offered for laying further reſtrictions on pawnbrokers and brokers, that they might no longer ſuc the blood of the poor, and act as the acceſſaries of theft and robbery, which was canvaſſed, debated, and made its way through the lower-houſe; but the lords rejected it as a crude ſcheme, which they could not amend, becauſe it was a money-bill, not cognizable by their houſe, without engaging in a diſpute with the commons. Another bill was prepared, for giving power to change the puniſhment of felony, in certain caſes, to confinement and hard labour in doc-yards or garriſons. It was the opinion of many who wiſhed well to their country, and were properly qualified to proſecute ſuch enquiries, that the practice of conſigning ſuch a number of wretches to the hands of the executioner ſerved only, by its frequency, to defeat the purpoſe of the law, in robbing death of all its terror, and the public of many ſubjects, who might, notwithſtanding their delinquency, be in ſome meaſure rendered uſeful to ſociety. Such was the motive that influenced the promoters of this bill; by which it was propoſed, in imitation of that œconomy practiſed in other countries, to confine felons convicted under certain circumſtances to hard labour upon the public works of the kingdom. The ſcheme was adopted by the lower-houſe, but rejected by the lords, who ſeemed apprehenſive of its bringing ſuch diſcredit upon his majeſty's doc-yards as would diſcourage perſons who valued their reputation from engaging in ſuch employment.

Of ſtill greater importance to the nation was the next meaſure propoſed, in a bill for making the militia of England more uſeful, preſented by mr. Thornton, a gentleman of Yorkſhire, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his loyalty and patriotiſm. It was canvaſſed in a committee of the whole houſe, and underwent divers amendments; but miſcarried, through the averſion of the miniſtry to any project tending to remove or leſſen the neceſſity of maintaining a ſtanding army. A conſiderable number of petitions for different regulations, in reſpect to commerce and convenience of traffic, were preſented, conſidered, and left upon the table. A remonſtrance from the priſoners confined in the gaol of the King's-bench, complaining of their miſerable ſituation, ariſing from want of room and other conveniences, being taken into conſideration by a committee, among other evidences, they examined that remarkable perſonage who had ſignalized himſelf in different parts of Chriſtendom, under the name of Theodore king of Corſica. Though formerly countenanced, and even treated as a ſovereign prince by the Britiſh miniſtry, he was now reduced to the forlorn condition of a confined debtor; and, to the reproach of this kingdom, died in priſon, ſurrounded with all the miſery of indigence, and overwhelmed with the infirmities of old age. But the moſt remarkable circumſtance of the parliamentary tranſactions that diſtinguiſhed this ſeſſion, was a motion made in both houſes for an addreſs to the king, beſeeching his majeſty, that in time of public tranquillity he would be graciouſly pleaſed to avoid entering into ſubſidiary treaties with foreign princes, which are ſo burthenſome to this nation. This extraordinary propoſal was made and ſtrenuouſly urged by the duke of B—, and a vehement debate enſued, in which the earls of G—, S—, and H, oppoſed it with an exertion of ſuperior abilities; and the queſtion being put, was carried in the negative, without a diviſion. The ſame fate attended it in the houſe of commons, where it was introduced by lord H—y, and ſupported by ſome diſtinguiſhed orators. The ſeſſion ended in the latter end of March, when his majeſty, having given his aſſent to 95 public and private bills, harangued both houſes, and prorogued the parliament[f].

Immediately after the prorogation the king appointed a regency, and ſet out for Hanover, in order to complete the great ſcheme he had projected for electing a king of the Romans. Great-Britain, in the mean time, produced no event of importance, or any tranſaction that deſerves hiſtorical mention, except the ratification of two treaties of peace and commerce with the ſtates of Tripoli and Tunis on the coaſt of Barbary, concluded by the Britiſh conſuls in thoſe cities, under the influence and auſpices of an Engliſh ſquadron, commanded by commodore Keppel, ſon to the earl of Albemarle. The tide of luxury ſtill flowed with an impetuous current, bearing down all the mounds of temperance and decorum; while fraud and profligacy ſtruc out new channels, through which they eluded the reſtrictions of the law, and all the vigilance of civil policy. New arts of deception were invented, in order to enſnare and ruin the unwary; and ſome infamous practices, in the way of commerce, were countenanced by perſons of rank and importance in the common-wealth. A certain member of parliament was obliged to withdraw himſelf from his country, in conſequence of a diſcovery, by which it appeared that he had contrived and executed ſchemes for deſtroying his own ſhips at ſea, with a view to defraud the inſurers.

In the courſe of this year the affairs of the continent did not undergo any material alteration. In France the religious diſpute concerning the doctrine of Janſenius ſtill ſubſiſted between the clergy and the parliament; and ſeemed to acquire additional fuel from the violence of the archbiſhop of Paris, a haughty turbulent prelate, whoſe pride and bigotry were ſufficient to embroil one half of Chriſtendom. The northern powers enjoyed a perfect tranquillity; the ſtates-general of the United-Provinces were engroſſed by plans of national œconomy. Spain was intent upon extending her commerce, bringing her manufactures to perfection, and repreſſing the inſolence of the Barbary Corſairs. His Portugeſe majeſty endeavoured, by certain peremptory precautions, to chec the exportation of gold coin from his dominions; and inſiſted upon inſpecting the books of the Britiſh merchants ſettled at Liſbon; but they refuſed to comply with this demand, which was contrary to a treaty ſubſiſting between the two crowns; and he thought proper to acquieſce in their refuſal. He was much better employed in obtaining from the pope an abolition of the annual proceſſion called the Auto da fe, one of the moſt horrid triumphs of ſpiritual tyranny. The peace of Italy was ſecured by a defenſive treaty concluded at Madrid between the emperor, his catholic majeſty, the king of the two Sicilies, and the duke of Parma; to which treaty the king of Sardinia afterwards acceded.

With reſpect to the great ſcheme of electing the archduke Joſeph king of the Romans, freſh objections ſeemed to riſe from different quarters. The good underſtanding between the courts of Berlin and Hanover received an additional ſhoc, from a diſpute concerning the property of Eaſt-Frieſeland, which his Pruſſian majeſty had ſecured, as heir to the laſt poſſeſſor. His Britannick majeſty, as elector of Hanover, having pretenſions to the ſame inheritance, his miniſter delivered a memorial to the diet of the empire, aſſembled at Ratiſbon, demanding that the king of Pruſſia, as elector of Bradenburgh, ſhould be referred to the deciſion of the Aulick council, in regard to his claim to the eſtates of Eaſt-Frieſeland: but the king being already in poſſeſſion, refuſed to ſubmit his right to the determination of that or any other tribunal; and when the diet preſumed to deliberate on this affair, his envoy entered a ſtrong proteſt againſt their proceedings. At the ſame time, he preſented the other miniſters with a memorial, tending to refute the elector of Hanover's pretenſions to the principality in queſtion.

At this juncture his Pruſſian majeſty made no ſcruple of expreſſing his reſentment againſt the court of London, which he ſeemed to conſider as an officious cabal, that had no right to intermeddle in the affairs of Germany. His reſident at London complained to the Britiſh miniſtry, that divers ſhips, ſailing under the Pruſſian flag, had been ſtopped at ſea, and even ſeiſed, by Engliſh cruiſers; and that his ſubjects had been ill-treated and oppreſſed: he, therefore, demanded reparation in a peremptory tone; and, in the mean time, diſcontinued the payment of the Sileſia loan, which he had charged himſelf with, by an article in the treaty of Breſlau. This was a ſum of money amounting to 250,000l. which the emperor Charles VI. father of the reigning empreſs, had borrowed of the ſubjects of Great-Britain, on condition of paying an intereſt of ſix per cent. and mortgaging the ſilver mines of Sileſia for the repayment of the principal. Theſe devolved to the king of Pruſſia with this incumbrance, and he continued to pay the intereſt punctually till this juncture, when the payment was ſtopped; and he publiſhed a paper, intituled, 'An Expoſition of the Motives which influenced his Conduct on this Occaſion.' In his memorial to the miniſtry of Great-Britain he alledged, that 18 Pruſſian ſhips, and 33 neutral veſſels, in which the ſubjects of Pruſſia were concerned, had been unjuſtly ſeiſed by Engliſh privateers: his account of damages amounted to a very conſiderable ſum; and he demanded, in the moſt dogmatic terms, that the affair ſhould be finally diſcuſſed in the term of three months from the date of his remonſtrance. The expoſition and memorial were ſubjected to the examination of the ableſt civilians in England, who refuted every article of the charge with equal preciſion and perſpicuity. They proved, that captures by ſea fell properly under the cognizance of thoſe powers under whoſe juriſdiction the ſeiſures were made: and, therefore, his Pruſſian majeſty could not, conſiſtent with the law of nations, determine theſe diſputes in his own tribunals. They demonſtrated, by undoubted evidence, the falſity of many facts alledged in the memorial, as well as the fairneſs of the proceedings by which ſome few of the Pruſſian veſſels had been condemned; and made it appear, that no inſult or injury had been offered to the ſubjects of Pruſſia. Finally, they obſerved, that the Sileſia loan was a private tranſaction of ſuch a nature, that, even if a war had happened between the emperor Charles VI. and his Britannick majeſty, this muſt have been held ſacred and inviolable: that when the empreſs-queen ceded Sileſia to the king of Pruſſia, this monarch charged himſelf with the repayment of the loan, which, being a private debt, and transferable, was now diffuſed into different countries, and become the property of many others beſides the ſubjects of Great-Britain. They wound up their chain of reaſoning by obſerving, that, according to agreement, with the emperor, the whole of this loan ſhould have been repayed in the year 1745; whereas the complaints ſpecified in the Pruſſian memorial were founded on facts poſterior to that period. Whether his Pruſſian majeſty was convinced by theſe reaſons, and deſiſted from principle, or thought proper to give up his claim upon other political conſiderations; certain it is, he no longer inſiſted upon ſatiſfaction, but ordered the payments of the Sileſia loan to be continued without further interruption: a report, indeed, was circulated, that advantage had been taken of the demur by a certain prince, who employed his agents to buy up great part of the loan at a conſiderable diſcount.

How much ſoever the king of Pruſſia may be the ſubject of cenſure on this occaſion, it muſt be allowed that, with regard to his own ſubjects, he acted as a wiſe legiſlator, and the father of his country. He peopled the deſerts of Pomerania, by encouraging, with royal bounties, a great number of induſtrious emigrants to ſettle in that province; the face of which, in a very few years, underwent the moſt agreeable alteration. Above 60 new villages aroſe amidſt a barren waſte, and every part of the country exhibited marks of ſucceſsful cultivation. Thoſe ſolitary and deſolate plans, where no human footſteps had for many ages been ſeen, were now converted into fields of corn. The farms were regularly parcelled out: the houſes multiplied, and teemed with population: the happy peaſants, ſheltered in a peculiar manner under their king's protection, ſowed their grounds in peace, and reaped their harveſts in ſecurity. The ſame care and indulgence were extended to the unpeopled parts of other provinces within the Pruſſian dominions, and extraordinary encouragement was granted to all French proteſtants who ſhould come and ſettle under the government of this political ſage.

The courts of Vienna and Hanover ſtill employed their chief attention upon the ſcheme of electing a king of the [f] Among the proceedings of this ſeſſion it may not be improper to mention a new act for the prevention of murders, which had been ſhockingly frequent of late, importing, that every criminal convicted of this horrid crime ſhould be executed in one day after his ſentence, and his body delivered to the ſurgeons for diſſection—an expedient which hath been found productive of every ſalutary conſequence.

Romans; and the elector of Mentz, influenced by the majority of the college, had convoked an electoral diet for that purpoſe; but ſtrong proteſts againſt this convocation were entered by the electors of Cologn and Palatine, inſomuch that it was thought expedient to conciliate this laſt, by taking ſome ſteps in his favour, with reſpect to the ſatisfaction he demanded from the empreſs-queen and his Britannick majeſty. His claim upon the court of Vienna amounted to three millions of florins, by way of indemnification for the loſſes he had ſuſtained during the war. He demanded of the king of England 20,000l. ſterling, for proviſion and forage furniſhed to the Britiſh troops while they acted on the Maine; and the like ſum for the like purpoſes from the ſtates-general of the United Provinces. This empreſs-queen could not help remonſtrating againſt the demand as exorbitant in itſelf, and the more unreaſonable, as the elector Palitine, at the death of her father, had openly declared againſt the pragmatic ſanction, which he had guaranteed in the moſt ſolemn manner: ſhe, therefore, obſerved, that the damage he had ſuſtained, in conſequence of that declaration, ought to be conſidered as the common fate of war, theſe reaſons, though concluſive and irrefragable in the uſual way of arguing, made no impreſſion upon the Palatine, who perfectly well underſtood his own importance, and was determined to ſeiſe this opportunity of turning it to the beſt advantage. The court of Vienna, and the maritime powers, finding him thus obſtinately attached to his own intereſt, reſolved to bring him over to their views at any rate, and commenced a negotiation with him, which produced a formal treaty. By this convention his demands in money were fixed at 1200,000 Duch florins, to be paid at three inſtalments, 500,000 by the empreſs-queen, and the remaining 700,000 by the king of Great-Britain and the ſtates-general, according to the proportion eſtabliſhed in former treaties. The privilege of Non appellendo, for the duchy of Deux-ponts was confirmed to his electoral highneſs, together with ſome other rights and pretenſions, in conſideration of his concurring with the other electors in the choice of a king of the Romans, to be elected according to the cuſtoms preſcribed by the laws and conſtitutions of the empire. He likewiſe engaged to join them in ſettling the articles of the capitulation with the king of the Romans, emperor in futuro. Yet, even after the concurrence of this prince was ſecured, the propoſed election proved abhortive, from the ſtrong objections that were ſtarted, and the ſtrenuous oppoſition which was made by his Pruſſian majeſty, who perhaps aſpired in ſecret at the imperial dignity, which the empreſs-queen took all this pains to perpetuate in her own family.

[1753] The king of Great-Britain, returning from the continent, opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the 11th day of January with a ſpeech, implying, That all his views and negotiations had been calculated and directed to preſerve and ſecure the duration of a general peace, ſo agreeable and neceſſary to the welfare of all Europe: that he had the ſatisfaction to be aſſured of a good diſpoſition in all the powers that were his allies, to adhere to the ſame ſalutary object. He exhorted them to continue their attention to the reduction of the national debt, the augmentation of the ſinking-fund, and the improvement of the public revenue. He recommended to their ſerious conſideration what further laws and regulations might be neceſſary for ſuppreſſing thoſe crimes and diſorders, of which the public had ſo juſtly complained: and concluded with an aſſurance, that his hearty concurrence and endeavours ſhould never be wanting in any meaſure that might promote their welfare and proſperity. The addreſſes in anſwer to this ſpeech were couched in the uſual form of implicit approbation: but that of the commons did not paſs without queſtion. The earl of E— took exceptions to one paragraph, in which they acknowledged his majeſty's wiſdom, as well as goodneſs in purſuing ſuch meaſures as muſt contribute to maintain and render permanent the general tranquillity of Europe; and declared their ſatisfaction at the aſſurances his majeſty had received from his allies, that they were all attached to the ſame ſalutary object. His lordſhip expatiated on the abſurdity of theſe compliments at ſuch a juncture, when the peace of Europe was ſo precarious, and the Engliſh nation had ſo much cauſe of complaint and diſſatisfaction. He was ſeconded by ſome other individuals who declaimed with great vivacity againſt continental connexions; and endeavoured to expoſe the weakneſs and folly of the whole ſyſtem of foreign meaſures which our miniſtry had lately purſued. It muſt be owned, indeed, that they might have choſen a better opportunity to compliment their ſovereign on the permanency of the peace than at this juncture, when they muſt have ſeen themſelves on the very brink of a new rupture with the moſt formidable power in Europe. But the truth is, theſe addreſſes to the throne had been long conſidered as compliments of courſe, implying no more than a reſpectful attachment to their ſovereign: accordingly, both houſes agreed to their reſpective addreſſes without diviſion. The two grand committees of ſupply and of ways and means, being eſtabliſhed, the buſineſs of the houſe was tranſacted without much altercation; and the people had great reaſon to be ſatisfied with their moderate proceedings. Ten thouſand ſeamen, with the uſual number of land-forces, were retained for the enſuing year. They provided for the maintenance of the new colony in Nova-Scotia, the civil eſtabliſhment of Georgia, the ſupport of the caſtles on the coaſt of Guinea, and the erection of a new fort at Anamaboa, where the French had attempted to make a ſettlement; and they enabled his majeſty to fulfil his engagements with the king of Poland and the elector of Bavaria.

The ſupplies, including grants for former deficiencies and ſervices, for which no proviſion had been made in the laſt year, did not exceed 2,132,770l. 17s. 2½d. in order to defray which expence they aſſigned the duty on malt, &c. the land-tax at 2s. in the pound, the ſurplus of certain funds in the exchequer, and the ſum of 420,000l. out of the ſinking-fund; ſo that the exceedings amounted to near 300,000l.[g] As for the national debt, it now ſtood at the enormous ſum of 74,368,451l. 15s. 1d. and the ſinking-fund produced 1,735,529l. 6s. 10¼d.

One of the firſt meaſures brought upon the carpet, in the courſe of this ſeſſion, was an act containing regulations for the better preſervation of the game, of which ſo great havoc had been made by poachers, and other perſons unqualified to enjoy that diverſion, and the total exterpation of it was apprehended.

The next ſtep taken by the commons was an affair of much greater conſequence to the community, being a bill for obliging ſhips the more effectually to perform quarentine, in order to prevent the plague from being imported from foreign countries into Great-Britain. For this purpoſe, it was ordained, that if this dreadful viſitation ſhould appear in any ſhip to the northward of Cape Finiſterre, the maſter or commander ſhould immediately proceed to the harbour of New Grimſby, in one of the iſlands of Scilly, and there communicate the diſcovery to ſome officer of the cuſtoms; who ſhould, with the firſt opportunity, tranſmit this intelligence to another cuſtom-houſe officer in the neareſt port of England, to be by him forwarded to one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate. In the mean time the ſhip ſhould remain at the ſaid iſland, and not an individual preſume to go aſhore, until his majeſty's pleaſure ſhould be known. It was alſo provided, that in caſe the maſter of a ſhip thus infected ſhould not be able to make the iſlands of Scilly, or be forced up either channel by violent winds, he ſhould not enter any frequented harbour; but remain in ſome open road, until he could receive orders from his majeſty, or the privy-council: that, during this interval, he ſhould avoid all intercourſe with the ſhore, or any perſon or veſſel whatſoever, on pain of being deemed guilty of felony, and ſuffering death without benefit of clergy.

In order the more effectually to repreſs the barbarous practice of plundering ſhips which have the misfortune to ſuffer ſhipwrec; a practice which prevailed upon many different parts of the Britiſh coaſt, to the diſgrace of the nation, and the ſcandal of human nature; a bill was prepared, containing clauſes to enforce the laws againſt ſuch ſavage delinquents, who prowl along the ſhore, like hungry wolves, in hopes of preying upon their fellow-creatures; and certain proviſions for the relief of the unhappy ſufferers.[h] When the mutiny-bill fell under deliberation, the earl of Egmont propoſed a new clauſe for empowering and requiring regimental courts-marſhal to examine witneſſes upon oath in all their trials. The propoſal occaſioned a debate, in which the miniſtry were pretty equally divided; but the clauſe was disapproved by the majority, and this annual bill was enacted into a law without any alteration.

[g] Several duties on ſalt, as well as on red and white herrings delivered out for home conſumption, were rendered perpetual, though ſubject to be redeemed by parliament; and it was provided, that the debt contracted upon theſe duties being diſcharged, all the after produce of them ſhould become part of the ſinking-fund.

[h] By the new law, the clerk of the peace in the county where the crime ſhall be committed is obliged, upon receiving proper information, to proſecute the offenders at the expence of the county. It was likewiſe propoſed, that in caſe of no perſecution of this nature ſhould be commenced within a certain limited time after the information ſhould have been legally given, in that caſe the county might be ſued by the perſon who had ſuſtained the damage, add obliged to indemnify him for his loſs: but this clauſe was rejected by the majority; and the bill, having made its way through both houſes, received the royal aſſent.

The next bill was framed in consequence of divers petitions presented by the exporters of corn, who complained that the bounties were not paid, and prayed that the house would make proper provision for that purpose. A bill was accordingly brought in, importing, that interest after the rate of 3 per cent. should be allowed upon every debenture for the bounty on the exportation of corn, payable by the receiver-general or cashier of the customs, until the principal could be discharged out of such customs or duties as are appropriated for the payment of this bounty. This premium on the exportation of corn ought not to be granted, except when the lowness of the market-price in Great-Britain proves that there is a superabundance in the kingdom; otherwise the exporter will find his account in depriving our own labourers of their bread, in order to supply our rivals at an easier rate: for example, suppose wheat in England should sell for 20s. a quarter, the merchant might export it to France, and afford it to the people of that kingdom for 18s. because the bounty on exportation would, even at that rate, afford him a considerable advantage.

A great number of merchants having presented petitions from different parts of the kingdom, representing that the trade to Turkey was greatly decreased, ascribing this diminution to the exclusive charter enjoyed by a monopoly, and praying that the trade might be laid open to all his majesty's subjects, one of the members for Liverpool moved for leave to bring in a bill for this purpose. Such a measure had been twice before proposed without success; but now it was adobted without opposition. A bill was immediately introduced; and, notwithstanding all the interest and efforts of the Turkey company, who petitioned the house against it, and were heard by their counsel, it passed through both houses, and received the royal sanction. By this regulation any British subject may obtain the freedom of the Turkey company, by paying or rendering a fine of 20l. and all the members are secured from the tyranny of oppressive by-laws, contrived by any monopolizing cabal.[1]

But this session was chiefly distinguished by an act for naturalizing Jews, and a bill for the better preventing clandestine marriages. The first of these, which passed without much opposition in the house of lords, from whence it descended to the commons, was intitled, 'An act to commit persons professing the Jewish religion to be naturalized by parliament, and for other purposes therein mentioned.' It was supported by some petitions of merchants and manufacturers, who, upon examination appeared to be Jews, or their dependants; and countenanced by the ministry, who thought they foresaw, in the consequence of such a naturalization, a great possession to the monied interest, and a considerable increase of their own influence among the individuals of that community. They boldly affirmed, that such a law would greatly conduce to the advantage of the nation; that it would encourage persons of wealth to remove with their effects from foreign parts into Great-Britain, increase the commerce and the credit of the kingdom, and set a laudable example of industry, temperance, and frugality. Such, however, were not the sentiments of the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London in common-council assembled, who, in a petition to parliament, expressed their apprehension that the bill, if passed into a law, would tend greatly to the dishonour of the Christian religion, endanger the excellent constitution, and be highly prejudicial to the interest and trade of the kingdom in general, and of the city of London in particular. Another petition to the same purpose was next day presented to the house, subscribed by merchents and traders of the city of London; who, among other allegations, observed, that the consequence of such a naturalization would greatly affect their trade and commerce with foreign nations, particularly with Spain and Portugal. Counsel was heard, evidence examined, and the bill produced violent debates, in which there seemed to be more passion than patriotism, more declamation than argument. The adversaries of the bill affirmed that such a naturalization would deluge the kingdom with brokers, usurers, and beggars; that the rich Jews, under the shadow of this indulgence, would purchase lands, and even advowsons; so as not only to acquire an interest in the legislature, but also to influence the constitution of the church of Christ, to which they were the inveterate and professed enemies: that the lower class of that nation, when thus admitted to the right of denizens, would interfere with the industrious natives who earn their livelihood by their labour; and by dint of the most parsimonious frugality, to which the English are strangers, work at an under-price; so as not only to share, but even in a manner to exclude them from all employment: that such an adoption of vagrant Jews into the community, from all parts of the world, would rob the real subjects of their birthright, disgrace the character of the nation, expose themselves to the most dishonourable participation and intrusion, endanger the constitution both in church and state, and be an indelible reproach upon the established religion of the country. Some of these orators seemed transported even to a degree of enthusiasm. They prognosticated that the Jews would multiply so much in number, engross such wealth, and acquire so great power and influence in Great-Britain, that their persons would be revered, their customs imitated, and Judaism become the fashionable religion of the English. Finally, they affirmed that such an act was directly flying in the face of the prophesy, which declares, that the Jews shall be a scattered people, without country or fixed habitation, until they should be converted from their infidelity, and gathered together in the land of their fore-fathers. These arguments and apprehensions, which were in reality frivolous and chimerical, being industriously circulated among the vulgar, naturally prejudicial against the Jewish people, excited such a ferment throughout the nation, as ought to have deterred the ministry from the persecution of such an unpopular measure; which, however, they had courage enough to maintain against all opposition. The bill passed the ordeal of both houses, and his majesty vouchsafed the royal sanction to this law in favour of the Hebrew nation. The truth is, it might have increased the wealth, and extended the commerce of Great-Britain, had it been agreeable to the people; and as the naturalized Jews would still have been excluded from all civil and military offices, as well as from other privileges enjoyed by their Christian brethren, in all probality they would have gradually forsaken their own unprofitable and obstinate infidelity, opened their eyes to the shining truths of the gospel, and joined their fellow-subjects in embracing the doctrines of Christianity. But no ministry ought to risk an experiment, how plausible soever it may be, if they find it, as this was, an object of the people's unconquerable aversion. What rendered this unpopular measure the more impolitic, was the unseasonable juncture at which it was carried into execution; that is, at the eve of a general election for a new parliament, when a minister ought carefully to avoid every step which may give umbrage to the body of the people. The earl of Eg———t, who argued against the bill with equal power and vivacity, in describing the effect it might have upon that occasion, 'I am amazed (said he) that this consideration makes no impression.—When that day, which is not far off, shall arrive, I shall not fear to set my foot upon any ground of election in the kingdom, in opposition to any one man among you, or any new Christian, who has voted or appeared in favour of this naturalization.'

Another bill transmitted from the upper-house, met with a reception equally unfavourable among the commons, though it was sustained on the shoulders of the majority, and thus forced its way to the throne, where it obtained the royal approbation. The practice of solemnizing clandestine marriages, so prejudicial to the peace of families, and so often productive of misery to the parties themselves thus united, was an evil that prevailed to such a degree as claimed the attention of the legislature. The sons and daughters of great and opulent families, before they had acquired knowledge and experience, or attained to the years of discretion, were every day seduced in their affections, and inveigled into matches big with infamy and ruin; and these were greatly facilitated by the opportunities that occurred of being united instantaneously by the ceremony of marriage, in the first transport of passion, before the destined victim had time to cool or deliberate on the subject. For this pernicious purpose, there was a band of profligate miscreants, the refuse of the clergy, dead to every sentiment of virtue, abandoned to all sense of decency and decorum, for the most part prisoners for debt or delinquency, and indeed the very outcasts of human society, who hovered about the verge of the [1] Several other bills were passed—one for regulating the number of public-houses, and the more easy conviction of persons selling ale and strong liquors without licence; an act which empowered the justices of the peace to tyrannize over their fellow subjects—a second, enabling the magistrates of Edinburgh to improve, enlarge, and adorn the avenues and streets of that city, according to a concerted plan, to be executed by a voluntary subscription—a third, allowing the exportation of wool and woolen yarn from Ireland into any port in Great-Britain and a fourth, prescribing the breadth of the wheels belonging to heavy carriages, that the high roads of the kingdom might be the better preserved.

Fleet-priſon to intercept cuſtomers, plying like porters for employment, and performed the ceremony of marriage without licence or queſtion, in cellars, garrets, or ale-houſes, to the ſcandal of religion, and the diſgrace of that order which they profeſſed. The eaſe with which this eccleſiaſtical ſanction was obtained, and the vicious diſpoſition of thoſe wretches, open to the practices of fraud and corruption, were productive of polygamy, indigence, conjugal infidelity, proſtitution, and every curſe that could imbitter the married ſtate. A remarkable caſe of this nature having fallen under the cognizance of the peers, in an appeal from an inferior tribunal, that houſe ordered the judges to prepare a new bill for preventing ſuch abuſes; and one was accordingly framed, under the auſpices of lord Hardwicke, at that time lord high chancellor of England. In order to anticipate the bad effects of clandeſtine marriages, this new ſtatute enacted, that the banns ſhould be regularly publiſhed, three ſucceſſive Sundays, in the church of the pariſh where the parties dwell: that no licence ſhould be granted to marry in any place, where one of the parties has not dwelt at leaſt a month, except a ſpecial licence by the archbiſhop: that if any marriage ſhould de ſolemniſed in any other place than a church or a chapel, without a ſpecial licence, or in a public-chapel, without having publiſhed the banns, or obtained a licence of ſome perſon properly qualified, the marriage ſhould be void, and the perſon who ſolemniſed it tranſported for ſeven years: that marriages, by licence, of parties under age, without conſent of parent or guardian, ſhould be null and void, unleſs the party under age be a widow, and the parent refuſing conſent a widow married again: that when the conſent of a mother or guardian is refuſed from caprice, or ſuch parent or guardian be non compos mentis, or beyond ſea, the minor ſhould have recourſe for relief to the court of chancery: that no ſuit ſhould be commenced to compel a celebration of marriage, upon pretence of any contract: that all marriages ſhould be ſolemnized before two witneſſes, and an entry be made in a book kept for that purpoſe, whether it was by banns or licence, whether either of the parties was under age, or the marriage celebrated with the conſent of parent or guardian; and this entry to be ſigned by the miniſter, the parties, and the witneſſes: that a falſe licence or certificate, or deſtroying regiſter-books, ſhould be deemed felony, either in principal or acceſſary, and puniſhed with death. The bill, when firſt conſidered in the lower-houſe, gave riſe to a variety of debates; in which the members appeared to be divided rather according to their real ſentiments, than by the rules of any political diſtinction: for ſome principal ſervants of the government freely differed in opinion from the miniſter, who countenanced the bill; while, on the other hand, he was, on this occaſion, ſupported by certain chiefs of the oppoſition, and the diſputes were maintained with extraordinary eagerneſs and warmth. The principal objections imported, that ſuch reſtrictions on marriage would damp the ſpirit of love and propagation; promote mercenary matches, to the ruin of domeſtic happineſs, as well as to the prejudice of poſterity and population; impede the circulation of property, by preſerving the wealth of the kingdom among a kind of ariſtocracy of opulent families, who would always intermarry within their own pale; ſubject the poor to many inconveniencies, and extraordinary expence, from the nature of the forms to be obſerved; and throw an additional power into the hands of the chancellor. They affirmed, that no human power had a right to diſſolve a vow ſolemnly made in the ſight of heaven: and that, in proportion as the bill prevented clandeſtine marriages, it would encourage fornication and debauchery, inſomuch as the parties, reſtrained from indulging their mutual paſſions in an honourable manner, would be tempted to gratify them by ſtealth, at the hazard of their reputation. In a word, they foreſaw a great number of evils in the train of this bill, which have not yet been realized. On the other ſide, its advocates endeavoured to refute theſe arguments, and ſome of them ſpoke with great ſtrength and preciſion. The bill underwent a great number of alterations and amendments: which were not effected without violent conteſt and altercation. At length, however, it was floated through both houſes on the tide of a great majority, and ſteered into the ſafe harbour of royal approbation. Certain it is, the abuſe of clandeſtine marriage might have been removed upon much eaſier terms than thoſe impoſed upon the ſubject by this bill, which, after all, hath been found ineffectual, as it may be eaſily eluded by a ſhort voyage to the continent, or a moderate journey to North-Britain, where the indiſſoluble knot may be tied without ſcruple or interruption.

Over and above theſe new ſtatutes there were ſome other ſubjects which occaſionally employed the attention of the commons; ſuch as the ſtate of the Britiſh ſugar-colonies, which was conſidered, in conſequence of petitions preſented by the ſugar-refiners and grocers of London, Weſtminſter, and Briſtol, complaining of the exorbitant price demanded and given for ſugars imported from Jamaica; deſiring that the proprietors of land in Jamaica might be obliged to cultivate greater quantities of ground for raiſing ſugar canes, or that they (the petitioners) might have leave to import Muſcovado ſugars from other countries, when the price of thoſe imported from Jamaica ſhould excede a certain rate. This remonſtrance was taken into conſideration by a committee of the whole houſe; and a great number of evidences and papers being examined, they reſolved, that the people of Jamaica with white inhabitants, and cultivating the lands thereof, would be the moſt proper meaſure for ſecuring that iſland, and increaſing the trade and navigation between it and Great-Britain, and other parts of his majeſty's dominions: that the endeavours hitherto uſed by the legiſlature of Jamaica to increaſe the number of white inhabitants, and enforce the cultivation of lands, in the manner that might beſt conduce to the ſecurity and defence of that iſland, had not been effectual for theſe purpoſes. The houſe ordered a bill to be founded on theſe reſolutions; but this was poſtponed, until the miniſtry ſhould receive more full information touching the true ſtate of that iſland. The planters of Jamaica laboured under many grievances and hardſhips, from diverſe heavy impoſitions and reſtrictions; and a detail of theſe was tranſmitted in a repreſentation to his majeſty, which was referred to the conſideration of the commiſſioners of trade and plantations. The cauſe of the planters were defended vigorouſly, and managed in the houſe of commons by alderman Beckford, a gentleman of vaſt poſſeſſions in the iſland of Jamaica, who perfectly well underſtood, and ſtrenuouſly ſupported, the intereſt of that his native country.

Abortive alſo proved the attempt to eſtabliſh a law for keeping an annual regiſter of marriages, births, deaths, the individuals who received alms, and the total number of people in Great-Britain. A bill for this purpoſe was preſented by mr. Potter, a gentleman of pregnant parts and ſpirited elocution, who, enumerating the advantages of ſuch a law, obſerved, that it would aſcertain the number of the people, and the collective ſtrength of the nation; conſequently point out thoſe places were there is a defect or exceſs of population, and certainly determine whether a general naturalization would be advantageous or prejudicial to the community; that it would decide what number of men might, on any ſudden emergency, be levied for the defence of the kingdom; and whether the nation is gainer or loſer by ſending its natives to ſettle, and our troops to defend diſtant colonies; that it would be the means of eſtabliſhing a local adminiſtration of civil government, or a police upon certain fixed principles, the want of which hath been long a reproach to the nation, a ſecurity to vice, and an encouragement to idleneſs; that in many caſes where all other evidence is wanting, it would enable ſuitors to recover their right in courts of juſtice, facilitate an equal and equitable aſſeſſment in raiſing the preſent taxes, and laying future impoſitions; ſpecify the lineal deſcents, relations, and alliance of families; lighten the intolerable burthens incurred by the public, from innumerable and abſurd regulations relating to the poor; provide for them by a more equal exertion of humanity, and effectually ſcreen them from all riſque of periſhing by hunger, cold, cruelty, and oppreſſion. Whether ſuch a law would have anſwered the ſanguine expectations of its patron, we ſhall not pretend to determine; though, in our opinion, it muſt have been attended with very ſalutary conſequences, particularly in reſtraining the hand of robbery and violence, in detecting fraud, bridling the ferocity of a licentious people, and eſtabliſhing a happy ſyſtem of order and ſubordination. At firſt the bill met with little oppoſition, except from mr. Thornton, member for the city of York, who inveighed againſt it with great fervour, as a meaſure that ſavoured of French policy, to which the Engliſh nation ever had the utmoſt averſion. He affirmed, that the method in which it was propoſed this regiſter ſhould be kept would furniſh the enemies of Great-Britain with continual opportunities of knowing the ſtrength or weakneſs of the nation; that it would empower an ill-deſigning miniſter to execute any ſcheme ſubverſive of public liberty, inveſt pariſh and petty officers of the peace with exorbitant powers, and coſt the nation above 50,000l. a year to carry the ſcheme into execution. Theſe arguments, which, we apprehend, are extremely frivolous and inconcluſive, had great weight with a conſiderable number, who joined in the oppoſition, while the miniſtry ſtood neutral. Nevertheleſs, after having undergone ſome amendments, it was conveyed to the lords, by whom it was, at the ſecond reading, thrown out, as a ſcheme of a very dangerous tendency. The legiſlature of Great-Britain have, on ſome occaſions, been more ſtartled at the diſtant ſhadow of a bare poſſibility, than at the real approach of the moſt dangerous innovation.

From the uſual deliberations on civil and commercial concerns, the attention of the parliament, which had ſeldom or never turned upon literary avocations, was called off by an extraordinary ſubject of this nature. Sir Hans Sloane, the celebrated phyſician and naturaliſt, well known through all the civilized countries of Europe for his ample collection of rarities, culled from the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, as well as of antiquities and curioſities of art, had directed, in his laſt will, that this valuable muſeum, together with his numerous library, ſhould be offered to the parliament for the uſe of the public, in conſideration of their paying a certain ſum, in compenſation, to his heirs. His terms were embraced by the commons, who agreed to pay 20,000l. for the whole, ſuppoſed to be worth four times that ſum; and a bill was prepared for purchaſing this muſeum, together with the Harleian collection of manuſcripts, ſo denominated from its founder, Robert Harley, earl of Oxford, lord high treaſurer of England, and now offered to the public by his daughter, the ducheſs of Portland. It was propoſed, that theſe purchaces ſhould be joined to the famous Cottonian library, and a ſuitable repoſitory provided for them and the king's library, which had long lain neglected, and expoſed to the injuries of the weather in the old dormitory at Weſtminſter. Accordingly, truſtees and governors, conſiſting of the moſt eminent perſons of the kingdom, were appointed, and regulations eſtabliſhed for the management of this noble muſeum, which was depoſited in Montagu-Houſe, one of the moſt magnificent edifices in England, where it is ſubjected without reſerve to the view of the public, under certain neceſſary reſtrictions, and exhibits a glorious monument of national taſte and liberality [k]. In the beginning of June the ſeſſion of Parliament was cloſed by his majeſty, who mentioned nothing particular in his ſpeech, but that the ſtate of foreign affairs had ſuffered no alteration ſince their meeting.

The genius of the Engliſh people is perhaps incompatible with a ſtate of perfect tranquillity: if it is not ruffled by foreign provocations, or agitated by unpopular meaſures of demeſtic adminiſtration, it will undergo temporary fermentations from the turbulent ingredients inherent in its own conſtitution. Tumults are excited, and factions kindled into rage and inveteracy, by incidents of the moſt frivolous nature. At this juncture the metropolis of England was divided and diſcompoſed in a ſurpriſing manner, by a diſpute in itſelf of ſo little conſequence to the community, that it could not deſerve a place in a general hiſtory, if it did not ſerve to convey a characteriſtic idea of the Engliſh nation. In the beginning of the year an obſcure damſel, of low degree, whoſe name was Elizabeth Canning, promulgated a report, which in a little time attracted the attention of the public. She affirmed, that on the firſt day of the new year, at night, ſhe was ſeiſed under Bedlam-wall by two ruffians, who having ſtripped her of her upper apparel, ſecured her mouth with a gag, and threatened to murder her ſhould ſhe make the leaſt noiſe; that they conveyed her on foot about ten miles, to a place called Enfield-Waſh, and brought her to the houſe of one Mrs. Wells, where ſhe was pillaged of her ſtays; and, becauſe ſhe refuſed to turn proſtitute, confined in a cold, damp, ſeparate, and unfurniſhed apartment; where ſhe remained a whole month, without any other ſuſtenance than a few ſtale cruſts of bread, and about a gallon of water; till at length ſhe forced her way through a window, and ran home to her mother's houſe, almoſt naked, in the night of the 29th of January. This ſtory, improbable and unſupported, operated ſo ſtrongly on the paſſions of the people in the neighbourhood of Aldermanbury, where Canning's mother lived, and particularly among fanatics of all denominations, that they raiſed voluntary contributions, with ſurpriſing eagerneſs, in order to bring the ſuppoſed delinquents to juſtice. Warrants were granted for apprehending Wells, who kept the houſe at Enfield-Waſh, and her accomplices, the ſervant-maid, whoſe name was Virtue Hall, and one Squires, an old gipſey-woman, which laſt was charged by Canning, of having robbed her of her ſtays. Wells, though acquitted of the felony, was puniſhed as a bawd. Hall turned evidence for Canning, but afterwards recanted. Squires, the gipſey, was convicted of the robbery, though ſhe produced undoubted evidence to prove that ſhe was at Abbotſbury in Dorſetſhire that very night in which the felony was ſaid to be committed, and Canning and her friends fell into divers contradictions during the courſe of the trial. By this time the prepoſſeſſion of the common people in her favour had riſen to ſuch a pitch of enthuſiaſm, that the moſt palpable truths which appeared on the other ſide had no other effect than that of exaſperating them to the moſt dangerous degree of rage and revenge. Some of the witneſſes for Squires, though perſons of unblemiſhed character, were ſo intimidated, that they durſt not enter the court; and thoſe who had reſolution enough to give evidence in her behalf, ran the riſque of aſſaſſination from the vulgar that ſurrounded the place. On this occaſion, ſir Criſp Gaſcoyne, lord-mayor of London, behaved with that laudable courage and humanity which ought ever to diſtinguiſh the chief magiſtrate of ſuch a metropolis. Conſidering the improbability of the charge, the heat, partiality, and blind enthuſiaſm with which it was proſecuted, and being convinced of the old woman's innocence by a great number of affidavits, voluntarily ſent up from the country by perſons of unqueſtionable credit, he, in conjunction with ſome other worthy citizens, reſolved to oppoſe the torrent of vulgar prejudice. Application was made to the throne for mercy: the caſe was referred to the attorney and ſollicitor-general, who having examined the evidences on both ſides, made their report in favour of Squires to the king and council; and this poor old creature was indulged with his majeſty's pardon. This affair was now ſwelled up into ſuch a faction as divided the greater part of the kingdom, including the rich as well as the poor, the high as well as the humble. Pamphlets and paſquinades were publiſhed on both ſides of the diſpute, which became the general topic of converſation in all aſſemblies, and people of all ranks eſpouſed one or other party with as much warmth and animoſity as had ever inflamed the whigs and tories, even at the moſt rancorous period of their oppoſition. Subſcriptions were opened, and large ſums levied, on one ſide, to proſecute for perjury the perſons on whoſe evidence the pardon had been granted. On the other hand, thoſe who had intereſted themſelves for the gipſey reſolved to ſupport her witneſſes, and, if poſſible, detect the impoſture of Canning. Bills of perjury were preferred on both ſides. The evidences for Squires were tried and acquitted: at firſt Canning abſconded; but afterwards ſurrendered to take her trial, and being after a long hearing found guilty, was tranſported to the Britiſh colonies. The zeal of her friends, however, ſeemed to be inflamed by her conviction; and thoſe who carried on the proſecution againſt her were inſulted, even to the danger of their lives. They ſupplied her with neceſſaries of all ſorts, paid for her tranſportation in a private ſhip, where ſhe enjoyed all the comforts and conveniences that could be afforded in that ſituation, and furniſhed her with ſuch recommendations as ſecured to her a very agreeable reception in New-England.

Next to this very remarkable tranſaction, the incident that principally diſtinguiſhed this year in England, was the execution of dr. Archibald Cameron, a native of North-Britain, and brother to Cameron of Lochiel, chief of that numerous and warlike tribe, who had taken the field with the prince-pretender. After the battle of Culloden, where he was dangerouſly wounded, he found means to eſcape to the continent. His brother, the doctor, had accompanied him in all his expeditions, though not in a military capacity, and was included with him in the act of attainder paſſed againſt thoſe who had been concerned in the rebellion. Notwithſtanding the imminent danger attending ſuch an attempt, the doctor returned privately to Scotland, in order (as it was reported) to recover a ſum of money belonging to the pretender, which had been embezzled by his adherents in that country. Whetever may have been his inducement to reviſit his native country under ſuch a predicament, certain it is, he was diſcovered, apprehended, conducted to London, confined in the Tower, examined by the privy-council, and produced in the court of King's-Bench, where his identity being proved by ſeveral witneſſes, he received ſentence of death, and was executed at Tyburn. The terror and reſentment of the people, occaſioned by the rebellion, having by this time ſubſided, their humane paſſions did not fail to operate in favour of this unfortunate gentleman: their pity was mingled with eſteem, ariſing from his perſonal character, which was altogether unblemiſhed, and his deportment on this occaſion, which they could not help admiring, as the ſtandard of manly fortitude and decorum. The populace, though not very ſubject to tender emotions, were moved to compaſſion, and even to tears, by his behaviour at the place of execution; and many ſincere well-wiſhers to the preſent eſtabliſhment thought that the ſacrifice of this victim, at ſuch a juncture, could not rebound either to his honour or ſecurity.

[k] The library of ſir Hans Sloane conſiſted of above 50,000 volumes, including about 350 books of drawings, and 3516 manuſcripts, beſides a multitude of prints. The muſeum comprehended an infinite number of medals, coins, urns, utenſils, ſeals, cameos, intaglios, precious ſtones, veſſels of agate and jaſper, chryſtals, ſpars, foſſils, metals, minerals, ores, earths, ſands, ſalts, bitumens, ſulphurs, amber, ambergriſe, talcs, miræ, teſtacea, corals, ſponges, echini, echenites, aſteriæ, trochi, cruſtatia, ſtellæ marinæ, fiſhes, birds, eggs, and neſts, vipers, ſerpents, quadrupeds, inſects, human calculi, anatomical preparations, ſeeds, gums, roots, dried plants, pictures, drawings and mathematical inſtruments. All theſe articles, with a ſhort account of each, are ſpecified in 38 volumes in folio, and eight in quarto.

The turbulent ſpirit, which is never totally extinguiſhed in this iſland, manifeſted itſelf in ſundry tumults that broke out in different parts of South-Britain. The price of proviſion, and bread in particular, being raiſed to an exorbitant rate, in conſequence of an abſurd exportation of corn, for the ſake of the bounty, a formidable body of colliers, and other labouring people, raiſed an inſurrection at Briſtol, began to plunder the corn-veſſels in the harbour, and commit ſuch outrages in the city, that the magiſtrates were obliged to have recourſe to the military power. A troop of dragoons were ſent to their aſſiſtance, and the inſurgents were quelled, though not without ſome bloodſhed. Commotions of the ſame kind were excited in Yorkſhire, Manchester, and ſeveral other places in the northern counties. At Leeds, a detachment of the king's troops were obliged in their own defence to fire upon the rioters, eight or nine of whom were killed on the ſpot: and, indeed, ſo little care had been taken to reſtrain the licentious inſolence of the vulgar by proper laws and regulations, duly executed under the eye of civil magiſtracy, that a military power was found abſolutely neceſſary to maintain the peace of the kingdom.

The tranquillity of the continent was not endangered by any new conteſts or diſturbance: yet the breach between the clergy and the parliament of Paris was every day more and more widened, and the people were equally divided between ſuperſtition and a regard for civil liberty. The parliament having cauſed divers eccleſiaſtics to be apprehended, for having refuſed to adminiſter the ſacrament to perſons in extremity, who refuſed to ſubſcribe to the bull Unigenitus, all of them declared they acted according to the direction of the archbiſhop of Paris. Application being made to this haughty prelate, he treated the deputies of the parliament with the moſt ſupercilious contempt, and even ſeemed to brave the power and authority of that body. They, on the other hand, proceeded to take cognizance of the recuſant clergy, until their ſovereign ordered them to deſiſt. Then they preſented remonſtrances to his majeſty, reminding him of their privileges, and the duty of their ſtation, which obliged them to do juſtice on all delinquents. In the mean time, they continued to perform their functions, and even commenced a proſecution againſt the biſhop of Orleans, whom they ſummoned to attend their tribunal. Next day they received from Verſailles a lettre de cachet, accompanied by letters-patent, commanding them to ſuſpend all proſecutions relating to the refuſal of the ſacraments; and ordering the letters-patent to be regiſtered. Inſtead of obeying theſe commands, they preſented new remonſtrances, for anſwers to which they were referred to the king's former declarations. In conſequence of this intimation, they had ſpirit enough to reſolve, 'That, whereas certain evil-minded perſons had prevented truth from reaching the throne, the chambers remained aſſembled, and all other buſineſs ſhould be ſuſpended.' The affair was now become very ſerious. His majeſty, by freſh letters-patent, renewed his orders, and commanded them to proceed with their ordinary buſineſs, on pain of incurring his diſpleaſure. They forthwith came to another reſolution, importing, that they could not obey this junction without a breach of their duty and their oath. Next day lettres de cachet were iſſued, baniſhing to different parts of the kingdom all the members, except thoſe of the great chamber, which the court did not find more tractable than their brethren. They forthwith reſolved to abide by the two reſolutions mentioned above; and, as an inſtance of their unſhaken fortitude, ordered an eccleſiaſtic to be taken into cuſtody for refuſing the ſacraments. This ſpirited meaſure involved them in the fate of the reſt; for they were alſo exiled from Paris, the citizens of which did not fail to extol their conduct with the loudeſt encomiums, and at the ſame time to expreſs their reſentment againſt the clergy, who could not ſtir abroad without being expoſed to violence and inſult. The example of the parliament of Paris was followed by that of Rouen, which had courage enough to iſſue orders for apprehending the biſhop of Evreux, becauſe he had refuſed to appear when ſummoned to their tribunal. Their decrees on this occaſion being annulled by the king's council of ſtate, they preſented a bold remonſtrance, which, however, had no other effect than that of exaſperating the miniſtry. A grand deputation being ordered to attend the king, they were commanded to deſiſt from intermeddling in diſputes relating to the refuſal of the ſacraments, and to regiſter this injunction. At their return they had recourſe to a new remonſtrance; and one of their principal counſellors, who had ſpoken freely in the debates on this ſubject, was arreſted by a party of dragoons, who carried him priſoner to the caſtle of Dourlens. In a word, the body of the people declared for the parliament, in oppoſition to eccleſiaſtical tyranny; and, had they not been over-awed by a formidable ſtanding army, would certainly have taken up arms in defence of their liberties; while the monarch weakly ſuffered himſelf to be governed by prieſtly deluſions; and ſecure his military appointments, ſeemed to ſet the reſt of his ſubjects at defiance. Apprehenſive, however, that theſe diſputes would put an entire ſtop to the adminiſtration of juſtice, he, by letters-patent, eſtabliſhed a royal chamber for the proſecution of ſuits civil and criminal, which was opened with a ſolemn maſs performed in the queen's chapel at the Louvre, where all the members aſſiſted. On this occaſion another difficulty occured. The letters-patent conſtituting this new court ought to have been regiſted by the parliament, which was now no more. To remedy this defect, application was made to the inferior court of the Chatelet; which refuſing to regiſter them, one of its members was committed to the Baſtile, and another abſconded. Intimidated by this exertion of deſpotic power, they allowed the king's officers to enter the letters in their regiſter; but afterwars adobted more vigorous reſolutions. The lieutenant-civil appearing in their court, all the counſellors roſe up and retired, leaving him alone, and on the table an arret, importing, That whereas the confinement of one of their members, the proſecution of another, who durſt not appear, and the preſent calamities of the nation, gave them juſt apprehenſion for their own perſons, they had, after mature deliberation, thought proper to retire. Thus a dangerous ferment was excited by the king's eſpouſing the cauſe of ſpiritual inſolence and oppreſſion againſt the general voice of his people, and the plaineſt dictates of reaſon and common ſenſe.

The property of Eaſt Frieſeland continued ſtill to be the ſource of contention between the electors of Brandenburgh and Hanover. The intereſts of his Britannick majeſty being powerfully ſupported by the houſe of Auſtria, the miniſter of that power at the diet propoſed that the affair ſhould be taken into immediate conſideration. He was ſeconded by the miniſter of Brunſwick; but the envoy from Brandenburgh, having proteſted in form againſt this procedure, withdrew from the aſſembly, and the Brunſwick miniſter made a counter proteſtation, after which he alſo retired. Then a motion being made, that this diſpute ſhould be refered to the deciſion of the Aulick council at Vienna, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of 14 voices. His Pruſſian majeſty's final declaration with regard to this affair was afterwards preſented to the diet, and anſwered in the ſequel by a memorial from his Britannick majeſty as elector of Hanover. Some other petty diſputes likewiſe happened between the regency of Hanover and the city of Munſter; and the former claiming ſome bailiwics in the territories of Bremen, ſequeſtered certain revenues belonging to this city, in Stade and Ferden, till theſe claims ſhould be ſatisfied.

The court of Vienna having dropped for the preſent the ſcheme for electing a king of the Romans, concluded a very extraordinary treaty with the duke of Modena, ſtipulating, that his ſerene highneſs ſhould be appointed perpetual governor of the duchy of Milan, with a ſalary of 90,000 florins, on condition that he ſhould maintain a body of 4000 men, to be at the diſpoſal of the empreſs-queen; that her imperial majeſty ſhould have a right to place garriſons in the citadels of Mirandola and Reggio, as well as in the caſtle of Maſſa-Carrara: that the archduke Peter Leopold, third ſon of their imperial majeſties, ſhould eſpouſe the daughter of the hereditary prince of Modena, by the heireſs of Maſſa-Carrara; and, in caſe of her dying without heirs male, the eſtates of that houſe and the duchy of Mirandola ſhould devolve to the archduke; but in caſe of her having male iſſue, that ſhe ſhould enjoy the principality of Fermia, and other poſſeſſions in Hungary, claimed by the duke of Modena, for her fortune: finally, that on the extinction of the male branch of the houſe of Eſte, all the dominions of the duke of Modena ſhould devolve to the houſe of Auſtria.

While the powers on the continent of Europe were thus employed in ſtrengthening their reſpective intereſts, and concerting meaſures for preventing any interruption of the general tranquillity, matters were faſt ripening to a freſh rupture between the ſubjects of Great-Britain and France, in different parts of North-America. We have already obſerved that commiſſaries had been appointed, and conferences opened at Paris, to determine the diſputes between the two crowns, relating to the boundaries of Nova-Scotia; and we took notice in general of the little arts of evaſion practiſed by the French commiſſaries, to darken and perplex the diſpute, and elude the pretenſions of his Britannick majeſty. They perſiſted in employing theſe arts of chicanery and cavil with ſuch perſeverance, that the negotiation proved abortive, the conferences broke up, and every thing ſeemed to portend approaching hoſtilities. But, before we proceed to a detail of the incidents which were the immediate forerunners of the war, we will endeavour to convey a juſt idea of the diſpute concerning Nova-Scotia; which, we apprehend, is but imperfectly underſtood, though of the utmoſt importance to the intereſt of Great-Britain.

Nova-Scotia, called by the French Acadia, lies between the 44th and 50th degrees of north latitude, having New-England and the Atlantick ocean to the ſouth and ſouth-weſt, and the river and gulf of St. Laurence to the north and north-eaſt. The winter, which continues near ſeven months in this country, is intenſely cold; and, without the intervention of any thing that can be called ſpring, it is immediately ſucceeded by a ſummer, the heat of which is almoſt inſupportable, but of no long continuance. The ſoil in general is thin and barren, though ſome parts of it are ſaid to be equal to the beſt land in England. The whole country is covered with a perpetual fog, even after the ſummer has commenced. It was firſt poſſeſſed by the French, before they made any eſtabliſhment in Canada; who, by dint of induſtry and indefatigable perſeverance, in ſtruggling with the many difficulties they neceſſarily laboured under in the infancy of this ſettlement, ſubſiſted tolerably well, and increaſed conſiderably, with very little aſſiſtance from Europe; whilſt we even now ſhould loſe the immence expence we have already been at to ſettle a colony there, and ſhould ſee all our endeavours to that end defeated, if the ſupport of the royal hand was withdrawn but for a moment. This country, by the poſſeſſion of which an enemy would be enabled greatly to annoy all our other colonies, and, if in the hands of the French, would be of ſingular ſervice both to their fiſhery and their ſugar iſlands, has frequently changed hands from the French to the Engliſh, and from the Engliſh bac again to the French, till our right to it was finally ſettled by the twelfth article of the treaty of Utrecht, by which all the country included within the ancient limits of what was called Nova-Scotia, or Acadia, was ceded to the Engliſh. This article was confirmed by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle; but, for want of aſcertaining diſtinctly what were the bounds intended to be fixed by the two nations with reſpect to this province, diſputes aroſe, and commiſſaries, as we have obſerved, were appointed by both ſides, to adjuſt the litigation.

The commiſſaries of the king of Great-Britain conformed themſelves to the rule laid down by the treaty itſelf, and aſſigned thoſe as the ancient limits of this country which had always paſſed as ſuch, from the very earlieſt time of any certainty, down to the concluſion of the treaty; which the two crowns had frequently declared to be ſuch, and which the French had often admitted and allowed. Theſe limits are, the ſouthern bank of the river St. Laurence to the north, and Pentagoet to the weſt: the country ſituated between theſe boundaries is that which the French received by the treaty of St. Germain's, in the year 1632, under the general name of Acadia. Of this country, thus limited, they continued in poſſeſſion from that period to the year 1654, when a deſcent was made upon it, under the command of colonel Sedgwick. That theſe were then the undiſputed limits of Acadia his Britannick majeſty's commiſſaries plainly proved, by a letter of Louis XIII. to the Sieurs Charniſay and La Tour, regulating their juriſdictions in Acadia; by the ſubſequent commiſſions of the French king to the ſame perſons, as governors of Acadia, in the ſequel; and by that which was afterwards granted to the Sieur Denys, in the year 1654; all of which extend the bounds of this country from the river St. Laurence to Pentagoet and New-England. That theſe were the notions of the French with reſpect to the ancient limits of this province was further confirmed by the demand made by their embaſſador, in the courſe of that ſame year, for the reſtitution of the forts Pentagoet, St. John's and Port-Royal, as forts ſituated in Acadia. In the year 1662, upon the revival of the claim of France to the country of Acadia, which had been left undecided by the treaty of Weſtminſter, the French embaſſador, then at the court of London, aſſigned Pentagoet as the weſtern, and the river St. Laurence as the northern boundary of that country; and alledged the reſtitution of Acadia in the year 1632, and the poſſeſſion taken by France in conſequence thereof, as well as the continuation of that poſſeſſion, with the ſame limits, to the year 1654, as proofs of the equity and validity of the claim he then made; in which claim, and in the manner of ſupporting it, he was particularly approved of by the court of France. The ſame court afterwards thought it ſo clear, upon former determinations, and her own former poſſeſſions, that the true ancient boundaries of Acadia were Pentagoet to the weſt, and the river St. Laurence to the north, that ſhe deſired no ſpecification of limits in the treaty of Breda, but was contented with the reſtitution of Acadia, generally named: and, upon a diſpute which aroſe in the execution of this treaty, France re-aſſerted, and Great-Britain, after ſome diſcuſſion agreed to the above-mentioned limits of Acadia; and France obtained poſſeſſion of that country, ſo bounded, under the treaty of Breda. The ſenſe of France upon this ſubject, in the years 1685, and 1687, was alſo clearly manifeſted, in the memorials delivered at that time by the French embaſſador at the court of London, complaining of ſome encroachments made by the Engliſh upon the coaſt of Acadia: he deſcribed the country as extending from iſle Perçe, which lies at the entrance of the river St. Laurence, to St. George's iſland: and again, in a ſubſequent complaint, made by monſ. Barillon and monſ. de Bonrepaus to the court of Great-Britain, againſt the judge of Pemaquid, for having ſeiſed the effects of a French merchant at Pentagoet, which, ſaid they, was ſituated in Acadia, as reſtored to France by the treaty of Breda. To explain the ſenſe of France, touching the bounds of Acadia in the year 1700, the Britiſh commiſſaries produced a propoſal of the French embaſſador, then reſiding in Great-Britain, to reſtrain the limits of that country to the river St. George. They alſo inſtanced the ſurrender of Port-Royal in the year 1710, in which Acadia is deſcribed with the ſame limits with which France had received it in the years 1632, and 1667. And further to aſcertain the ſenſe of both crowns, even at the treaty of Utrecht itſelf, they produced the queen of Great-Britain's inſtructions to her embaſſadors in the year 1711, in which they were directed to inſiſt, 'That his moſt chriſtian majeſty ſhould quit all claim or title, by virtue of any former treaty, or otherwiſe, to the country called Nova-Scotia, and expreſsly to Port-Royal, otherwiſe Annapolis-Royal.' To theſe they added a manifeſt demonſtration, founded on indiſputable facts, proving, that the recital of the ſeveral ſorts of right which France had ever pretended to this country, and the ſpecification of both terms, Acadia, or Nova-Scotia, were intended by Great-Britain to obviate all doubts which had ever been made concerning the limits of Acadia, and to comprehend with more certainty all that country which France had ever received as ſuch: finally, to ſpecify what France conſidered as Acadia, during the treaty they referred to the offers of that crown in the year 1712, in which ſhe propoſed to reſtrain the boundary of Acadia to the river St. George, as a departure from its real boundary, in caſe Great-Britain would reſtore to her the poſſeſſion of that country. From all theſe facts it plainly appears, that Great-Britain demanded nothing but what the fair conſtruction of the words of the treaty of Utrecht neceſſarily implies; and that it is impoſſible for any thing to have more evident marks of candour and fairneſs in it, than the demand of the Engliſh on this occaſion. From the variety of evidence brought in ſupport of this claim, it evidently reſults, that the Engliſh commiſſaries aſſigned no limits as the ancient limits of Acadia, but thoſe which France herſelf determined to be ſuch in the year 1632; and which ſhe poſſeſſed, in conſequence of that determination, till the year 1654; that in 1662 France claimed, and received in 1669, the country which Great-Britain now claims as Acadia, reſtored to France by the treaty of Breda under that general denomination: that France never conſidered Acadia as having any other limits than thoſe which were aſſigned to it from the year 1632, to the year 1710; and that, by the treaty of Utrecht, ſhe engaged to transfer that very ſame country as Acadia, which France has always aſſerted and poſſeſſed, and Great-Britain now claims, as ſuch. Should the crown of France, therefore, be ever willing to decide what are the ancient limits of Acadia, by her own declarations ſo frequently made in like diſcuſſions upon the ſame point, by her poſſeſſions of this country for almoſt a century, and by her deſcription of Acadia, during the negotiation of that very treaty upon which this doubt is raiſed, ſhe cannot but admit the claim of Great-Britain to be conformable to the treaty of Utrecht, and to the deſcription of the country transferred to Great-Britain by the 12th article of that treaty. There is a conſiſtency in the claim of the Engliſh, and a completeneſs in the evidence brought in ſupport of it, which is ſeldom ſeen in diſcuſſions of this ſort; for it rarely happens, in diſputes of ſuch a nature between two crowns, that either of them can ſafely offer to have its pretenſions decided by the known and repeated declarations or the poſſeſſions of the other. To anſwer the force of this detail of concluſive hiſtorical facts, and to give a new turn to the real queſtion in diſpute, the French commiſſaries, in their memorial, laid it down as a diſtinction made by the treaty of Utrecht, that the ancient limits of Acadia, referred to by that treaty, are different from any with which that country may have paſſed under the treaties of St. Germains and Breda; and then endeavoured to ſhow, upon the teſtimonies of maps and hiſtorians, that Acadia and its limits were anciently confined to the ſouth-eaſtern part of the peninſula. In ſupport of this ſyſtem, the French commiſſaries had recourſe to ancient maps and hiſtorians, who, as they aſſerted, had ever confined Acadia to the limits they aſſigned. They alledged, that thoſe commiſſions of the French government over Acadia, which the Engliſh cited as evidences of the limits they claimed, were given as commiſſions over Acadia and the country around it, and not over Acadia only: that the whole of the country claimed by the Engliſh as Acadia could not poſſibly be ſuppoſed ever to be conſidered as ſuch, becauſe many parts of that territory always did, and ſtill do, preſerve particular and diſtinct names. They affirmed New-France to be a province in itſelf; and argued, that many parts of what we claim as Acadia can never have been in Acadia, becauſe hiſtorians and the French commiſſions of government expreſsly place them in New-France. They aſſerted, that no evidence can be drawn of the opinion of any crown, with reſpect to the limits of any country, from its declaration during the negotiation of a treaty; and, in the end, relying upon maps and hiſtorians for the ancient limits of Acadia, they pretended that the expreſs reſtitution of St. Germain's, and the poſſeſſion taken by France in conſequence of the treaty of Breda, after a long diſcuſſion of the limits, and the declaration of France during the negotiation of the treaty of Utrecht, were foreign to the point in queſtion. In refutation of theſe maxims, the Engliſh commiſſaries proved, from an examination of the maps and hiſtorians cited by the French in ſupport of their ſyſtem, that if this queſtion was to be decided upon the authorities which they themſelves allowed to belong, and to be applicable, to this diſcuſſion, the limits which they aſſigned were utterly inconſiſtent with the beſt maps of all countries, which are authorities in point for almoſt every part of the claim of Great-Britain. They ſhowed, that the French hiſtorians Champlain and Denys, and particularly this laſt, with his commiſſion in the year 1655, aſſigned the ſame northern and weſtern limits to Acadia which they did; and that Eſcarbot, another of their hiſtorians, as far as any evidence can be drawn from his writings, agrees entirely with the former two. They obſerved, that all theſe evidences fall in with and confirm the better authorities of treaties, and the ſeveral tranſactions between the two crowns for near a century paſt; and that the French commiſſaries, by deviating from treaties, and the late proceedings of the two crowns, to ancient hiſtorians and maps, only made a tranſition from an authentic to an inſufficient ſort of evidence; and led the Engliſh commiſſaries into an enquiry, which proved, that both the proper and the improper, the regular and the foreign evidence, upon which this matter had been reſted, equally confuted the limits alledged by the French commiſſaries as the ancient limits of Acadia.

While the Britiſh miniſtry depended upon the ſucceſs of the conferences between the commiſſaries of the two crowns at Paris, the French were actually employed in executing their plans of encroachment upon the Britiſh colonies in North-America. Their ſcheme was to engroſs the whole fur-trade of that continent; and they had already made great progreſs in extending a chain of forts, connecting their ſettlements on the river Miſſiſſippi with their poſſeſſions in Canada, along the great lakes of Erie and Ontario, which laſt iſſues into the river St. Laurence. By theſe means they hoped to exclude the Engliſh from all communication and traffic with the Indian nations, even thoſe that lay contiguous to the Britiſh ſettlements, and confine them within a line of their drawing, beyond which they ſhould neither extend their trade nor plantations. Their commercial ſpirit did not keep pace with the gigantic ſtrides of their ambition: they could not ſupply all thoſe Indians with the neceſſaries they wanted, ſo that many of the natives had recourſe to the Engliſh ſettlements; and this commerce produced a connection, in conſequence of which the Britiſh adventurers ventured to travel with merchandize as far as the banks of the river Ohio, that runs into the Miſſiſſippi, a great way on the other ſide of the Apalachian mountains, beyond which none of our coloniſts had ever attempted to penetrate. The tract of country lying along the Ohio is ſo fertile, pleaſant, and inviting, and the Indians, called Twightees, who inhabit thoſe delightful plains, were ſo well diſpoſed towards a cloſe alliance with the Engliſh, that as far bac as the year 1716, mr. Spotſwood, governor of Virginia, propoſed a plan for erecting a company to ſettle ſuch lands upon this river as ſhould be ceded to them by treaty with the natives; but the deſign was at that time fruſtrated, partly by the indolence and timidity of the Britiſh miniſtry, who were afraid of giving umbrage to the French, and partly by the jealouſies and diviſions ſubſiſting between the different colonies of Great-Britain. The very ſame circumſtances encouraged the French to proceed in their project of invaſion. At length, they penetrated from the banks of the river St. Laurence, acroſs lake Champlain, and upon the territory of New-York built with impunity, and, indeed, without oppoſition, the fort of Crown-Point, the moſt inſolent and dangerous encroachment that they had hitherto carried into execution.

Governor Spotſwood's ſcheme for an Ohio company was revived immediately after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, when certain merchants of London, who traded to Maryland and Virginia, petitioned the government on this ſubject, and were indulged not only with a grant of a great tract of ground to the ſouthward of Penſylvannia, which they promiſed to ſettle; but alſo with an excluſive privilege of trading with the Indians on the banks of the river Ohio. This deſign no ſooner tranſpired, than the French governor of Canada took the alarm, and wrote letters to the governors of New-York and Pennſylvania, giving them to underſtand, that as the Engliſh inland traders had encroached on the French territories and privileges, by trading with the Indians under the protection of his ſovereign, he would ſeiſe them wherever they could be found, if they did not immediately deſiſt from that illicit practice. No regard being paid to this intimation, he next year cauſed three Britiſh traders to be arreſted. Their effects were confiſcated, and they themſelves conveyed to Quebec, from whence they were ſent priſoners to Rochelle in France, and there detained in confinement. In this ſituation they preſented a remonſtrance to the earl of Albermarle, at that time Engliſh ambaſſador in Paris, and he claiming them as Britiſh ſubjects, they were ſet at liberty. Although, in anſwer to his lordſhip's memorial, the court of Verſailles promiſed to tranſmit orders to the French governors in America to uſe all their endeavours for preventing any diſputes, that might have a tendency to alter the good correſpondence eſtabliſhed between the two nations; in all probability the directions given were ſeemingly the very reverſe of theſe profeſſions, for the French commanders, partiſans, and agents in America, took every ſtep their buſy genius could ſuggeſt, to ſtrengthen their own power, and weaken the influence of the Engliſh, by embroiling them with the Indian nations. This taſk they found the more eaſy, as the natives had taken offence againſt the Engliſh, when they underſtood that their lands were given away without their knowledge, and that there was a deſign to build forts in their country, without their conſent and concurrence. Indeed the perſon whom the new company employed to ſurvey the banks of Ohio concealed his deſign ſo carefully, and behaved in other reſpects in ſuch a dark myſterious manner, as could not fail to arouſe the jealouſy of a people naturally inquiſitive, and very much addicted to ſuſpicion. How the company propoſed to ſettle this acquiſition in deſpite of the native poſſeſſors it is not eaſy to conceive, and it is ſtill more unaccountable that they ſhould have neglected the natives, whoſe conſent and aſſiſtance they might have procured at a very ſmall expence. Inſtead of acting ſuch a fair, open, and honourable part, they ſent a mr. Giſt to make a clandeſtine ſurvey of the country, as far as the falls of the river Ohio; and, as we have obſerved above, his conduct alarmed both the French and Indians. The erection of this company was equally diſagreeable to the ſeparate traders of Virginia and Pennſylvania, who ſaw themſelves on the eve of being deprived of a valuable branch of traffic, by the exceſſive charter of a monopoly; and therefore they employed their emiſſaries to foment the jealouſy of the Indians.

The French having in a manner commenced hoſtilities againſt the Engliſh, and actually built forts on the territories of the Britiſh allies at Niagara, and on the lake Erie, mr. Hamilton, governor of Pennſylvania, communicated this intelligence to the aſſembly of the province, and repreſented the neceſſity of erecting truc-houſes, or places of ſtrength and ſecurity, on the river Ohio, to which the traders might retire in caſe of inſult or moleſtation. The propoſal was approved, and money granted for the purpoſe; but the aſſembly could not agree about the manner in which they ſhould be erected; and in the mean time the French fortified themſelves at leiſure, and continued to harraſs the traders belonging to the Britiſh ſettlements. Repeated complaints of theſe encroachments and depredations being repreſented to mr. Dinwiddie, governor of Virginia, he, towards the latter end of this very year, ſent major Waſhington with a letter to the commanding officer of a fort which the French had built on the Riviere-au-Beuf, which falls into the Ohio, not far from the lake Erie. In this letter mr. Denwiddie expreſſed his ſurpriſe that the French ſhould build forts and make ſettlements on the river Ohio, in the weſtern part of the colony of Virginia, belonging to the crown of Great-Britain. He complained of theſe encroachments, as well as of the injuries done to the ſubjects of Great-Britain, in open violation of the law of nations, and of the treaties actually ſubſiſting between the two crowns. He deſired to know by whoſe authority and inſtructions his Britannick majeſty's territories had been invaded; and required him to depart in peace without further proſecuting a plan which muſt interrupt the harmony and good underſtanding which his majeſty was deſirous to continue and cultivate with the moſt chriſtian king. To this ſpirited intimation the officer replied, That it was not his province to ſpecify the evidence, and demonſtrate the right of the king his maſter to the lands ſitnated on the river Ohio; but he would tranſmit the letter to the marquis du Queſne, and act according to the anſwer he ſhould receive from that nobleman. In the mean time, he ſaid, he did not think himſelf obliged to obey the ſummons of the Engliſh governor; that he commanded the fort by virtue of an order from his general, to which he was determined to conform with all the preciſion and reſolution of a good officer. Mr Dinwiddie expected no other reply, and therefore had projected a fort to be erected near the forks of the river. The province undertook to defray the expence, and the ſtores for that purpoſe were already provided; but by ſome fatal overſight, the concurrence of the Indians was neither obtained nor ſollicited, and therefore they looked upon this meaſure with an evil eye, as a manifeſt invaſion of their property.

While the French thus induſtriouſly extended their encroachments to the ſouthward, they were not idle in the gulf of St. Laurence, but ſeized every opportunity of diſtreſſing the Engliſh ſettlement of Nova-Scotia. We have already obſerved, that the town of Halifax was no ſooner built, than they ſpirited up the Indians of that neighbourhood to commit hoſtilities againſt the inhabitants, ſome of whom they murdered, and others they carried priſoners to Louiſbourg, where they ſold them for arms and ammunition, the French pretending that they maintained this traffic from motives of pure compaſſion, in order to prevent the maſſacre of the Engliſh captives, whom, however, they did not ſet at liberty without exacting an exorbitant ranſom. As theſe ſculking parties of Indians were generally directed and headed by French commanders, repeated complaints were made to the governor of Louiſbourg, who ſtill anſwered, that his juriſdiction did not extend over the Indians, and that their French conductors were choſen from the inhabitants of Annapolis, who thought proper to remain in that country after it was ceded to the Engliſh, and were in fact, the ſubjects of Great-Britain. Even while the conferences were carried on for aſcertaining the limits of Nova-Scotia the governor of Canada detached M. la Corne, with ſome regular troops, and a body of militia, to fortify a poſt on the bay of Chignecto, on pretence that this and a great part of the peninſula belonged to his government. The poſſeſſion of this poſt not only ſecured to the Indians of the continent a free entrance into the peninſula, and a ſafe retreat in caſe of purſuit; but alſo encouraged the French inhabitants of Annapolis to riſe in open rebellion againſt the Engliſh government.

In the ſpring of the year 1750, general Cornwallis, governor of Halifax, detached major Laurence with a few men to reduce them to obedience. At his approach they burned their town to aſhes, forſook their poſſeſſions, threw themſelves under the protection of M. la Corne, who thus re-enforced, found himſelf at the head of 1500, well provided with arms and ammunition. Major Laurence being unable to cope with him in the field, demanded an interview, at which he deſired to know for what cauſe the French inhabitants of Nova-Scotia had ſhaken off their allegiance to the crown of Great-Britain, and violated the neutrality which they had hitherto affected to profeſs. The French officer, without pretending to account for their behaviour, gave him to underſtand in general terms, that he had orders to defend his poſt, and theſe orders he was determined to obey. The Engliſh major finding himſelf too weak to attac their united force, and having no orders to commit hoſtilities againſt any but the Indians and their open abettors, returned to Halifax, without having been able to fulfil the purpoſe of his expedition. Immediately after his retreat, the French neutrals (ſo they were called) returned to the habitations which they had abandoned; and, in conjunction with the Indians, renewed their depredations upon the inhabitants of Halifax and its dependent ſettlements. The Engliſh governor, juſtly incenſed at theſe outrages, and ſeeing they would neither ſubmit to the Engliſh government themſelves, nor allow others to enjoy it with tranquillity, reſolved to expel them effectually from the country they ſo ill deſerved to poſſeſs. Major Laurence was again detached with a thouſand men, tranſported by ſea, to Chignecto, where he found the French and Indians entrenched, in order to diſpute his landing. Notwithſtanding this oppoſition, he made a deſcent with a few companies, received and returned a ſmart fire, and ruſhing into their entrenchments, obliged them to fly with the utmoſt precipitation, leaving a conſiderable number killed on the ſpot. The fugitives ſaved themſelves by croſſing a river, on the farther bank of which La Corne ſtood at the head of his troops, drawn up in order to receive them as friends and dependents. He had by this time erected a fort, which he denominated Beau Sejour; and now the Engliſh built another on the oppoſite ſide of the river, which was called after its founder St. Laurence. This being provided with a good garriſon, ſerved as a chec upon the French, and in ſome meaſure reſtrained the incurſions of their barbarians. Not that it effectually anſwered this purpoſe; for the Indians and neutrals ſtill ſeized every opportunity of attacking the Engliſh in the interior parts of the peninſula. In the courſe of the ſucceeding year they ſurpriſed the little town of Dartmouth, on the other ſide of Halifax-bay, where they killed and ſcalped a great number of people, and carried off ſome priſoners. For theſe expeditions the French always ſupplied them with boats, canoes, arms, and ammunition; and indeed they were conducted with ſuch care and ſecrecy, that it was almoſt impoſſible to prevent their ſucceſs. One ſure remedy againſt the ſudden and ſtolen incurſions of thoſe ſavages might have been found in the uſe of ſtaunch hounds, which would have run upon the foot, detected the ſculking parties of the Indians, and fruſtrated all their ambuſcades: but this expedient, ſo eaſy and practicable, was never tried, though frequently recommended in public to the attention of the government, and the conſideration of the coloniſts. The Indians continued to plunder and maſſacre the Britiſh ſubjects with impunity, and were countenanced by the French government in that country, who now ſtrengthened their lodgment on the nec of the peninſula with an additional fort, diſtinguiſhed by the name of Baye-verte; and built a third at the mouth of St. John's river, on the north ſide of the bay of Fundy.

All theſe previous ſteps to a rupture with England were taken with great deliberation, while the commiſſaries of both nations were diſputing about the limits of the very country which they thus arrogantly uſurped; and they proceeded to perfect their chain of forts to the ſouthward, without paying the leaſt regard to the expoſtulations of the Engliſh governors, or to a memorial preſented at Verſailles by the earl of Albermarle, the Britiſh miniſter. He demanded that expreſs orders ſhould be ſent to M. De la Jonquiere, the commander for the French in America, to deſiſt from violence againſt the Britiſh ſubjects in that country; that the fort of Niagara ſhould be immediately raſed; that the ſubjects of Great-Britain, who had been made priſoners, ſhould be ſet at liberty, and indemnified for the loſſes they had ſuſtained: and that the perſons who had committed thoſe exceſſes ſhould be puniſhed in an exemplary manner. True it is, ſix Engliſhmen, whom they had unjuſtly taken, were immediately diſmiſſed; and the embaſſador amuſed with general promiſes of ſending ſuch inſtructions to the French governor in America, as ſhould anticipate any cauſe of complaint for the future; but far from having any intention to perform theſe promiſes, the court of Verſailles, without all doubt, exhorted La Jonquiere to proceed in bringing its ambitious ſchemes to perfection.

Every incident in America ſeemed to prognoſticate war, when the ſeſſion of parliament was opened on the 15th day of November: yet his majeſty, on this occaſion, told them, That the events of the year had not made it neceſſary for him to offer any thing in particular to their conſideration, relating to foreign affairs. He even declared, that the continuance of the public tranquillity, and the general ſtate of Europe, remained upon the ſame footing as when they laſt parted; and aſſured them of his ſteadineſs in purſuing the moſt effectual meaſures to preſerve to his people the bleſſings of peace. He expreſſed uncommon concern that the horrid crimes of robbery and murder were of late rather increaſed than diminiſhed, and earneſtly recommended this important object to their ſerious attention. Affectionate addreſſes were preſented by both houſes in anſwer to his harrangue; and what was very remarkable, they were propoſed and paſſed without queſtion or debate.

The commons continued the ſame number of ſeamen and land-forces for the enſuing year which had been granted in the laſt ſeſſion, and made ſuitable proviſion for the exigencies of the ſtate. The whole ſupply amounted to 2,797,916l. 10s. 2d. to be raiſed by a land-tax of 2s. in the pound, a malt-tax, a continuation of certain duties on wine, vinegar, cyder, and beer imported, a ſum taken from the ſinking-fund, and the overplus of certain grants, funds, and duties. The proviſions made conſiderably exceeded the grants; but this exceſs was chargeable with the intereſt of what ſhould be borrowed upon the credit of the land or malt-tax, there being a clauſe of credit in both, as alſo with the deficiency (if any ſhould happen) in the ſums they were computed to produce. The houſe agreed to all theſe reſolutions almoſt unanimouſly: indeed, no oppoſition was made to any of them, but that for continuing the ſame number of land-forces, which was carried by a great majority.

The act permitting Jews to be naturalized which had, during the laſt ſeſſion, triumphed over ſuch an obſtinate oppoſition, was by this time become the object of national horror and execration. Every part of the kingdom reſounded with the reproach of the miniſtry who had enforced ſuch an odious meaſure; and the two brothers, who engroſſed the greater part of the adminiſtration, trembled at the proſpect of what this clamour might produce at the general election, this being the laſt ſeſſion of the preſent parliament. So eager were the miniſters to annul this unpopular meaſure, that, immediately after the peers had agreed to the nature and form of an addreſs to his majeſty, the duke of Newcaſtle, with that precipitation ſo peculiar to his character, poured forth an abrupt harangue, in that houſe, importing, that the diſaffected had made an handle of the act paſſed laſt ſeſſion in favour of the Jews, to raiſe diſcontents among many of his majeſty's good ſubjects; and as the act was in itſelf of little importance, he was of opinion it ought to be repealed: for this purpoſe he preſented a bill ready framed, which was read and committed, though not without ſome debate. The naturalization-bill, now devoted as a ſacrifice to the reſentment of the people, contained a clauſe diſabling all naturalized Jews from purchaſing, inheriting, or receiving any advowſon or preſentation, or right to any eccleſiaſtical benefice or promotion, ſchool, hoſpital, or donative; and by the firſt draft of the bill, which his grace now preſented, it was intended that this clauſe ſhould not be repealed. It was the opinion, however, of the majority, that ſuch a clauſe ſtanding unrepealed might imply, that the Jews, by being thus expreſsly excluded from the poſſeſſion of any eccleſiaſtical right of preſentation, would be conſidered as having the power and privilege of purchaſing and inheriting any lay-property in the kingdom. On this conſideration an amendment was made in the bill, the clauſe in queſtion was left out, and the whole act of naturalization repealed without exception [k]. Though the lords, in general, concurred in the expediency of the repeal, it was oppoſed by ſome few, as too great a ſacrifice to the idle and unfounded clamours of the multitude; and upon this ſide of the debate a great power of elocution was diſplayed by earl Temple, who had lately ſucceeded to this title on the death of his mother, a nobleman of diſtinguiſhed abilities, and the moſt amiable diſpoſition, frank, liberal, humane, and zealouſly attached to the intereſt and honour of his country. In the lower-houſe the members of both parties ſeemed to vie with each other in demonſtrations of averſion to this unpopular act. On the very firſt day of the ſeſſion, immediately after the motion for an addreſs to his majeſty, ſir James Daſhwood, an eminent leader in the oppoſition, gave the commons to underſtand, that he had a motion of very great importance to make, which would require the attention of every member, as ſoon as the motion for the addreſs ſhould be diſcuſſed: he, therefore, deſired they would not quit the houſe until he ſhould have an opportunity to explain his propoſal. Accordingly, they had no ſooner agreed to the motion for an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty, than he ſtood up again; and having expatiated upon the juſt and general indignation which the act of the preceding ſeſſion, in favour of the Jews, had raiſed among the people, he moved to order that the houſe ſhould be called over on Tueſday the fourth day of December, for taking that act into conſideration: but being given to underſtand that it was not uſual to appoint a call of the houſe for any particular purpoſe, he agreed that the motion ſhould be general. It was ſeconded by lord Parker, his oppoſite in political intereſts; the houſe agreed to it without oppoſition, and the call was ordered accordingly. They were anticipated, however, by the lords, who framed and tranſmitted to them a bill on the ſame ſubject, to the purport of which the commons made no objection; for every member, having the fear of the general election before his eyes, carefully avoided every expreſſion which could give umbrage to his conſtituents: but violent oppoſition was made to the preamble, which ran in the following ſtrain:—'Whereas an act of parliament was made and paſſed in the 25th year of his majeſty's reign, intituled, An Act to permit perſons profeſſing the Jewiſh religion to be naturalized by parliament, and for other purpoſes therein mentioned; and whereas occaſion has been taken, from the ſaid act, to raiſe diſcontents and diſquiets in the minds of his majeſty's ſubjects, be it enacted, &c.' This introduction was conſidered as an unjuſt reflection upon the body of the people in general, and in particular upon thoſe who had oppoſed the bill in the courſe of the preceding ſeſſion. Sir Roger Newdigate therefore moved that the expreſſion ſhould be varied to this effect: 'Whereas great diſcontents and diſquietudes had from the ſaid act ariſen.' The conſequence of this motion was an obſtinate debate, in which it was ſupported by the earl of Egmont, and divers other able orators: but mr. Pelham and mr. Pitt were numbered among its opponents. The queſtion being put for the propoſed alteration, it was of courſe carried in the negative: the bill, after the third reading, paſſed nemine contradicente, and in due time obtained the royal aſſent.

Even this conceſſion of the miniſtry did not allay the reſentment of the people, and their apprehenſions of encroachment from the Jews. Another act ſtill ſubſiſted, by virtue of which any perſon profeſſing the Jewiſh religion might become a free denizen of Great-Britain, after having reſided ſeven years in any of his majeſty's colonies in America; and this was now conſidered as a law having the ſame dangerous tendency, of which the other was now in a fair way of being convicted. It was moved, therefore, in the lower-houſe, that part of this former act might be read: then the ſame member made a motion for an addreſs to his majeſty, deſiring that the houſe might have the peruſal of the liſts tranſmitted from the American colonies to the commiſſioners for trade and plantations, containing the names of all ſuch perſons profeſſing the Jewiſh religion as had entitled themſelves to the benefit of the ſaid act, ſince the year 1740. Theſe liſts were accordingly preſented, and left upon the table for the peruſal of the members: but as this act contained no limitation of time within which the benefit of it ſhould be claimed, and as this claim was attended with a good deal of trouble and ſome expence, very few perſons had availed themſelves of it in that period. Nevertheleſs, as a great number of Jews were already entitled to claim this indulgence, and as it remained an open channel through which Great-Britain might be deluged with thoſe people, all of whom the law would hold as natural-born ſubjects, and their progeny as freed from all the reſtrictions contained in the act with reſpect to naturalized foreigners, lord Harley moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal ſo much of the ſaid act as related to perſons profeſſing the Jewiſh religion, who ſhould come to ſettle in any Britiſh colony after a certain time. The motion was ſeconded by ſir James Daſhwood, and ſupported by the earl of Egmont; but being found unequal to the intereſt and elocution of mr. Pelham and mr. Pitt, was rejected by the majority.

[k] The reverend bench of biſhops had, with a laudable ſpirit of chriſtian meekneſs and philanthropy, generally approved of the indulgence granted to their Hebrew brethren; and now they acquieſced in the propoſed repeal with the ſame paſſive diſcretion though one of the number contended for the ſaving clauſe which the duke of N— had reccommended.

[1754] The next object that claimed the attention of the commons, was a bill for improving the regulations already made to prevent the ſpreading of a contagious diſtemper, which raged among the horned cattle in different parts of the kingdom. The laſt bill of this ſeſſion that had the good fortune to ſucceed, was brought in for puniſhing mutiny and deſertion of officers and ſoldiers in the ſervice of the Eaſt-India company, and for the puniſhment of offences committed in the Eaſt-Indies and the iſland of St. Helena. This being a meaſure of a very extraordinary nature, all the members were ordered to attend the houſe on the day fixed for the ſecond reading: at the ſame time all charters, commiſſions, and authorities, by which any powers relative to a military juriſdiction, or the exerciſe of martial law, had been granted or derived from the crown to the ſaid company, were ſubmitted to the peruſal of the members. The bill was by many conſidered as a dangerous extenſion of military power, to the prejudice of the civil rights enjoyed by Britiſh ſubjects, and as ſuch violently conteſted by the earl of Egmont, lord Strange, and mr. alderman Beckford. Their objections were anſwered by the ſollicitor-general and mr. Yorke. The bill, after ſome warm debates, being eſpouſed by the miniſtry, was enacted into a law, and diſpatched to the Eaſt-Indies by the firſt opportunity.

Some other motions were made, and petitions preſented on different ſubjects, which, as they miſcarried, it will be unneceſſary to particulariſe. It may not be amiſs, however, to record an exemplary act of juſtice done by the commons on a perſon belongnig to a public office, whom they detected in the practice of fraud and impoſition. Notwithſtanding the particular care taken in the laſt ſeſſion, to prevent the monopolizing of tickets in the ſtate-lottery, all thoſe precautions had been eluded in a ſcandalous manner by certain individuals, entruſted with the charge of delivering the tickets to the contributors, according to the intent of the act, which expreſsly declared that not more than twenty ſhould be ſold to any one perſon. Inſtead of conforming to theſe directions of the legiſlaure, they and their friends engroſſed great numbers, ſheltering themſelves under a falſe liſt of feigned names for the purpoſe; by which means they not only defeated the equitable intention of the commons, but in ſome meaſure injured the public credit; inaſmuch as their avarice had prompted them to ſubſcribe for a greater number than they had caſh to purchaſe; ſo that there was a deficiency in the firſt payment, which might have had a bad effect on the public affairs. Theſe practices were ſo flagrant and notorious as to attract the notice of the lower-houſe, when an enquiry was begun, and proſecuted with a ſpirit of real patriotiſm, in oppoſition to a ſcandalous cabal, who endeavoured with equal eagerneſs and perſeverance to ſcreen the delinquents. All their efforts, however, proved abhortive; and a committee appointed to examine particulars, agreed to ſeveral ſevere reſolutions againſt one Le—, who had amaſſed a large fortune by this and other kinds of peculation. They voted him guilty of breach of truſt, and a direct violation of the lottery-act; and an addreſs was preſented to his majeſty, deſiring he might be proſecuted by the attorney-general for theſe offences. He was accordingly ſued in the court of King's-Bench, and paid a fine of 1000l. for having committed frauds by which he had gained forty times that ſum; but he was treated with ſuch gentleneſs as remarkably denoted the clemency of that tribunal.

The ſeſſion ended in the beginning of April, when the king gave the parliament to underſtand that he ſhould ſay nothing at preſent on foreign affairs; but aſſured them of his fixed reſolution to exert his whole power in maintaining the general tranquillity, and adhering to ſuch meaſures for that purpoſe as he had hitherto purſued in conjunction with his allies. He in very affectionate terms thanked both houſes for the repeated proofs they had given of their zealous attachment and loyalty to his perſon and government. He enumerated the ſalutary meaſures they had taken for leſſening the national debt, and augmenting the public credit, extending navigation and commerce, reforming the morals of the people, and improving the regulations of civil œconomy. He concluded with declaring, that he ſecurely relied upon the loyalty and good affection of his people, and had no other aim than their permanent happineſs. In a little time after the cloſe of this ſeſſion they were diſſolved by proclamation, and new writs iſſued by the lord-chancellor for convoking a new parliament. The ſame ceremonies were practiſed with reſpect to the convocations of Canterbury and York, though they no longer retained their former importance; nor, indeed, were they ſuffered to ſit and deliberate upon the ſubjects which formerly fell under their cognizance and diſcuſſion.

In the beginning of March, the miniſtry of Great-Britain had been left without a head by the death of mr. Pelham, which was not only ſincerely lamented by his ſovereign, but alſo regreted by the nation in general, to whoſe affection he had powerfully recommended himſelf by the candour and humanity of his conduct and character, even while he purſued meaſures which they did not entirely approve. The loſs of ſuch a miniſter was the more deeply felt by the government at this juncture, being the eve of a general election for a new parliament, when every adminiſtration is ſuppoſed to exert itſelf with redoubled vigilance and circumſpection. He had already concerted the meaſures for ſecuring a majority, and his plan was faithfully executed by his friends and adherents, who ſtill engroſſed the adminiſtration. His brother the duke of Newcaſtle, was appointed firſt lord-commiſſioner of the treaſury, and ſucceeded as ſecretary of ſtate by ſir Thomas Robinſon, who had long reſided as embaſſador at the court of Vienna. The other department of this office was ſtill retained by the earl of Holderneſſe, and the function of chancellor of the exchequer was performed as uſual by the lord-chief-juſtice of the King's-Bench, until a proper perſon could be found to fill that important office: but in the courſe of the ſummer it was beſtowed upon mr. Legge, who acquitted himſelf with equal honour and capacity. Divers other alterations were made, of leſs importance to the public. Sir George Lyttelton was appointed cofferer, and the earl of Hillſborough comptroller of the houſehold. Mr George Grenville, brother to earl Temple, became treaſurer of the navy; and mr. Charles Townſhend, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the ſequel, took place as a commiſſioner at the board of admiralty, in the room of lord Barrington, made maſter of the wardrobe. Lord Hardwicke, the chancellor, was promoted to the dignity of an earl. The place of the lord-chief-juſtice of the King's-bench becoming vacant by the death of ſir William Lee, was filled with ſir Dudley Ryder, and he was ſucceeded by mr. Murray in the office of attorney-general.

The elections for the new parliament generally ſucceeded according to the wiſh of the miniſtry; for oppoſition was now dwindled down to the loweſt ſtate of imbecility. It had received a mortal wound by the death of the late prince of Wales, whoſe adherents were too wiſe to purſue an ignis fatuus, without any proſpect of ſucceſs or advantage. Some of them had prudently ſung their palinodia to the miniſtry, and been gratified with profitable employments; while others, ſetting too great a price upon their own importance kept aloof till the market was over, and were left to pine in ſecret over their diſappointed ambition. The maxims of toryiſm had been relinquiſhed by many, as the barren principles of a loſing game; the body of the people were conciliated to the eſtabliſhed government: and the harmony that now, for the firſt time, ſubſiſted among all the branches of the royal family had a wonderful effect in acquiring a degree of popularity which they had never before enjoyed. The writs being returned, the new parliament was opened on the laſt day of May by the duke of Cumberland, and ſome other peers, who acted by virtue of a commiſſion from his majeſty. The commons having choſen for their ſpeaker the right hon. Arthur Onſlow, who had honourably filled that high office in the four preceding parliaments, he was preſented and approved by the commiſſioners. Then the lord high-chancellor haranged both houſes, giving them to underſtand, that his majeſty had indulged them with this early opportunity of coming together, in order to complete without loſs of time certain parliamentary proceedings, which he judged would be for the ſatisfaction of his good ſubjects; but he did not think proper to lay before them any points of general buſineſs, reſerving every thing of that nature to the uſual time of their aſſembling in the winter. On the 5th day of June this ſhort ſeſſion was cloſed, and the parliament prorogued by the lords-commiſſioners.

In the beginning of this year violent diſputes aroſe between the government and the houſe of commons in Ireland, on the almoſt forgotten ſubjects of privilege and prerogative. The commons conceived they had an undoubted right to apply the ſurplus of their revenue towards national purpoſes, without the conſent of their ſovereign; and, accordingly, in the year 1749, prepared a bill with this preamble; 'Whereas on the 25th day of March laſt a conſiderable balance remained in the hands of the vice-treaſurers or receivers-general of the kingdom, or their deputy or deputies, unapplied; and it will be for your majeſty's ſervice, and for the eaſe of your faithful ſubjects in this kingdom, that ſo much thereof as can be conveniently ſpared ſhould be paid, agreeably to your majeſty's moſt gracious intentions, in diſcharge of part of the national debt.' This approbation gave great offence to the advocates for prerogative in England, who affirmed that the commons had no right to apply any part of the unappropriated revenue, nor even to take any ſuch affair into conſideration, without the previous conſent of the crown, expreſſed in the moſt explicit terms. It was in conſequence of this doctrine, that the duke of Dorſet, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, told them in the next ſeſſion of parliament, held in the year 1751, he was commanded by the king to acquaint them that his majeſty, ever attentive to the eaſe and happineſs of his ſubjects, would graciouſly conſent, and recommended it to them, that ſuch a part of the money then remaining in his treaſury, as ſhould be thought conſiſtent with the public ſervice, be applied towards the further reduction of the national debt. This declaration alarmed the commons, zealous as they were for the preſervation of their privileges; and in their addreſs of thanks, which, like that of the parliament of Great-Britain, uſed always to echo bac the words of the ſpeech, they made no mention of his majeſty's conſent; but only acknowledged his gracious attention to their eaſe and happineſs, in recommending to them the application of the ſurplus. They, accordingly, reſolved to apply 120,000l. of that overplus towards a diſcharge of the national debt; and, in the preamble of the bill, framed for this purpoſe, made no mention of his majeſty's conſent, though before they had acknowledged his goodneſs in recommending this application. The miniſtry in England were highly offended at this purpoſed omiſſion, which they conſtured into a wilful encroachment on the prerogative; and the bill was ſent bac with an alteration in the preamble, ſignifying his majeſty's conſent as well as recommendation. The Iriſh houſe of commons being at that time deeply engaged in a minute enquiry into the conduct of a gentleman, a ſervant of the crown, and a member of their own houſe, accuſed of having miſapplied a large ſum of money, with which he had been entruſted, for rebuilding or repairing the barracs, were now unwilling to embroil themſelves farther with the government, until this affair ſhould be diſcuſſed. They, therefore paſſed the bill with the alteration, and proceeded with their enquiry. The perſon was convicted of having miſapplied the pbblic money, and ordered to make the barracs fit for the reception and accommodation of the troops at his own expence. They did not, however, neglect to aſſert what they thought their rights and privileges, when the next opportunity occurred. The duke of Dorſet, when he opened the ſeſſion of this year, repeated the expreſſion of his majeſty's gracious conſent, in mentioning the ſurplus of the public money. They again omitted that word in their addreſs; and reſolved, in their bill of application, not only to ſink this odious term, but likewiſe to abate in their complaiſance to the crown, by leaving out that expreſſion of grateful acknowledgement, which had met with ſuch a cold reception above. By this time the conteſt had kindled up two violent factions, and diffuſed a general ſpirit of reſentment through the whole Iriſh nation. The committee who prepared the bill, inſtead of inſerting the uſual compliments in the preamble, mentioned nothing but a recital of facts, and ſent it over in a very plain dreſs, quite deſtitute of all embroidery. The miniſtry, intent upon vindicating the prerogative from ſuch an unmannerly attac, filled up the omiſſions of the committee, and ſent it bac with this alteration: 'And your majeſty, ever attentive to the eaſe and happineſs of your faithful ſubjects, has been graciouſly pleaſed to ſignify that you would conſent, and to recommend it to us, that ſo much of the money remaining in your majeſty's treaſury as ſhould be neceſſary be applied to the diſcharge of the national debt, or ſuch part thereof as ſhould be thought expedient by parliament.' This, then, being the criſis, which was to determine a conſtitutional point of ſuch importance, namely, whether the people in parliament aſſembled have a right to deliberate upon, and vote the application of any part of the unappropriated revenue, without the previous conſent of the crown; thoſe who were the moſt zealouſly attached to the liberties of their country reſolved to exert themſelves in oppoſing what they conceived to be a violation of thoſe liberties; and the bill, with its alterations, was rejected by a majority of five voices. The ſucceſs of their endeavours was celebrated with the moſt extravagant rejoicings, as a triumph of patriotiſm over the arts of miniſterial corruption: and on the other hand, all the ſervants of the crown who had joined the popular cry on this occaſion were in a little time diſmiſſed from their employments. The rejection of the bill was a great diſappointment to the creditors of the public, and the circulation of caſh was almoſt ſtagnated. Theſe calamities were imputed to arbitrary deſigns in the government; and the people began to be inflamed with an enthuſiaſtic ſpirit of independency, which might have produced miſchievous effects, had not artful ſteps been taken to bring over the demagogues, and thus divert the ſtream of popular clamour from the miniſtry of thoſe very individuals who had been the idols of popular veneration. The ſpeaker of the houſe of commons was promoted to the dignity of an earl; and ſome other patriots were gratified with lucrative employments. His majeſty's letter arrived for paying off 75,500l. of the national debt. The circulation was thus animated, and the reſentment of the populace ſubſiding, the kingdom retrieved its former tranquillity.

The ambition and intrigues of the French court, by which the Britiſh intereſt was invaded and diſturbed on the continent of America, had alſo extended itſelf to the Eaſt-Indies, where they endeavoured to embroil the Engliſh company with divers nabobs, or princes, who governed different parts of the peninſula intra Gangem. That the reader may have a clear and diſtinct idea of theſe tranſactions, we ſhall exhibit a ſhort ſketch of the Engliſh forts and ſettlements in that remote country. The firſt of theſe we ſhall mention is Surat,[1] in the province ſo called, ſituated between the 21ſt and 22d degrees of north latitude: from hence the peninſula ſtretches into the Indian ocean, as far as the latitude of eight north, ending in a point at Cape Comorin, which is the ſouthern extremity. To the northward this peninſula joins to Indoſtan, and at its greateſt breadth extends ſeven hundred miles. Upon the weſt, eaſt, and ſouth, it is waſhed by the ſea. It comprehends the kingdoms of Malabar, Decan, Golconda, and Biſnagar, with the principalities of Gingi, Tanjaour, and Madura. The weſtern ſide is diſtinguiſhed by the name of the Malabar coaſt: the eaſtern takes the denomination of Coromandel; and, in different parts of this long ſweep, from Surat, round Cape Comorin to the bottom of the bay of Bengal, the Engliſh and other Europian powers have, with the conſent of the mogul, eſtabliſhed forts and trading ſettlements. All theſe kingdoms, properly ſpeaking, belong to the mogul: but his power was ſo weakened by the laſt invaſion of Kouli Khan, that he has not been able to aſſert his empire over this remote country; the tributary princes of which, and even the nabobs, who were originally governors appointed under their authority, have rendered themſelves independant, and exert an abſolute dominion over their reſpective territories, without acknowledging his ſuperiority either by tribute or homage. Theſe princes, when they quarrel among themſelves, naturally have recourſe to the aſſiſtance of ſuch European powers as are ſettled in or near their dominions; and in the ſame manner the Eaſt-Indian companies of the European powers which happen to be at war with each other never fail to intereſt the nabobs in the diſpute.

The next Engliſh ſettlement to Surat, on the coaſt of the peninſula, is Bombay, in the kingdom of Decan, a ſmall iſland, with a convenient harbour, about 45 leagues to the ſouth of Surat. The town is very populous: but the ſoil is barren, and the climate unhealthy; and the commerce was rendered very precarious by the neighbourhood of the famous Carſair Angria, until his port of Geriah was taken, and his fortifications demoliſhed. The Engliſh company likewiſe carry on ſome traffic at Dabul, about 40 leagues farther to the ſouth, in the province of Cuncan. In the ſame ſoutherly progreſſion, towards the point of the peninſula, we arrive at Carwar, in the latitude of fifteen degrees, where there is a ſmall fort and factory belonging to the company, ſtanding on the ſouth ſide of a bay, with a river capable of receiving ſhips of pretty large burthen. The climate here is remarkably ſalubrious; the country abounds with proviſions of all ſorts, and the beſt pepper of India grows in this neighbourhood. The next Engliſh ſettlement we find at Tillicherry, where the company has erected a fort, to defend their commerce of pepper and cardamons from the inſults of the Rajah, who governs this part of Malabar. Hither the Engliſh trade was removed from Calicut, a large town, that ſtands 15 leagues to the ſouthward of Tillicherry, and was as well frequented as any port on the coaſt of the Indian peninſula. The moſt ſoutherly ſettlement which the Engliſh poſſeſs on the Malabar coaſt is that of Anjengo, between the eight and ninth degrees of latitude. It is defended by a regular fort, ſituated on a broad river, which falls into the ſea, and would be very commodious for trade, were not the water on the bar too ſhallow to admit ſhips of conſiderable burthen. Then turning the cape, and paſſing through the ſtrait of Chilao, formed by the iſland of Ceylon, we arrive on the coaſt of Coromandel, which forms the eaſtern ſide of the iſthmus. Proſecuting our courſe in a northern direction, the firſt Engliſh factory we reach is that of Fort St. David's, formerly called Tegapatan, ſituated in the latitude of 11 degrees 40 minutes north, within the kingdom of Gingi. It was, about 26 years ago ſold by a Mahratta prince to the Eaſt-India company, and, next to Bombay, is the moſt conſiderable ſettlement we have yet mentioned. Its territory extends about eight miles along the coaſt, and half that ſpace up the country, which is delightfully watered by a variety of rivers; the ſoil is fertile, and the climate healthy. The fort is regular, well provided with cannon, ammunition, and a numerous garriſon, which is the more neceſſary, on account of the neighbourhood of the French ſettlement at Pondichery [m]. But the chief ſettlement belonging to the company on this coaſt is that of Madras, or Fort St. George, ſtanding farther to the northward, between the 13th and 14th degrees of latitude, and not a great way from the diamond mines of Golconda. It is ſeated on a flat, barren, ſcorching ſand, ſo near the ſea, that, in bad weather, the walls are endangered by the mighty ſurges rolled in from the ocean. As the ſoil is barren, the climate is ſo intenſely hot, that it would be altogether uninhabitable, were not the heat mitigated by the ſea-breezes. On the land ſide it is defended by a ſalt-water river, which, while it contributes to the ſecurity of the place, robs the inhabitants of one great comfort, by obſtructing the ſprings of freſh water. The fort is a regular ſquare, the town ſurrounded with walls well mounted with artillery, and the place, including the Black Town, is very populous. Madras, with ſeveral villages in the neighbourhood, was purchaſed of the king of Golconda, before the mogul became ſovereign of this country. The governor of this place is not only preſident of Fort St. George, but alſo of all the other ſettlements on the coaſts of Malabar and Coromandel, as far as the iſland of Sumatra. He lives in great pomp, having inferior judges, who paſs ſentence of death occaſionally on malefactors of any nation, except the ſubjects of Great-Britain. All the company's affairs are directed by him and his council, who are inveſted with the power of inflicting corporal puniſhment, ſhort of life and member, upon ſuch Europeans as are in the ſervice, and diſpoſe of all places of truſt and profit. By virtue of an act paſſed in the courſe of this very ſeſſion, the military officers belonging to the company were permitted to hold courts-martial, and puniſh their ſoldiers according to the degree of their delinquency. In a word, Madras is of the utmoſt importance to the company of its ſtrength, wealth, and the great returns it makes in callicoes and muſlins. Towards the latter end of the laſt century the Engliſh company had a flouriſhing factory at Maſulipatam, ſtanding on the north ſide of the river Nagundi, which ſeparates the provinces of Golconda and Biſnagar, in the latitude of 16 degrees and 30 minutes; but now there is no European ſettlement here, except a Dutch factory, maintained for carrying on the chintz commerce. At Viſigapatam, ſituated ſtill farther to the northward, the Engliſh poſſeſs a factory, regularly fortified, on the ſide of a river, which, however, a dangerous bar has rendered unfit for navigation. The adjacent country affords cotton cloths and the beſt ſtriped muſlins of India. It is chiefly for the uſe of this ſettlement that the company maintains a factory at Ganjam, the moſt eaſtern town in the province or kingdom of Golconda, ſituated in a country abounding with rice and ſugar canes. Still farther to the north coaſt, in the latitude of 22 degrees, the company maintains a factory at Balaſore, which was formerly very conſiderable; but hath been of very little conſequence ſince the navigation of the river Huguely was improved. At this place every European ſhip bound for Bengal and the Ganges takes in a pilot. The climate is not counted very ſalubrious; but the adjacent country is fruitful to admiration, and here are conſiderable manufactures of cotton and ſilk. Without ſkilful pilots, the Engliſh would find it very difficult to navigate the different channels through which the river Ganges diſcharges itſelf into the ſea at the bottom of the bay of Bengal. On the ſouthern branch is a town called Pipely, where there was formerly an Engliſh factory: but this was removed to Huguely, 160 miles farther up the river; a place which, together with the company's ſettlements at Calcutta, were the emporiums of their commerce for the whole kingdom of Bengal. Indeed Huguely is now abandoned by the Engliſh, and their whole trade centres at Calcutta or Fort William, which is a regular fortification, containing lodgings for the factors and writers, ſtore-houſes for the company's merchandize, and magazines for their ammunition. As for the governor's houſe, which likewiſe ſtands within the fort, it is one of the moſt regular ſtructures in all India. Beſides theſe ſettlements along the ſea-coaſt of the peninſula, and on the banks of the Ganges, the Engliſh Eaſt-India company poſſeſs certain inland factories and poſts for the convenience and defence of their commerce, either purchaſed of the nabobs and rajahs, or conquered in the courſe of the war. As the operations we propoſe to record were confined to the coaſts of Malabar and Coromandel, or the interior countries which form the peninſula intra Gangem, it will be unneceſſary to deſcribe the factory at Bencoolen, on the iſland of Sumatra, or any ſettlement which the Engliſh poſſeſs in other parts of the Eaſt-Indies.

[1] Several European nations had ſettlements at Surat, which was one of the moſt frequented cities of the Eaſt, from the great concourſe of Mahometan pilgrims, who make it their road from India, in their viſits to the tomb of their prophet at Mecca. In order to keep the ſeas clear of pirates between Surat and the gulf of Arabia and Perſia, the mogul had been at the annual expence of a large ſhip fitted out on purpoſe to carry the pilgrims to Judda, which is within a ſmall diſtance of Mecca. For the ſecurity of this ſhip, as well as to protect the trade of Surat, he granted to his admiral, the ſiddee chief of a colony of caffrees, or blacks, a revenue called the Tanka, to the value of three lacks of rupees, amounting to above thirty-ſeven thouſand pounds, ariſing partly from the adjacent lands, and partly from the revenues of Surat, which were paid him yearly by the governor of the caſtle, who is appointed by the mogul to keep the city under proper ſubjection, without, however, interfering with the government of it.

In order to underſtand the military tranſactions of the Engliſh company in India, the reader will take notice, that immediately after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, monſieur Dupleix, who commanded for the French in that country, began by his intrigues to ſow the ſeeds of diſſenſion among the nabobs, that he might be the better able to fiſh in troubled waters. Nizam Almuluck, the mogul's viceroy of Decan, having the right of nominating a governor of the Carnatic, now more generally known by the name of the nabob of Arcot, appointed Anaverdy Khan to that office, in the year 1745. The viceroy dying was ſucceeded in his viceroyalty or ſubaſhip, by his ſecond ſon. Nazirzing, whom the mogul confirmed. He was oppoſed in his pretenſions by his own couſin Muzapherzing, who had recourſe to the aſſiſtance of M. Dupleix, and obtained from him a re-enforcement of Europeans and artillery, in conſideration of many preſents and promiſes, which he fulfilled in the ſequel. Thus re-enforced, and joined by one Chund Saib, an active Indian chief, he took the field againſt his kinſman Nazirzing, who was ſupported by a body of Engliſh troops under colonel Laurence. The French, dreading an engagement, retired in the night; and Muzapherzing, ſeeing himſelf abandoned by all his own troops, appealed to the clemency of his couſin, who ſpared his life, but detained him as a ſtate priſoner. In this ſituation, he formed a conſpiracy againſt his kinſman's life, with Nazirzing's prime miniſter, and the nabobs of Cadupah and Condaneor, then in his camp; and the conſpirators were encouraged in their ſcheme by Dupleix and Chunda Saib, who had retired to Pondicherry. Thus ſtimulated, they murdered Nazirzing in his camp, and proclaimed Muzapherzing viceroy of Decan. In the tents of the murdered viceroy they found an immenſe treaſure, of which great ſhare fell to M. Dupleix, whom Muzapherzing the uſurper at this time aſſociated in the government. By virtue of this aſſociation the Frenchman aſſumed the ſtate and formalities of an eaſtern prince; and he and his colleague Muzapherzing appointed Chunda Saib nabob of Arcot, Anaverdy Khan, the late nabob, had been in the year 1749, defeated and ſlain by Muzapherzing and Chunda Saib, with the aſſiſtance of the French auxiliaries; and his ſon Mahomed Ali Khan had put himſelf under the protection of the Engliſh at Madras, and was confirmed by Nazarzing, as his father's ſucceſſor in the nabobſhip, or government of Arcot. This government, therefore, was diſputed betwen Mahommed Ali Khan, appointed by the legal viceroy Nazirzing, ſupported by the Engliſh company, and Chunda Saib, nominated by the uſurper Muzapherzing, and protected by Dupleix, who commanded at Pondicherry. Muzapherzing did not long ſurvive his uſurpation. In the year 1751, the ſame nabobs who had promoted him to his kinſman's place, thinking themſelves ill rewarded for their ſervices, fell upon him ſuddenly, routed his troops, and put him to death; and the next day the chiefs of the army proclaimed Sallabatzing, brother to Nazirzing, viceroy of Decan: on the other hand, the mogul appointed Gauzedy Khan, who was the elder brother of Sallabatzing: and this prince confirmed Mahommed Ali Khan in the government of Arcot: but the affairs of the mogul's court were then in ſuch confuſion, that he could not ſpare an army to ſupport the nomination he had made. Chunda Saib, nabob of Arcot, having been depoſed by the great mogul, who placed Anaverdy Khan in his room, he reſolved to recover his government by force, and had recourſe to the French general at Pondicherry, who re-enforced him with 2000 ſepoys, or ſoldiers of the country, 60 caffrees, and 420 French troops, on condition that, if he proved ſucceſsful in his enterpriſe, he ſhould cede to the French the town of Velur, in the neighbourhood of Pondicherry, with its dependencies, conſiſting of 45 villages. Thus re-enforced, he defeated his rival Anaverdy Khan, who loſt his life in the engagement, re-aſſumed the government of Arcot, and punctually performed the conditions which had been ſtipulated by his French allies.

Mahommed Ali Khan, at the death of his father, had fled to Tiruchirapalli,[n] and ſollicited the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, who favoured him with a re-enforcement of money, men, and ammunition, under the conduct of major Laurence, a brave and experienced officer. By dint of this ſupply, he gained ſome advantages over the enemy, who were obliged to retreat; but no deciſive blow was given. Mahommed afterwards repaired in perſon to Fort St. David's, to demand more powerful ſuccours, alledging that his fate was connected with the intereſt of the Engliſh company, which in time would be obliged to abandon the whole coaſt, ſhould they allow the enemy to proceed in their conqueſts. In conſequence of theſe repreſentations, he received another ſtrong re-enforcement, under the command of captain Cope; but nothing of importance was attempted, and the Engliſh auxiliaries retired. Then Mahommed was attacked by the enemy, who obtained a complete victory over him. Finding it impoſſible to maintain his footing by his own ſtrength, he entered into a cloſe alliance with the Engliſh, and ceded to them ſome commercial points, which had been long in diſpute. Then they detached captain Cope to put Tiruchirapalli in a poſture of defence; while captain de Gingins, a Swiſs officer, marched at the head of 400 Europeans to the nabob's aſſiſtance. The two armies being pretty equal in ſtrength, lay encamped in ſight of each other a whole month; during which nothing happened but a few ſkirmiſhes, which generally terminated to the advantage of the Engliſh auxiliaries. In order to make a diverſion, and divide the French forces, the company reſolved to ſend a detachment into the province of Arcot; and this was one of the firſt occaſions upon which the extraordinary talents of mr. Clive were diſplayed. He had entered into the ſervice of the Eaſt-India company as a writer, and was conſidered as a perſon very indifferently qualified for ſucceeding in any civil ſtation of life. He now offered his ſervice in a military capacity, and actually began his march to Arcot, at the head of 210 Europeans, with 500 ſepoys.[o]

Such was the reſolution, ſecreſy and diſpatch with which he conducted this enterpriſe, that the enemy knew nothing of his motions until he was in poſſeſſion of the capital, which he took without oppoſition. The inhabitants, expecting to be plundered, offered him a large ſum to ſpare their city; but they derived their ſecurity from the generoſity and diſcretion of the conqueror. He refuſed the proffered ranſom, and iſſued a proclamation, intimating, That thoſe who were willing to remain in their houſes ſhould be protected from inſult and injury, and the reſt have leave to retire with all their effects, except proviſions, for which he promiſed to pay the full value. By this ſage conduct he conciliated the affections of the people ſo entirely, that even thoſe who quitted the place ſupplied him with exact intelligence of the enemy's deſigns, when he was beſieged in the ſequel. The town was in a little time inveſted by Raja Saib, ſon of Chunda Saib, at the head of a numerous army, and the operations of the ſiege were conducted by European engineers. Though their approaches were retarded by the repeated and reſolute ſallies of mr. Clive, they at length effected two breaches, ſuppoſed to be practicable; and on the 14th day of October, in the year 1751, gave a general aſſault. Mr Clive, having received intimation of their deſign, had made ſuch preparations for their reception, that they were repulſed in every quarter with great loſs, and obliged to raiſe the ſiege with the utmoſt precipitation.

This gallant Engliſhman, not content with the reputation he had acquired from his noble defence, was no ſooner re-enforced by a detachment under captain Kirkpatrick from Trichinopoly, than he marched in purſuit of the enemy, whom he overtook in the plains of Arani. There, on the 3d day of December, he attacked them with irreſiſtible impetuoſity; and after an obſtinate diſpute, obtained a complete victory at a very ſmall expence. The forts of Timery, Caujeveram, and Aranie, ſurrendered to the terrour of his name, rather than to the force of his arms; and he returned to the Fort of St. David's in triumph. He had enjoyed a very few weeks of repoſe, when he was ſummoned to the field by freſh incurſions of the enemy. In the beginning of the year 1752, he marched with a ſmall detachment to Madras, where he was joined by a re-enforcement from Bengal, the whole number not exceeding 300 Europeans, and aſſembled a body of the natives, that he might have at leaſt the appearance of an army. With theſe he proceeded to Koveripauk, about 15 miles from Arcot, where he found the French and Indians, conſiſting of 1500 ſepoys, 1700 horſe, a body of natives, and 150 Europeans, with eight pieces of cannon. Though they were advantageouſly poſted and entrenched, and the day was already far advanced, mr. Clive advanced againſt them with his uſual intrepidity; but the victory remained for ſome time in ſuſpenſe. It was now dark, and the battle doubtful, when mr. Clive ſent round a detachment to fall on the rear of the French battery. This attac was executed with great reſolution, while the Engliſh in front entered the entrenchments with their bayonets fixed; and though very little tinctured with diſcipline, diſplayed the ſpirit and activity of hardy veterans. This double attac diſconcerted the enemy in ſuch a manner, that they ſoon deſiſted from all oppoſition. A conſiderable carnage enſued; yet the greater part of the enemy, both horſe and foot, ſaved themſelves by flight, under cover of the darkneſs. The French, to a man, threw down their arms, and ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war; and all the cannon and baggage fell into the hands of the victor.

The province of Arcot being thus cleared of the enemy, mr. Clive, with his forces, returned to Fort St. David's, where he found major Laurence juſt arrived from England,[p] to take upon him the command of the troops in the company's ſervice. On the 18th day of March this officer, accompanied by mr. Clive, took the field, and was joined by captain de Gingins at Tiruchirapalli. From hence he detached mr. Clive, with 400 European ſoldiers, a few Mahratta horſe, and a body of ſepoys, to cut off the enemy's retreat to Pondicherry. In the courſe of this expedition he diſlodged a ſtrong body of the foe poſted at Samiaveram, and obliged Chunda Saib to through a body of troops into a ſtrong fortified temple, or pagoda, upon the river Koleroon, which was immediately inveſted. The commanding officer, in attempting to eſcape, was ſlain with ſome others, and the reſt ſurrendered at diſcretion. They were ſtill in poſſeſſion of another fortified temple, hich he alſo beſieged in form, and reduced by capitulation. Having ſubdued theſe forts, he marched directly to Volconda, whither he underſtood the French commander D'Anteuil had retired. He found that officer entrenched in a village, from whence he drove him with precipitation, and made himſelf maſter of the French cannon. The enemy attempted to ſave themſelves in a neighbouring fort; but the gates being ſhut againſt them by the governor, who was apprehenſive that they would be followed pell-mell by the Engliſh, mr. Clive attacked them with great fury, and made a conſiderable ſlaughter: but his humanity being ſhocked at this carnage, he ſent a flag of truce to the vanquiſhed, with terms of capitulation, which they readily embraced. Theſe articles imported, That D'Anteuil, and three other officers, ſhould remain priſoners on parole for one year: that the garriſon ſhould be exchanged, and the money and ſtores be delivered to the nabob whom the Engliſh ſupported.

[n] Tiruchirapalli, commonly called Trichinopoly, ſituated near the river Cauveri, above 200 miles to the ſouthward of Madras, is the capital of a ſmall kingdom belonging to the government of Arcot, and bounded on the eaſt by the kingdom of Tanjore.

[o] The ſepoys are the mercenaries of the country, who are hired as ſoldiers occaſionally by all parties.

[p] Major Laurence had ſailed for England in the year 1750.

During theſe tranſactions Chunda Saib lay encamped with an army of 30,000 men at Syrinham, an iſland in the neighbourhood of Tiruchirapalli, which he longed eagerly to poſſeſs. Hither major Laurence marched with his Indian allies,[q] and took his meaſures ſo well, that the enemy's proviſions were entirely intercepted. Chunda Saib, in attempting to fly, was taken priſoner by the nabob of Tanjore, an ally of the Engliſh company, who ordered his head to be ſtruc off, in order to prevent the diſputes which otherwiſe would have ariſen among the captors.[r] The main body of the army being attacked by major Laurence, and totally defeated, the iſland of Syrinham was ſurrendered, and about 1000 European French ſoldiers, under the command of mr. Law, nephew to the famous Law who ſchemed the Miſſiſſippi company, fell into the hands of the conquerors, including 30 officers with 40 pieces of cannon, and 10 mortars. M. Dupleix, though exceedingly mortified by this diſaſter, reſolved to maintain the cauſe which he had eſpouſed. He proclaimed Raja Saib, the ſon of Chund Saib, nabob of Arcot; and afterwards pretended that he himſelf had received from the mogul ſanids or commiſſions, appointing him governor of all the Carnatick, from the river Kriſtnah to the ſea: but theſe ſanids appeared in the ſequel to be forged. In order to complete the comedy, a ſuppoſed meſſenger from Delhi was received at Pondicherry as embaſſador from the mogul. Dupleix, mounted on an elephant, preceded by muſic and dancing women, in the oriental manner, received in public his commiſſion from the hands of the pretender embaſſador. He affected the eaſtern ſtate, kept his darbar or court, where he appeared ſitting croſs-legged on a ſopha, and received preſents as prince of the country from his own council, as well as from the natives. In the mean time, hoſtilities continued between the forces of the two companies, as auxiliaries to the contending nabobs. The Engliſh, under major Kinnier, made an unſucceſsful attempt upon Gingee, a ſtrong town ſituated to the weſt of Pondicherry. Major Laurence defeated a ſtrong body of French and natives, commanded by Dupleix's nephew, M. de Derjean, in the neighbourhood of Pondicherry, and took him priſoner, together with 15 officers: after this ſucceſs, mr. Clive reduced the forts of Covelong and Chengalput, the laſt very ſtrong, ſituated about 40 miles to the ſouthward of Madras. On the other hand, M. Dupleix intercepted at ſea captain Schaub, with his whole Swiſs company, whom he detained priſoners at Pondicherry, although the two nations were not at war with each other. During theſe tranſactions Sallabatzing, with a body of French under M. de Buſſy, advanced towards Aurengabad, which was the ſeat of government; but he was oppoſed by a chief of the Mahrattas, at the head of a numerous army. In the mean time, Gawzedy Khan, the elder brother of Sallabatzing, whom the mogul had appointed viceroy of Decan, took poſſeſſion of his government at Aurengabad, where in 14 days after his arrival, he was poiſoned by his own ſiſter. The mogul immediately appointed his ſon Schah Abadin Khan to ſucceed his father; and this prince actually raiſed an army to come to take poſſeſſion: but the mogul's affairs requiring his preſence at Delhi, he was obliged to poſtpone his deſign, ſo that Sallabatzing was left without a competitor, and made a preſent to the French of all the Engliſh ſettlements to the northward. Thus concluded the year 1752. Next campaign was chiefly confined to the neighbourhood of Trichinopoly, where major Laurence made ſeveral vigorous attacs upon the enemy's army, and obtained many advantages, which, however, did not prove deciſive, becauſe he was ſo much out-numbered that he could never follow his blow.

In the courſe of this year, the mogul was depoſed by his general Schah Abadin Khan, the viceroy of Decan, who raiſed to the throne Allum Geer, another prince of the blood. In the ſucceeding year, a negotiation was ſet on foot by mr. Saunders, governor of Madras, and M. Dupleix, and conferences were opened at Sadraſs, a Dutch ſettlement between Pondicherry and Fort St. George; but this proved abortive; and many other gallant efforts were made by major Laurence in the territory of Trichinopoly, which ſtill continued to be the ſcene of action. In the courſe of this year admiral Watſon arrived on the coaſt of Coromandel with a ſquadron of ſhips of war, having on board a regiment commanded by colonel Aldercroon: at the ſame time the ſhips from France brought over to Pondicherry the Sieur Godeheu, commiſſary-general and governor-general of all their ſettlements, at whoſe arrival Dupliex departed for Europe. The new governor immediately wrote a letter to mr. Saunders, profeſſing the moſt pacific inclinations, and propoſing a ſuſpenſion of arms between the two companies, until their diſputes could be amicably adjuſted. This propoſal was very agreeable to the governor and council at Madras, and a ceſſation of arms actually took place in the month of October, in the year 1754. Deputies being ſent to Pondicherry, a proviſional treaty and truce were concluded, on condition that neither of the two companies ſhould for the future interfere in any difference that might riſe between the princes of the country. The other articles related to the places and ſettlements that ſhould be retained or poſſeſſed by the reſpective companies, until freſh orders relating to this agreement ſhould arrive from the courts of London and Verſailles, tranſmitted by the two Eaſt-India company of France and England. Until ſuch orders ſhould arrive, it was ſtipulated that either nation ſhould be allowed to procure any new grant or ceſſion, or to build forts for the defence of new eſtabliſhments; and that they ſhould not proceed to any ceſſion, retroceſſion, or evacuation of what they then poſſeſſed; but every thing ſhould remain on the footing of ulti poſſidetis. How pacific ſoever the ſentiments of the French ſubjects might have been at this period in the Eaſt-Indies, certain it is, the deſigns of the French governors in America were altogether hoſtile, and their conduct haſtening towards a rupture, which kindled up a bloody war in every diviſion of the globe.

As this war may be termed a native of America, and the principal ſcenes of it were acted on that continent, we ſhall, for the information of the reader, ſketch out the ſituation of the then Britiſh colonies as they bordered on each other, and extended along the ſea-coaſt, from the gulf of St. Laurence as far ſouth as the country of Florida. We ſhall enumerate the Indian nations that lie ſcattered about their confines, and delienate the manner in which the French hemmed them in by a ſurpriſing line of fortifications. Should we comprehend Hudſon's-Bay, with the adjacent countries, and the banks of Newfoundland, in this geographical detail, we might affirm that Great-Britain at that time poſſeſſed a territory along the ſea-coaſt, extending 1700 miles in a direct line, from the 60th to the 31ſt degree of northern latitude: but as theſe two countries were not concerned in this diſpute, we ſhall advance from the northward to the ſouthern ſide of the gulf of St. Laurence; and beginning with Acadia or Novia-Scotia, deſcribe our ſettlements, as they lie in a ſoutherly direction, as far as the gulf of Florida. This great tract of country, ſtretching 15 degrees of latitude, is waſhed on the eaſt by the Atlantic ocean: the ſouthern boundary is Spaniſh Florida; but to the weſtward the limits are uncertain, ſome affirming that the juriſdiction of the colonies penetrates through the whole continent, as far as the ſouth-ſea; while others, with more moderation, think they are naturally bounded by the river Illionois that runs into the Miſſiſſippi, and in a manner connects that river with the chain of lakes known by the names of Michigan, Huron, Erie, and Ontario, the three firſt communicating with each other, and the laſt diſcharging itſelf into the river St. Laurence, which running by Montreal and Quebec iſſues into the bay of the ſame denomination, forming the northern boundary of Nova-Scotia. The French, who had no legal claim to any lands on the ſouth ſide of this river, nevertheleſs, with an inſolence of ambition peculiar to themſelves, not only extended their forts from the ſource of the St. Laurence, through an immenſe tract of that country, as far as the Miſſiſſippi, which diſembogues itſelf into the gulf of Florida; but alſo, by a ſeries of unparalleled encroachments, endeavouring to contract the Engliſh colonies within ſuch narrow limits as would have cut off almoſt one-half of their poſſeſſions. As we have already given a geographical deſcription of Nova-Scotia, and mentioned the particulars of the new ſettlement of Halifax, we ſhall now only obſerve, that it is ſurrounded on three ſides by the ſea, the gulf, and river of St. Laurence; that its original boundary to the weſt was the river Pentagoet; but it is now contracted within the river St. Croix, becauſe the crown of Great-Britain did, in the year 1663, grant to the duke of York, the territory of Sagadahack, ſtretching from St. Croix, to the river of this name; which was in the ſequel, by an expreſs charter from the crown, annexed to the province of Maſſachuſett's-Bay, one of the four governments of New-England. This country, ſituated next to Nova-Scotia, lies between the 41ſt and 45th degrees of north latitude, extending near 300 miles in length, and about 200 in breadth, if we bound it by thoſe tracts which the French poſſeſſed; no part of the ſettlements of this country, however, ſtretches above 60 miles from the ſea. The ſummer is here intenſely hot, and the winter proportionably ſevere: nevertheleſs, the climate is healthy, and the ſky generally ſerene. The ſoil is not favourable to any of the European kinds of grain; but produces great plenty of maiz, which the people bake into bread, and brew into beer, though their favourite drink is made of melaſſes hopped, and impregnated with the tops of the ſpruce-fir, which is a native of this country. The ground raiſes good flax and tolerable hemp. Here are great herds of blac cattle, ſome of them very large in ſize, a vaſt number of excellent hogs, a breed of ſmall horſes, graceful, ſwift, and hardy; and large flocs of ſheep, whoſe wool, though not ſo fine as that of England, is manufactured with great ſucceſs.

[q] His army conſiſted of 1200 Europeans and Topaſſes in battalions, 2000 ſepoys; with the forces of the nabob, the kings of Tanjore, Muiſſack, and Mahrattas; amounted to 1500 horſe, and 10,000 infantry. Topaſſes are deſcendants from the Portugueſe. The Mahrattas are native Indians of a very numerous and powerful nation, which hath more than once given law to the mogul.

[r] Chunda Saib demanded leave of the Tanjore general to paſs through his camp to Tanjore, and this requeſt was granted; but, inſtead of being allowed to paſs, he was detained priſoner, and as the allies could not agree about the manner in which he ſhould be diſpoſed of, ſome of the Tanjore officers, of their own accord, ended the diſpute, by cutting off his head.

New-England is compoſed of the four provinces known by the names of New-Hampſhire, Maſſachuſett's-Bay, Rhode-Iſland, and Connecticut. It is bounded on the ſouth by New-York, extending northerly on both ſides of the river Hudſon, about 200 miles into the country poſſeſſed by the Indians of the Five-Nations, whom the French diſtinguiſh by the name of the Irroquois; but in breadth this province does not exceed 50 miles, though it comprehends Long-Iſland, lying to the ſouthward of Connecticut. The capital, which derives from the province the name of New-York, is ſituated on an excellent harbour in the iſland of Manahatton, extending 14 miles in length, and 5 in breadth, at the mouth of the noble river Hudſon, which is navigable for above 200 miles. At the diſtance of 150 miles from New-York ſtands the town of Albany, upon the ſame river. In this place all the treaties and other tranſactions are negotiated between the Engliſh and Irroquois, a confederacy of five Indian nations, who, by their union, courage, and military ſkill, had reduced a great number of other Indian tribes, and ſubdued a territory more extenſive than the whole kingdom of France. They were about fourſcore years ago able to bring 10,000 warriors into the field; but now their number is ſo greatly diminiſhed by wars, epidemical diſeaſes, and the uſe of ſpirituous liquors, that they cannot raiſe above 1500 men, even though they have admitted into their confederacy the nation of the Tuſcaroras, whom the Engliſh drove from the confines of Carolina. The Mohok Indians inhabit the country advanced from Albany. The northern extremities of New-Hampſhire and New-York are divided by the lakes Champlain and Sacrament, between which the French had raiſed the fort of Crown-Point.

Contiguous to New-York, and lying along the coaſt, in a ſoutherly direction, is the ſmall province of New-Jerſey, bounded on the weſt by the river Delaware, which divides it from Pennſylvania, extending about 150 miles in length but in breadth not more than one-third of that extent. The climate, ſoil, and produce of theſe two provinces, as well as of Pennſylvania, are ſimilar. They yield great quantities of grain, ſheep, horſes, hogs, and horned cattle; all kind of poultry and game in great abundance; vegetables of every ſort in perfection, and excellent fruit, particularly peaches and melons. Their vaſt foreſt abound with oak, aſh, beech, cheſnut, cedar, walnut-tree, cypreſs, hickery, ſaſſafras, and pine; but the timber is not counted ſo fit for ſhipping as that of New-England and Nova-Scotia. Theſe provinces produce great quantities of flax and hemp. New-York affords mines of iron, and very rich copper ore is found in New-Jerſey.

Pennſylvania, lying to the ſouthward of New-York and New-Jerſey, is bounded on the other ſide by Maryland, ſtretching 250 miles in length, 200 in breadth, and having no communication with the ſea, except by the mouth of the river Delaware. This province was originally ſettled by quakers, under the auſpices of the celebrated William Penn, whoſe deſcendents are ſtill proprietors of the country. Philadelphia, the capital iſland, ſtands on a tongue of land, at the confluence of the two navigable rivers, the Deleware and the Schulkel, diſpoſed in the form of a regular oblong, and deſigned by the original plan to extend from the one to the other. The ſtreets, which are broad, ſpacious and uniform, croſs each other at right angles, leaving proper ſpaces for churches, markets, and other public edifices. The houſes are neatly built of bric, the quays ſpacious and magnificent, the warehouſes large and numerous, and the docs commodious and well contrived for ſhip-building. Pennſylvania is underſtood to extend as far northerly as the banks of the lake Erie, where the French erected a fort. They alſo raiſed another at ſome diſtance to the ſouthward of the Reviere-au-Beuf, and made other encroachments on this colony.

Adjoining to part of Pennſylvania, on the ſea coaſt, lies the province of Maryland, a tract of land ſituated along the bay of Cheſapeak, in length about 140 miles, and nearly of the ſame breadth, bounded on the north by Pennſylvania, on the eaſt by the Atlantic ocean, and by the river Potowmack on the ſouth. This country was firſt planted with Roman catholics by lord Baltimore, to whom Charles II. granted it by patent. In the ſequel, however, people of all religions were admitted into this ſettlement, and indulged with liberty of conſcience, and at preſent the reigning religion is that of the Engliſh church. The climate is very ſultry in ſummer, and not very ſalubrious. The ſoil is fruitful, and produces a great quantity of tobacco, which the people cultivate as their ſtaple commodity. The ſeat of government is eſtabliſhed at Annapolis, a ſmall town beautifully ſituated on the river Patuxent.

Tracing the ſea-coaſt ſtill ſoutherly, the next ſettlement is Virginia, watered on the north by the river Potowmack, which is the boundary between this and the colony laſt deſcribed, having the bay of Cheſapeak to the eaſt, bounded on the ſouth by Carolina, and extending weſtward without any preſcribed limits, though the plantations have reached no farther than the great Allegany mountains; ſo that the province, as now poſſeſſed, ſtretches in length about 240 miles, and in breadth not above 200, lying between 55th and 40th degrees of latitude. In ſailing to Virginia, navigators ſteer through a ſtrait formed by two points, called the Capes, into the bay of Cheſapeak, a large inlet that runs 300 miles into the country, from ſouth to north, covered from the Atlantick ocean, by the eaſtern ſide of Maryland, and a ſmall portion of Virginia on the ſame peninſula. This noble bay is about 18 miles broad for a conſiderable ſpace, and 7 at its narroweſt part, yielding generally 9 fathoms depth of water; on both ſides it receives many navigable rivers, thoſe on the Virginia ſide being known by the names of James-river, York-river, the Rappahannock, and Potowmack. This country, eſpecially towards the ſea, lies very low and ſwampy, and the ſoil is extremely fertile. The air and weather are variable, the heats of ſummar exceſſive, the froſts of winter ſudden, and intenſely cold; ſo that upon the whole, the climate is neither very agreeable nor healthy, the people being particularly ſubject to agues and pleuretic diſorders. The province abounds with vaſt foreſts of timber; the plains are covered with a ſurpriſing luxuriancy of vegetables, flowers, and flowering ſhrubs, diffuſing the moſt delicious fragrance. The ground yields plenty of corn, and every ſort of fruit in great abundance and perfection. Horned cattle and hogs have here multiplied to admiration ſince they were firſt imported from Europe. The animals, natives of this and the neighbouring countries, are deer, panthers or tygers, bears, wolves, foxes, ſquirrels, racoons, and creatures called opoſſums, with an infinite variety of beautiful birds, and a diverſity of ſerpents, among which the rattle-ſnake is the moſt remarkable.

Virginia is bounded to the ſouth by the two Carolinas, ſituated between the 46th and 31ſt degrees of latitude; the length amounting to upwards of 400 miles, and the breadth extending near 300, as far as the Indian nations called the Catawbas, the Creeks, and Cherokees. The country of Carolina is divided into two governments, of which the moſt northern is the moſt inconſiderable. The climate in both is the ſame, as well as the ſoil: the firſt is warm, though not unhealthy; the laſt extremely fertile, yielding every thing in plenty which is produced in Virginia, beſides abundance of excellent oranges, and ſome commodities which are not found to the northward. North-Carolina, though not ſo opulent, is more populous than the ſouthern part. The coloniſts of North-Carolina carry on a conſiderable traffic in tar, pitch, turpentine, ſtaves, ſhingles, lumber, corn, peas, pork, and beef, tobacco, deer-ſkins, indigo, wheat, rice, bees-wax, tallow, bacon, and hog's lard, cotton and ſquared timber, live cattle, with the ſkins of beaver, racoon, fox, minx, wild cat, and otter. South-Carolina is much better cultivated; the people are more civiliſed, and the commerce more important. The capital of this province, called Charles-Town, is finely ſituated at the confluence of two navigable rivers, having the advantage of a commodious harbour. Their trade, excluſive of the articles we have already mentioned as common to this government and that of North-Carolina, conſiſts of two chief ſtaple commodities, rice and indigo, which they cultivate with great ſucceſs; and they have likewiſe made come progreſs in the culture of ſilk.

The moſt ſouthern of all our ſettlements on this coaſt is Georgia, extending about 60 miles from north to ſouth, along the ſea-ſhore; but widening in the inland parts to above 150, and ſtretching almoſt 300 from the ſea to the Apalachian mountains. This country differs very little from that of South-Carolina, with which it borders; yet the ſummer is here more hot, and the ſoil not ſo fertile. Savannah, the capital, ſtands commodiouſly for trade, about 10 miles from the ſea, on a river of the ſame name, navigable with large boats 200 miles farther up to the ſecond town, called Auguſta, a place that flouriſhes by the Indian trade of ſkins, which the inhabitants carry on with their neighbours the Creeks, the Chickeſaws, and the Cherokees, who are the moſt numerous and powerful tribes in America. Georgia is bounded on the ſouth by the river Attamaha, at no great diſtance from the Spaniſh fort of St. Auguſtin.

Having thus exhibited a ſuccinct view of the Britiſh colonies in North-America, for the information of the reader, we ſhall now reſume the thread of our hiſtory, and particulariſe the tranſactions by which the preſent year was diſtinguiſhed on this extenſive continent. The government of England having received nothing but evaſive anſwers from the court of France, touching the complaints that were made of the encroachments in America, diſpached orders to all the governors of that country to repel force by force, and drive the French from their ſettlements on the river Ohia. Accordingly, the provinces of Virginia and Pennſylvania took this important affair into their conſideration; but while they deliberated, the French vigorouſly proſecuted their deſigns on the other ſide of the mountains. They ſurprized Logs-town, which the Virginians had built upon the Ohio; made themſelves maſters of the Block-houſe and Truck-houſe, where they found ſkins and other commodities to the amount of 20,000l. and deſtroyed all the Britiſh traders, except two who found means to eſcape. At the ſame time, M. de Contrecœur, with 1000 men and 18 pieces of cannon, arrived in 300 canoes from Vanengo, a fort they had raiſed on the banks of the Ohio, and reduced by ſurprize a Britiſh fort which the Virginians had built on the forks of the Monangahela, that runs into the ſame river.

Theſe hoſtilities were followed by divers ſkirmaſhes between the people of the two nations, which were fought with various ſucceſs. At length the governors of the Engliſh ſettlements received orders from England to form a political confederacy, for their mutual defence: and the governor of New-York was directed to confer with the chiefs of the Six Nations, with a view to detach them from the French intereſt by dint of promiſes and preſents of value, ſent over for that purpoſe. A congreſs was accordingly appointed at Albany, to which place the governor of New-York repaired, accompanied by commiſſioners from all the other Britiſh ſettlements: but a very ſmall number of Indians arrived, and even theſe ſeemed to be indifferent to the advances and exhortations that were made by the Engliſh orator. The truth is, the French had artfully weaned them from their attachment to the ſubjects of Great-Britain. Nevertheleſs, they accepted the preſents, renewed their treaties with the king of England, and even demanded his aſſiſtance in driving the French from the poſts and poſſeſſions they had uſurped within the Indian territories. It was in conſequence of the meaſures here taken, that colonel Waſhington was detached from Virginia with 400 men, and occupied a poſt on the banks of the river Ohio, where he threw up ſome works, and erected a kind of occaſional fort, in hopes of being able to defend himſelf in that ſituation, until he ſhould be joined by a re-enforcement from New-York, which, however, did not arrive.

While he remained in this ſituation, De Viller, a French commander, at the head of 900 men, being on his march to diſlodge Waſhington, detached one Jamonville, an inferior officer, with a ſmall party, and a formal ſummons to colonel Waſhington, requiring him to quit the fort, which he pretended was built on ground belonging to the French, or their allies. So little regard was paid to this intimation, that the Engliſh fell upon this party, and, as the French affirm, without the leaſt provocation, either ſlew or took the whole detachment. De Viller, incenſed at theſe unprovoked hoſtilities, marched up to the attac, which Waſhington for ſome time ſuſtained under manifold diſadvantages. At length, however, he ſurrendered the fort upon capitulation, for the performance of which he left two officers as hoſtages in the hands of the French; and in his retreat was terribly harraſſed by the Indians, who plundered his baggage, and maſſacred his people. This event was no ſooner known in England, than the Britiſh embaſſador at Paris received directions to complain of it to the French miniſtry, as an open violation of the peace; but this repreſentation had no effect.

Both nations by this time foreſaw that a rupture would be inevitable, and each reſolved to make ſuitable preparations. France continued to ſend re-enforcements of men, and ſupplies of ammunition to Quebec, for the proſecution of her ambitious projects; and the miniſtry of Great-Britain tranſmitted ſalutary cautions to the governors of the provinces in North-America, exhorting them to join their endeavours for repelling the incurſions of the enemy. Such an union as ſeemed neceſſary for their common preſervation was not eaſily effected. The different colonies were divided by different views and intereſts, both religious and political: beſides, every ſettlement was diſtracted into factions, formed by the governor and the demagogues of the aſſembly: in other words, an oppoſition like that in parliament, and a continual ſtruggle between the liberties of the people and the prerogative of the proprietor, whether ſovereign or ſubject. Mr Dinwiddie, governor of Virginia, having demanded a certain perquiſite or fee for every patent he ſhould paſs for land, the aſſembly voted his demand illegal, arbitrary, and oppreſſive. They declared that every man who paid it ſhould be deemed an enemy to his country, and ſent over an agent to London, to ſollicit the ſuppreſſion of this impoſition. The repreſentatives of the people in Pennſylvania waſted the time in vain deliberations and violent diſputes with their proprietors, while the enemy infeſted their frontiers. The colony of New-York was filled with diſcontent and animoſity. Sir Danvers Oſborne, who had been appointed governor of this province, died immediately after his arrival at New-York, and the inſtructions he had received were expoſed to public cenſure. The preamble inveighed ſeverely againſt the want of duty, allegiance, loyalty, and unanimity which had lately appeared ſo notorious in the aſſembly of that province, who had violated the royal commiſſion and inſtructions, by aſſuming to themſelves the power to diſpoſe of public money in the laws which they had occaſionally paſſed. This gentleman was, therefore, directed to inſiſt upon the reformation of all thoſe public abuſes, and upon the eſtabliſhment of a certain ſupply for the ſervice of the government, as well as upon the ſettlement of a ſalary for himſelf. Moreover, his majeſty, in theſe inſtructions, ſignified his will and pleaſure, That all money raiſed for the ſupply and ſupport of government, or upon any emergency for immediate ſervice, ſhould be diſpoſed of and applied properly to the uſe for which it might be granted, by warrant from the governor, by and with the advice and conſent of the council of the province, and no otherwiſe: that nevertheleſs, the aſſembly ſhould be permitted, from time to time, to view and examine the accounts of money diſpoſed of, by virtue of laws which they had enacted: that if any member of the council, or officer holding place of truſt or profit within the government, ſhould, in any manner whatever give his aſſent to, or in any wiſe advice or concur with the aſſembly in paſſing any act or vote, whereby the royal prerogative might be leſſened or impaired, or any money be raiſed or diſpoſed of for the public ſervice, contrary to or inconſiſtenr with the method preſcribed by theſe inſtructions, the governor ſhould forthwith remove or ſuſpend ſuch counſellor or officer ſo offending, and give an immediate account of his proceedings to the commiſſioners of trade and plantations. Theſe were peremptory injunctions, which plainly proved that the miniſtry was determined to ſupport the prerogative with a high hand; but it muſt be owned, at the ſame time, that abundance of provocation had been given, by the inſolent oppoſition of ſome turbulent individuals, who had exerted all their influence in diſturbing and diſtreſſing the views and deſigns of the government. While the Britiſh colonies in America were, by theſe diviſions, in a great meaſure diſabled from making vigorous efforts againſt the common enemy, the adminiſtration at home began to exert itſelf for their defenſe. Officers were appointed for two regiments, conſiſting of two battalions each, to be raiſed in America, and commanded by ſir William Pepperel and governor Shirley, who had enjoyed the ſame command in the laſt war; and a body of troops was deſtined for the ſame ſervice.

The moſt remarkable incident that marked this year on the continent of Europe was the converſion of the hereditary prince of Heſſe-Caſſel, who had eſpouſed the princeſs Mary of England. He now declared himſelf a Roman catholic, and was ſuppoſed to have been cajoled to this pro-ſeſſion by the promiſes of certain powers, who flattered his ambition, in order to weaken the proteſtant intereſt in Germany. His father, though deeply affected by his ſon's apoſtacy, did not fail to take immediate meaſures for preventing the evil conſequences which might otherwiſe have flowed from his defection. He forthwith aſſembled the ſtates of the landgraviate, in order to take ſuch meaſures as might appear neceſſary to maintain the religion, laws, and conſtitution of the country; and the prince was laid under certain reſtrictions, which he did not find it an eaſy taſk to ſet aſide. It was enacted, that when the regency ſhould devolve to him by ſucceſſion he ſhould not have it in his power to alter the eſtabliſhed laws, or grant any church to perſons of the Roman communion, for the public exerciſe of their religion; and that he ſhould be excluded from all ſhare in the education of his ſons, the eldeſt of whom ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of the country of Hanau upon his father's acceſſion to the regency of the landgraviate. Theſe reſolutions were guaranteed by the kings of Pruſſia and Denmark, by the maritime powers, and the evangelic body of the empire.

The exile of the parliament of Paris, far from having intimidated the other tribunals from performing what they apprehended to be their duty, ſerved only to inflame the diſcontents of the people, and to animate all the courts of juſtice to a full exertion of their authority. The chatelet continued to proſecute thoſe prieſts who refuſed the ſacrament to perſons whoſe conſciences would not allow them to ſubſcribe to the bull Unigenitus, even after three of their members were ſent to the Baſtile. The ſame proſecutions were carried on, and bold remonſtrances publiſhed by the parliaments of Aix and Rouen. In a word, the whole kingdom was filled with ſuch confuſion as threatened a total ſuppreſſion of juſtice, in a general ſpirit of diſaffection, and univerſal anarchy. The prelates, mean while, ſeemed to triumph in the combuſtion they had raiſed. They entered into aſſociations to ſupport each other: they intrigued at court, and harraſſed the king with inſolent declarations, till he grew tired of their proceedings, and opened his eyes to the fatal conſequences of their pride and obſtinacy. He even took an opportunity of exhorting the archbiſhop of Paris to act more ſuitably to the character of a clergyman. He recalled the parliament from exile, and they returned in triumph, amidſt the acclamations of the people, who celebrated their arrival at Paris with the moſt extravagant demonſtrations of joy; and the archbiſhop, notwithſtanding the king's expreſs declaration to the contrary, ſtill perſiſting in countenancing the recuſant prieſts, was baniſhed to Conſians-ſous-Charenton.

In Spain the intereſt of Great-Britain was ſo warmly eſpouſed, and ſo powerfully ſupported by mr. Wall, who had been reſident in England, that the French party, though countenanced by the queen-mother, and ſuſtained with all the influence of the marquis de la Enſenada, the prime-miniſter, was totally defeated. The king being convinced that it would be for the intereſt of his ſubjects to live on good terms with England, and well appriſed of Enſenada's intrigues, ordered that miniſter to be arreſted and confined, and beſtowed upon mr. Wall the beſt part of his employments. Nevertheleſs, the Spaniards in the Weſt-Indies continued to oppreſs the ſubjects of Great-Britain employed in cutting logwood in the bay of Honduras; and repreſentations on this head being made to the court of Madrid, the diſpute was amicably adjuſted between mr. Wall and ſir Benjamin Keene, the Britiſh embaſſador. While the intereſt of Britain thus triumphed in Spain, it ſeemed to loſe ground at the court of Liſbon. His Portugueſe majeſty had formed vaſt projects of an active commerce, and even eſtabliſhed an Eaſt-India company: in the mean time he could not help manifeſting his chagrin at the great quantities of gold which were yearly exported from his dominions, as the balance due from his ſubjects on Engliſh commodities. In his endeavours to chec this traffic, which he deemed ſo detrimental to his ſubjects, he inflicted hardſhips on the Britiſh merchants ſettled at Liſbon: ſome were impriſoned on frivolous pretences; others deprived of their property, and obliged to quit the kingdom. He inſiſted upon laying an impoſition of two per cent. on all the Portugueſe gold that ſhould be exported; but the profits of the trade would not bear ſuch an exaction. Mean while, there being a ſcarcity of corn in Portugal, the kingdom was ſupplied from England; and the people having nothing but gold to purchaſe this neceſſary ſupply, the king ſaw the neceſſity of conniving at the exportation of his coin, and the trade reverted into its former channel.

On the fourteenth day of November the king of Great-Britain opened the ſeſſion of parliament with an harangue, which intimated nothing of an approaching rupture. He ſaid, That the general ſtate of affairs in Europe had undergone very little alteration ſince their laſt meeting; that he had lately received the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from his good brother the king of Spain of friendſhip and confidence, which he would cultivate with harmony and good faith. He declared his principal view ſhould be to ſtrengthen the foundation, and ſecure the duration of a general peace; to improve the preſent advantages of it for promoting the trade of his good ſubjects, and protecting thoſe poſſeſſions which conſtituted one great ſourſe of their wealth and commerce. Finally, he exhorted them to complete their plan for appropriating the forfeited eſtates in the Highlands to the ſervice of the public. He probably avoided mentioning the encroachments of France, that he might ſupply no handle for debates on the addreſs, which was carried in both houſes almoſt without oppoſition. The government ſeemed determined to humble the inſolence of the French councils; and this diſpoſition was ſo agreeable to the people in general, that they grudged no expence, and heartily concurred with the demands of the miniſtry.

The commons granted for the ſervice of the enſuing year 4,73,729l. one million of that ſum expreſsly given for enabling his majeſty to augment his forces by land and ſea. 32,000l. were allotted as a ſubſidy to the king of Poland, and 20,000l. to the elector of Bavaria. Theſe gratifications met with little or no oppoſition in the committee of ſupply; becauſe it was taken for granted, that, in caſe of a rupture, France would endeavour to avail herſelf of her ſuperiority by land, by invading his Britannick majeſty's German dominions; and therefore it might be neceſſary to ſecure the aſſiſtance of ſuch allies on the continent. That they prognoſticated aright, with reſpect to the deſigns of that ambitious power, will ſoon appear in the courſe of this hiſtory; which will alſo demonſtrate how little dependence is to be placed upon the profeſſed attachment of ſubſidiary princes. The ſupplies were raiſed by the ſtanding branches of the revenue, the land tax and the malt tax, and a lottery for 1,0000; 100,000l. of it to be deducted for the ſervice of the public, and the remaining 900,000l. to be charged on the produce of the ſinking-fund, at the rate of three per cent. per annum, to commence from the fifth day of January in the year 1756. The civil tranſactions of this ſeſſion were confined to a few objects. Divers new regulations were made for encouraging and improving the whale and white-herring fiſhery, as well as for finiſhing and putting in a proper ſtate of defence a new fort, lately built at Anamaboe on the coaſt of Africa.

Mr Pitt, the paymaſter-general of the forces, brought in a bill, which will ever remain a ſtanding monument of his humanity. The poor diſabled veterans, who enjoyed the penſion of Chelſea hoſpital, were ſo iniquituouſly oppreſſed by a ſet of miſcreants, who ſupplied them with money per advance, at the moſt exhorbitant rates of uſury, that many of them with their families, were in danger of ſtarving; and the intention of government in granting ſuch a comfortable ſubſiſtence was in a great meaſure defeated. Mr Pitt, perceiving that this evil originally flowed from the delay of the firſt payment, which the penſioner could not touch till the expiration of a whole year after he had been put upon the liſt, removed this neceſſity of borrowing, by providing in the bill, that half a year's penſion ſhould be advanced half a year before it is due; and the practice of uſury was effectually prevented by a clauſe, enacting, That all contracts ſhould be void by which any penſion might be mortgaged. This humane regulation was unanimouſly approved, and having paſſed through both houſes with uncommon expedition, received the royal aſſent.

Notwithſtanding the unanimity manifeſted by the commons in every thing relating to the meaſures for acting vigorouſly againſt the common enemy of the nation, they were remarkably diſturbed and divided by a conteſted election of members for Oxfordſhire. In the courſe of this diſpute, the ſtrength and influence of what they called the old and new intereſt, or, to ſpeak more intelligibly, of the tories and whigs in that county, were fully diſplayed. The candidates ſuſtained on the ſhoulders of the old intereſt, were lord viſcount Wenman and ſir James Daſhwood; their competitors, whom the new intereſt ſupported, and of conſequence the miniſtry countenanced, were lord Parker and ſir Edward Turner. Never was any contention of the kind maintained with more ſpirit and animoſity or carried on at a greater expence. One would have imagined that each ſide conſidered it as a diſpute which muſt have determined, whether the nation ſhould enjoy its ancient liberty, or tamely ſubmit to the fetters of corruption. Noblemen and gentlemen, clergymen and ladies, employed all their talents and induſtry in canvaſſing for either ſide, throughout every townſhip and village in the county. Scandal emptied her whole quiver of inſinuation, calumny, and lampoon; corruption was not remiſs in promiſes and preſents; houſes of entertainment were opened; and nothing was for ſome time to be ſeen but ſcenes of tumult, riot, and intoxication. The revenue of many an independent prince on the continent would not have been ſufficient to afford ſuch ſums of money as were expended in the courſe of this diſpute. At length they proceeded to election, and the ſheriff made a double return of all the four candidates, ſo that not one of them could ſit, and the county remained without a repreſentative until this ambiguous affair could be decided in the houſe of commons. About the middle of November petitions being preſented by the four candidates, as well as the gentlemen, clergy, and other freeholders of the county, complaining of an undue election, and double return, the matter of theſe petitions was heard at the bar of the houſe on the 3d day of December. The counſel for lord Wenman and ſir James Daſhwood alledged, that they had the majority of votes upon the poll, and this circumſtance was admitted by the counſel on the other ſide: then they proceeded to prove by evidence, that after cloſing the poll, the ſheriff declared the majority of votes to be in favour of theſe two candidates, and adjourned the court from the 23d of April to the 8th of May; ſo that the ſcrutiny demanded and granted on the behalf of lord Parker and ſir Edward Turner could not be diſcuſſed before the laſt day of the month, when the writ was returnable; that the ſcrutiny did not begin till the 9th day of May, when the time was protracted by diſputes about the manner in which it ſhould be carried on; that lord Parker and ſir Edward Turner were allowed to object, through the whole poll, to the votes on the other ſide, on pretence that their competors ſhould be permitted to anſwer theſe objections, and in their turn, objected through the whole poll to the votes for lord Parker and ſir Edward Turner, who ſhould in the laſt place, have leave to anſwer: that lord Wenman and ſir James Daſhwood had diſapproved of this method, becauſe they apprehended it might induce their competitors to make ſuch a number of frivolous objections, that they ſhould not have time to anſwer one-half of them, much leſs to make objections of their own before the writ ſhould be returned; that they foreſaw ſuch a number of frivolous objections were made, as engroſſed the attention of the court till the 27th day of May; ſo that they could not begin to anſwer any of theſe objections till the 28th; and on the 30th the ſheriff, having cloſed the ſcrutiny, made the double return. The proof being exbibited, the counſel inſiſted, that, as they had eſtabliſhed a majority on the poll, and demonſtrated that this majority neither was nor could be overthrown by ſuch an unfiniſhed ſcrutiny, it was incumbent on the other ſide to proceed upon the merits of the election, by endeavouring to overthrow that majority of which their clients were in poſſeſſion. A queſtion in the houſe being carried to the ſame purpoſe, lord Wenman and ſir James Daſhwood objected to 530 votes on the other ſide, whom they propoſed to diſqualify. Their counſel examined ſeveral witneſſes, to prove the partiality of the ſheriff in favour of lord Parker and ſir Edward Turner, and to detect theſe candidates in the practice of bribery; for which purpoſe they produced a letter in their own hand-writing. They afterwards proceeded to diſqualify particular votes, and ſummed up their evidence on the 21ſt day of January.

[1755] Then the counſel for the other ſide began to refute the charge of partialty and corruption; and to anſwer the objections that had been made to particular voters. They produced evidence to prove, that cuſtomary freeholds, or cuſtomary holdings, had voted at elections in the counties of Glamorgan, Monmouth, Glouceſter, Wells, and Hereford; and that the cuſtomary tenants of the manor of Woodſtock, in Oxfordſhire, had been reputed capable of voting, and even voted at elections for that county. In a word, they continued to examine evidences, argue and refute, prove and diſapprove, until the 23d day of April, when, after ſome warm debates and diviſions in the houſe, lord Parker and ſir Edward Turner were declared duly elected; and the clerk of the crown was ordered to amend the return, by eraſing the names of lord Wenman and ſir James Daſhwood. Many who preſumed to think for themſelves, without recollecting the power and influence of the adminiſtration, were aſtoniſhed at the iſſue of this diſpute; which however, might have eaſily been foreſeen; inaſmuch as, during the courſe of the proceedings, moſt, if not all, of the many queſtions debated in the houſe were determined by a great majority in favour of the new intereſt. A great number of copy-holders had been admitted to vote at this election, and the ſheriff incurred no cenſure for allowing them to take the oath appointed by law to be taken by freeholders; nevertheleſs, the commons carefully avoided determining the queſtion, Whether copy-holders poſſeſſed of the yearly value of 40s. clear of all deductions, have not a right to vote for knights to repreſent the ſhire within which their copy-hold eſtates are ſituated; This point being left doubtful by the legiſlature, puts it often in the power of the ſheriff to return which of the candidates he pleaſes to ſupport; for, if the majority of the voting copy-holders adheres to the intereſt of his favourites, he will admit their votes both on the poll and the ſcrutiny; whereas, ſhould they be otherwiſe diſpoſed, he will reject them as unqualified. What effect this practice may have upon the independency of parliament every perſon muſt perceive, who reflects, that in almoſt all the counties of England the high-ſheriffs are annually appointed by the miniſter for the time being.

The attention of the legiſlature was chiefly turned upon the conduct of France, which preſerved no medium, but ſeemed intent upon ſtriking ſome important blow, that might ſerve as a declaration of war. At Breſt and other ports in that kingdom, the French were employed in equipping a powerful armament, and made no ſcruple to own it was intended for North-America. Towards the latter end of March ſir Thomas Robinſon, ſecretary of ſtate, brought a meſſage from the king to the parliament, intimating, That his majeſty having at the beginning of the ſeſſion declared his principal object was to preſerve the public tranquillity, and at the ſame time to protect thoſe poſſeſſions which conſtitute one great ſource of the commerce and wealth of his kingdoms, he now found it neceſſary to acquaint the houſe of commons, that the preſent ſituation of affairs made it requiſite to augment his forces by ſea and land, and to take ſuch other meaſures as might beſt tend to preſerve the general peace of Europe, and to ſecure the juſt rights and poſſeſſions of his crown in America, as well as to repel any attemps whatſoever that might be made to ſupport or countenance any deſigns which ſhould be formed againſt his majeſty and his kingdoms; and his majeſty doubted not but his faithful commons, on whoſe affection and zeal he entirely relied, would enable him to make ſuch augmentations, and to take ſuch meaſures for ſupporting the honour of his crown, and the true intereſt of his people, and for the ſecurity of his dominions in the preſent critical conjuncture, as the exigency of affairs might require; in doing which his majeſty would have as much regard to the eaſe of his good ſubjects as ſhould be conſiſtent with their ſafety and welfare. In anſwer to this meſſage a very warm and affectionate addreſs was preſented to his majeſty; and it was on this occaſion, that the million was granted for augmenting his forces by ſea and land.[r] The court of Verſailles, notwithſtanding the aſſiduity and diſpatch which they were exerting in equipping armaments, and embarking troops, for the ſupport of their ambitious ſchemes in America, ſtill continued to amuſe the Britiſh miniſtry with general declarations, that no hoſtility was intended, nor the leaſt infringement of the treaty.

The earl of Albemarle, the Engliſh embaſſador at Paris having lately died in that city, theſe aſſurances were communicated to the court of London by the marquis de Mirepoix, who reſided in England with the ſame character, which he had ſupported ſince his firſt arrival with equal honour and politeneſs. On this occaſion he himſelf was ſo far impoſed upon by the inſtructions he had received, that he believed the profeſſions of his court were ſincere, and ſeriouſly endeavoured to prevent a rupture between the two nations. At length, however, their preparations were ſo notorious that he began to ſuſpect the conſequence; and the Engliſh miniſtry produced ſuch proofs of their inſincerity and double dealing, that he ſeemed to be ſtruc with aſtoniſhment and chagrin. He repaired to France, and upbraided the miniſtry of Verſailles for having made him the tool of their diſſimulation. They referred him to the king, who ordered him to return to London, with freſh aſſurances of his pacific intentions: but his practice agreed ſo ill with his profeſſions, that the embaſſador had ſcarce obtained an audience to communicate them, when undoubted intelligence arrived, that a powerful armament was ready to ſail from Breſt and Rochefort. The government of Great-Britain, aroused by this information, immediately took the moſt expeditious methods for equipping a ſquadron; and towards the latter end of April, admiral Boſcawen ſailed with 11 ſhips of the line and one frigate, having on board a conſiderable number of land-forces, to attend the motions of the enemy: but more certain and particular intelligence arriving ſoon after, touching the ſtrength of the French fleet, which conſiſted of 25 ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and tranſports, with a great quantity of war like ſtores, and 4000 regular troops, commanded by the baron Dieſkau, admiral Holbourne was detached with ſix ſhips of the line, and one frigate, to re-enforce mr. Boſcawen; and a great number of capital ſhips were put in commiſſion. In the beginning of May the French fleet, commanded by mr. Macnamara, an officer of Iriſh extraction, ſailed from Breſt, directing his courſe to North-America; but after having proceeded beyond the chops of the Engliſh channel, he returned with nine of the capital ſhips, while the reſt of the armament continued their courſe, under the direction of M. Bois de la Mothe.

[r] The miniſtry having reſolved to ſend a body of forces to America, to act in conjunction with the provincial troops raiſed on that continent, it became neceſſary that the mutiny act ſhould be rendered more clear and extenſive. When this bill, therefore, fell under conſideration, it was improved with a new clauſe, providing, 'That all officers and ſoldiers of any troops being muſtered and in pay, which are or ſhall be raiſed in any of the Britiſh provinces in America, by authority of the reſpective governors or governments thereof, ſhall at all times, and in all places, when they happen to join or act in conjunction with his majeſty's Britiſh forces, be liable to martial law and diſcipline, in like manner, to all intents and purpoſes, as the Britiſh forces are and ſhall be ſubject to the ſame trial, penalties and puniſhment.'

On the 25th day of April the king went to the houſe of lords, where, after giving the royal aſſent to the bills then depending; for granting a certain ſum out of the ſinking-fund, for the relief of inſolvent debtors, for the better regulation of the marine forces on ſhore, for the better raiſing of marines and ſeamen, and to ſeveral other public and private bills: his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion of parliament by a ſpeech, in which he acquainted the two houſes, That the zeal they had ſhown for ſupporting the honour, rights and poſſeſſions of his crown had afforded him the greateſt ſatisfaction: that his deſire to preſerve the public tranquillity had been ſincere and uniform: that he had religiouſly adhered to the ſtipulations of the treaty of Aix-le Chapelle, and made it his care not to injure or offend any power whatſoever; but that he never could entertain a thought of purchaſing the name of peace at the expenſe of ſuffering encroachments upon, or of yielding up what juſtly belonged to Great-Britain, either by ancient poſſeſſion or ſolemn treaties: that the vigour and firmneſs of his parliament, on this important occaſion, had enabled him to be prepared for ſuch contigences as might happen: that, if reaſonable and honourable terms of accommodation could be agreed upon, he would be ſatisfied, and, at all events, rely on the juſtice of his cauſe, the effectual ſupport of his people, and the protection of Divine Providence. The parliament was then prorogued to the 27th of May.

Whilſt all Europe was in ſuſpenſe about the fate of the Engliſh and French ſquadrons, preparations for a vigorous ſea war were going forward in England with an unparalleled ſpirit and ſucceſs. Still the French court flattered itſelf that Great-Britain, out of tenderneſs to his majeſty's German dominions, would abſtain from hoſtilities. Mirepoix continued to have frequent conferences with the Britiſh miniſtry, who made no ſecret that their admirals, particularly Boſcawen, had orders to atrac the French ſhips wherever they ſhould meet them. On the other hand, Monſ. de Mirepoix declared, that his maſter would conſider the firſt gun fired at ſea in a hoſtile manner as a declaration of war. This menace, far from intimidating the Engliſh, animated them to redouble their preparations for war. The preſs for ſeamen was carried on with extraordinary vigour in all parts of this kingdom, as well as in Ireland; and great premiums were given not only by the government, but alſo, over and above his majeſty's bounty, by almoſt all the conſiderable cities and towns in England, to ſuch as ſhould enliſt voluntarily for ſailors or ſoldiers. Other branches of the public ſervice went on with equal alacrity: and ſuch was the eagerneſs of the people to lend their money to the government, that inſtead of one million, which was to be raiſed by way of lottery, 3,800,80l. were ſubſcribed immediately.

The ſituation of affairs requiring his majeſty to go to Germany this ſummer, great apprehenſions aroſe in the minds of many, leſt the French ſhould either intercept him in his journey, or prevent his return. Earl Paulet had made a motion in the houſe of lords, humbly to repreſent to his majeſty, 'that it was an article in the original act of ſettlement by which the ſucceſſion of theſe kingdoms devolved to his electoral houſe, that the king ſhould not go to his foreign dominions without the conſent of parliament; and that this was a principal article in the compact between the crown and the people: that though this article was repealed in the late reign, yet, till of late, it had always been the cuſtom for his majeſty to acquaint the parliament with his intended departure to his German dominions, both in regard to the true ſenſe and ſpirit of the act that placed him on the throne, as well as for the paternal kindneſs of his royal heart, and the condeſcenſion he had been ſo good to ſhew to his parliament on all occaſions; but that his majeſty's declaration of his deſign to viſit his electoral eſtates had always come on the laſt day of a ſeſſion, when it was too late for the great conſtitutional council of the crown to offer ſuch advice as might otherwiſe have been expedient and neceſſary: that his majeſty's leaving his kingdoms in a conjuncture ſo pregnant with diſtreſs, ſo denunciative of danger, would not only give the greateſt advantage to ſuch as might be diſpoſed to ſtir up diſaffection and diſcontent, and to the conſtitutional and national enemies of England; but would alſo fill his loyal ſubjects with the moſt affecting concern, and moſt gloomy fears, as well for their own ſafety, as for that of their ſovereign, whoſe invaluable life, at all times of the utmoſt conſequence to his people, was then infinitely ſo, by reaſon of his great experience, the affection of every one to his royal perſon, and the minority of the heir apparent.' Such was the purport of this motion; but it was not ſeconded by any of the other lords.

The general uneaſineſs, on account of his majeſty's departure, was greatly increaſed by an apprehenſion that there would, during his abſence, be no good agreement amongſt the regency, which conſiſted of the following perſons: his royal highneſs William duke of Cumberland; Thomas lord archbiſhop of Canterbury; Philip earl of Hardwicke, lord high-chancellor; John earl of Granville, preſident of the council; Charles duke of Marlborough, lord privy-ſeal; John duke of Rutland, ſteward of the houſehold; Charles duke of Grafton, lord-chamberlain; Archibald duke of Argyle; the duke of Newcaſtle, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury; the duke of Dorſet, maſter of the horſe; the earl of Holderneſſe, one of the ſecretaries of ſtate; the earl of Rochford, groom of the ſtole; the marquis of Hartington, lord-lieutenant of Ireland; lord Anſon, firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty; ſir Thomas Robinſon, ſecretary of ſtate; and Henry Fox, eſq. ſecretary at war. His majeſty ſet out from St. James's on the 28th of April early in the morning, embarked at Harwich in the afternoon, landed the next day at Helvoetſluys, and arrived at Hanover on the 2d of May.

Admiral Boſcawen, with 11 ſhips of the line and a frigate, having taken on board two regiments at Plymouth, ſailed from thence on the 27th of April for the banks of Newfoundland, and, in a few days after his arrival there, the French fleet from Breſt came to the ſame ſtation, under the command of M. Bois de la Mothe. But the thic fogs which prevail upon theſe coaſts, eſpecially at that time of the year, kept the two armaments from ſeeing each other; and part of the French ſquadron eſcaped up the river St. Laurence, whilſt another part of them went round, and got into the ſame river through the ſtraits of Belleiſle, by a way which was never known to be attempted before by ſhips of the line. However, whilſt the Engliſh fleet lay off Cape Race, which is the ſouthernmoſt point of Newfoundland, and was thought to be the moſt proper ſituation for intercepting the enemy, two French ſhips, the Alcide, of 64 guns, and 480 men, and the Lys, pierced for 64 guns, but mounting only 22, having eight companies of land-forces on board, being ſeparated from the reſt of the fleet in the fog, fell in with the Dunkirk, captain Howe, and the Defiance, captain Andrews, two 60 gun ſhips of the Engliſh ſquadron; and after a ſmart engagement, which laſted ſome hours, and in which captain (afterwards lord) Howe behaved with the greateſt ſkill and intrepidity, were both taken, with ſeveral conſiderable officers and engineers, and about 8000l. in money. Though the capture of theſe ſhips, from which the commencement of the war may in fact be dated, fell greatly ſhort of what was hoped for from this expedition; yet, when the news of it reached England, it was of infinite ſervice to the public credit of every kind, and animated the whole nation, who now ſaw plainly that the government was determined to keep no further meaſures with the French, but juſtly to repel force by force, and put a ſtop to their ſending more men and arms to invade the property of the Engliſh in America, as they had hitherto done with impunity. The French, who, for ſome time, did not even attempt to make repriſals on our ſhipping, would gladly have choſen to avoid a war at that time, and to have continued extending their encroachments on our ſettlements, till they had executed their grand plan of ſecuring a communication from the Miſſiſſippi to Canada, by a line of forts, many of which they had already erected.

Upon the arrival of the news of this action at Paris, the French embaſſador, M. de Mirepoix, was recalled from London, and M. de Buſly from Hanover, where he had juſt arrived, to attend the king of England in a public character. They complained loudly of Boſcawen's attacking the ſhips, as a breach of national faith: but it was juſtly retorted on the part of England, that their encroachments in America had rendered repriſals both juſtifiable and neceſſary. The reſolution of making them was the effect of mature deliberation in the Engliſh council. The vaſt increaſe of the French marine of late years, which in all probability would ſoon be employed againſt Great-Britain, occaſioned an order for making repriſals general in Europe as well as in America; and that all French ſhips, whether outward or homeward bound, ſhould be ſtopped, and brought into Britiſh ports. To give the greater weight to theſe orders, it was reſolved to ſend out thoſe admirals who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves moſt towards the end of the laſt war. Accordingly, on the 21ſt of July, ſir Edward Hawke ſailed on a cruiſe to the weſtward, with 18 ſhips of the line, a frigate, and a ſloop; but not meeting with the French fleet, theſe ſhips returned to England about the latter end of September and the beginning of October; on the 14th of which laſt month another fleet, conſiſting of 22 ſhips of the line, two frigates and two ſloops, ſailed again on a cruiſe to the weſtward under admiral Byng, in hopes of intercepting the French ſquadron under Duguay, and likewiſe that commanded by La Mothe, in caſe of its return from America. But this fleet likewiſe returned to Spithead on the 22d of November, without having been able to effect any thing, though it was allowed by all, that the captain had acted judiciouſly in the choice of his ſtations.

While theſe meaſures were purſued, for the general ſecurity of the Britiſh coaſts and trade in Europe, ſeveral new ſhips of war were begun, and finiſhed with the utmoſt expedition, in his majeſty's docs: 12 frigates and ſloops contracted for in private yards, were compleated by the month of Auguſt; and 24 ſhips and 12 colliers were then taken into the ſervice of the government, to be fitted out as veſſels of war, to carry 20 guns and 120 men each.—In the mean time the French trade was ſo annoyed by the Engliſh cruiſers, that before the end of this year 300 of their merchant ſhips, many of which, from St. Domingo and Martinico, were extremely rich, and 8000 of their ſailors, were brought into Engliſh ports. By theſe captures the Britiſh miniſtry anſwered many purpoſes: they deprived the French of a great body of ſeamen, and withheld from them a very large property, the want of which greatly diſtreſſed their people, and ruined many of their traders. Their outward-bound merchant ſhips were inſured at the rate of 30 per cent. whilſt the Engliſh paid no more than the common inſurance. This intolerable burthen was felt by all degrees of people amongſt them: their miniſtry was publicly reviled, even by their parliaments; and the French name, from being the terrour, began to be the contempt of Europe. Their uneaſineſs was alſo not a little heightened by new broils between their king and the parliament of Paris, occaſioned by the obſtinacy of the clergy of that kingdom, who ſeemed determined to ſupport the church, in all events, againſt the ſecular tribunals, and, as much as poſſible, to enforce the obſervance of the bull Unigenitus, which had long been the occaſion of ſo many diſputes among them. However, the parliament continuing firm, and the French king approving of its conduct, the eccleſiaſtics thought proper to ſubmit for the preſent; and in their general aſſembly this year granted him a free gift of 16,0000 of livres, which he demanded of them—a greater ſum than they had ever given before, even in time of war.

In the beginning of this year the aſſembly of Maſſachuſett's-Bay in New-England paſſed an act, prohibiting all correſpondence with the French at Louiſbourg; and early in the ſpring they raiſed a body of troops, which was tranſported to Nova-Scotia, to aſſiſt lieutenant-governor Laurence in driving the French from the encroachments they had made upon that province. Accordingly, towards the end of May, the governor ſent a large detachment of troops, under the command of lieutenant-colonel Monckton, upon this ſervice; and three frigates and a ſloop were diſpatched up the bay of Fundy, under the command of captain Rous, to give their aſſiſtance by ſea. The troops, upon their arrival at the river Maſſaguaſh, found the paſſage ſtopped by a large number of regular forces, rebel neutrals, or Acadians, and Indians, 450 of whom occupied a bloc-houſe, with cannon mounted on their ſide of the river; and the reſt were poſted within a ſtrong breaſt-work of timber, thrown up by way of outwork to the bloc-houſe. The Engliſh provincials attacked this place with ſuch ſpirit, that the enemy were obliged to fly, and leave them in poſſeſſion of the breaſt-work: then the garriſon in the bloc-houſe deſerted it, and left the paſſage of the river free. From thence colonel Monckton advanced to the French fort of Beau-ſejour, which he inveſted, as far at leaſt as the ſmall number of his troops would permit, on the 12th of June; and after four days bombardment obliged it to ſurrender, though the French had 26 pieces of cannon mounted, and plenty of ammunition, and the Engliſh had not yet placed a ſingle cannon upon their batteries. The garriſon was ſent to Louiſbourg, on condition of not bearing arms in America for the ſpace of ſix months; and the Acadians, who had joined the French, were pardoned, in conſideration of their having been forced into that ſervice. Colonel Monckton, after putting a garriſon into this place, and changing its name to that of Cumberland, the next day attacked and reduced the other French fort upon the river Gaſpereau, which runs into Bay Verte; where he likewiſe found a large quantity of proviſions and ſtores of all kinds, that being the chief magazine for ſupplying the French Indians and Acadians with arms, ammunition, and other neceſſaries. He then diſarmed theſe laſt, to the number of 15,000: and in the mean time, captain Rous with his ſhips ſailed to the mouth of the river St. John, to attac the new fort the French had erected there; but they ſaved him that trouble, by abandoning it upon his appearance, after having burſt their cannon, blown up their magazine, and deſtroyed, as far as they had time, all the works they had lately raiſed. The Engliſh had but 20 men killed, and about the ſame number wounded, in the whole of this expedition, the ſucceſs of which ſecured the tranquillity of Nova-Scotia.

While the New-Englanders were thus employed in reducing the French in Nova-Scotia, preparations were made in Virginia for attacking them upon the river Ohio. A fort was built, which was likewiſe called Fort-Cumberland, and a camp formed at Wills's-Creek. On the 14th of January of this year, major-general Braddock, with colonel Dunbar's and colonel Halcut's regiments of foot, ſailed from Cork, in Ireland, for Virginia, where they all landed ſafe before the end of February. This general might conſequently have entered upon action early in the ſpring, had he not been unfortunately delayed by the Virginian contractors for the army, who, when he was ready to march, had neither provided a ſufficient quantity of proviſions for his troops, nor a competent number of carriages for his army. This accident was foreſeen by almoſt every perſon who knew any thing of our plantations upon the continent of America: for the people of Virginia, who think of no produce but their tobacco, and do not raiſe corn enough even for their own ſubſiſtance, being, by the nature of their country, well provided with the conveniency of water conveyance, have but few wheel-carriages, or beaſts of burthen; whereas Pennſylvania, which abounds in corn, and moſt other ſorts of proviſions, has but little water-carriage, eſpecially in its weſtern ſettlements, where its inhabitants have great numbers of carts, waggons, and horſes. Mr Braddock ſhould, therefore, certainly, in point of prudence, have landed in Pennſylvania: the contract for ſupplying his troops ſhould have been made with ſome of the chief planters there, who could eaſily have performed their engagements; and if his camp had been formed near Frank's-Town, or ſomewhere upon the ſouth-weſt borders of that province, he would not have had 80 miles to march from thence to Fort Du Queſne, inſtead of an 130 miles that he had to advance from Wills's-Creek, where he did encamp, through roads neither better nor more practicable than the other would have been. This error, in the very beginning of the expedition, whether owing to an injudicious preference fondly given to the Virginians in the lucrative job of ſupplying theſe troops, or to any other cauſe, delayed the march of the army for ſome weeks, during which it was in the utmoſt diſtreſs for neceſſaries of all kinds; and would probably have defeated the expedition entirely for that ſummer, had not the contractors found means to procure ſome aſſiſtance from the bac ſettlements of Pennſylvania. But even when theſe ſupplies did arrive, they conſiſted of only 15 waggons, and 100 draft horſes, inſtead of 150 waggons and 300 horſes, which the Virginian contractors had engaged to furniſh, and the proviſions were ſo bad that they could not be uſed. However, ſome gentlemen in Pennſylvania, being applied to in this exigency, amply made up for theſe deficiencies, and the troops were by this means ſupplied with every thing they wanted. Another, and ſtill more fatal error was committed in the choice of the commander for this expedition. Major-general Braddock, who was appointed to it, was undoubtedly a man of courage, and expert in all the punctilios of a review, having been brought up in the Engliſh guards; but he was naturally very haughty, poſitive, and difficult of acceſs; qualities ill ſuited to the temper of the people whom he was to command. His extreme ſeverity in matters of diſcipline had rendered him unpopular among the ſoldiers; and the ſtrict military education in which he had been trained from his youth, and which he prided himſelf on ſcrupulouſly following, made him hold the American militia in great contempt, becauſe they could not go through their exerciſe with the ſame dexterity and regularity as a regiment of guards in Hyde-Park, little knowing, or indeed being able to form any idea of the difference between the European manner of fighting, and an American expedition through woods, deſerts, and moraſſes. Before he left England, he received, in the handwriting of colonel Napier, a ſet of inſtructions from the duke of Cumberland. By theſe, the attempt upon Niagara was, in a great meaſure referred to him; and the reduction of Crown-Point was to be left chiefly to the provincial forces. But above all, his royal highneſs, both verbally and in this writing, frequently cautioned him carefully to beware of an ambuſh or ſurpriſe. Inſtead of regarding this ſalutary caution, his conceit of his own abilities made him diſdain to aſk the opinion of any under his command; and the Indians, who would have been his ſafeſt guards againſt this danger in particular, were ſo diſguſted by the haughtineſs of his behaviour, that moſt of them forſook his banners. Under theſe diſadvantages he began his march from Fort-Cumberland on the 10th of June, at the head of about 2200 men, for the Meadows, where colonel Waſhington was defeated the year before. Upon his arrival there, he was informed that the French at Fort du Queſne, which had lately been built on the ſame river, near its confluence with the Monangahela, expected a re-enforcement of 500 regular troops: therefore that he might march with the greater diſpatch, he left colonel Dunbar, with 800 men, to bring up the proviſions, ſtores, and heavy baggage, as faſt as the nature of the ſervice would permit; and with the other 1200, together with 10 pieces of cannon, and the neceſſary ammunition and proviſions, he marched on with ſo much expedition, that he ſeldom took any time to reconnoitre the woods or thickets he was to paſs through; as if the nearer he approached the enemy, the farther he was removed from danger.

On the 8th of July, he encamped within 10 miles of Fort du Queſne. Though colonel Dunbar was near 40 miles behind him, and his officers, particularly ſir Peter Halket, earneſtly entreated him to proceed with caution, and to employ the friendly Indians who were with him, by way of advanced guard, in caſe of ambuſcades; yet he reſumed his march the next day, without ſo much as endeavouring to obtain any intelligence of the ſituation or diſpoſition of the enemy, or even ſending out any ſcouts to viſit the woods and thickets on both ſides of him, as well as in front. With this careleſsneſs he was advancing, when, about noon, he was ſaluted with a general fire upon his front, and all along his left flank, from an enemy ſo artfully concealed behind the trees and buſhes, that not a man of them could be ſeen. The vanguard immediately fell back upon the main body, and in an inſtant the panic and confuſion became general; ſo that moſt of the troops fled with great precipitation, notwithſtanding all their officers, ſome of whom behaved very gallantly, could do to ſtop their career. As to Baddock himſelf, inſtead of ſcouring the thickets and buſhes from whence the fire came, with grape-ſhot from the ten pieces of cannon he had with him, or ordering flanking parties of his Indians to advance againſt the enemy, he obſtinately remained upon the ſpot where he was, and gave orders for the few brave officers and men who ſtaid with him, to form regularly, and advance. Mean while his men fell thic about him, and almoſt all his officers were ſingled out, one after another, and killed or wounded; for the Indians, who always take aim when they fire, and aim chiefly at the officers, diſtinguiſhed them by their dreſs. At laſt, the general, whoſe obſtinacy ſeemed to increaſe with the danger, after having had ſome horſes ſhot under him, received a muſket-ſhot through the right arm and lungs, of which he died in a few hours, having been carried off the field by the bravery of lieutenant-colonel Gage, and another of his officers. When he dropped, the confuſion of the few that remained turned it into a downright and very diſorderly flight acroſs a river which they had juſt paſſed, though no enemy appeared, or attempted to attac them. All the artillery, ammunition, and baggage of the army were left to enemy, and among the reſt, the general's cabinet, with all his letters and inſtructions, which the French court afterwards made great uſe of in their printed memorials or manifeſtoes. The loſs of the Engliſh in this unhappy affair amounted to 700 men. Their officers in particular, ſuffered much more than in the ordinary proportion of battles in Europe. Sir Peter Halket fell by the very firſt fire, at the head of his regiment; and the general's ſecretary, ſon to governor Shirley, was killed ſoon after. Neither the number of men which the enemy had in this engagement, nor the loſs which they ſuſtained, could be ſo much as gueſſed at: but the French afterwards gave out, that their number did not, in the whole, exceed 400 men, moſtly Indians; and that the loſs was quite inconſiderable, as it probably was, becauſe they lay concealed in ſuch a manner that the Engliſh knew not whether to point their muſkets. The panic of theſe laſt continued ſo long, that they never ſtopped till they met the rear diviſion; and even then they infected their troops with their terrours; ſo that the army retreated without ſtopping, till they reached Fort-Cumberland, though the enemy did not ſo much as attempt to purſue, nor even appeared in ſight, either in the battle or after the defeat. On the whole, this was perhaps the moſt extraordinary victory that ever was obtained, and the fartheſt flight that ever was made.

Had the ſhattered remains of this army continued at fort Cumberland, and fortified themſelves there, as they might eaſily have done during the reſt of the ſummer, they would have been ſuch a chec upon the French and their ſcalping Indians, as would have prevented many of thoſe ravages that were committed in the enſuing winter upon the weſtern borders of Virginia and Pennſylvania; but inſtead of taking that prudent ſtep, their commander left only the ſic and wounded at that fort, under the protection of two companies of the provincial militia, poſted there by way of garriſon, and began his march on the 2d of Auguſt, with about 1600 men, from Philadelphia; where thoſe troops could be of no immediate ſervice. From thence they were ordered away to Albany, in New-York, by general Shirley, on whom the chief command of the troops in America had devolved by the death of major-general Braddock. Virginia, Maryland, and Pennſylvania, were by theſe means left entirely to take care of themſelves, which they might have done effectually, had they been united in their councils; but the uſual diſputes, between their governors and aſſemblies, defeated every ſalutary plan that was propoſed. Pennſylvania, the moſt powerful of the three, was rendered quite impotent, either for its own defence, or that of its neighbours, by theſe unhappy conteſts; though at laſt, the aſſembly of that province, ſenſible of the danger to which they were expoſed, and ſeeing the abſolute neceſſity of providing a ſtanding military force, and of erecting ſome forts to defend their weſtern frontier, paſſed a bill for raiſing 50,000l. But this ſum, ſmall as it was, even to a degree of redicule, conſidering the richneſs of the province, and the extent of its frontier, could not be obtained; the governor poſitively refuſing to give his aſſent to the act of the aſſembly, becauſe they had taxed the proprietaries eſtates equally with thoſe of the inhabitants, which, he ſaid, he was ordered by his inſtructions not to conſent to, nor indeed any new tax upon the proprietaries; and the aſſembly conſiſting chiefly of members whoſe eſtates lay in the eaſtern or interior parts of the province, as poſitively refuſing to alter their bill. One would be apt to think, that in caſe of ſuch urgent neceſſity, the governor might have ventured to give his aſſent to the bill under a proteſt, that it ſhould not prejudice the rights of the proprietaries upon any future occaſion: but as he did not, the bill was dropped, and the province left defenceleſs; by which means it afterwards ſuffered ſeverely, to the deſtruction of many of the poor inhabitants upon the weſtern frontier, and to the impreſſing the Indians with a contemptible opinion of the Engliſh, and the higheſt eſteem of the French.

Our colonies to the north of Pennſylvania were more active, and more ſucceſsful in their preparations for war. New-York, following the example of New-England, paſſed an act to prohibit the ſending of proviſions to any French port or ſettlement on the continent of North-America, or any of the adjacent iſlands; and alſo for raiſing 45,000l. on eſtates real and perſonal, for the better defence of their colony, which lay more expoſed than any other to a French invaſion from Crown-Point. However, this ſum, great as it might ſeem to them, was far from being ſufficient; nor, indeed, could they have provided properly for their ſecurity, without the aſſiſtance of our other colonies to the eaſt of them; but with their help, and the additional ſuccour of the ſmall body of regular troops expected under colonel Dunbar, they boldly reſolved upon offenſive meaſures, which, when practicable, are always the ſafeſt; and two expeditions, one againſt the French fort at Crown-Point, and the other againſt their fort at Niagara, between the lakes Ontario and Erie, were ſet on foot at the ſame time. The former of theſe expeditions was appointed to be executed under the command of general Johnſon, a native of Ireland, who had long reſided upon the Mohock river, in the weſtern parts of New-York, where he had acquired a conſiderable eſtate, and was univerſally beloved, not only by the inhabitants, but alſo by the neighbouring Indians, whoſe language he had learnt, and whoſe affections he had gained by his humanity towards them. The expedition againſt Niagara was commanded by general Shirley himſelf.

The rendezvous of the troops for both theſe expeditions was appointed to be at Albany, where moſt of them arrived before the end of June: but the artillery, batteaux, proviſions and other neceſſaries for the attempt upon Crown-Point, could not be prepared till the 8th of Auguſt, when general Johnſon ſet out with them from Albany for the carrying-place from Hudſon's river to Lake-George. There the troops had already arrived, under the command of major-general Lyman, and conſiſted of between five and ſix thouſand men, beſides Indians, raiſed by the governments of Boſton and Connecticut, New-Hamſhire, Rhode-Iſland, and New-York. Every thing was then prepared as faſt as poſſible for a march; and towards the end of the month, general Johnſon advanced about 14 miles forward with his troops, and encamped in a very ſtrong ſituation, covered on each ſide by a thic wooded ſwamp, by Lake-George in his rear, and by a breaſt-work of trees, cut down for that purpoſe, in his front. Here he reſolved to wait the arrival of his batteaux, and after to proceed to Ticonderoga, at the other end of the lake, from whence it was about 15 miles to the fort at the ſouth end of Lake Corlaer, or Champlain, called Fort-Frederick by the French, and by us Crown-Point. Whilſt he was thus encamped, ſome of his Indian ſcouts, of which he took care to ſend out numbers along both ſides, and to the farther end of Lake-George, brought him intelligence that a conſiderable number of the enemy were then on their march from Ticonderoga, by the way of the ſouth bay, towards the fortified encampment, ſince called Fort-Edward, which general Lyman had built at the Carrying-place: and in which 4 or 500 of the New-Hampſhire and New-York men had been left as a garriſon. Upon this information general Johnſon ſent two expreſſes, one after the other, to colonel Blanchard, their commander, with orders to call in all his out parties, and to keep his whole force within the entrenchments. About 12 o'clock at night, thoſe who had been ſent upon the ſecond expreſs returned with an account of their having ſeen the enemy within four miles of the camp at the Carrying-place, which they ſcarcely doubted their having by that time attacked. Important as the defence of this place was for the ſafety of the whole army, and imminent as the danget ſeemed to be, it does not appear that the general then called any council of war, or reſolved upon any thing for its relief: but early the next morning he called a council, wherein it was unadviſedly reſolved to detach 1000 men, with a number of Indians, to intercept, or, as the general's expreſſion was in his letter, to catch the enemy in their retreat, either as victors, or as defeated in their deſign. This expedient was reſolved on, though no one knew the number of the enemy, nor could obtain any information in that reſpect from the Indian ſcouts, becauſe the Indians have no words or ſigns for expreſſing any large number, which, when it exeeds their reckoning, they ſignify by pointing to the ſtars in the firmament, or to the hair of their head; and this they often do to denote a number leſs then 1000, as well as to ſignify 10,000, or any greater number.

Between eight or nine o'clock in the morning 1000 men, with 200 Indians, were detached under the command of colonel Williams: but they had not been gone two hours, when thoſe in the camp began to hear a cloſe firing, at about 3 or 4 miles diſtance, as they judged: as it approached nearer and nearer, they rightly ſuppoſed that their detachment was overpowered, and retiring towards the camp; which was ſoon confirmed by ſome fugitives, and preſently after by whole companies, who fled bac in great confuſion. In a very ſhort time after, the enemy appeared marching in regular order up to the centre of the camp, where the conſternation was ſo great, that if they had attacked the breaſt-work directly, they might probably have thrown all into confuſion, and obtained an eaſy victory; but fortunately for the Engliſh, they had halted for ſome time about 150 yards diſtance, and from thence began their attac with platoon firing, too far off to do much hurt, eſpecially againſt troops who were defended by a ſtrong breaſt-work. On the contrary, this ineffectual fire ſerved only to raiſe the ſpirits of theſe laſt, who having prepared their artillery during the time that the French halted, began to play it ſo briſkly upon the enemy, that the Canadians and Indians in their ſervice fled immediately into the woods on each ſide of the camp, and they ſquatted under buſhes, or ſkulked behind trees, from whence they continued firing with very little execution, moſt of their ſhot being intercepted by the breaks and thickets, for they never had the courage to advance to the verge of the wood. Baron Dieſkau, who commanded the French, being thus left alone, with his regular troops, at the front of the camp, finding he could not make a cloſe attac upon the centre with his ſmall number of men, moved firſt to the left, and then to the right, at both which places he endeavoured to force a paſſage, but was repulſed, being unſupported by the irregulars. Inſtead of retreating, as he ought in prudence to have done, he ſtill continued his platoon and buſh-firing till 4 o'clock in the afternoon, during which time his regular troops ſuffered greatly by the fire from the camp, and were at laſt thrown into confuſion; which was no ſooner perceived by general Johnſon's men, then they, without waiting for orders, leaped over their breaſt-work, attacked the enemy on all ſides, and, after killing and taking a conſiderable number of them, entirely diſperſed the reſt. The French, whoſe numbers at the beginning of this engagement, amounted to about 2000 men, including 200 grenadiers, 800 Canadians, and the reſt Indians of different nations, had between 7 and 800 men killed, and 30 taken priſoners: among the latter was baron Dieſkau himſelf, whom they found at a little diſtance from the field of battle, dangerouſly wounded, and leaning on the ſtump of a tree for his ſupport. The Engliſh loſt about 200 men, and thoſe chiefly of the detachment under colonel Williams; for they had very few either killed or wounded in the attac upon their camp, and not any of diſtinction, except colonel Titcomb killed, and the general himſelf and major Nichols wounded. Among the ſlain of the detachment, which would probably have been entirely cut off had not lieutenant-colonel Cole been ſent out from the camp with 300 men, with which he ſtopped the enemy's purſuit, and covered the retreat of his friends, were colonel Williams, major Aſhley, ſix captains, and ſeveral ſubalterns, beſides private men; and the Indians reckoned that they had loſt 40 men, beſides the brave old Hendrick, the Mohock Sachem, or chief captain.

When baron Dieſkau ſet out from Ticonderogo, his deſign was only to ſurpriſe and cut off the entrenched camp, now called Fort-Edward, at the Carrying-place, where there were but 4 or 500 men. If he had executed this ſcheme, our army would have been thrown into great difficulties, for it could neither have proceeded farther, nor have ſubſiſted where it was, and he might have found an opportunity to attac it with great advantage in its retrent. But when he was within four or five miles of that fort, his people were informed that there were ſeveral cannon there, and none at the camp; upon which they all deſired to be led on to this laſt, which he the more readily conſented to, as he himſelf had been told by an Engliſh priſoner, who had left this camp but a few days before, that it was quite defenceleſs, being without any lines, and deſtitute of cannon; which, in effect, was true at that time, for the cannon did not arrive, nor was the breaſt-work erected, till about two days before the engagement. To this miſinformation, therefore, muſt be imputed this ſtep, which would otherwiſe be inconſiſtent with the general character and abilities of baron Dieſkau. A leſs juſtifiable error ſeems to have been committed by general Johnſon, in not detaching a party to purſue the enemy when they were defeated and fled. Perhaps he was prevented from ſo doing by the ill fate of the detachment he had ſent out in the morning under colonel Williams. However that may be, his neglect, in this reſpect, had like to have been fatal the next day to a detachment ſent from Fort-Edward, conſiſting of 120 men of the New-Hampſhire regiment, under captain M'Ginnes, as a re-enforcement to the army at the camp. This party fell in with between 3 and 400 men of Deiſkau's troops, near the ſpot where colonel Williams had been defeated the day before; but M'Ginnes having timely notice by his ſcouts of the approach of an enemy, made ſuch a diſpoſition, that he not only repulſed the aſſailants, but defeated and entirely diſperſed them, with the loſs only of two men killed, eleven wounded, and five miſſing. He himſelf unfortunately died of the wounds he received in this engagement, a few days after he arrived at the camp with his party.

It was now judged too late in the year to proceed to the attac of Crown-Point, as it would have been neceſſary, in that caſe, to build a ſtrong fort in the place where the camp then was, in order to ſecure a communication with Albany, from whence only the troops could expect to be re-enforced or ſupplied with freſh ſtores of ammunition or proviſions. They, therefore, ſet out upon their return ſoon after this engagement, having firſt erected a little ſtockaded fort at the hither end of Lake-George, in which they left a ſmall garriſon, as a future prey for the enemy; as a misfortune which might eaſily have been foreſeen, becauſe this whole army, being country militia, was to be diſbanded, and return to their reſpective homes, as they actually did ſoon after their retreat to Albany. This was all the glory, this all the advantage, that the Engliſh nation acquired by ſuch an expenſive expedition. But ſo little had the Engliſh been accuſtomed of late to hear of victory, that they rejoiced at this advantage, as if it had been an action of the greateſt conſequence. The general was highly applauded for his conduct, and liberally rewarded; for he was created a baronet by his majeſty, and preſented with 5000l. by the parliament.

The preparations for general Shirley's expedition againſt Niagara were not only deficient, but ſhamefully ſlow; though it was well known that even the poſſibility of his ſucceſs muſt, in a great meaſure, depend upon his ſetting out early in the year, as will appear to any perſon that conſiders the ſituation of our fort at Oſwego, this being the only way by which he could proceed to Niagara. Oſwego lies on the ſouth-eaſt ſide of the lake Ontario, near 300 miles almoſt due-weſt from Albany in New-York. The way to it from thence, though long and tedious, is the more convenient, as the far greateſt part of it admits of water-carriage, by what the inhabitants call batteaux, which are a kind of light flat-bottomed boats, wideſt in the middle, and pointed at each end, of about 1500 weight burden, and managed by two men, called batteau-men, with paddles and ſetting poles, the rivers being in many places too narrow to admit of oars. From Albany to the village of Shenectady, about 16 miles, is a good waggon-road. From thence to the little Falls in the Mohock river, being 65 miles, the paſſage is by water-carriage up that river, and conſequently againſt the ſtream, which in many places is ſomewhat rapid, and in others ſo ſhallow, that, when the river is low, the water-men are obliged to get out, and draw their batteaux over the riſts. At the little Falls is a poſtage, or land-carriage, for about a mile, over a ground ſo marſhy, that it will not bear any wheel-carriage: but a colony of Germans ſettled there, attend with ſledges, on which they draw the loaded batteaux to the next place of embarkation upon the ſame river. From thence they proceed by water up that river, for 50 miles, to the Carrying-place, near the head of it, where there is another poſtage, the length of which depends upon the dryneſs or wetneſs of the ſeaſon, but is generally above ſix or eight miles over in the ſummer months. Here the batteaux are again carried upon ſledges, till they come to a narrow river called Wood's Creek, down which they are wafted on a gentle ſtream, for about 40 miles, into the lake Oneyada, which ſtretches from eaſt to weſt about 30 miles, and is paſſed with great eaſe and ſafety in calm weather. At the weſtern end of this lake is the river Onondaga, which, after a courſe of between 20 or 30 miles, unites with the river Cayuga, or Seneca, and their united ſtreams run into the lake Ontario, at the place where Oſwego fort is ſituated. But this river is ſo rapid as to be ſometimes dangerous, beſides it being full of rifts and rocs; and about 12 miles on this ſide of Oſwego there is a fall of 11 feet perpendicular, where there is conſequently a poſtage, which however, does not exceed 40 yards. From thence the paſſage is eaſy quite to Oſwego. The lake Ontario, on which this fort ſtands, is near 280 leagues in circumference: its figure is oval, and its depth runs from 20 to 25 fathoms. On the north ſide of it are ſeveral little gulfs. There is a communication between this lake and that of the Hurons by the river Tanaſuate, from whence it is a land-carriage of ſix or eight leagues to the river Toronto, which falls into it. The French have two forts of conſequence on this lake; Frontenac, which commands the river St. Laurence, where the lake communicates with it; and Niagara, which commands the communication between the lake Ontario and the lake Erie. But of theſe forts, and this laſt lake, which is one of the fineſt in the world, we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter.

Though we had long been in poſſeſſion of fort Oſwego, and though it lay greatly expoſed to the French, particularly to thoſe of Canada, upon any rupture between the two nations, we had never taken care to render it tolerably defenſible, or even to build a ſingle veſſel fit for navigating the lake: nor was this ſtrange neglect ever taken effectual notice of, till the beginning of this year, when, at a meeting which general Braddock had in April with the governors and chief gentlemen of ſeveral of our colonies at Alexandria, in Virginia, it was reſolved to ſtrengthen both the fort and garriſon at Oſwego, and to build ſome large veſſels at that place, accordingly, a number of ſhip-wrights and workmen were ſent thither in May and June. At the ſame time captain Bradſtreet marched thither with two companies of 100 men each, to re-enforce the 100 that were there before under captain King, to which number the garriſon had been increaſed ſince our conteſts with France began to grow ſerious. For a long time before, not above 25 men were left to defend this poſt, which from its great importance, and the ſituation of affairs at this juncture, moſt certainly required a much ſtronger garriſon than was put into it even at this juncture: but œconomy was the chief thing conſulted in the beginning of this war, and to that, in a great meaſure, was owing its long duration.

From the above deſcription of the paſſage from Albany to Oſwego, it is plain how neceſſary it was that the troops intended for this expedition ſhould have ſet out early in the ſpring. But, inſtead of that, the very firſt of them, colonel Schuyler's New-Jerſey regiment, did not begin their march till after the beginning of July; and juſt as Shirley's and Pepperell's regiments were preparing to follow, the melancholy account of Braddock's diſaſter arrived at Albany, where it ſo damped the ſpirits of the people, and ſpread ſuch a terror, that many of the troops deſerted, and moſt of the batteau-men diſperſed, and ran home, by which means even all the neceſſary ſtores could not be carried along with the troops. Notwithſtanding this diſappointment, general Shirley ſet out from Albany before the end of July, with as many of the troops and ſtores as he could procure a conveyance for, hoping to be joined in his route by great numbers of the Indians of the Six Nations, to whom he ſent invitations to that effect as he paſſed by their ſettlements: but they, inſtead of complying with his deſire, abſolutely declared againſt all hoſtilities on that ſide of the country; and inſiſted that Oſwego, being a place of traffic and peace, ought not to be diſturbed either by the Engliſh or the French, as if they could have perſuaded both parties to agree to ſuch a local truce. Upon this refuſal, mr. Shirley proceeded forward, being joined by very few Indians, and arrived at Oſwego on the 17th or 18th of Auguſt; but the reſt of the troops and artillery did not arrive till the laſt day of that month; and even then, their ſtore of proviſions was not ſufficient to enable them to proceed againſt Niagara, though ſome tolerable good veſſels had by this time been built and got ready for that purpoſe. The general now reſolved to take but 600 men with him for the attac of Niagara, and to leave the reſt of his army, conſiſting of about 1400 more, at Oſwego, to defend that place, in caſe the French ſhould attac it in his abſence, which there was reaſon to apprehend they might, as they had then a conſiderable force at Fort Frontenac, from whence they could eaſily croſs over the lake Ontario to Oſwego. However, he was ſtill obliged to wait at Oſwego for proviſions, of which at length a ſmall ſupply arrived on the 26th of September, barely ſufficient to ſupport his men during their intended expedition, and to allow 12 days ſhort ſubſiſtence for thoſe he left behind. But by this time the rainy boiſterous ſeaſon had begun, on which account moſt of his Indians had already left him, and were returned home; and the few that remained with him declared that there was no croſſing the lake Ontorio in batteaux at that ſeaſon, or any time before the next ſummer. In this perplexity he called a council of war, which, after weighing all circumſtances, unanimouſly reſolved to defer the attempt upon Niagara till the next year, and to employ the troops, whilſt they remained at Oſwego, in building barracs, and erecting, or at leaſt beginning to erect, two new forts, one on the eaſt ſide of the river Onondaga, 450 yards diſtant from the old fort, which it was to command, as well as the entrance of the harbour, and to be called Ontario-fort; and the other 450 yards weſt of the old fort, to be called Oſwego new fort.

Theſe things being agreed on, general Shirley, with the greateſt part of the troops under his command, ſet out on his return to Albany on the 24th of October, leaving colonel Mercer, with a garriſon of about 700 men, at Oſwego; though repeated advice had been received, that the French had then at leaſt 1000 men at their fort of Frontenac, upon the ſame lake: and, what was ſtill worſe, the new forts were not yet near compleated; but left to be finiſhed by the hard labour of colonel Mercer and his little garriſon, with the addition of this melancholy circumſtance, that, if beſieged by the enemy in the winter, it would not be poſſible for his friends to come to his aſſiſtance. Thus ended this year's unfortunate campaign, during which the French, with the aſſiſtance of their Indian allies, continued their murders, ſcalping, captivating, and laying waſte the weſtern frontiers of Virginia and Pennſylvania, during the whole winter.

The miniſters of the two jarring powers were very buſily employed this year at moſt of the courts of Europe; but their tranſactions were kept extremely ſecret. The French endeavoured to inſpire the Spaniards with a jealouſy of the ſtrength of the Engliſh by ſea, eſpecially in America; and the Spaniſh court ſeemed inclined to accept of the office of mediator; but mr. Wall, who was perfectly well acquainted with the ſtate of affairs between England and France, ſeconded the repreſentations of the Britiſh miniſtry, which demonſtrated, that however willing Great-Britain might be to accept of the mediation of Spain, ſhe could not agree to any ſuſpenſion of arms in America, which France inſiſted on as a preliminary condition, without hazarding the whole of her intereſt there; and that the captures which had been made by the Engliſh were the neceſſary conſequence of the encroachments and injuſtice of the French, particularly in that country. Upon this remonſtrance, all further talk of the mediation of Spain was dropped, and the miniſtry of Verſailles had recourſe to the princes of Germany; amongſt whom the elector of Cologn was ſoon brought over to their party, ſo as to conſent to their forming magazines in his territories in Weſtphalia. This was a plain indication of their deſign againſt Hanover, which they ſoon after made his Britannick majeſty, who was then at Hanover, an offer of ſparing, if he would agree to certain conditions of neutrality for that electorate, which he rejected with diſdain. Then the count D'Aubeterre, envoy extraordinary from France at the court of Vienna, propoſed a ſecret negotiation with the miniſters of the empreſs-queen. The ſecret articles of the treaty of Peterſburgh, between the two empreſſes had ſtipulated a kind of partition of the Pruſſian territories, in caſe that prince ſhould infringe the treaty of Dreſden; but his Britannick majeſty, though often invited, had always refuſed to agree to any ſuch ſtipulation; and the king of Poland, howſoever he might be inclined to favour the ſcheme, did not dare to avow it formally, till matters ſhould be more ripe for carrying it into execution. The court of Vienna, whoſe favourite meaſure this was, began to liſten to D'Aubeterre's inſinuations, and by degrees entered into negotiations with him, which in the end, were productive of that unnatural confederacy between the empreſs-queen and the king of France, of which further notice will be taken in the occurences of the next year, when the treaty between them, into which they afterwards found means ſecretly to bring the empreſs of Ruſſia, was concluded at Verſailles.

The king of England taking it for granted that the French would invade Hanover, in conſequence of the rupture with Great-Britain, which ſeemed to be near at hand, began to take meaſures for the defence of that electorate. To this end, during his ſtay at Hanover, he concluded, on the 18th of June, a treaty with the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, by which his ſerene highneſs engaged to hold in readineſs, during four years, for his majeſty's ſervice, a body of 8000 men, to be employed, if required, upon the continent, or in Britain or Ireland; but not on board the fleet, or beyond the ſeas; and alſo, if his Britannick majeſty ſhould judge it neceſſary or advantageous for his ſervice, to furniſh and join to this body of 8000 men, within ſix months after they ſhould be demanded, 4000 more, of which 700 were to be horſe or dragoons, and each regiment of infantry to have two field pieces of cannon*. Another treaty was begun with Ruſſia about the ſame time; but this did not take effect during his majeſty's reſidence at Hanover: that others were not concluded was the more ſurpriſing, as our ſubſidy treaty with Saxony had then expired, and that with Bavaria was near expiring, and as the ſecuring of theſe two princes in our intereſt was at leaſt as neceſſary towards forming a ſufficient confederacy upon the continent for the defence of Hanover, as it was to ſecure the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel. If the reaſon of their not being engaged, and no other ſeems ſo probable, was, that they refuſed to renew their treaties with England upon any terms, all that can be ſaid is, that they were guilty of flagrant ingratitude, as they had both received a ſubſidy from this kingdom for many years in time of peace, when they neither were nor could be of any ſervice to the intereſt of Great-Britain.

On the 15th of July an expreſs arrived from admiral Boſcawen, with an account of his having taken the two French ſhips of war, the Alcide and the Lys. This was certainly contrary to the expectation of the court of France; for had they apprehended any ſuch attac, they would not have ordered mr. M'Namara to return to Breſt with the chief part of their ſquadron; nor was it, perhaps, leſs contrary to the expectation of ſome of our own miniſtry: but as matters had been carried ſo far, it was then too late to retreat; and, therefore, orders were ſoon after given to all our ſhips of war to make repriſals upon the French, by taking their ſhips wherever they ſhould meet them. Sir Edward Hawke ſailed from Portſmouth on the 21ſt of July, with 18 ſhips of war, to watch the return of the French fleet from America, which, however, eſcaped him, and arrived at Breſt on the 3d day of September. Commodore Frankland ſailed from Spithead for the Weſt-Indies on the 13th of Auguſt with four ſhips of war, furniſhed with orders to commit hoſtilities, as well as to protect our trade and ſugar-iſlands from any inſult that the French might offer; and the duke de Mirepoix, their embaſſador at the court of London, ſet out for Paris on the 22d of July, without taking leave.

A war being thus in ſome meaſure begun, his majeſty thought proper, perhaps for that reaſon, to return to his Britiſh dominions ſooner than uſual; for he left Hanover on the 8th of September, and arrived on the 15th at Kenſington, where the treaty of alliance between him and the empreſs of Ruſſia, which he had begun during his abſence, was concluded on the 30th of the ſame month. By this treaty her Ruſſian majeſty engaged to hold in readineſs in Livonia, upon the frontiers of Lithuania, a body of troops conſiſting of 40,000 infantry, with the neceſſary artillery, and 15,000 cavalry; and alſo on the coaſts of the ſame province, 40 or 50 galleys, with the neceſſary crews; to be ready to act, upon the firſt order, in his majeſty's ſervice, in caſe, ſaid the fifth article, which was the moſt remarkable, that the dominions of his Britannick majeſty in Germany ſhould be invaded on account of the intereſts or diſputes which regard his kingdoms; her imperial majeſty declaring that ſhe would look upon ſuch an invaſion as a caſe of the alliance of the year 1742; and that the ſaid dominions ſhould be therein compriſed in this reſpect: but neither theſe troops nor gallies were to be put in motion, unleſs his Britannick majeſty, or his allies, ſhould be ſomewhere attacked; in which caſe the Ruſſian general ſhould march, as ſoon as poſſible after requiſition, to make a diverſion with 30,000 infantry and 15,000 cavalry; and ſhould embark on board the gallies the other 10,000 infantry, to make a deſcent according to the exigency of the affair. On the other ſide, his Britannick majeſty engaged to pay to her Ruſſian majeſty an annual ſubſidy of 100,000l. ſterling a-year, each year to be paid in advance, and to be reckoned from the day of the exchange of the ratifications, to the day that theſe troops ſhould upon requiſition march out of Ruſſia; from which day the annual ſubſidy to her imperial majeſty was to be 500,000l. ſterling, to be paid always four months in advance, until the troops ſhould return into the Ruſſian dominions, and for three months after their return. His Britannick majeſty, who was to be at liberty to ſend once every year into the ſaid province of Livonia a commiſſary, to ſee and examine the number and condition of the ſaid troops, further engaged, that, in caſe her Ruſſian majeſty ſhould be diſturbed in this diverſion, or attacked herſelf, he would furniſh immediately the ſuccour ſtipulated in the treaty of 1742; and that, in caſe a war ſhould break out, he would ſend into the Baltic a ſquadron of his ſhips, of a force ſuit-

* The king, on his ſide, promiſed to pay to the landgrave for theſe ſuccours, 80 crowns banco, by way of levy-money, for every trooper or dragoon duly armed and mounted, and 30 crowns banco for every foot ſoldier; the crown to be reckoned at 53 ſols of Holland, or at 4s. 9¾d. Engliſh money: and alſo to pay to his ſerene highneſs, for the 8000 men, an annual ſubſidy of 150,000 crowns banco, during the four years, to commence from the day of ſigning the treaty, which ſubſidy was to be increaſed to 300,000 crowns yearly, from the time of requiring the troops, to the time of their entering into Britiſh pay, and in caſe of their being diſmiſſed, the ſaid ſubſidy of 300,000 crowns was then to revive and be continued during the reſidue of the term: but if 12,000 men were demanded and furniſhed, the ſubſidy was then to be increaſed in proportion: and in caſe the king of Great-Britain ſhould at any time think fit to ſend back theſe troops, before the expiration of the treaty, notice thereof was to be given to his ſerene highneſs three months beforehand; one month's pay was to be allowed them for their return, and they were to be furniſhed gratis with the neceſſary tranſport veſſels.

able to the circumſtances. This was the chief ſubſtance of the treaty, which by agreement of both parties, was to ſubſiſt for four years from the exchange of the ratifications: but in the ſeventh article theſe words were unluckily inſerted: 'conſidering alſo the proximity of the countries wherein the diverſion in queſtion will probably be made, and the facility her troops will probably have of ſubſiſting immediately in an enemy's country, ſhe takes upon herſelf alone, during ſuch a diverſion, the ſubſiſtence and treatment of the ſaid troops by ſea and land.' And in the 11th article it was ſtipulated, that all the plunder the Ruſſian army ſhould take from the enemy ſhould belong to them. That his Britannick majeſty, who now knew enough of the court of Vienna to be ſenſible that he could expect no aſſiſtance from thence, in caſe his German dominions were invaded, ſhould enter into this convention with the empreſs of Ruſſia, in order to ſtrengthen his defence upon the continent, was extremely natural; eſpecially as he had lately lived in great friendſhip with her, and her tranſactions with the court of France had been ſo ſecret, by paſſing through only that of Vienna, that he had not yet been informed of them; neither had the project of the treaty of Verſailles then come to his knowledge, or to that of the king of Pruſſia, nor had either of theſe princes yet made any formal advances to the other.

The firſt intimation that appeared publicly of the negotiations of France with the empreſs of Germany, was, when the French miniſter, count d'Aubeterre, declared at Vienna, 'that the warlike deſigns with which the king his maſter was charged, were ſufficiently confuted by his great moderation, of which all Europe had manifold proofs: that his majeſty was perſuaded this groundleſs charge had given as much indignation to their imperial majeſties as to himſelf: that he was firmly reſolved to preſerve to Chriſtendom that tranquillity which it enjoyed through his good faith, in religiouſly obſerving the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle: but that if his Britannick majeſty's allies ſhould take part in the war which was kindled in America, by furniſhing ſuccours to the Engliſh, his majeſty would be authoriſed to conſider and treat them as principals in it.' France likewiſe made the ſame declaration to other courts.

The words and ſtipulation in the above recited clauſe, in the 7th article of the treaty of Great-Britain with Ruſſia, were looked on as a menace levelled at the king of Pruſſia, who, having ſome time after found means to procure a copy of this treaty, and ſeeing it in that light, boldly declared, by his miniſters at all the courts of Europe, that he would oppoſe with his utmoſt force the entrance of any foreign troops into the empire, under any pretence whatever. This declaration was particularly diſpleaſing to the French, who had already marched large bodies of troops towards the frontiers of the empire, and erected ſeveral great magazines in Weſtphalia, with the permiſſion of the elector of Cologn, for which the Engliſh miniſter at his court was, in Auguſt, ordered to withdraw from thence without taking leave. However, as ſoon as this declaration of the king of Pruſſia was notified to the court of Verſailles, they ſent an embaſſador extraordinary, the duke of de Nivernois, to Berlin, to try to perſuade his majeſty to retract his declaration, and enter into a new alliance with them. His Pruſſian majeſty received this embaſſador in ſuch a manner as ſeemed to denote a diſpoſition to agree to every thing he had to propoſe. This awakened in England a jealouſy that his declaration alone was not to be relied on, but that it was neceſſary to bring him under ſome ſolemn engagement; eſpecially as the French had by this time a numerous army near the Lower-Rhine, with magazines provided for their march all the way to Hanover; and if the king of Pruſſia ſuffered them to paſs through his dominion, that electorate muſt be ſwallowed up before the Ruſſian auxiliaries could poſſibly be brought thither, or any army be formed for protecting it.[t] For this reaſon a negotiation was ſet on foot by Great-Britain at Berlin; but as it was not concluded before the beginning of the next year, we ſhall defer entering into the particulars of it, till we come to that period.

Mean while the French made another attempt upon the court of Madrid, loudly complaining of the taking of their two men of war by Boſcawen's ſquadron; before any declaration of war was made, repreſenting it as a moſt unjuſtifiable proceeding, which threatened a diſſolution of all faith amongſt nations. This produced a ſtrong memorial from ſir Benjamin Keene, our miniſter at that court, importing, 'that it was well known that the French fleet carried troops, ammunition, and every thing neceſſary for defending the countries which the French had unjuſtly uſurped in America, and of which the Engliſh claimed the property: that the rules of ſelf-defence authorize every nation to render fruitleſs any attempt that may tend to its prejudice; that this right had been made uſe of only in taking the two French ſhips of war; and that the diſtinction of place might be interpreted in favour of the Engliſh, ſeeing the two ſhips were taken on the coaſts of the countries where the conteſts aroſe.' In anſwer to this obſervation, the French miniſter repreſented the vaſt number of ſhips that had been taken in the European ſeas; for in fact the Engliſh ports ſoon began to be filled with them, in conſequence of the general orders for making repriſals. But the court of Madrid was ſo far from being perſuaded by any thing he could ſay, that it gave his Britannick majeſty the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of its friendſhip, and of its intention to take no part in the differences between him and France, but ſuch as ſhould be conciliatory, and tending to reſtore the public tranquillity.

On the other hand, his Britannick majeſty required, as king of Great-Britain, the auxiliaries ſtipulated to him by treaty from the empreſs-queen. But theſe were refuſed, under pretence, that as the conteſt between him and France related to America only, it was not a caſe of the alliance; though at the ſame time the French made no ſcruple of owning, that they intended to make a powerful deſcent on Great-Britain early in the ſpring. When, a little while after, France being employed in making great preparations for a land war in Europe, the king of England required her to defend her own poſſeſſions, the barrier in the Low-Countries, with the number of men ſtipulated by treaty, which countries, acquired by Engliſh blood and Engliſh treaſure, had been given to her on that expreſs condition, ſhe declared that ſhe could not ſpare troops for that purpoſe, on account of her dangerous enemy the king of Pruſſia: and afterwards, when he was ſecured by his treaty with England, ſhe urged that as a reaſon for her reliance with France. It muſt be owned, however, for the ſake of hiſtorical truth, that this was no bad reaſon, conſidering the power, the genius, and the character of that prince, who hovered over her dominions with an army of 150,000 veterans. It muſt likewiſe be owned that ſhe undertook to procure the French king's conſent to a neutrality for Hanover, which would have effectually ſecured that electorate from the invaſion of every other power but Pruſſia itſelf; and it is no ſtrained conjecture to ſuppoſe that the dread of this very power was the true ſource of thoſe connexions in Germany, which entailed ſuch a ruinous continental war upon Great-Britain.

Though the Engliſh continued to make repriſals upon the French, not only in the ſeas of America, but alſo in thoſe in Europe, by taking every ſhip they could meet with, and detaining them, their cargoes, and crews; yet the French, whether from a conſciouſneſs of their want of power by ſea, or that they might have a more plauſible plea to repreſent England as the aggreſſor, were ſo far from returning theſe hoſtilities, that their fleet, which eſcaped ſir Edward Hawke, having, on the 13th of Auguſt, taken the Blandford ſhip of war with governor Lyttelton on board, going to Carolina, they ſet the governor at liberty, as ſoon as the court was informed of the ſhip's being brought into Nantes, and ſhortly after releaſed both the ſhip and crew. However, at the ſame time, their preparations for a land war ſtill went on with great diligence, and their utmoſt arts and efforts were fruitleſly exerted to perſuade the Spaniards and Dutch to join with them againſt Great-Britain.

In England the preparations by ſea became greater than ever; ſeveral new ſhips of war were put in commiſſion, and many others taken into the ſervice of the government: the exportation of gunpowder was forbid: the bounties to ſeamen were continued, and the number of thoſe that either entered voluntarily, or were preſſed, increaſed daily, as did alſo the captures from the French, among which was the Eſperance, of 70 guns, taken as ſhe was going from Rochefort to Breſt to be manned. The land-forces of Great-Britain were likewiſe ordered to be augmented; ſeveral new regiments were raiſed, and all half-pay officers, and the out-penſioners belonging to Chelſea-hoſpital, were directed to ſend in their names, ages, and time of ſervice, in order that ſuch of them as were yet able to ſerve might be employed again if wanted. The Engliſh navy, ſo early as in the month of September of this year, conſiſted of one ſhip of 110 guns, five of 100 guns each, thirteen of 90, eight of 80, five of 74, twenty-nine of 70, four of 66, one of 64, thirty-three of 60, three of 54, twenty-eight of 50, four of 44, thirty-five of 40, and forty-two of 20, four ſloops of war of 18 guns each, two of 16, eleven of 14, thirteen of 12, and one of 10, beſides a number of bomb-ketches, fire-ſhips, and tenders; a force ſufficient to oppoſe the united maritime ſtrength of all the powers in Europe; whilſt that of the French, even at the end of this year, and including the ſhips then upon the ſtocs, amounted to no more than ſix ſhips of 80 guns, twenty-one of 74, one of 72, four of 74, thirty-one of 64, two of 60, ſix of 50, and thirty-two frigates.

[t] Perhaps the elector of Hanover was more afraid of the Pruſſian monarch than the moſt Chriſtian king, knowing with what eaſe and rapidity this enterprizing neighbour could in a few days ſubdue the whole electorate.

Such was the ſituation of the two kingdoms, when, on the 13th of November, the parliament met, and his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he acquainted them, 'That the moſt proper meaſures had been taken to protect our poſſeſſions in America, and to regain ſuch parts thereof as had been encroached upon, or invaded; that to preſerve his people from the calamities of war, as well as to prevent a general war from being lighted up in Europe, he had been always ready to accept reaſonable and honourable terms of accommodation, but that none ſuch had been propoſed by France: that he had alſo confined his views and operations to hinder France from making new encroachments, or ſupporting thoſe already made; to exert his people's right to a ſatisfaction for hoſtilities committed in a time of profound peace, and to diſappoint ſuch deſigns, as, from various appearances and preparations, there was reaſon to think had been formed againſt his kingdoms and dominions: that the king of Spain earneſtly wiſhed the preſervation of the public tranquillity, and had given aſſurances of his intention to continue in the ſame pacific ſentiments: that he himſelf had greatly increaſed his naval armaments, and augmented his land forces in ſuch a manner as might be leſt burthenſome; and finally, that he had concluded a treaty with the empreſs of Ruſſia, and another with the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, which ſhould be laid before them.'

In anſwer to this ſpeech, both houſes voted moſt loyal addreſſes, but not without a warm oppoſition in each, to ſome of the particular expreſſions, for it having been propoſed in the houſe of lords to inſert in their addreſs the words following, viz. 'That they looked upon themſelves as obliged, by the ſtrongeſt ties of duty, gratitude, and honour, to ſtand by and ſupport his majeſty in all ſuch wiſe and neceſſary meaſures and engagements as his majeſty might have taken in vindication of the rights of his crown, or to defeat any attempts which might be made by France, in reſentment for ſuch meaſures, and to aſſiſt his majeſty in diſappointing or repelling all ſuch enterprizes as might be formed, not only againſt his kingdoms, but alſo againſt any other of his dominions (though not belonging to the crown of Great-Britain) in caſe they ſhould be attacked on account of the part which his majeſty had taken for maintaining the eſſential intereſts of his kingdoms;' the inſerting of theſe words in their addreſs was oppoſed by earl Temple, and ſeveral other lords; becauſe, by the firſt part of them, they engaged to approve of the treaties with Ruſſia and Heſſe-Caſſel, neither of which they had ever ſeen, nor could it be ſuppoſed that either of them could be of any advantage to this nation; and by the ſecond part of theſe words it ſeemed to be reſolved to engage this nation in a continental connexion for the defence of Hanover, which it was impoſſible for England to ſupport, and which would be ſo far from being of any advantage to it at ſea, or in America, that it might at laſt diſable the nation from defending itſelf in either of thoſe parts of the world. But upon putting the queſtion, the inſerting of theſe words was agreed to by a great majority, and accordingly they ſtand as part of the addreſs of the houſe upon that occaſion.

To this remarkable addreſs his majeſty returned the following as remakable anſwer; 'my lords, I give you my hearty thanks for this dutiful and affectionate addreſs. I ſee, with the greateſt ſatisfaction, the zeal you expreſs for my perſon and government, and for the true intereſt of your country, which I am determined to adhere to. The aſſurances which you give me for the defence of my territories abroad are a ſtrong proof of your affection for me, and regard for my honour. Nothing ſhall divert me from purſuing thoſe meaſures which will effectually maintain the poſſeſſions and rights of my kingdoms, and procure reaſonable and honourable terms of accommodation.' The addreſs of the houſe of commons breathed the ſame ſpirit of zeal and gratitude, and was full of the warmeſt aſſurances of a ready ſupport of his majeſty, and of his foreign dominions, if attacked in his reſentment of his maintaining the rights of his crown and kingdom; and his majeſty's anſwer to it was to the ſame effect as that to the houſe of lords. The ſame, or nearly the ſame words, relating to the treaties concluded by his majeſty, and to the defence of his foreign dominions, were propoſed to be inſerted in this addreſs. which was oppoſed by William Pitt, eſq. then paymaſter of his majeſty's forces; the right hon. Henry Legge, eſq. then chancellor and under-treaſurer of his majeſty's exchequer, and one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury; and by ſeveral other gentlemen in high poſts under the government, as well as by many others: but, upon putting the queſtion, it was by a conſiderable majority agreed to inſert the words objected to; and very ſoon after, mr Pitt, mr Legge, and moſt, if not all, of the gentlemen who had appeared in the oppoſition, were diſmiſſed from their employments. In the mean time, a draft came over from Ruſſia for part of the new ſubſidy ſtipulated to that crown; but ſome of the miniſtry, who were then at the head of the finances, refuſed to pay it, at leaſt before the treaty ſhould be approved of by parliament.

Sir Thomas Robinſon had not been long in poſſeſſion of the office of ſecretary of ſtate, before it was generally perceived, that though an honeſt, well-meaning man, and a favourite with the king, his abilities were not equal to the functions of that poſt. Much leſs were they ſo at this juncture, when the nation was on the point of being engaged in a difficult and expenſive war, and plunged into foreign meaſures and connexions, which would require the utmoſt ſkill of an able politician to render them palatable to the people. Mr Pitt and mr. Fox, though they ſcarce ever agreed in any other particular, had generally united in oppoſing his meaſures, and their ſuperior influence in the houſe of commons, and univerſally acknowledged abilities, though of different kinds, had always prevailed, uncommon as it was, to ſee two perſons who held conſiderable places under the government, one of them being paymaſter-general, and the other ſecretary at war, oppoſe upon almoſt every occaſion, a ſecretary of ſtate, who was ſuppoſed to know and ſpeak the ſentiments of his maſter. Sir Thomas himſelf ſoon grew ſenſible of his want of ſufficient weight in the ſenate of the nation; and therefore, of his own accord, on the 10th of November, wiſely and dutifully reſigned the ſeals of his office to his majeſty, who delivered them to mr. Fox, and appointed ſir Thomas Maſter of the wardrobe, with a penſion to him during his life, and after his death to his ſons. Lord Barrington ſucceeded mr. Fox as ſecretary at war; and ſoon after ſir George Lyttelton was made chancellor of the exchequer, and a lord of the treaſury, in the room of mr. Legge, who had declared himſelf againſt the new continental ſyſtem. However, notwithſtanding theſe changes in the miniſtry, very warm debates aroſe in both houſes, when the treaties of Ruſſia and Heſſe-Caſſel came to be conſidered by them: ſome of the members were for referring them to a committee; but this motion was over-ruled, in conſideration of his majeſty's having engaged in them to guard againſt a ſtorm that ſeemed ready to break upon his electoral dominions merely on account of our quarrel with the French. They were at length approved of by a majority of 318 againſt 126, in the houſe of commons; and by 84 againſt 11, in the houſe of lords.

The houſe of commons then proceeded to provide for the ſervice of the enſuing years and for the deficiencies of the proviſions for the former. Fifty thouſand ſeamen, including 9138 marines, were voted, on the 24th of November, for the ſervice of the year 1756, together with 2,600,000l. for their maintenance, and 34,263 land ſoldiers, 930,603l. 6s. 9d. for their ſupport. One hundred thouſand pounds were voted as a ſubſidy to the empreſs of Ruſſia; 54,140l. 12s. 6d. to the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel; and 10,000l. to the elector of Bavaria.

During theſe tranſactions, the public was overwhelmed with conſternation, by the tidings of a dreadful earthquake, which, on the 1ſt of November, ſhook all Spain and Portugal, and many other places in Europe, and laid the city of Liſbon in ruins. When the news of this great calamity firſt reached England, it was feared the conſequences of it might affect our public credit, conſidering the vaſt intereſt which the Engliſh merchants had in the Portugueſe trade: but fortunately, it afterwards proved inconſiderable, in compariſon of what had been apprehended: the quarter in which the Engliſh chiefly lived, and where they had their warehouſes, having ſuffered the leaſt of any part of the city; and moſt of the Engliſh merchants then reſiding there, together with their families, being at their country houſes, to avoid the inſults to which they might have been expoſed from the Portugueſe populace, during the celebration of their Auto-da-fe, which was kept that very day. The two firſt ſhocs of this dreadful viſitation continued near a quarter of an hour, after which the water of the river Tagus roſe perpendicularly above 20 feet, and ſubſided to its natural bed in leſs than a minute. Great numbers of houſes, of which this city then contained about 36,000, extending in length near ſix miles, in form of a creſcent, on the aſcent of a hill, upon the north ſhore of the mouth of the river Tagus, within nine miles from the ocean, were thrown down by the repeated commotions of the earth, together with ſeveral magnificent churches, monaſtries, and public buildings. But what entirely completed the ruin of this then moſt opulent capital of the Portugueſe dominions, was a devouring conflagration, partly fortuitous or natural, but chiefly occaſioned by a ſet of impious villains, who unawed by the tremendous ſcene at that very inſtant paſſing before their eyes, with a wickedneſs ſcarcely to be credited, ſet fire even to the falling edifices in different parts of the city, to increaſe the general confuſion, that they might have the better opportunity to rob and plunder their already deſolate fellow-citizens. Out of 350,000 inhabitants, which Liſbon was then ſuppoſed to contain, about 10,000 periſhed by the calamity; and the ſurvivors, deprived of their habitations, and deſtitute even of the neceſſaries of life, where forced to ſeek for ſhelter in the open fields.

As ſoon as his majeſty received an account of this deplorable event, from his embaſſador at the court of Madrid, he ſent a meſſage to both houſes of parliament, on the 28th of November, acquainting them therewith, and deſiring their concurrence and aſſiſtance towards ſpeedily relieving the the unhappy ſufferers; and the parliament thereupon, to honour of Britiſh humanity, unanimouſly voted, on the 8th of December, a gift of 100,000l. for the diſtreſſed people of Portugal. A circumſtance which enhances the merit of this action is, that though the Engliſh themſelves were, at that very time, in great want of grain, a conſiderable part of the ſum was ſent in corn, flour, rice, and a large quantity of beef from Ireland; ſupples which came very ſeaſonably for the poor Portugueſe, who were in actual want of the neceſſaries of life. The king was ſo affected by this inſtance of Britiſh generoſity, that, to ſhow his gratitude for the timely relief, he ordered mr. Caſtres, the Britiſh reſident at his court to give the preference, in the diſtribution of theſe ſupplies, to the Britiſh ſubjects who had ſuffered by the earthquake; accordingly, about a thirtieth part of the proviſions, and 2000l. in money, was ſet apart for that purpoſe; and the Portugueſe majeſty returned his thanks, in very warm terms, to the Britiſh crown and nation.

The report of an intended invaſion of theſe kingdoms by the French increaſed daily; on the 22d day of January lord Barrington, as ſecretary at war, laid before the houſe an eſtimate for defraying the charge of 10 new regiments of foot, over and above 34,263 land ſoldiers before ordered to be raiſed; and a ſum of 91,919l. 10s. was voted for theſe additional forces: upon another eſtimate preſented a little after by the ſame lord, and founded upon the ſame reaſons, for raiſing, for the further defence of the kingdom, 11 troops of light dragoons, 49,628l. 11s. 3d. were voted for the enſuing year; together with 81,178l. 16s. for a regiment of foot to be raiſed in North-America: 298,534l. 17s. 10½d. for the maintenance of our forces already eſtabliſhed in our American colonies; and 79,915l. 6s. for ſix regiments of foot from Ireland, to ſerve in North-America and the Eaſt-Indies. Beſides all theſe ſupplies, mr. Fox, on the 28th of January, preſented to the houſe a meſſage from the king, deſiring them to take into conſideration the faithful ſervices of the people of New-England, and of ſome other parts of North-America; upon which 115,000l. more were voted, and 5000l. as a reward to ſir William Johnſon in particular. In ſhort, including ſeveral other ſums, as well for defraying the expence of the army and navy, as for a ſubſidy of 20,000l. to the king of Pruſſia, and 121,447ls. 2s. 6d. for Hanoverian troops, of which two laſt articles further notice will be taken hereafter, the whole of the ſupplies granted by parliament in this ſeſſion amounted to 7,229,117l. 4s. 6¾d. For raiſing this ſum, beſides the malt-tax, and the land-tax of 4s. in the pound, the whole produce of the ſinking-fund, from the 5th of January 1756, till it ſhould amount to 1,555,955l. 11s. 11½d. was ordered to be applied thereunto; together with a million to be raiſed by loans, or exchequer-bills, at 3 per cent. intereſt; 1,500,000l. to be raiſed by the ſale of redeemable annuities, at 3 and a half per cent. and 500,000l. to be raiſed by a lottery, at 3 per cent. All which ſums, with 83,412l. 2s. 5½d. then remaining in the Exchequer, amounted to 7,427,261l. 5s. 7d.

The clauſe inſerted in the mutiny bill laſt year, ſubjecting all officers and ſoldiers raiſed in America, by authority of the reſpective governors or governments there, to the ſame rules and articles of war, and the ſame penalties and puniſhments, as the Britiſh forces were liable to; the act paſſed at the ſame time for regulating the marine forces, while on ſhore; and that for the more ſpeedy and effectual manning of his majeſty's navy, were not only confirmed now; but it was further enacted, with reſpect to this laſt, as well as for the more ſpeedy and effectual recruiting of his majeſty's land-forces. That the commiſſioners appointed by the preſent act ſhould be empowered to raiſe and levy, within their reſpective juriſdictions, ſuch able-bodied men as did not follow any lawful calling or employment: or had not ſome other lawful and ſufficient ſupport; and might order, wherever and whenever they pleaſed, a general ſearch to be made for ſuch perſons, in order to their being brought before them to be examined; nay, that the pariſh or town officers might, without any ſuch order, ſearch for and ſecure ſuch perſons, in order to convey them before the ſaid commiſſioners to be examined: that if any three commiſſioners ſhould find any perſon, ſo brought before them, to be within the above deſcription; and if the recruiting officer attending ſhould judge him to be a man fit for his majeſty's ſervice, they ſhould cauſe him to be delivered to ſuch officer, who might ſecure him any place of ſafety provided by the juſtices of the peace for that purpoſe, or even in any public priſon; and that every ſuch man was from that time to be deemed a liſted ſoldier, and not to be taken out of his majeſty's ſervice by any proceſs, other than for ſome criminal matter. Nothing could more plainly ſhow either the zeal of the parliament for a vigorous proſecution of the war, or their confidence in the juſtice and moderation of our miniſtry, than their agreeing to this act, which was to continue in force till the end of the next ſeſſion: and which, in the hands of a wicked and enterprizing adminiſtration, might have been made ſuch an uſe of, as would have been inconſiſtent with that ſecurity which is provided by our happy conſtitution for the liberty of the ſubject.

The next object of the immediate attention of parliament in this ſeſſion was the raiſing of a new regiment of foot in North-America; for which purpoſe the ſum of 81,178l. 16s. to which the eſtimate thereof amounted, was voted. This regiment which was to conſiſt of four battalions of 1000 men each, was intended to be raiſed chiefly out of the Germans and Swiſs, who, for many years paſt, had annually tranſported themſelves in great numbers to the Britiſh plantations in America, where waſte lands had been aſſigned them upon the frontiers of the provinces; but, very injudiciouſly, no care had been taken to intermix them with the Engliſh inhabitants of the place. To this circumſtance it is owing, that they have continued to correſpond and converſe only with one another; ſo that very few of them, even of thoſe who have been born there, have yet learned to ſpeak or underſtand the Engliſh tongue. However, as they were all zealous proteſtants, and in general ſtrong, hardy men, and accuſtomed to the climate, it was judged that a regiment of good and faithful ſoldiers might be raiſed out of them, particularly proper to oppoſe the French: but to this end it was neceſſary to appoint ſome officers, eſpecially ſubalterns, who underſtood military diſcipline, and could ſpeak the German language; and as a ſufficient number of ſuch could not be found among the Engliſh officers, it was neceſſary to bring over and grant commiſſions to ſeveral German and Swiſs officers and engineers: but as this ſtep, by the act of ſettlement, could not be taken without the authority of parliament, an act was now paſſed for enabling his majeſty to grant commiſſions to a certain number of foreign proteſtants, who had ſerved as officers or engineers, to act and rank as officers or engineers in America only. An act was likewiſe paſſed in this ſeſſion, ſtrictly forbidding, under pain of death, any of his majeſty's ſubjects to ſerve as officers under the French king, or to inliſt as ſoldiers in his ſervice, without his majeſty's previous licence; and alſo for obliging ſuch of his majeſty's ſubjects as ſhould, in time to come, accept of commiſſions in the Scotch brigade in the Dutch ſervice, to take the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, on pain of forfeiting 500l.

As it had been reſolved, in the beginning of the preceding ſummer, to build veſſels of force upon the lake Ontario, an act was now paſſed for extending the maritime laws of England, relating to the government of his majeſty's ſhips and forces by ſea, to ſuch officers, ſeamen, and others, as ſhould ſerve on board his majeſty's ſhips or veſſels employed upon the lakes, great waters, or rivers, in North-America; and alſo, but not without oppoſition to this laſt for the better recruiting of his majeſty's forces upon the continent of America: to which end, by a new clauſe now added to a former act, a recruiting officer was empowered to enliſt and detain an indentured ſervant, even though his maſter ſhould reclaim him, upon paying to the maſter ſuch a ſum as two juſtices of peace within the precinct ſhould adjudge to be a reaſonable equivalent for the original purchaſe-money, and the remaining time ſuch ſervant might have to ſerve.

The inteſtine broils of Ireland were happily compoſed this year, by the prudent management of the marquis of Hartington, lord-lieutenant of that kingdom. By his ſteady and diſintereſted conduct, his candour and humanity, the Iriſh were not only brought to a much better temper, even among themſelves, than they were before their late outrageous riots and dangerous diſſenſions happened; but alſo prevailed upon to acquieſce in the meaſures of England, without this laſt being obliged to give up any one point of her ſuperiority. The leading men in the parliament of Ireland were the firſt that conformed: and though the ferment continued very high for ſome time after among the middling and lower ranks of people, it was at length entirely allayed by the wiſdom of the lord-lieutenant, and the excellent laws which he encouraged and paſſed for the benefit of that nation [u]. The P—— of Ireland, who had been very buſy in fomenting many of the late diſturbances, was, by his majeſty's command, ſtruc off the liſt of privy-counſellors; and the greateſt part of thoſe patriots, whom faction had turned out of their employments there, were re-inſtated with honour.

[1756] The parliament of England, which had adjoined on the 23d of December, met again; the houſe of commons on the 13th of January, and the lords on the 19th. On the 16th of the ſame month, the treaty between his Britannick majeſty and the king of Pruſſia was ſigned, importing, that, for the defence of their common country, Germany, and in order to preſerve her peace and tranquillity, which it was feared was in danger of being diſturbed, on account of the diſputes in America; the two kings, for that end only, entered into a convention of neutrality, by which they reciprocally bound themſelves not to ſuffer foreign troops of any nation whatſoever to enter into Germany, or paſs through it during the troubles aforeſaid, and the conſequences that might reſult from them; but to oppoſe the ſame with their utmoſt might, in order to ſecure Germany from the calamities of war, maintain her fundamental laws and conſtitutions, and preſerve her peace uninterrupted. Thus, the late treaty with Ruſſia was virtually renounced. Their majeſties, moreover, ſeized this favourable opportunity to adjuſt the differences that had ſubſiſted between them, in relation to the remainder of the Sileſia loan due to the ſubjects of his Britannick majeſty, and the indemnification claimed by the ſubjects of his Pruſſian majeſty for their loſſes by ſea during the late war; ſo that the attachment laid on the ſaid debt was agreed to be taken off, as ſoon as the ratification of this treaty ſhould be exchanged.

On the 21ſt of January the houſe took into conſideration the laws then in being, relating to the militia of this kingdom; and, finding them inſufficient, ordered a new bill to be prepared, and brought in, for the better regulating of the militia forces in the ſeveral counties of England. A bill wat accordingly prepared to that effect, and preſented to the houſe on the 12th of March by the hon. Charles Townſhend, eſq. who, to his honour, was one of the chief promoters of it. After receiving many amendments in the houſe of commons, it was on the 10th of May paſſed, and ſent to the lords: but ſeveral objections being made to it by ſome of the peers, and it ſeeming to them that ſome further amendments were ſtill neceſſary, which they thought they could not in that ſeſſion ſpare time to conſider ſo maturely as the importance of the ſubject required, a negative of 59 againſt 23 was put upon the motion for paſſing the bill; though every one muſt have been ſenſible, not only of the propriety, but even of the abſolute neceſſity of ſuch a law, which was ardently deſired by the whole nation.

On the 27th of May his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and, after having given the royal aſſent to the bills then depending, thanked his parliament, in a ſpeech from the throne, for their vigorous and effectual ſupport. He acquainted them, that the injuries and hoſtilities which had been for ſome time committed by the French againſt his dominions and ſubjects, were then followed by the actual invaſion of the iſland of Minorca, though guaranteed to him by all the great powers of Europe, and particularly by the French king: that he had, therefore, found himſelf obliged, in vindication of the honour of his crown, and of the rights of his people, to declare war in form againſt France; and that he relied on the Divine Protection, and the vigorous aſſiſtance of his faithful ſubjects, in ſo juſt a cauſe. The parliament was then adjourned to the 18th of June; and from thence afterwards to the 18th of July, and then it was prorogued.

In the month of January mr. Fox, lately appointed ſecretary of ſtate, received a letter from M. Rouillè, miniſter and ſecretary of ſtate for foreign affairs to the king of France, expoſtulating, in the name of his ſovereign, upon the orders and inſtructions for committing hoſtilities, which his Britannick majeſty had given to general Braddock and admiral Boſcawen, in diametrical oppoſition to the moſt ſolemn aſſurances ſo often repeated by word of mouth, as well as in writing. He complained of the inſult which had been offered to his maſter's flag, in attacking and taking two of his ſhips in the open ſea, without any previous declaration of war; as alſo by committing depredations on the commerce of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty's ſubjects, in contempt of the law of nations, the faith of treaties, and the uſages eſtabliſhed among civilized nations. He ſaid, the ſentiments and character of his Britannick majeſty gave the king his maſter room to expect, that, at his return to London, he would diſavow the conduct of his admiralty; but ſeeing that, inſtead of puniſhing, he rather encouraged thoſe who had been guilty of ſuch depredations, his moſt Chriſtian majeſty would be deemed deficient in what he owed to his own glory, the dignity of his crown, and the defence of his people, if he deferred any longer demanding a ſignal reparation for the outrage done to the French flag, and the damage ſuſtained by his ſubjects. He, therefore, demanded immediate and full reſtitution of all the French ſhips, which, contrary to law and decorum, had been taken by the Engliſh navy, together with all the officers, ſoldiers, mariners, guns, ſtores, and merchandiſe. He declared, that ſhould this reſtitution be made, he ſhould be willing to engage in a negotiation for what further ſatisfaction he might claim, and continue deſirous to ſee the differences relating to America determined by a ſolid and equitable accommodation: but if, contrary to all hopes, theſe demands ſhould be rejected, he would conſider ſuch a denial of juſtice as the moſt authentic declaration of war, and as a formed deſign in the court of London to diſturb the peace of Europe. To this peremptory remonſtrance the Britiſh ſecretary was directed to anſwer, that though the king of England would readily conſent to an equitable and ſolid accommodation, he would not comply with the demand of immediate and full reſtitution as a preliminary condition; for his majeſty had taken no ſteps but ſuch as were rendered juſt and indiſpenſible by the hoſtilities which the French began in time of profound peace, and a proper regard for his own honour, the rights and poſſeſſions of his crown, and the ſecurity of his kingdom.

Without all doubt the late tranſactions had afforded ſpecious arguments for both nations to impeach the conduct of each other. The French court, conſcious of their encroachments in Nova-Scotia, affected to draw a ſhade over theſe, as particulars belonging to a diſputed territory, and to divert the attention to the banks of the Ohio, where Jamonville and his detachment had been attacked and maſſacred by the Engliſh, without the leaſt provocation. They likewiſe inveighed againſt the capture of their ſhips, before any declaration of war, as flagrant acts of piracy; and ſome neutral powers of Europe ſeemed to conſider them in the ſame point of view. It was certainly high time to chec the inſolence of the French by force of arms, and ſurely this might have been as effectually and expeditiouſly exerted under the uſual ſanction of a formal declaration; the omiſſion of which expoſed the adminiſtration to the cenſure of our neighbours, and fixed the imputation of fraud and freebooting on the beginning of the war. The miniſtry was ſaid to have delayed the ceremony of denouncing war from political conſiderations, ſuppoſing that, ſhould the French be provoked into the firſt declaration of this kind, the powers of Europe would conſider his moſt Chriſtian majeſty as the aggreſſor, and Great-Britain would reap all the fruits of the defenſive alliances in which ſhe had engaged. But nothing could be more weak and frivolous than ſuch a conjecture. The aggreſſor is he who firſt violates the peace; and every [u] Among other objects of the attention of the legiſlature of that country, 10,000l. were granted for making the river Nore navigable from the city of Kilkenny to the town of Inneſtalge; 20,000l. towards carrying on an inland navigation from the city of Dublin to the river Shannon; 4000l. for making the river Newry navigable; 1000l. a-year for two years, for the encouragement of Engliſh proteſtant ſchools; ſeveral ſums, to be diſtributed in premiums, for the encouragement of the cambric, hempen, and flaxen manufactures; and 300,000l. to his majeſty, towards ſupporting the ſeveral branches of the eſtabliſhment, and for defraying the expences of the government for two years.

ally will interpret the aggreſſion according to his own intereſt and convenience. The adminiſtration maintained the appearance of candour in the midſt of their hoſtilities. The merchant-ſhips, of which a great number had been taken from the French, were not ſold and divided among the captors according to the practice of war; but carefully ſequeſtered, with all their cargoes and effects, in order to be reſtored to the right owners, in caſe the diſputes between the two nations ſhould not be productive of an open rupture. In this particular, however, it was pity that a little common ſenſe had not been blended with their honourable intention. Great part of the cargoes conſiſted of fiſh, and other periſhable commodities, which were left to rot and putrify, and afterwards thrown overboard, to prevent contagion; ſo that the owners and captors were equally diſappointed, and the value of them loſt to both nations.

The court of Verſailles, while they preſented remonſtrances which they knew would prove ineffectual, and exclaimed againſt the conduct of Great-Britain with all the arts of calumny and exaggeration at every court in Chriſtendom, continued nevertheleſs to make ſuch preparations as denoted a deſign to proſecute the war with uncommon vigour. They began to repair and fortify Dunkirk: orders were publiſhed, that all Britiſh ſubjects ſhould quit the dominions of France: many Engliſh veſſels were ſeized in the different ports of that kingdom, and their crews ſent to priſon. At the ſame time an edict was iſſued, inviting the French ſubjects to equip privateers, offering a premium of 40 livres for every gun, and as much for every man they ſhould take from the enemy; and promiſing that, in caſe a peace ſhould be ſpeedily concluded, the king would purchaſe the privateers at prime coſt. They employed great numbers of artificers and ſeamen in equipping a formidable ſquadron of ſhips at Breſt; and aſſembling a ſtrong body of land-forces, as well as a conſiderable number of tranſports, threatened the iſland of Great-Britain with a dangerous invaſion.

The Engliſh people were ſeized with conſternation: the miniſtry were alarmed and perplexed. Colonel Yorke, the Britiſh reſident at the Hague, was ordered by his majeſty to make a requiſition of the 6000 men whom the ſtates-general are obliged by treaty to furniſh, when Great-Britain ſhall be threatened with an invaſion; and in February he preſented a memorial for this purpoſe. Monſieur d'Affry, the French king's miniſter at the Hague, having received intimation of this demand, produced a counter memorial from his maſter, charging the Engliſh as the aggreſſors, and giving the ſtates-general plainly to underſtand, that, ſhould they grant the ſuccours demanded by Great-Britain, he would conſider their compliance as an act of hoſtility againſt himſelf. The Dutch, though divided among themſelves by faction, were unanimouſly averſe to any meaſure that might involve them in the approaching war. Their commerce was in a great meaſure decayed, and their finances were too much exhauſted to admit of an immediate augmentation of their forces, which for many other reaſons they ſtrove to avoid. They foreſaw a great increaſe of trade in their adhering to a punctual neutrality: they were afraid of the French by land, and jealous of the Engliſh by ſea; and, perhaps, enjoyed the proſpect of ſeeing theſe two proud and powerful nations humble and impoveriſh each other. Certain it is, the ſtates-general protracted their anſwer to mr. York's memorial by ſuch affected delays, that the court of London perceived their intention, and, in order to avoid the mortification of a flat denial, the king ordered his reſident to acquaint the princeſs regent, that he would not inſiſt upon his demand. The ſtates, thus freed from their perplexity, at length delivered an anſwer to mr. Yorke, in which they expatiated on the difficulties they were laid under, and thanked his Britannick majeſty for having freed them by his declaration from that embaraſſment into which they were thrown by his firſt demand and the counter memorial of the French miniſter. The real ſentiments of thoſe people, however, more plainly appeared in the previous reſolution delivered to the ſtates of Holland by the towns of Amſterdam, Dort, Haerlem, Gouda, Rotterdam, and Enckhuyſen, declaring flatly that England was uncontrovertibly the aggreſſor in Europe, by ſeizing a conſiderable number of French veſſels; that the threatened invaſion of Great-Britain did not affect the republic's guarantee of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, inaſmuch as it was only intended to obtain reparation for the injury ſuſtained by the ſubjects of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty; finally, that the ſuccours demanded could be of no advantage to the king of England, as it appeared by the declaration of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, that their granting theſe ſuccours would immediately lay them under a neceſſity of demanding, in their turn, aſſiſtance from Great-Britain. From this way of arguing, the Engliſh may perceive what they have to expect in caſes of emergency from the friendſhip of their neareſt allies, who muſt always be furniſhed with the ſame excuſe, whenever they find it convenient or neceſſary to their intereſt. Such a conſideration, joined to other concurring motives, ought to induce the Britiſh legiſlature to withdraw its dependance from all foreign connections, and provide ſuch a conſtitutional force within itſelf, as will be fully ſufficient to baffle all the efforts of an external enemy. The apprehenſions and diſtraction of the people at this juncture plainly evinced the expediency of ſuch a national force: but different parties were divided in their opinions about the nature of ſuch a proviſion. Some of the warmeſt friends of their country propoſed a well regulated militia, as an inſtitution that would effectually anſwer the purpoſe of defending a wide extending ſea-coaſt from invaſion; while, on the other hand, this propoſal was ridiculed and refuted as impracticable or uſeleſs by all the retainers to the court, and all the officers of the ſtanding army. In the mean time, as the experiment could not be immediately tried, and the preſent juncture demanded ſome inſtant determination, recourſe was had to a foreign remedy.

Towards the latter end of March, the king ſent a written meſſage to parliament, intimating, that he had received repeated advices from different perſons and places, that a deſign had been formed by the French court to invade Great-Britain or Ireland; and the great preparations of forces, ſhips, artillery, and warlike ſtores, then notoriouſly making in the ports of France oppoſite to the Britiſh coaſts, together with the language of the French miniſters in ſome foreign courts, left little room to doubt the reality of ſuch a deſign: that his majeſty had augmented his forces both by ſea and land, and taken proper meaſures and precautions for putting his kingdom in a poſture of defence: that, in order further to ſtrengthen himſelf, he had made a requiſition of a body of Heſſian troops, purſuant to the late treaty, to be forthwith brought over, and for that purpoſe ordered tranſports to be prepared: that he doubted not of being enabled and ſupported by his parliament in taking ſuch meaſures as might be conducive to an end ſo eſſential to the honour of his crown, the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, and the laws and liberties of theſe kingdoms. This meſſage was no ſooner received, than both houſes voted, compoſed, and preſented very warm and affectionate addreſſes, in which his majeſty was thanked for the requiſition he had made of the Heſſian troops; a meaſure which at any other time would have been ſtigmatiſed with all the ſatire and rhetoric of the oppoſition.

Even this precaution was not thought ſufficient to ſecure the iſland, and quiet the terrors of the people. In a few days mr. Fox, the new miniſter, encouraged by the unanimity which had appeared ſo conſpicuous in the motions for the late addreſſes, ventured to move again, in the houſe of commons, that another addreſs ſhould be preſented to the king, beſeeching his majeſty, that for the more effectual defence of this iſland, and for the better ſecurity of the religion and liberties of his ſubjects, againſt the threatened attac by a foreign enemy, he would be graciouſly pleaſed to order 12 battalions of his electoral troops, together with the uſual detachment of artillery, to be forthwith brought into this kingdom. There was a conſiderable party in the houſe, to whom ſuch a motion was odious and deteſtable: but, conſidering the critical ſituation of affairs, they were afraid that a direct oppoſition might expoſe them to a more odious ſuſpicion: they, therefore moved for the order of the day, and inſiſted on the queſtion's being put upon that motion; but it was carried in the negative by a conſiderable majority, which alſo agreed to the other propoſal. The reſolution of the houſe was communicated to the lords, who unanimouſly concurred; and their joint addreſs being preſented, his majeſty aſſured them he would immediately comply with their requeſt. Accordingly, ſuch expedition was uſed that in the courſe of the next month both Hanoverians and Heſſians arrived in England, and encamped in different parts of the kingdom.—As the fears of an invaſion ſubſided in the minds of the people, their antipathy to theſe foreign auxiliaries emerged. They were beheld with the eyes of jealouſy, ſuſpicion, and diſdain. They were treated with contempt, reſerve, and rigour. The miniſtry was execrated for having reduced the nation to ſuch a low circumſtance of diſgrace, as that they ſhould owe their ſecurity to German mercenaries. There were not wanting ſome incendiaries, who circulated hints and inſinuations, that the kingdom had been purpoſely unprovided; and that the natives of South-Britain had been formerly ſubdued and expelled by a body of Saxon auxilliaries, whom they had hired for their preſervation. In a word, the doubts and ſuſpicions of a people naurally blunt and jealous were inflamed to ſuch a degree of animoſity, that nothing would have reſtrained them from violent acts of outrage, but the moſt orderly, modeſt, and inoffenſive behaviour by which both the Hanoverians and Heſſians were diſtinguiſhed.

Under the cloak of an invading armament, which engroſſed the attention of the Britiſh nation, the French were actually employed in preparations for an expedition, which ſucceeded according to their wiſh. In the beginning of the year advice was received that a French ſquadron would ſoon be in a condition to ſail from Toulon: this was afterwards confirmed by repeated intelligence, not only from foreign gazettes, but alſo from Engliſh miniſters and conſuls reſiding in Spain and Italy. They affirmed that the Toulon ſquadron conſiſted of 12 or 15 ſhips of the line, with a great number of tranſports; that they were ſupplied with proviſion for two months only, conſequently could not be intended for America; that ſtrong bodies of troops were on their march from different parts of the French dominions to Dauphiné and Provence, in order to be embarked. Notwithſtanding theſe particulars of information, which plainly pointed out Minorca as the object of their expedition; notwithſtanding the extenſive and important commerce carried on by the ſubjects of Great-Britain in the Mediterranean; no care was taken to ſend thither a ſquadron of ſhips capable to protect the trade, and fruſtrate the deſigns of the enemy. That great province was left to a few inconſiderable ſhips and frigates, which could ſerve no other purpoſe than that of carrying intelligence from port to port, and enriching their commanders, by making prize of merchant veſſels. Nay, the miniſtry ſeemed to pay little or no regard to the remonſtrance of general Blakeney, deputy-governor of Minorca, who, in repeated advices, repreſented the weakneſs of the garriſon which he commanded in St. Philip's caſtle, the chief fortreſs on the iſland. Far from ſtrengthening the garriſon with a proper re-enforcement, they did not even ſend thither the officers belonging to it, who were in England upon leave of abſence, nor give directions for any veſſel to tranſport them, until the French armament was ready to make a deſcent upon the iſland.[x]

At length, the deſtination of the enemy's fleet being univerſally known, the miniſtry ſeemed to rouſe from their lethargy, and, like perſons ſuddenly waking, acted with hurry and precipitation. Inſtead of detaching a ſquadron that in all reſpects ſhould be ſuperior to the French fleet in the Mediterranean, and beſtowing the command of it upon an officer of approved courage and activity, they allotted no more than 10 ſhips of the line for this ſervice, veſting the command of them in admiral Byng, who had never met with any occaſion to ſignalize his courage, and whoſe character was not very popular in the navy: but mr. Weſt, the ſecond in command, was a gentleman univerſally reſpected for his probity, ability and reſolution. The 10 ſhips deſtined for this expedition were but in very indifferent order, poorly manned, and unprovided with either hoſpital or fire-ſhip. They ſailed from Spithead on the 7th day of April, having on board, as part of their complement, a regiment of ſoldiers to be landed at Gibraltar, with major-general Stuart, lord Effingham, and colonel Cornwallis, whoſe regiments were in garriſon at Minorca, about 40 inferior officers, and near 100 recruits, as a re-enforcement to St. Philip's fortreſs.

After all the intelligence which had been received, one would imagine the government of England was ſtill ignorant of the enemy's force and deſtination; for the inſtructions delivered to admiral Byng imported, that, on his arrival at Gibraltar, he ſhould enquire whether any French ſquadron had paſſed through the ſtraits; and that being certified in the affirmative, as it was probably deſigned for North-America, he ſhould immediarely detach rear-admiral Weſt to Louiſbourg, on the iſland of Cape-Breton, with ſuch a number of ſhips as, when joined with thoſe at Halifax, would conſtitute a force ſuperior to the armament of the enemy. On the 2d day of May, admiral Byng arrived at Gibraltar, where he found captain Edgecombe, with the Princeſs Louiſa ſhip of war, and a ſloop, who informed him that the French armament, commanded by M. de la Galiſſonniere, conſiſting of 13 ſhips of the line, with a great number of tranſports, having on board a body of 15,000 land-forces, had ſailed from Toulon on the 10th day of April, and made a deſcent upon the iſland of Minorca, from whence he (captain Edgecombe) had been obliged to retire at their approach. General Fowke, who commanded at Gibraltar, had received two ſucceſſive orders from the ſecretary at war, with reſpect to his ſparing a battalion of troops to be tranſported by mr. Byng, as a re-enforcement to Minorca; but as the two orders appeared inconſiſtent or equivocal, a council of war was conſulted, and the majority were of opinion that no troops ſhould be ſent from thence to Minorca, except a detachment to ſupply the deficiency in the little ſquadron of captain Edgecombe, who had left a good number of his ſeamen and marines, under the command of captain Scroop, to aſſiſt in the defence of Fort St. Philip's. Theſe articles of intelligence the admiral diſpatched by expreſs to the lords of the admiralty, and in his letter made uſe of ſome impolitic expreſſions, which in all probability, it would have been well for him had he omitted. He ſaid, if he had been ſo happy as to have arrived at Mahon before the French had landed, he flattered himſelf he ſhould have been able to prevent their getting a footing on that iſland. He complained, that there were no magazines in Gibraltar for ſupplying the ſquadron with neceſſaries; that the careening-wharfs, pits, and ſtore-houſes were entirely decayed, ſo that he ſhould find the greateſt difficulty in cleaning the ſhips that were foul; and this was the caſe with ſome of thoſe he carried out from England, as well as thoſe which had been for ſome time cruiſing in the Mediterranean. He ſignified his opinion, that, even if it ſhould be found practicable, it would be very impolitic to throw any men into St. Philip's-caſtle, which could not be ſaved without a land-force ſufficient to raiſe the ſiege; therefore, a ſmall re-enforcement would only add ſo many men to the number which muſt fall into the hands of the enemy. He obſerved, that ſuch engineers and artillery-men in Gibraltar as had been at Minorca, were of opinion, that it would be impoſſible to throw any number of men into St. Philip's, if the French had erected batteries on the two ſhores near the entrance of the harbour, ſo as to bar all paſſage up to the ſally-port of the fortreſs; and with this opinion he ſignified the concurrence of his own ſentiments. The firſt part of this letter was downright impeachment of the miniſtry, for having delayed the expedition, for having ſent out ſhips unfit for ſervice, and for having neglected the magazines and wharfs at Gibraltar. In the latter part he ſeemed to prepare them for the ſubſequent account of his miſconduct and miſcarriage. It cannot be ſuppoſed that they underwent this accuſation without apprehenſion and reſentment; and as they foreſaw the loſs of Minorca, which would not fail to excite a rational clamour, perhaps they now began to take meaſures for gratifying their reſentment, and transferring the blame from themſelves to the perſon who had preſumed to hint a diſapprobation of their conduct: for this purpoſe they could not have found a fairer opportunity than mr. Byng's ſubſequent behaviour afforded.

The admiral being ſtrengthened by mr. Edgecombe, and re-enforced by a detachment from the garriſon, ſet ſail from Gibraltar on the 8th day of May, and was joined off Minorca, by his majeſty's ſhip the Phœnix, under the command of captain Hervey, who confirmed the intelligence he had already received; touching the ſtrength and deſtination of the French ſquadron. When he approached Minorca, he deſcried the Britiſh colours ſtill flying at the caſtle of St. Philip's, and ſeveral bomb batteries playing upon it from different quarters, where the French banners were diſ-

[x] It is with pleaſure we ſeize this opportunity of recording an inſtance of gallantry and patriotiſm in a Britiſh officer, which would have done honour to the character of a Roman tribune. Captain Cunningham, an accompliſhed young gentleman, who acted as engineer in ſecond at Minorca, being preferred to a majority at home, and recalled to his regiment by an expreſs order, had repaired with his family to Nice in Italy, where he waited for the opportunity of a ſhip bound for England, when he received certain intelligence that the French armament was deſtined for the place he had quitted. His lady, whom he tenderly loved, was juſt delivered, and two of his children were dangerouſly ill of the ſmall-pox. He recollected that the chief engineer at Minorca was infirm, and indeed diſabled by the gout, and that many things were wanted for the defence of the fortreſs. His zeal for the honour and ſervice of his country immediately triumphed over the calls of tenderneſs and of nature. He expended a conſiderable ſum of money in purchaſing timber for the platforms, and other neceſſaries for the garriſon: hired a ſhip for tranſporting them thither; and tearing himſelf from his wife and children, thus left among ſtrangers in a foreign country, embarked again for Minorca, where he knew he ſhould be in a peculiar manner expoſed to all the dangers of a furious ſiege. In the courſe of this deſperate ſervice he acquitted himſelf with that vigilance, ſkill, and active courage which he had on divers former occaſions diſplayed, until the aſſault was given to the Queen's-baſtion, when mixing with the enemy ſword in hand, he was diſabled in his right arm by the ſhot of a muſket and the thruſt of a bayonet. His behaviour was ſo acceptable to his ſovereign, that when he returned to England, he was preferred to the rank of colonel of the guards. He afterwards acted as chief engineer in the attempts and diſcents which were made on the French coaſt. Though grievouſly maimed, he accepted the ſame office in the expedition to Guadalupe, where he died univerſally regretted.

played. Thus informed, he detached three ſhips a-head, with captain Hervey, to reconnoitre the harbour's mouth, and land, if poſſible, a letter for general Blakeney, giving him to underſtand the fleet was come to his aſſiſtance. Before this attempt could be made, the French fleet appearing to the ſouth-eaſt, and the wind blowing ſtrong off ſhore, he recalled his ſhips, and formed the line of battle. About ſix o'clock in the evening, the enemy, to the number of 17 ſhips, 13 of which appeared to be very large, advanced in order; but about ſeven tacked, with a view to gain the weather-gage. Mr Byng, in order to preſerve that advantage, as well as to make ſure of the land-wind in the morning followed their example, being then about five leagues from Cape-Mola. At day-light the enemy could not be diſcried; but two tartanes appearing cloſe to the rear of the Engliſh ſquadron, they were immediately chaſed by ſignal. One eſcaped, and the other being taken, was found to have on board two French captains, two lieutenants, and about 100 private ſoldiers, part of 600 who had been ſent out in tartanes the preceding day, to re-enforce the enemy's ſquadron. This ſoon re-appearing, the line of battle was formed on each ſide, and about two o'clock admiral Byng threw out a ſignal to bear away two points from the wind and engage. At this time his diſtance from the enemy was ſo great, that rear-admiral Weſt, perceiving it impoſſible to comply with both orders, bore away with his diviſion ſeven points from the wind, and cloſing down upon the enemy, attacked them with ſuch impetuoſity, that the ſhips which oppoſed him were in a little time driven out of the line. Had he been properly ſuſtained by the van, in all probability the Britiſh fleet would have obtained a complete victory; but the other diviſion did not bear down, and the enemy's centre keeping that ſtation, rear-admiral Weſt could not purſue his advantage without running the riſque of ſeeing his communication with the reſt of the line entirely cut off. In the beginning of the action, the Intrepid, in mr. Byng's diviſion, was ſo diſabled in her rigging, that ſhe could not be managed, and drove on the ſhip that was next in poſition: a circumſtance which obliged ſeveral others to throw all a-bac, in order to avoid confuſion, and for ſome time retarded the action. Certain it is, that mr. Byng, though accommodated with a noble ſhip of 90 guns, made little or no uſe of his artillery, but kept aloof, either from an overſtrained obſervance of diſcipline, or timidity. When his captain exhorted him to bear down upon the enemy, he very cooly replied, that he would avoid the error of admiral Matthews, who, with his engagement with the French and Spaniſh ſquadrons off Toulon, during the preceding war, had broke the line by his own precipitation, and expoſed himſelf ſingly to a fire that he could not ſuſtain. Mr Byng, on the contrary, was determined againſt acting, except with the line entire; and, on pretence of rectifying the diſorder which had happened among ſome of the ſhips, heſitated ſo long, and kept at ſuch a wary diſtance, that he never was properly engaged, though he received ſome few ſhots in his hull. M. de la Galiſſonniere ſeemed equally averſe to the continuance of the battle: part of his ſquadron had been fairly obliged to quit the line; and though he was rather ſuperior to the Engliſh in number of men and weight of metal, he did not chooſe to abide the conſequence of a cloſer fight with an enemy ſo expert in naval operations: he, therefore, took the advantage of mr. Byng's heſitation, and edged away with an eaſy ſail to join his van, which had been diſcomfited. The Engliſh admiral gave chaſe, but the French ſhips being clean, he could not come up and cloſe them again, ſo they retired at their leiſure. Then he put his ſquadron on the other tac, in order to keep the wind of the enemy; and next morning they were altogether out of ſight.

While he lay to with the reſt of his fleet, at the diſtance of 10 leagues from Mahon, he detached cruiſers to look for ſome miſſing ſhips, which joined him accordingly, and made an enquiry into the condition of the ſquadron. The number of killed amounted to 42, including captain Andrews, of the Defiance, and about 168 were wounded. Three of the capital ſhips were ſo damaged in their maſts, that they could not keep the ſea, with any regard to their ſafety: a great number of the ſeamen were ill, and there was no veſſel which could be converted into an hoſpital for the ſic and wounded. In this ſituation mr. Byng called a council of war, at which the land-officers were preſent. He repreſented to them, that he was much inferior to the enemy in weight of metal and number of men; that they had the advantage of ſending their wounded to Minorca, from whence at the ſame time they were refreſhed and re-enforced occaſionally; that, in his opinion, it was impracticable to relieve St. Philip's fort, and, therefore, they ought to make the beſt of their way bac to Gibralter, which might require immediate protection. They unanimouſly concurred with his ſentiments, and thither he directed his courſe accordingly. How he came to be ſo well acquainted with the impracticability of relieving general Blakeney it is not eaſy to determine, as no experiment was made for that purpoſe. Indeed, the neglect of ſuch a trial ſeems to have been the leaſt excuſeable part of his conduct; for it afterwards appeared, that the officers and ſoldiers belonging to the garriſon might have been landed at the ſally-port, without running any great riſque; and a gentleman, then in the fort actually paſſed and repaſſed in a boat, unhurt by any of the enemy's batteries.

Mr Byng's letter to the admiralty, containing a detail of this action, is ſaid to have arrived ſome days before it was made public; and when it appeared, was curtailed of divers expreſſions, and whole paragraphs, which either tended to his own juſtification, or implied a cenſure on the conduct of his ſuperiors. Whatever uſe might have been made of this letter while it remained a ſecret to the public we ſhall not pretend to explain: but ſure it is, that, on the 16th day of June, Sir Edward Hawke and Admiral Saunders ſailed from Spithead to Gibralter, to ſuperſede the admirals Byng and Weſt, in their commands of the Mediterranean ſquadron; and mr. Byng's letter was not publiſhed till the 26th day of the ſame month, when it produced all the effect which that gentleman's bittereſt enemies could have deſired. The populace took fire like a train of the moſt haſty combuſtibles, and broke out into ſuch a clamour of rage and indignation againſt the devoted admiral, as could not have been exceeded if he had loſt the whole navy of England, and left the coaſts of the kingdom naked to invaſion. This animoſity was carefully fomented and maintained by artful emiſſaries, who mingled with all public aſſemblies, from the drawing-room at St. James's to the mob at Charing-croſs. They expatiated upon the inſolence, the folly, the cowardice, and miſconduct of the unhappy admiral. They even preſumed to make their ſovereign in ſome meaſure an inſtrument of their calumny, by ſuggeſting that his majeſty had prognoſticated Byng's miſbehaviour from the contents of his firſt letter, dated at Gibralter. They rediculed and refuted the reaſons he had given for returning to that fortreſs, after his ſcandalous re-encounter with the French ſquadron; and, in order to exaſperate them to the moſt implacable reſentment, they exaggerated the terrible conſequences of loſing Minorca, which muſt now be ſubdued through his treachery or want of reſolution. In a word, he was devoted as the ſcape-goat of the miniſtry, to whoſe ſupine negligence, ignorance, and miſconduct the loſs of that important fortreſs was undoubtedly owing. Byng's miſcarriage was thrown out like a barrel to the whale, in order to engage the attention of the people, that it might not be attracted by the real cauſe of the national misfortune. In order to keep up the flame which had been kindled againſt the admiral, recourſe was had to the loweſt artifices. Agents were employed to vilify his perſon in all public places of vulgar reſort; and mobs were hired at different parts of the capital to hang and burn him in effigy.

The two officers who ſucceeded to the command in the Mediterranean were accompanied by lord Tyrawley, whom his majeſty had appointed to ſuperſede general Fowke in the government of Gibralter, that gentleman having incurred the diſpleaſure of the miniſtry, for not having underſtood an order which was unintelligible. By the ſame conveyance, a letter from the ſecretary to the admiralty was tranſmitted to mr. Byng, giving him notice that he was recalled. To this intimation he replied in ſuch a manner as denoted a conſciouſneſs of having done his duty, and a laudable deſire to vindicate his own conduct. His anſwer contained a further account of the engagement in which he was ſuppoſed to have miſbehaved, intermixed with ſome puerile calculation of the enemy's ſuperiority in weight of metal, which ſerved no other purpoſe than that of expoſing his character ſtill more to redicule and abuſe; and he was again ſo impolitic as to hazard certain expreſſions, which added freſh fuel to the reſentment of his enemies. Directions were immediately diſpatched to Sir Edward Hawke, that Byng ſhould be ſent home in arreſt; and an order to the ſame purpoſe was lodged at every port in the kingdom: precautions, which, however unneceſſary to ſecure the perſon of a man who longed ardently to juſtify his character by a public trial, were yet productive of conſiderable effect in augmenting the popular odium. Admiral Byng immediately embarked in the ſhip which had carried out his ſucceſſor, and was accompanied by mr. Weſt, general Fowke, and ſeveral other officers of that garriſon, who were alſo recalled, in conſequence of having ſubſcribed to the reſult of the council of war, which we have mentioned above. When they arrived in England, mr. Weſt met with ſuch a gracious reception from his majeſty as was thought due to his extraordinary merit; but mr. Byng was committed cloſe priſoner in an apartment of Greenwich-Hoſpital.

In the mean time, the ſiege of St. Philip's fort in Minorca was proſecuting with unremitting vigour. The armament of Toulon, conſiſting of the fleet commanded by M. de la Galliſſonniere, and the troops under the duke de Richelieu, arrived on the 18th day of April at the port of Ciudadella, on that part of the iſland oppoſite to Mahon, or St. Philip's, and immediately began to diſembark their forces. Two days before they reached the iſland, general Blakeney had, by a packet-boat, received certain intelligence of their approach, and began to make preparations for the defence of the caſtle. The fort which he commanded was very extenſive, ſurrounded with numerous redoubts, ravelins, and other out works; and provided with ſubterranean galleries, mines, and traverſes, cut out of the ſolid roc with incredible labour. Upon the whole, this was one of the beſt fortified places in Europe, well ſupplied with artillery, ammunition, and proviſion; and, without all doubt, might have ſuſtained the deſperate ſiege, had it been defended by a numerous garriſon, conducted by able engineers, under the eye and auſpices of an active and ſkilful commander. All theſe advantages, however, did not concur on this occaſion. The number of troops in Minorca did not exceed four regiments, whereas the nature of the works required at leaſt double the number; and, even of theſe above 40 officers were abſent. The chief engineer was rendered lame by the gout, and the general himſelf oppreſſed with the infirmities of old age. The natives of the iſland might have been ſerviceable as pioneers, or day-labourers; but, from their hatred to the proteſtant religion, they were generally averſe to the Engliſh government, although they had lived happily and grown wealthy under its influence.

The governor ordered his officers to beat up for volunteers in the adjacent town of St. Philip's; but few or none would inliſt under his banners, and it ſeems he would not venture to compel them into the ſervice. He recalled all his advanced parties; and, in particular, a company poſted at Fornelles, where a ſmall redoubt had been raiſed, and five companies at Ciudadella, a poſt fortified with two pieces of cannon, which were now withdrawn, as ſoon as the enemy began to diſembark their forces. At the ſame time major Cunningham was detached with a party to break down the bridges, and break up the roads between that place and St. Philip's; but the taſk of deſtroying the roads could not be performed in ſuch a hurry, on account of the hard rocs which runs along the ſurface of the ground through this whole iſland; nor was there time to demoliſh the town of St. Philip's, which ſtood ſo near the fort, that the enemy could not fail to take advantage of its neighbourhood. The ſtreets ſerved them for trenches, which otherwiſe could not have been dug through the ſolid roc. Here they made a lodgement cloſe to the works; here they found convenient barracs and quarters of refreſhment, maſks for their batteries, and an effectual cover for their mortars and bombardiers. The general has been blamed for leaving the town ſtanding; but if we conſider his uncertainty concerning the deſtination of the French armament, the odious nature of ſuch a precaution, which could not fail to exaſperate the inhabitants, and the impoſſibility of executing ſuch a ſcheme after the firſt appearance of the enemy, he will be found excuſeable, if not altogether blameleſs. Some houſes and windmills were actually demoliſhed, ſo as to clear the explanade and the approaches. All the wine in the cellars of St. Philip's town was deſtroyed, and the butts were carried into the caſtle, where they might ſerve for gabions and traverſes. Five-and-twenty Minorquin bakers were hired, and a large number of cattle brought into the fort, for the benefit of the garriſon. The ports were walled up, the poſts aſſigned, the ſentinals placed, and all the different guards appointed. Commodore Edgecombe, who then ancored in the harbour of Mahon, cloſe under the walls of the caſtle, ſailed away with his little ſquadron, conſiſting of the Cheſterfield, Princeſs Louiſa, Portland, and Dolphin, after having left all his marines, a detachment from Gibraltar, the whole crew of the Porcupine ſloop, and the greater part of the Dolphin's, as a re-enforcement to the fort, under the immediate direction and command of capt. Scroop, of the Dolphin, who, with great gallantry, offered himſelf for this ſevere duty, and bravely ſignaliſed himſelf during the whole ſiege. The French admiral might certainly have blocked up this harbour in ſuch a manner as would have prevented the eſcape of theſe ſhips, and divers other rich merchant veſſels, which happened then to be at Mahon: but, in all probability, they purpoſely allowed them to abandon the place, which, on any emergency, or aſſault, their crews, and officers would have conſiderably re-enforced. The enemy were perfectly acquainted with the great extent of the works, and the weakneſs of the garriſon; from which circumſtances they derived the moſt ſanguine hopes that the place might be ſuddenly taken, without the trouble of a regular ſiege. After mr. Edgecombe had ſailed for Gibraltar, and general Blakeney had ordered a ſloop to be ſunk in the channel that leads to the harbour, the French ſquadron made its appearance at this part of the iſland; but, without having attempted any thing againſt the fort, fell to leeward of Cape-Mola. Next day they came in ſight again, but ſoon bore away, and never afterwards, during the whole courſe of the ſiege, approached ſo near as to give the garriſon the leaſt diſturbance.

On the 22d day of April, the governor ſent a drummer to the French with a letter general, deſiring to know his reaſons for invading the iſland. To this an anſwer was returned by the duke de Richelieu, declaring he was come with intention to reduce the iſland under the dominion of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, by way of retaliation for the conduct of his maſter, who had ſeized and detained the ſhips belonging to the king of France and his ſubjects.—If we may judge from the firſt operations of this nobleman, he was but indifferently provided with engineers: for, inſtead of beginning his approaches on the ſide of St. Philip's town, cloſe by the outworks, where he might have been ſcreened from the fire of the garriſon, his batteries were erected at Cape Mola, on the other ſide of the harbour, where they were more expoſed, their fire much leſs effectual, and indeed at too great a diſtance to be of any ſervice. The fire of St. Philip's was ſo ſevere, and the cannon ſo well ſerved on this quarter, that in a little time the enemy thought proper to change their plan of attac, and advance on the ſide of St. Philip's town, which ought to have been the firſt object of their conſideration, eſpecially as they could find little or no earth to fill their gabions, and open their trenches in the uſual form. On the 12th of May, about nine at night, they opened two bomb batteries, near the place where the windmills had been deſtroyed; and from that period an inceſſant fire was kept up on both ſides, from mortars and cannon, the French continuing to raiſe new batteries in every ſituation from whence they could annoy the beſieged.

On the 17th day of the month the garriſon were tranſported with joy at the ſight of the Britiſh ſquadron, commanded by admiral Byng; and mr. Boyd, commiſſary of the ſtores, ventured to embark in a ſmall boat, with ſix oars, which paſſed from St. Stephen's cove, a creek on the weſt ſide of the fortification, through a ſhower of cannon and muſketry from the enemy's poſt on the other ſide, and actually reached the open ſea, his deſign being to join the ſquadron; but this being at a great diſtance, ſtretching away to the ſouthward, and mr. Boyd perceiving himſelf chaſed by two of the enemy's light veſſels, he returned by the ſame rout to the garriſon, without having ſuſtained the leaſt damage. A circumſtance which plainly confutes the notion of mr. Byng, that it was impracticable to open a communication with the garriſon of St. Philip's. Next day the hopes of the beſieged, which had prognoſticated a naval victory to the Britiſh ſquadron, a ſpeedy relief to themſelves, and no leſs than captivity to the aſſailants, were conſiderably damped by the appearance of the French fleet, which, quietly returned to their ſtation of the harbour of Mahon. That ſame evening they were told by a deſerter, that the Engliſh fleet had been worſted in an engagement by M. de la Galiſſonniere; and this information was ſoon confirmed by a general diſcharge, or feu de joie, through the whole French camp, to celebrate the victory they pretended to have obtained. How little ſoever they had reaſon to boaſt of any advantage in the action, the retreat of the Engliſh ſquadron was undoubtedly equivalent to a victory; for had mr. Byng acquired and maintained the ſuperiority at ſea, the French forces, which had been diſembarked in Minorca, would, in all probability, have been obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war to his Britannick majeſty. The caſe was now much altered in their favour: their ſquadron cruiſed about the iſland without moleſtation: and they daily received, by means of their tranſports, re-enforcements of men and ammunition, as well as conſtant ſupplies of proviſions.

The Engliſh garriſon, however mortified at finding themſelves thus abandoned, reſolved to quit themſelves with gallantry in the defence of the place, not without ſome remaining hope that the Engliſh ſquadron would be re-enforced, and return to their relief. In the mean time, they ſuſtained and retorted the enemy's fire with undaunted reſolution. They remounted cannon, the carriages of which had been diſabled: they removed them occaſionally to places from whence it was judged they could do the greateſt execution: they repaired breaches, reſtored merlons, and laboured with ſurpriſing alacrity, even when they were ſurrounded by the numerous batteries of the foe; when their embraſures, and even the parapets, were demoliſhed, and they ſtood expoſed not only to the cannon and mortars, but alſo to the muſquetry, which fired upon them, without ceaſing, from the windows of the houſes in the town of St. Philip. By this time, they were inveſted with an army of 20,000 men, and plyed inceſſantly from 62 battering cannon, 21 mortars, and 4 howitzers, beſides the ſmall arms: nevertheleſs, the loſs of men within the fortreſs was very inconſiderable, the garriſon being moſtly ſecured in the ſubterranean works, which were impenetrable to ſhells or ſhot. By the 27th day of June they had made a practicable breach in one of the ravelins, and damaged the other outworks to ſuch a degree, that they determined this night to give a general aſſault. Accordingly, between the hours of 10 and 11, they advanced to the attac from all quarters on the land-ſide. At the ſame time a ſtrong detachment, in armed boats, attempted to force the harbour, and penetrate into the creek, called St. Stephen's Cove, to ſtorm Fort Charles, and ſecond the attac upon Fort Marlborough, on the farther ſide of the creek, the moſt detached of all the outworks. The enemy advanced with great intrepidity, and their commander, the duke de Richelieu, is ſaid to have led them up to the works in perſon. Such an aſſault could not but be attended with great ſlaughter: they were mowed down, as they approached, with grape-ſhot and muſquetry: and ſeveral mines were ſprung with great effect, ſo that the glacis was almoſt covered with the dying and the dead. Nevertheleſs, they preſerved with uncommon reſolution; and, though repulſed on every other ſide, at length made a lodgement in the Queen's redoubt, which had been greatly damaged by their cannon. Whether their ſucceſs in this quarter was owing to the weakneſs of the place, or to the timidity of the defender, certain it is, the enemy were in poſſeſſion before it was known to the officers of the garriſon: for lieutenant-colonel Jeffries, the ſecond in command, who had acquitted himſelf ſince the beginning of the ſiege, with equal courage, ſkill, and activity, in his viſitation of this poſt, was ſuddenly ſurrounded and taken by a file of French grenadiers, at a time when he never dreamed they had made a lodgement. Major Cunningham, who accompanied him, met with a ſeverer fate, though he eſcaped captivity: he was run through the arm with a bayonet, and the piece being diſcharged at the ſame time, ſhattered the bones of his hand in ſuch a manner, that he was maimed for life. In this ſhocking condition he retired behind a traverſe, and was carried home to his quarters. Thus the governor was deprived of his two principal aſſiſtants, one being taken, and the other diſabled.

The enemy having made themſelves maſters of Anſtruther's and the Queen's redoubts, from which perhaps they might have been diſlodged, had a vigorous effort been made for that purpoſe, before they had leiſure to ſecure themſelves, the duke de Richelieu ordered a parley to be beat, in order to obtain permiſſion to bury the dead, and remove the wounded. This requeſt was granted with more humanity than diſcretion, inaſmuch as the enemy took this opportunity to throw a re-enforcement of men privately into the places where the lodgements had been made, and theſe penetrated into the gallery of the mines, which communicated with all the other outworks. During this ſhort ceſſation, general Blakeney ſummoned a council of war, to deliberate upon the ſtate of the fort and garriſon; and the majority declared for a capitulation. The works were in many places ruined; the body of the caſtle was ſhattered; many guns were diſmounted, the embraſures and parapets demoliſhed, the palliſadoes broke in pieces, the garriſon exhauſted with hard duty and inceſſant watching, and the enemy in poſſeſſion of the ſubterranean communications. Beſides, the governor had received information from priſoners, that the duke de Richelieu was alarmed by a report that the marſhal duke de Belleiſle would be ſent to ſuperſede him in the command, and for that reaſon would hazard another deſperate aſſault, which it was the opinion of the majority the garriſon could not ſuſtain. Theſe conſiderations, added to the deſpair of being relieved, induced him to command him to a capitulation. But this meaſure was not taken with the unanimous conſent of the council. Some officers obſerved, that the garriſon was very little diminiſhed, and ſtill in good ſpirits: that no breach was made in the body of the caſtle, nor a ſingle cannon erected to batter in breach: that the loſs of an outwork was never deemed a ſufficient reaſon for ſurrendering ſuch a fortreſs: that the counterſcarp was not yet taken, nor, on account of the rocky ſoil, could be taken, except by aſſault, which would coſt the enemy a greater number than they had loſt in their late attempt: that they could not attac the ditch, or batter in breach, before the counterſcarp ſhould be taken, and even then they muſt have recourſe to galleries before they could paſs the foſſé, which was furniſhed with mines and countermines: finally, they ſuggeſted, that in all probability the Britiſh ſquadron would be re-enforced, and ſail bac to their relief; or, if it ſhould not return, it was the duty of the governor to defend the place to extremity, without having any regard to the conſequences. Theſe remarks being over ruled, the chamade was beat, a conference enſued, and very honourable conditions were granted to the garriſon, in conſideration of the gallant defence they had made. This it muſt be owned was vigorous while it laſted, as the French general was ſaid to have loſt 5000 men in the ſiege; whereas the loſs of the garriſon, which at firſt fell ſhort of 3000 men, did not exceed 100. The capitulation imported that the garriſon ſhould march out with all the honours of war, and be conveyed by ſea to Gibraltar. The French were put in poſſeſſion of one gate, as well as Fort-Charles and Marlborough redoubt: but the Engliſh troops remained in the other works till the 7th day of July, when they embarked. In the mean time, reciprocal civilities paſſed between the commanders and officers of both nations.

The articles of capitulation were no ſooner executed than monſieur de la Galiſſonniere ſailed bac to Toulon, with all the prizes which had lain at anchor in the harbour of Mahon ſince the fort of St. Philip was firſt inveſted. In all probability the ſafety of himſelf and his whole ſquadron was owing to this expeditious retreat; for in a few days after the ſurrender of the fort, ſir Edward Hawke's fleet, augmented by five ſhips of the line, which had been ſent from England, when the firſt tidings arrived of Minorca's being invaded, now made its appearance off the iſland: but by this time Geliſſonnier was retired, and the Engliſh admiral had the mortification to ſee the French colours flying upon St. Philip's-caſtle. What, perhaps, chagrined this gallant officer ſtill more, he was not provided with frigates, ſloops, and ſmall craft to cruiſe round the iſland, and intercept the ſupplies which were daily ſent to the enemy. Had he reached Minorca ſooner, he might have diſcomfited the French ſquadron; but he could not have raiſed the ſiege of St. Philip's, becauſe the duke de Richelieu had received his reenforcements, and ſuch a train of artillery as no fortification could long withſtand. Indeed, if the garriſon had been conſiderably re-enforced, and the communication with it opened by ſea, the defence would have been protracted, and ſo many vigorous ſallies might have been made, that the aſſailants would have had cauſe to reprent of their enterprize.

When the news of this conqueſt was brought to Verſailles, by the count of Egmont, whom the duke de Richelieu had diſpatched for that purpoſe, the people of France were tranſported with the moſt extravagant joy. Nothing was ſeen but triumphs and proceſſions; nothing heard but anthems, congratulations, and hyperibolical encomiums upon the conqueror of Minorca, who was celebrated in a thouſand poems and ſtudied orations; while the conduct of the Engliſh was vilified and ridiculed in ballads, farces, and paſquinades. Nothing more argues the degeneracy of a warlike nation than the pride of ſuch mean triumph for an advantage, which, in more vigorous times, would ſcarce have been diſtinguiſhed by the ceremony of a Te Deum Laudamus. Nor is this childiſh exultation that diſgraces the laurels of victory, confined to the kingdom of France. Truth obliges us to own, that even the ſubjects of Great-Britain are apt to be elevated by ſucceſs into an illiberal inſolence of ſelf-applauſe, and contemptuous compariſon. This muſt be condemned as a proof of unmanly arrogance, and abſurd ſelf-conceit, by all thoſe who cooly reflect, that the events of war generally, if not always, depend upon the genius or miſconduct of one individual. The loſs of Minorca was ſeverely felt in England, as a national diſgrace; but inſtead of producing dejection and deſpondence, it excited an univerſal clamour of rage and reſentment, not only againſt mr. Byng, who had retreated from the French ſquadron; but alſo in reproach of the adminiſtration, which was taxed with having neglected the ſecurity of Minorca. Nay, ſome politicians were inflamed into a ſuſpicion, that this important place had been negatively betrayed into the hands of the enemy, that, in caſe the arms of Great-Britain ſhould proſper in other parts of the world, the French king might have ſome ſort of equivalent to reſtore for the conqueſts which ſhould be abandoned at the peace. This notion, however, ſeems to have been conceived from prejudice and party, which now began to appear with the moſt acrimonious aſpect, not only throughout the united kingdoms in general, but even in the ſovereign's councils.

Sir Edward Hawke, being diſappointed in his hope of encountering La Galiſſonniere, and relieving the Engliſh garriſon of St. Philip's, at leaſt aſſerted the empire of Great-Britain in the Mediterranean, by annoying the commerce of the enemy, and blocking up the ſquadron in the harbour of Toulon. Underſtanding that the Auſtrian government at Leghorn had detained an Engliſh privateer, and impriſoned the captain, on pretence that he had violated the neutrality of the port, he detached two ſhips of war, to inſiſt, in a peremptory manner, on the releaſe of the ſhip, effects, crew and captain; and they thought proper to comply with his demand, even without waiting for orders from the court of Vienna. The perſon in whoſe behalf the admiral thus interpoſed, was one Fortunatus Wright, a native of Liverpool; who, though a ſtranger to a ſea-life, had, in the laſt war, equipped a privateer, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſuch a manner, by his uncommon vigilance and valour, that, if he had been indulged with a command ſuituable to his genius, he would have then deſerved as honourable a place in the annals of the navy, as that which the French had beſtowed upon their boaſted Guai Trouin, Du Bart, and Thurot. An uncommon exertion of ſpirit was the occaſion of his being detained at this juncture. While he lay at anchor in the harbour of Leghorn, commander of the St. George privateer of Liverpool, a ſmall ſhip of 12 guns and 80 men, a large French xebeque, mounted with 16 cannon, and nearly three times the number of his complement, choſe her ſtation in view of the harbour, in order to interrupt the Britiſh commerce. The gallant Wright could not endure this inſult: notwithſtanding the enemy's ſuperiority in metal and number of men, he weighed anchor, hoiſted his ſails, engaged him within ſight of the ſhore, and after a very obſtinate diſpute, in which the captain, lieutenant, and above 60 of the men belonging to the xebeque were killed on the ſpot, he obliged them to ſheer off, and returned to the harbour in triumph. This brave corſer would, no doubt, have ſignalized himſelf by many other exploits, had not he, in the ſequel, been overtaken in the midſt of his career by a dreadful ſtorm, in which the ſhip foundering, he and all his crew periſhed.

Sir Edward Hawke, having ſcoured the Mediterranean, and inſulted the enemy's ports, returned with the homeward-bound trade to Gibraltar; from whence, about the latter end of the year, he ſet ſail for England with part of his ſquadron, leaving the reſt in that bay, for the protection of our commerce, which in thoſe parts ſoon began to ſuffer extremely from the French privateers, that now ſwarmed in the Mediterranean. General Blakeney had arrived, with the garriſon of Minorca, at Portſmouth in the month of November, and been received with expreſſions of tumultuous joy: every place through which he paſſed celebrated his return with bonfires, illuminations, bell-ringing, and acclamations; every mouth was opened in his praiſe, extolling him for the gallant defence he had made in the caſtle of St. Philip. In a word, the people's veneration for Blakeney encraeſed in proportion to their abhorrence of Byng: the firſt was lifted into an idol of admiration, while the other ſunk into an object of reproach; and they were viewed at different ends of a falſe perſpective, through the medium of prejudice and paſſion; of a perſpective artfully contrived, and applied by certain miniſters for the purpoſes of ſelf-intereſt and deceit. The ſovereign is ſaid to have been influenced by the prepoſſeſſion of the ſ——t. Mr Blakeney met with a gracious reception from his majeſty, who raiſed him to the rank of an Iriſh baron. in conſideration of his faithful ſervices, while ſome mal-contents murmured as this mark of favour, as an unreaſonable ſacrifice to popular miſapprehenſion.

In the beginning of the year, the meaſures taken by the government of England ſeemed to have been chiefly dictated by the dread of an invaſion, from which the miniſters did not think themſelves ſecured by the guard-ſhips and cruiſers on different parts of the coaſt, or the ſtanding army of the kingdom, though re-enforced by the two bodies of German auxiliaries. A conſiderable number of new troops was levied: the ſucceſs in recruiting was not only promoted by the land-holders throughout the kingdom, who thought their eſtates were at ſtake, and for that reaſon encouraged their dependents to engage in the ſervice, but alſo in a great meaſure owing to a dearth of corn, which reduced the lower claſs of labourers to ſuch diſtreſs, that ſome inſurrections were raiſed, and many inliſted with a view to obtain a livelihood, which otherwiſe they could not earn. New ſhips of war were built, and daily put in commiſſion; but it was found impracticable to man them, without having recourſe to the odious and illegal practice of impreſſing ſailors, which muſt always be a reproach to every free people. Notwithſtanding large bounties granted by the government to volunteers, it was found neceſſary to lay an embargo upon all ſhipping, and impreſs all the ſeamen that could be found, without any regard to former protections; ſo that all the merchant-ſhips were ſtripped of their hands, and foreign commerce for ſome time wholly ſuſpended. Nay, the expedient of compelling men into the ſervice was carried to an unuſual degree of oppreſſion; for rewards were publicly offered to thoſe who ſhould diſcover where any ſeaman lay concealed: ſo that thoſe unhappy people were in ſome reſpects treated like felons, dragged from their families and connexions to confinement, mutilation, and death, and totally cut off from the enjoyment of that liberty, which, perhaps, at the expence of their lives, their own arms had helped to preſerve, in favour of their ungrateful country.[y]

About 80 ſhips of the line and 60 frigates were already equipped, and conſiderable bodies of land forces aſſembled, when, on the 3d day of February, a proclamation was iſſued, requiring all officers civil and military, upon the firſt appearance of any hoſtile attempt to land upon the coaſts of the kingdom, immediately to cauſe all horſes, oxen, or cattle, which might be fit for draft or burthen, and not actually enployed in the king's ſervice, or in the defence of the country, and alſo (ſo far it might be practicable) all other cattle and proviſions, to be removed 20 miles at leaſt from the place where ſuch hoſtile attempt ſhould be made, and to ſecure the ſame, ſo as that they might not fall into the hands or power of thoſe who ſhould make ſuch attempt; regard being had, however, that the reſpective owners ſhould ſuffer as little damage as might be conſiſtent with the public ſafety.

As the miniſtry were determined to make their chief efforts againſt the enemy in North-America, where the firſt hoſtilities had been committed, and where the ſtrongeſt impreſſion could be made, a detachment of two regiments was ſent thither under the conduct of general Abercrombie, who was appointed as ſucceſſor to general Shirley, whom they recalled, as a perſon no ways qualified to conduct military operations: nor indeed, could any ſucceſs in war be expected from a man who had not been trained to arms, nor ever acted but in a civil capacity. But the command in chief of all the forces in America was conferred upon the earl of Loudoun, a nobleman of amiable character, who had already diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſervice of his country. Over and above this command, he was now appointed governor of Virginia, and colonel of a royal American regiment, conſiſting of four battalions, to be raiſed in that country, and diſciplined by officers of experience, invited from foreign ſervice. Mr Abercrombie ſet ſail for America in March; but the earl of Loudoun, who directed in chief the plan of operations, and was veſted with power and authority little inferior to thoſe of a viceroy, did not embark till the latter end of May.

All theſe previous meaſures being taken, his majeſty, in the courſe of the ſame month, thought proper to publiſh a declaration of war[z] againſt the French king, importing,

[y] At this juncture, a number of public ſpirited merchants of the city of London, and others formed themſelves in a very laudible aſſociation, under the name of the Marine Society, and contributed conſiderable ſums of money for equipping ſuch orphans, friendleſs and forloin boys, as were willing to engage in the ſervice of the navy. In conſequence of this excellent plan, which was executed with equal zeal and diſcretion, many thouſands were reſcued from miſery, and rendered uſeful members of that ſociety, of which they muſt have been the bane and the reproach, without this humane interpoſition.

[z] When the French embaſſador returned to London, he propoſed that orders ſhould be immediately diſpatched to the Engliſh governors in America, with expreſs orders to deſiſt from any new undertaking, and all acts of hoſtility; but with regard to the lands on the Ohio, to put, without delay, matters on the ſame footing in which they ſtood before the late war, that the reſpective claims of both nations might be amicably referred to the commiſſaries at Paris. The Britiſh court agreed to the ceſſation of hoſtilities, and the diſcuſſion of the diſputes by the miniſters of the two crowns, on condition that that, ſince the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, the uſurpations and encroachments made upon the Britiſh territories in America had been notorious: that his Britannick Majeſty had, in divers ſerious repreſentations to the court of Verſailles, complained of theſe repeated acts of violence, and demanded ſatisfaction; but notwithſtanding the repeated aſſurances given by the French king, that every thing ſhould be ſettled agreeably to the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns, and particularly that the evacuation of the four neutral iſlands in the Weſt-Indies ſhould be effected, the execution of theſe aſſurances, and of the treaties on which they were founded, had been evaded under the moſt frivolous pretences: that the unjuſtifiable practices of the French governors, and officers acting under their authority, were ſtill continued, until they broke out in open acts of hoſtility in the year 1754; when, in time of profound peace, without any declaration of war, without any previous notice given, or application made, a body of French troops, commanded by an officer bearing the French king's commiſſion, attacked in an hoſtile manner, and took poſſeſſion of, an Engliſh fort on the river Ohio in North-America: that great naval armaments were prepared in the ports of France, and a conſiderable body of French troops embarked for that country: that although the French embaſſador was ſent bac to England with ſpecious profeſſions of a deſire to accommodate theſe differences, it appeared their real deſign was only to amuſe and gain time for the paſſage of theſe ſupplies and re-enforcements, which they hoped would ſecure the ſuperiority of the French forces in America, and enable them to carry their ambituous and oppreſſive projects into execution: that in conſequence of the juſt and neceſſary meaſures taken by the king of Great-Britain for preventing the ſucceſs of ſuch a dangerous deſign, the French embaſſador was immediately recalled from England, the fortifications of Dunkirk were enlarged, great bodies of troops marched down to the ſea-coaſts of France, and the Britiſh dominions threatened with an invaſion: that though the king of England, in order to fruſtrate theſe intentions, had given orders for ſeizing at ſea the ſhips of the French king and his ſubjects, yet he had hitherto contented himſelf with detaining thoſe ſhips which had been taken, and preſerving their cargoes intire, without proceeding to confiſcation; but it being at laſt evident, from the hoſtile invaſion of Minorca, that the court of Verſailles was determined to reject all propoſals of accommodation, and carry on the war with the utmoſt violence, his Britannick majeſty could no longer conſiſtently with the honour of his crown, and the welfare of his ſubjects, remain within thoſe bounds, which from a deſire of peace, he had hitherto obſerved A denunciation of war followed in the uſual form, and was concluded with an aſſurance, that all the French ſubjects reſiding in Great-Britain and Ireland, who ſhould demean themſelves dutifully to the government, might depend upon its protection, and be ſafe in their perſons and effects.

In the beginning of June the French king declared war in his turn againſt his Britannick majeſty, and his declaration was couched in terms of uncommon aſperity. He artfully threw a ſhade over the beginning of hoſtilities in North-America, referring to a memorial which had been delivered to the ſeveral courts of Europe, containing a ſummary of thoſe facts which related to the preſent war, and the negotiations by which it had been preceded. He inſiſted on the attac made by the king of England, in the year 1754, on the French poſſeſſions in North-America; and afterwards by the Engliſh navy on the navigation and commerce of the French ſubjects, in contempt of the law of nations, and direct violation of treaties. He complained that the French ſoldiers and ſailors underwent the harſheſt treatment in the Britiſh iſles, exceeding thoſe bounds which are preſcribed to the moſt rigorous rights of war, by the law of nature, and common humanity. He affirmed, that while the Engliſh miniſtry, under the appearance of ſincerity, impoſed upon the French embaſſador with falſe proteſtations, orders diametrically oppoſite to theſe deceitful aſſurances of a ſpeed accommodation were actually carrying into execution in North-America: that while the court of London em loyed every caballing art, and ſquandered away the ſubſidies of England, to inſtigate other powers againſt France, his moſt Chriſtian majeſt did not even aſk of theſe powers the ſuccours which guarantees and defenſive treaties authoriſed him to demand: but recommended to them ſuch meaſures only as tended to their own peace and ſecurity; that while the Engliſh navy, by the moſt odious violences, and ſometimes by the vileſt artifices, made captures of French veſſels, navigating in full ſecurity under the lafeguard of public faith, his moſt Chriſtian ma eſty releaſed an Engliſh frigate taken by a French ſquadron, and Britiſh veſſels traded to the ports of France without moleſtation: that the ſtriking contraſt formed by theſe different methods of proceeding would convince all Europe, that one court was guided by motives of jealouſy, ambition and avarice, and that the conduct of the other was founded on principles of honour, juſtice, and moderation: that the vague imputations contained in the king of England's declaration, had in reality no foundation; and the very manner in which they were ſet forth would prove their futility and falſehood: that the mention made of the works at Dunkirk, and the troops aſſembled on the coaſts of the ocean, implied the moſt groſs attempt to deceive mankind into a belief, that theſe were the points which determined the king of England to iſſue orders for ſeizing the French veſſels; whereas, the works at Dunkirk were not begun till after two French ſhips of war had been taken by an Engliſh ſquadron; and depredations had been committed ſix months upon the ſubjects of France before the firſt battalions began their march for the ſea-ſide. In a word, the moſt Chriſtian king, laying aſide that politeneſs and decorum on which his people value themſelves above all the nations upon the face of the earth, very roundly taxes his brother monarch's adminiſtration with piracy, perfidy, inhumanity, and deceit. A charge conveyed in ſuch reproachful terms, againſt one of the moſt reſpectable crowned heads in Europe, will appear the more extraordinary and injurious, if we conſider the accuſers were well acquainted with the falſity of their own imputations, and at the ame time conſcious of having practiſed thoſe very arts which they affected ſo much to decry. For, after all, it muſt be allowed, that nothing could be juſtly urged againſt the Engliſh government, with reſpect to France, except the omiſſion of a mere form, which other nations might interpret into an irregularity, but could not conſtrue into perfidious dealing, as the French had previouſly violated the peace by their inſolence and encroachments.

Whatever might have been the opinion of other nations, certain it is, the ſubjects of Great Britain heartily approved of the hoſtilities committed and intended againſt a people, whom they have always conſidered as their natural enemies, and the incendiaries of Europe. They chearfully contributed to the expence of armaments,[a] and ſeemed to approve of their deſtination, in hopes of being able to wipe off the diſgraces they had ſuſtained in the defeat of Braddock, and the loſs of Minorca. The laſt event made a deep impreſſion upon the minds of the community. An addreſs was preſented to the king by the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, containing ſtrong hints to the diſadvantage of the miniſtry. They expreſſed their apprehenſion, that the loſe of the important fortreſs of St. Philip and iſland of Minorca, poſſeſſions of the utmoſt conſequence to the commerce and naval ſtrength of Great-Britain, without any attempt by timely and effectual ſuccours to prevent or defeat an attac, after ſuch early notice of the enemy's intention, and when his majeſty's navy was ſo evidently ſuall the poſſeſſions in America ſhould be previouſly put in the ſituation preſcribed by the treaty of Utrecht, confirmed by that of Aix-la-Chapelle. The French miniſtry, inſtead of complying with this condition, produced an evaſive draft of a preliminary convention, and this was anſwered by a counter-propoſal: At length the embaſſador of France demanded, as preliminary conditions, that Great-Britain would renounce all claim to the ſouth-coaſt of the river St. Laurence, and the lakes that diſcharge themſelves into that river; cede to the French 20 leagues of country lying along the bay of Fundy, which divides Acadia, or Nova-Scotia; and all the land between the rivers Ohio and Onabache. A memorial was afterwards preſented on the ſame ſubject, including the affair of the neutral iſlands in the Weſt-Indies; but this was amply refuted in another piece, in which the Britiſh miniſtry obſerved, that even at the very opening of the commiſſion eſtabliſhed in Paris, for terminating amicably the diſputes in North-America, the French invaded Nova-Scotia, erected three forts in the heart of that province, and would have deſtroyed the Engliſh ſettlement at Halifax, had they not been prevented: that the like hoſtilities were committed upon his Britannick majeſty's ſubjects on the Ohio and Indian lakes, where the governors appointed by the French king, without any ſhadow of right, prohibited the Engliſh from trading; ſeized their traders by force, and ſent them priſoners to France; invaded the territories of Virginia, attacked a fort that covered its frontier, and, to ſecure their uſurpations, erected, with an armed force, a chain of forts on the lands which they had invaded: that his Britannick majeſty had complained of theſe hoſtilities to the court of Verſailles, but without effect; ſo that he found himſelf obliged to provide for the ſecurity of his ſubjects; and as the encroachments made by France were hoſtile, it could never be unlawful, or irreconcileable with the aſſurance of his majeſty's peaceable diſpoſition, to repel an aggreſſor; and that the ſame motive of ſelf-defence had forced him to ſeize the French ſhips and ſailors, in order to deprive that court of the means of making an invaſion, with which their miniſters in all the courts of Europe had menaced England.

[a] Immediately after the declaration of war, the French ſhips and cargoes which had been taken were tried and condemned, as legal prizes expoſed to public ſale, and their produce lodged in the Bank; but in what manner this money, amounting to a large ſum, was diſtributed or employed, we have not been able to diſcover.

perior to theirs, would be an indeliable reproach on the honour of the Britiſh nation. They expatiated upon the imminent danger to which the Britiſh poſſeſſions in America were expoſed, by the miſmanagement and delays which had attended the defence of thoſe invaluable colonies, the object of the preſent war, the principal ſource of the wealth and ſtrength of theſe kingdoms. They lamented the want of a conſtitutional well-regulated militia, the moſt natural and certain defence againſt all invaders whatſoever. They ſignified their hope, that the authors of the late loſſes and diſappointments would be detected, and brought to condign puniſhment; that his majeſty's known intentions of protecting and defending his ſubjects in their rights and poſſeſſions might be faithfully and vigorouſly carried into execution; and the large ſupplies, ſo neceſſarily demanded, and ſo chearfully granted, might be religiouſly applied to the defence of theſe kingdoms, their colonies, and their commerce, as well as to the annoyance of their inveterate and perfidious enemies, the only ſure means of obtaining a laſting and honourable peace. In anſwer to this addreſs the king aſſured them, that he would not fail to do juſtice upon the perſons who ſhould have been wanting in their duty to him and their country; to enforce obedience and diſcipline in his fleets and armies; and to ſupport the authority and reſpect due to his government. Remonſtrances of the ſame kind were preſented by different counties and corporations; and the populace clamoured aloud for enquiry and juſtice.

The firſt victim offered to the enraged multitude was the unfortunate general Fowke, who had been deputy-governor of Gibraltar, and behaved with remarkable conduct and integrity in the exerciſe of that important office, till that period, when he fell under the diſpleaſure of the government. He was now brought to trial before a board of general officers, and accuſed of having diſobeyed the orders he had received from the ſecretary at war in three ſucceſſive letters [b], touching the relief of Minorca. Mr Fowke alledged in his own defence, that the orders were confuſed and contradictory, and implied a diſcretionary power; that the whole number of his garriſon did not exceed 2600 men, after he had ſpared 275 to the ſhips commanded by mr. Edgecombe: that the ordinary duty of the garriſon requiring 800 men, the whole number was not ſufficient for three reliefs: that, if he had detached a battalion on board the fleet, he ſhould not have had above two reliefs, at a time when he believed the place was in danger of being attacked, for good reaſons, which he did not think himſelf at liberty to mention: that his orders being doubtful, he held a council of war, which was of opinion, that as undoubted intelligence was received of the French army's being landed at Minorca, to the number of between 13 and 16,000 men, and that a French ſquadron of 16 ſhips was ſtationed off the harbour, the ſending a detachment equal to a battalion from Gibraltar would be an ineffectual ſupply for the relief of the place, and a weakening of the garriſon from which they muſt be ſent. He obſerved, that ſuppoſing the orders to have been poſitive, and 700 men detached to Minorca, the number remaining at Gibraltar would not have exceeded 1556: a deduction of 700 more, according to the order of May the 12th, would have left a remainder of 856: that the men daily on duty in the garriſon, including artificers and labourers in the king's works, amounted to 839; ſo that if he had complied with the orders as they arrived, he would not have had more than 17 men over and above the number neceſſary for the daily work of the garriſon: thus, the important fortreſs of Gibraltar muſt, at this critical juncture, have been left almoſt naked and defenceleſs to the attempts of the enemy; and had thoſe detachments been actually ſent aboard, it afterwards appeared that they could not have been landed on the iſland of Minorca. The order tranſmitted to general Fowke to detain all empty veſſels, for further tranſportation of troops, ſeems to have been ſuperfluous; for it can hardly be ſuppoſed he could have occaſion for them, unleſs to embark the whole garriſon, and abandon the place. It ſeems likewiſe to have been unneceſſary to exhort the general to keep his garriſon as alert as poſſible, during that critical time; inaſmuch as it would have been impoſſible for the men to have enjoyed the leaſt repoſe or intermiſſion of duty, had the orders been punctually and literally obeyed. What other aſſiſtance it might have been in the governor's power to give for the relief of Minorca, or in what manner he could avoid fatiguing his garriſon, while there was an impoſſibility of relieving the guards, it is not eaſy to comprehend. Be that as it may, when the trial was finiſhed, and the queſtion put to acquit or ſuſpend for one year, the court was equally divided; and in ſuch caſes the caſting vote being veſted in the preſident, he threw it into the ſcale againſt the priſoner, whom his majeſty thought fit to diſmiſs from his ſervice.

The expectation of the public was now eagerly turned towards America, the chief if not the ſole ſcene of our military operations. On the 25th of June, mr. Abercrombie arrived at Albany, the frontier of New-York, and aſſumed the command of the forces there aſſembled, conſiſting of two regiments which had ſerved under Braddock, two battalions raiſed in America, two regiments now tranſported from England, four independent companies which had been many years maintained in New-York, the New-Jerſey regiment, four companies levied in North-Carolina, and a body of provincial forces raiſed by the government of New-England. Thoſe to the ſouthward, including Pennſylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, had not yet determined on any regular plan of operation, and were moreover hard preſſed in defending their weſtern frontier from the French and Indians who, in ſkulking parties, made ſudden irruptions upon their unguarded ſettlements, burning, plundering, and maſſacring with the moſt ſavage inhumanity. As for South-Carolina, the proportion of negro-ſlaves to the number of white inhabitants was ſo great in that colony, that the government could not, with any regard to the ſafety of the province, ſpare any re-enforcement for the general enterprize. The plan of this undertaking had been ſettled the preceding year in a council of war held at New-York. There it was reſolved to attac the fort of Niagara, ſituated between the lakes Ontario and Erie, in order to cut off the communication between Canada and Louiſiana, and prevent the French from ſupporting their new fortreſſes on the Ohio; to reduce Ticonderago and Crown-Point, ſo that the frontier of New-York might be delivered from the danger of an invaſion, and Great-Britain become maſter of the lake Champlain, over which the forces might be tranſported in any future attempt: to beſiege Fort Du Queſne upon the Ohio; and to detach a body of troops by the river Kennebec, to alarm the capital of Canada. This plan was too extenſive for the number of troops which had been prepared: the ſeaſon was too far advanced before the regiments arrived from England, the different colonies were divided in their opinions, and mr. Abercrombie poſtponed in the execution of any important ſcheme till the arrival of lord Loudoun, who was daily expected. The reaſons that delayed the reenforcement, and detained his lordſhip ſo long, we do not pretend to explain; though we may be allowed to obſerve, [b] To lieu. gen. Fowke, or, in his abſence, to the commander in chief in his majeſty's garriſon of Gibraltar.

SIR, War-Office, March 21, 1756.

I am commanded to acquaint you, that it is his majeſty's pleaſure that you receive into your garriſon lord Robert Bertie's regiment, to do duty there; and in caſe you ſhould apprehend that the French intend to make any attempt upon his majeſty's iſland of Minorca, it is his majeſty's pleaſure, that you make a detachment out of the troops in your garriſon equal to a battalion, to be commanded by a lieutenant-colonel and major; ſuch lieutenant-colonel and major to be the eldeſt in your garriſon, to be put on board the fleet for the relief of Minorca, as the admiral ſhall think expedient, who is to carry them to the ſaid iſland. I am,

Your humble ſervant, B.

To lieut. gen. Fowke, or, in his abſence, to the commander in chief at Gibraltar.

SIR, War-Office, March 26, 1756.

I am commanded to acquaint you, that it is his majeſty's pleaſure, in caſe the iſland of Minorca ſhould be in any likelihood of being attacked, that you make a detachment from the troops in your garriſon equal to a battalion, commanded by a lieutenant-colonel and major, for the relief of that place, to be put on board the fleet, at the diſpoſition of the admiral: ſuch lieutenant-colonel and major to be the eldeſt in your garriſon.

To lieut. gen. Fowke, or, in his abſence, to the commander in chief in his majeſty's garriſon in Gibraltar.

SIR, War-Office, April 1, 1756.

It is his majeſty's pleaſure, that you receive into your garriſon the women and children belonging to lord Robert Bertie's regiment.

To lieut. gen. Fowke, or the commander in chief at Gibraltar.

SIR, War-Office, May 12, 1756.

I wrote to you by general Stewart: if that order is not complied with, then you are now to make a detachment of 700 men out of your own regiment and Guiſe's; and alſo another detachment out of Pulteney's and Panmure's regiments, and ſend them on board the fleet for the relief of Mahon. But if that order has been complied with, then you are only to make one detachment of 700 men, to be commanded by another lieutenant-colonel and major, and to ſend it to Mahon; and you are alſo to detain all ſuch empty veſſels as ſhall come into your harbour, and keep them in readineſs for any further tranſportation of troops. I have alſo his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland's commands, to deſire that you will keep your garriſon as alert as poſſible, during this critical time, and give ſuch other aſſiſtance as may be in your power for the relief of Minorca; taking care, however, not to fatigue or endanger your own garriſon.

that many fair opportunities have been loſt, by the neglect and procraſtination of an Engliſh miniſtry. Certain it is, the unaccountable delay of this armament rendered it uſeleſs for a whole year, afforded time and leiſure to the enemy to take their precautions againſt any ſubſequent attac, and, in the mean time, to proceed unmoleſted in diſtreſſing the Britiſh ſettlements. Even before this period, they had attacked and reduced a ſmall poſt in the country of the Five Nations, occupied by 25 Engliſhmen, who were cruelly butchered to a man, in the midſt of thoſe Indians whom Great-Britain had long numbered among her allies.

Soon after this expedition, having received intelligence that a conſiderable convoy of proviſions and ſtores, for the garriſon of Oſwego, would in a little time ſet out from Schenectady, and be conveyed in batteaux up the river Onondaga, they formed an ambuſcade among the woods and thickets on the north ſide of that river; but underſtanding the convoy had paſſed before they had reached the place, they reſolved to wait the return of the detachment. Their deſign, however, was fruſtrated by the vigilance and valour of colonel Bradſtreet, who expected ſuch an attempt, and had taken his meaſures accordingly. On the 3d day of July, while he ſtemmed the ſtream of the river, with his batteaux formed into three diviſions, they were ſaluted with the Indian war-whoop, and a general diſcharge of muſquetry from the north ſhore. Bradſtreet immediately ordered his men to land on the oppoſite bank, and with a few of the foremoſt took poſſeſſion of a ſmall iſland, where he was forthwith attacked by a party of the enemy, who had forded the river for that purpoſe; but theſe were ſoon repulſed. Another body having paſſed a mile higher, he advanced to them at the head of 200 men, and fell upon them, ſword in hand, with ſuch vigour, that many were killed on the ſpot, and the reſt driven into the river with ſuch precipitation, that a conſiderable number of them were drowned. Having received information that a third body of them had paſſed at a ford ſtill higher, he marched thither without heſitation, and purſued them to the other ſide, where they were intirely routed and diſperſed. In this action, which laſted near three hours, about 70 of the batteau-men were killed or wounded, but the enemy loſt double the number killed, and above 70 taken priſoners. In all probability the whole detachment of the French, amounting to 700 men, would have been cut off, had not a heavy rain interpoſed, and diſabled colonel Bradſtreet from following his blow; for that ſame night he was joined by captain Patten with his grenadiers, in his march from Oneida to Oſwego, and next morning re-enforced with 200 men, detached to his aſſiſtance from the garriſon of Oſwego, but by this time the rivulets were ſo ſwelled by the rain, that it was found impracticable to purſue the enemy through the woods and thickets. Patten and his grenadiers accompanied the detachment to Oſwego, while Bradſtreet purſued his voyage to Schenectady, from whence he repaired to Albany, and communicated to general Abercromble the intelligence he had received from the priſoners, that a large body of the enemy were encamped on the eaſtern ſide of the lake Ontario, provided with artillery, and all other implements, to beſiege the fort of Oſwego.

In conſequence of this information, major-general Webb was ordered to hold himſelf in readineſs to march with one regiment to the relief of that garriſon; but, before they could be provided with neceſſaries, the earl of Loudoun arrived at the head-quarters at Albany, on the 29th day of July. The army at this time is ſaid to have conſiſted of regular troops to the number of 2600, about 7000 provincials, ſuppoſed to be in readineſs to march from Fort William-Henry, under the command of general Winſlow, over and above a conſiderable number of batteau-men at Albany and Schenectady. The garriſon at Oſwego amounted to 1400 ſoldiers, beſides 300 workmen and ſailors, either in the fort, or poſted in ſmall parties between the fort and place called Burnet's field, to ſecure a ſafe paſſage through the country of the Six Nations, upon whoſe friendſhip there was no longer any reliance. By the beſt accounts received of the enemy's force, they had about 3000 men at Crown-Point and Ticonderoga upon the lake Champlain: but their chief ſtrength was collected upon the banks of the lake Ontario, where their purpoſe undoubtedly was to reduce the Engliſh fort at Oſwego. The immediate object, therefore, of lord Loudoun's attention was the relief of this place; but his deſign was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the province of New-York, and other northern governments, who were much more intent upon the reduction of Crown-Point, and the ſecurity of their own frontiers, which they apprehended was connected with this conqueſt. They inſiſted upon Winſlow's being joined by ſome regiments of regular troops before he ſhould march againſt this fortreſs; and ſtipulated that a body of reſerve ſhould be detained at Albany, for the defence of that frontier, in caſe Winſlow ſhould fail in his enterprize and be defeated. At length they agreed, that the regiment which mr. Abercrombie had deſigned for that purpoſe ſhould be detached to the relief of Oſwego: and on the 12th day of Auguſt major-general Webb began his march with it from Albany: but on his arrival at the Carrying-place, between the Mohock's river and Wood's-creek, he received the diſagreeable news that Oſwego was taken, and the garriſon made priſoners of war. Mr Webb, apprehending himſelf in danger of being attacked by the beſieging army, began immediately to render the creek impaſſable, even to canoes, by felling trees, and throwing them into the ſtream; while the enemy, ignorant of his numbers, and apprehenſive of a like viſitation from him, took the very ſame method of preventing his approach: in conſequence of this apprehenſion, he was permitted to retire unmoleſted.

The loſs of the two ſmall forts, called Ontario and Oſwego, was a conſiderable national misfortune. They were erected on the ſouth ſide of the great lake Ontario, ſtanding on the oppoſite ſides, at the mouth of the Onandago river, that diſcharges itſelf into the lake, and conſtituted a poſt of great importance, where veſſels had been built, to cruiſe upon the lake, which is a kind of inland ſea, and interrupt the commerce as well as the motions and deſigns of the enemy. The garriſon, as we have already obſerved, conſiſted of 1400 men, chiefly militia and new-raiſed recruits, under the command of lieutenant-colonel Mercer, an officer of courage and experience: but the ſituation of the forts was very ill choſen; the materials moſtly timber, or logs of wood; the defences wretchedly contrived, and unfiniſhed; and, in a word, the place altogether untenable againſt any regular approach. Such were the forts which the enemy wiſely reſolved to reduce. Being under no apprehenſion for Crown-Point, they aſſembled a body of troops, conſiſting of 1300 regulars, 1700 Canadians, and a conſiderable number of Indian auxiliaries, under the command of the marquis de Montcalm, a vigilant and enterprizing officer, to whom the conduct of the ſiege was entruſted by the marquis de Vaudreuil, governor and lieutenant-general of New France. The firſt ſtep taken by Montcalm was to bloc up Oſwego by water with two large armed veſſels, and poſt a ſtrong body of Canadians on the road between Albany and the forts, to cut off all communication of ſuccour and intelligence. In the mean time, he embarked his artillery and ſtores upon the lake, and landed them in the bay of Nixouri, the place of general rendezvous. At another creek, within half a league of Oſwego, he erected a battery for the protection of his veſſels, and on the 12th day of Auguſt, at midnight, after his diſpoſitions had been made, he opened the trenches before Fort-Ontario. The garriſon having fired away all their ſhells and ammunition, ſpiked up the cannon, and deſerting the fort, retired next day acroſs the river into Oſwego, which was even more expoſed than the other, eſpecially when the enemy had taken poſſeſſion of Ontario, from whence they immediately began to fire without intermiſſion. Colonel Mercer being, on the 13th, killed by a cannon-ball, the fort, deſtitute of all cover, the officers divided in opinion, and the garriſon in confuſion, they next day demanded a capitulation, and ſurrendered priſoners of war, on condition that they ſhould be exempted from plunder, conducted to Montreal, and treated with humanity. Theſe conditions, however, the marquis did not punctually obſerve. The Britiſh officers and ſoldiers were inſulted by the ſavage Indians, who robbed them of their clothes and baggage, maſſacred ſeveral men as they ſtood defenceleſs on the parade, aſſaſſinated lieutenant De la Court as he lay wounded in his tent, under the protection of a French officer, and barbarouſly ſcalped all the ſic people in the hoſpital: finally, Montcalm, in direct violation of the articles, as well as in contempt of common humanity, delivered up above 20 men of the garriſon to the Indians, in lieu of the ſame number they had loſt during the ſiege; and, in all probability, theſe miſerable captives were put to death by thoſe barbarians with the moſt excruciating tortures, according to the execrable cuſtom of the country. Thoſe who countenance the perpetration of cruelties, at which human nature ſhudders with horror, ought to be branded as infamous to all poſterity. Such, however, were the trophies that, in the courſe of the American war, diſtinguiſhed the operations of a people who pique themſelves upon politeneſs, and the virtues of humanity. The priſoners taken at Oſwego, after having been thus barbarouſly treated, were conveyed in batteaux to Montreal, where they had no reaſon to complain of their reception; and, before the end of the year, they were exchanged. The victors immediately demoliſhed the two forts (if they deſerved that denomination) in which they found 121 pieces of artillery, 14 mortars, with a great quantity of ammunition, warlike ſtores, and proviſion, beſides two ſloops, and 200 batteaux, which likewiſe fell into their hands. Such an important magazine, depoſited in a place altogether indefenſible, and without the reach of immediate ſuccour, was a flagrant proof of egregious folly, temerity, and miſconduct.

The earl of Loudoun finding the ſeaſon too far advanced to admit of any enterprize againſt the enemy, exerted all his endeavours in making preparations for an early campaign in the ſpring, in ſecuring the frontiers of the Engliſh colonies, in forming an uniform plan of action, and promoting a ſpirit of harmony among the different governments, which had been long divided by jarring intereſts, and other ſources of diſſenſion. Mean while, the forts Edward and William-Henry were put in a proper poſture of defence, and ſecured with numerous garriſons: and the forces put into winter quarters at Albany, where comfortable barracs were built for that purpoſe. Fort-Granville, on the confines of Pennſylvania, an inconſiderable block-houſe, was ſurpriſed by a party of French and Indians, who made the garriſon priſoners, conſiſting of 22 ſoldiers, with a few women and children. Theſe they loaded with flour and proviſion, and drove into captivity; but the fort they reduced to aſhes. Many ſhocing murders were perpetrated upon defenceleſs people, without diſtinction of age or ſex, in different parts of the frontiers: but theſe outrages were in ſome meaſure balanced by the advantages reſulting from a treaty of peace, which the governor of Pennſylvania concluded with the Delaware Indians, a powerful tribe that dwell upon the river Saſquehanna, forming, as it were, a line along the ſouthern ſkirts of the province. At the ſame time the governor of Virginia ſecured the friendſhip and alliance of the Cherokees and Catawbas, two powerful nations adjoining to that colony, who were able to bring 3000 fighting men into the field. All theſe circumſtances conſidered, Great-Britain had reaſon to expect that the enſuing campaign would be vigorouſly proſecuted in America, eſpecialily as a freſh re-enforcement of troops, with a great ſupply of warlike ſtores was ſent to that country in 14 tranſports, under convoy of two ſhips of war, which ſailed from Cork, in Ireland, about the beginning of November.

No action of great importance diſtinguiſhed the naval tranſactions of this year on the ſide of America. In the beginning of June, captain Spry, who commanded a ſmall ſquadron, cruiſing off Louiſbourg, in the iſland Cape-Breton, took the Arc en Ciel, a French ſhip of 50 guns, having on board near 600 men, with a large quantity of ſtores and proviſions for the garriſon. He likewiſe made prizes of another French ſhip, with 70 ſoldiers, 200 barrels of powder, two large braſs mortars, and other ſtores of the like deſtination. On the 27th day of July commodore Holmes, being in the ſame latitude, with two large ſhips and a couple of ſloops, engaged two French ſhips of the line and four frigates, and obliged them to ſheer off, after an obſtinate diſpute. A great number of privateers were equiped in this country, as well as in the Weſt-India iſlands belonging to the crown of Great-Britain; and as thoſe ſeas ſwarmed with French veſſels, their cruiſers proved very advantageous to the adventurers.

Scenes of higher import were this year acted by the Britiſh arms in the Eaſt-Indies. The ceſſation of hoſtilities between the Engliſh and French companies on the peninſula of Indus, though it encouraged mr. Clive to viſit his native country, was not of long duration; for in a few months both ſides recommenced their operations no longer as auxiliaries to the princes of the country, but as principals and rivals, both in arms and commerce. Major Laurence, who now enjoyed the chief command of the Engliſh forces, obtained divers advantages over the enemy; and proſecuted his ſucceſs with ſuch vigour, as in all probability, would in a little time have terminated the war according to his own wiſh, when the progreſs of his arms was interrupted and ſuſpended by an unfortunate event at Calcutta, the cauſe of which is not eaſily explained: for extraordinary pains have been taken to throw a veil over ſome tranſactions, from whence this calamity was immediately or remotely derived.

The old ſuba or viceroy of Bengal, Bahar, and Orixa, dying in the month of April, in the year 1756, was ſucceeded by his adopted ſon, Sur Raja al Dowlat, a young man of violent paſſions, without principle, fortitude, or good faith, who began his adminiſtration with acts of perfidy and violence. In all probability, his deſign againſt the Engliſh ſettlements was ſuggeſted by his rapacious diſpoſition, on a belief that they abounded with treaſure; as the pretences which he uſed for commencing hoſtilities were altogether inconſiſtent, falſe and frivolous. In the month of May, he cauſed the Engliſh factory at Caſſimbuzzar to be inveſted, and inviting mr. Watts the chief of the factory, to a conference, under the ſanction of a ſafe conduct, detained him as priſoner; then by means of fraud and force intermingled, made himſelf maſter of the factory. This exploit being achieved, he made no ſecret of his deſign to deprive the Engliſh of all their ſettlements. With this view he marched to Calcutta, at the head of a numerous army, and inveſted the place, which was then in no poſture of defence.

The governor, intimidated by the number and power of the enemy, abandoned the fort, and with ſome principal perſons reſiding in the ſettlement, took refuge on board a ſhip in the river, carrying along with them their moſt valuable effects, and the books of the company. Thus the defence of the place devolved to mr. Holwell, the ſecond in command, who with the aſſiſtance of a few gallant officers, and a very feeble garriſon, maintained it with uncommon courage and reſolution againſt ſeveral attacs, until he was overpowered by numbers, and the enemy had forced their way into the caſtle. Then he was obliged to ſubmit; and the ſuba, or viceroy, promiſed on the word of a ſoldier, that no injury ſhould be done to him or his garriſon. Nevertheleſs, they were all driven to the number of 146 perſons of both ſexes, into a place called the Black-Hole priſon, a cube of about 18 feet, walled up to the eaſtward and ſouthward, the only quarters from which they could expect the leaſt refreſhing air, and open to the weſtward by two windows ſtrongly barred with iron, through which there was no perceptible circulation. The humane reader will conceive with horror the miſerable ſituation to which they muſt have been reduced, when thus ſtewed up in a cloſe ſultry night under ſuch a climate as that of Bengal, eſpecially when he reflects that many of them were wounded, and all of them fatigued with hard duty. Tranſported with rage to find themſelves thus barbarouſly cooped up in a place where they muſt be expoſed to ſuffocation, thoſe hapleſs victims endeavoured to force open the door, that they might ruſh upon the ſwords of the barbarians by whom they were ſurrounded: but all their efforts were ineffectual; the door was made to open inwards, and being once ſhut upon them, the crowd preſſed upon it ſo ſtrongly as to render all their endeavours abhortive: then they were overwhelmed with diſtraction and deſpair. Mr Holwell, who had placed himſelf at one of the windows, accoſted a jemmautdaar, or ſerjeant of the Indian guard, and having endeavoured to excite his compaſſion, by drawing a pathetic picture of their ſufferings, promiſed to gratify him with 1000 rupees in the morning, if he could find means to remove one-half of them into a ſeparate apartment. The ſoldier, allured by the promiſe of ſuch a reward, aſſured him he would do his endeavour for their relief, and retired for that purpoſe, but in a few minutes returned, and told him that the ſuba, by whoſe order alone ſuch a ſtep could be taken, was aſleep, and no perſon durſt diſturb his repoſe. By this time a profuſe ſweat had broke out on every individual, and this was attended with an inſatiable thirſt, which became the more intolerable as the body was drained of its moiſture. In vain thoſe miſerable objects ſtripped themſelves of their clothes, ſquatted down on their hams, and fanned the air with their hats, to produce a refreſhing undulation. Many were unable to riſe again from this poſture, but falling down were trod to death, or ſuffocated. The dreadful ſymptoms of thirſt was now accompanied with a difficulty of reſpiration, and every individual gaſped for breath. Their deſpair became outrageous: again they attempted to force the door and provoke the guard to fire upon them by execration and abuſe. The cry of 'water! water!' iſſued from every mouth. Even the jammautdaar was moved to compaſſion at their diſtreſs. He ordered his ſoldiers to bring ſome ſkins of water, which ſerved only to enrage the appetite, and increaſe the general agitation. There was no other way of conveying it through the windows but by hats, and this was rendered ineffectual by the eagerneſs and tranſports of the wretched priſoners, who at ſight of it ſtruggled and raved even into fits of delirium. In conſequence of theſe conteſts, very little reached thoſe who ſtood neareſt the windows, while the reſt at the farther end of the priſon, were totally excluded from all relief, and continuing calling upon their friends for aſſiſtance, and conjuring them by all the tender ties of pity and affection. To thoſe who were indulged, it proved pernitious; for, inſtead of allaying their thirſt, it enraged their impatience for more. The confuſion became general and horrid; all was clamour and conteſt; thoſe who were at a diſtance endeavoured to force their paſſage to the window, and the weak were preſſed down to the ground, never to riſe again. The inhuman ruffians without derived entertainment from their miſery: they ſupplied the priſoners with more water, and held up lights cloſe to the bars, that they might enjoy the inhuman pleaſure of ſeeing them fight for the baneful indulgence. Mr Holwell ſeeing all his particular friends lying dead around him, and trampled upon by the living, finding himſelf wedged up ſo cloſe as to be deprived of all motion, begged, as the laſt inſtance of their regard, that they would remove the preſſure, and allow him to retire from the window, that he might die in quiet. Even in thoſe dreadful circumſtances, which might be ſuppoſed to have levied all diſtinction, the poor delirious wretches manifeſted a reſpect for his rank and character: they forthwith gave way, and he forced his paſſage into the centre of the place, which was not crowded ſo much, becauſe by this time, about one-third of the number had periſhed, and lay in little compaſs on the floor, while the reſt ſtill crowded to both windows. He retired to a platform at the farther end of the room, and lying down upon ſome of his dead friends, recommended his ſoul to heaven. Here his thirſt grew inſupportable; his difficulty in breathing increaſed, and he was ſeiſed with a ſtrong palpitation. Theſe violent ſymptoms, which he could not bear, urged him to make another effort: he forced his way bac to the window, and cried aloud, 'water! for God's ſake!' He had been ſuppoſed already dead by his wretched companions, but finding him ſtill alive, they exhibited another extraordinary proof of tenderneſs and regard to his perſon: 'give him water,' they cried; nor would one of them attempt to touch it until he had drank. He now breathed more freely, and the palpitation ceaſed: but finding himſelf ſtill more thirſty after drinking, he abſtained from water, and moiſtened his mouth from time to time, by ſucking the perſpiration from his ſhirt ſleeves[c]. The miſerable priſoners, perceiving that water rather agrivated than relieved their diſtreſs, grew clamorous for air, and repeated their inſults to the guard, loading the ſuba and his governor with the moſt violent reproach. From railing they had recourſe to prayer, beſeeching heaven to put an end to their miſery. They now began to drop on all hands; but then a ſteam aroſe from the living, and the dead, as pungent and volatile as ſpirit of hortſhorn: ſo that all who could not approach the windows were ſuffocated. Mr Holwell being weary of life, retired once more to the platform, and ſtretched himſelf by the rev. mr. Jervas Bellamy, who, together with his ſon, a lieutenant, lay dead in each other's embrace. In this ſituation he was ſoon deprived of ſenſe, and lay to all appearance dead till day-break, when his body was diſcovered, and removed by his ſurviving friends to one of the windows, where the freſh air revived him, and he was reſtored to his ſight and ſenſes. The ſuba, at laſt, being informed that the greater part of the priſoners were ſuffocated, enquired if the chief was alive; and being anſwered in the affirmative, ſent an order for their immediate releaſe, when no more than 23 ſurvived of 146 who had entered alive.

Nor was the late deliverance, even of theſe few, owing to any ſentiment of compaſſion in the viceroy. He had received intimation, that there was a conſiderable treaſure ſecreted in the fort, and that mr. Holwell knew the place where it was depoſited. That gentleman, who, with his ſurviving companions, had been ſeized with a putrid fever, immediately upon their releaſe, was dragged in that condition before the inhuman ſuba, who queſtioned him about the treaſure, which exiſted no where but in his own imagination; and would give no credit to his proteſtations, when he ſolemnly declared he knew of no ſuch depoſit. Mr Holwell and three of his friends were loaded with fetters, and conveyed three miles to the Indian camp, where they lay all night, expoſed to a ſevere rain: next morning they were brought bac to town, ſtill manacled, under the ſcorching beams of a ſun intenſely hot; and muſt infallibly have expired, had not nature expelled the fever in large painful boils, that covered almoſt the whole body. In this piteous condition they were embarked in an open boat for Muxadavad, the capital of Bengal, and underwent ſuch cruel treatment and miſery in their paſſage, as would ſhoc the humane reader, ſhould he peruſe the particulars. At Muxadavad they were led through the city in chains, as a ſpectacle to the inhabitants, lodged in an open ſtable, and treated for ſome days as the worſt of criminals. At length the ſuba's grandmother interpoſed her mediation in their behalf; and as that prince was by this time convinced that there was no treaſure concealed at Calcutta, he ordered them to be ſet at liberty. When ſome of his ſycophants oppoſed this indulgence, repreſenting that mr. Holwell had ſtill enough left to pay a conſiderable ranſom, he replied with ſome marks of compunction and generoſity, 'If he has any thing left, let him keep it: his ſufferings have been great: he ſhall have his liberty.' Mr Holwell and his friends were no ſooner unfettered, than they took water for the Dutch Tankſall or mint, in the neighbourhood of the city, where they were received with great tenderneſs and humanity. The reader, we hope, will excuſe us for having thus particulariſed a tranſaction ſo intereſting and ſo extraordinary in all its circumſtances. The ſuba having deſtroyed Calcutta, and diſperſed the inhabitants, extorted large ſums from the French and Dutch factories, that he might diſplay a ſpirit of impartiality againſt all the Europeans, even in his oppreſſion, and returned to his city of Muxadavad in triumph. By the reduction of Calcutta, the Engliſh Eaſt-India company's affairs were ſo much embroiled in that part of the world, that perhaps nothing could have retrieved them but the interpoſition of a national force, and the good fortune of a Clive, whoſe enterprizes were always crowned with ſucceſs.

As the Engliſh Eaſt-India company had, for a whole century, been at a conſiderable expence in maintaining a marine force at Bombay, to protect their ſhips from the piracies of the Angrias, who had rendered themſelves independent princes, and fortified Geriah in that neighbourhood; many unſucceſsful attempts had been made to deſtroy their naval power, and reduce the fortreſs, under which they always took ſhelter. In the year 1754, the fleet of Tullagee Angria, the reigning prince, attacked three Dutch ſhips of force, which they either took or deſtroyed. Elated with this ſucceſs, he boaſted that he ſhould in a little time ſweep the ſeas of the Europeans, and began to build ſome large ſhips, to re-enforce his grabs and gallivats, which were the veſſels on which he had formerly depended. Next year his neighbours, the Mahrattas, having ſignified to the preſidency at Bombay, that they were diſpoſed to join in the neceſſary ſervice of humbling this common enemy, ſo formidable to the whole Malabar coaſt, commodore James was detached with ſome ſhips of force to attac Angria, in conjunction with thoſe allies. They accordingly joined him with ſeven grabs and ſixty gallivats. They proceeded to the harbour of Severndroog, where Angria's fleet lay at anchor: but they no ſooner received intelligence of his approach, then they ſlipped their cables, and ſtood out to ſea. He chaſed them with all the canvaſs he could carry; but their veſſels being lighter than his, they eſcaped; and he returned to Severndroog, which is a fortreſs ſituated on an iſland within muſket-ſhot of the main-land, ſtrongly, but irregularly fortified, and mounted with 54 pieces of cannon. There were three other ſmall forts on the continent, the largeſt of which was called Goa. On the 2d day of April, the commodore began to batter and bombard the iſland, fort, and Fort-Goa, at the ſame time. That of Severndroog was ſet on fire; one of the magazines blew up: a general conflagration enſued: the garriſon were overwhelmed with fire and confuſion; the Engliſh ſeamen landed under cover of the fire from the ſhips, and took the place by ſtorm with very little loſs. The other forts were immediately ſurrendered, and all of theſe by treaty delivered to the Mahrattas. On the 8th of April, the commodore anchored off Bancote, now called Fort-Victoria, one of the moſt northern parts of Angria's dominions, which ſurrendered without oppoſition, and ſtill remains in the hands of the Engliſh Eaſt-India company, by the conſent of the Mahrattas. The harbour is good, and here is a great trade for ſalt and other commodities ſent hither from Bombay.

It was in November following, that the ſquadron under admiral Watſon arrived at Bombay, where it was reſolved to give Angria the finiſhing ſtroke, ſtill in conjunction with the Mahrattas. Mean while commodore James was ſent to reconnoitre Geriah, the capital of his dominions, and to ſound the depth of the harbour; a ſervice which he ſuc-ceſsfully performed. The admiral being joined by a diviſion of ſhips, fitted out at the company's expence, having on board a body of troops commanded by colonel Clive, ſailed on the 7th day of February, and found in the neighbourhood of Geriah the Mahratta fleet, conſiſting of four grabs, and forty ſmaller veſſels, called gallivats, lying to the northward of the place, in a creek called Rajipore; and a land-army of horſe and foot, amounting to ſeven or eight thouſand men, the whole commanded by Rhamagee Punt, who had already taken one ſmall fort, and was actually treating about the ſurrender of Geriah. Angria himſelf had quitted the place; but his wife and family remained under the protection of his brother-in-law; who, being ſummoned to ſurrender by a meſſage from the admiral, replied that he would defend the place to the laſt extremity. In conſequence of this refuſal the whole Engliſh fleet, in two diviſions, ſailed on the 12th day of February into the harbour, and ſuſtained a warm fire from the enemy's batteries as they paſſed, as well as from the grabs poſted in the harbour for that purpoſe: this, however, was ſoon ſilenced after the ſhips were brought to their ſtations, ſo as to return the ſalutation. Between the hours of four and five in the afternoon, a ſhell being thrown into one of Angria's armed veſſels, ſet her on fire; and the flames communicating to the reſt, they were all deſtroyed: between ſix and ſeven the fort was ſet on fire by another ſhell; and ſoon after the fire ceaſed on both ſides. The admiral, ſuſpecting that the governor of the place would ſurrender it to the Mahrattes rather than to the Engliſh, diſembarked all the troops under mr. Clive, that he might be at hand, in caſe of emergency, to take poſſeſſion. In the mean time, the fort was bombarded; the line of battle ſhips were warped near enough to batter in breach; and then the admiral ſent an officer, with a flag of truce to the governor, requiring him to ſurrender. His propoſal being again rejected, the Engliſh ſhips renewed their fire next day with redoubled vigour. About one o'clock the magazine of the fort blew up, and at four the garriſon hung out a white flag for capitulation. The parley that enſued proved ineffectual, the engagement began again, and continued till 15 minutes after five: when the white flag was again diſplayed, and now the governor ſubmitted to the terms which were impoſed. Angria's flag was immediately hauled down; and two Engliſh captains taking poſſeſſion of the fort with a detachment, forthwith hoiſted the Britiſh enſign. To theſe captains, whoſe names were Buchannan and Forbes, the Mahrattas offered a bribe of 50,000 rupees, if they would allow them to paſs their guard, that they might take poſſeſſion of the fort for themſelves; but this offer was rejected with diſdain, and immediately diſcloſed to colonel Clive, who took effectual meaſures to fruſtrate their deſign. In this place, which was reduced with very inconſiderable loſs, the conquerors found above 200 cannon, ſix braſs mortars, a large quantity of ammunition, with money and effects to the value of 130,000l. The fleet which was deſtroyed conſiſted of eight grabs, one ſhip finiſhed, two upon the ſtocs, and a good number of gallivats. Among the priſoners, the admiral found Angria's wife, children, and mother, towards whom he demeaned himſelf with great humanity. Three hundred European ſoldiers, and as many ſepoys, were left to guard the fort; and four of the company's armed veſſels remained in the harbour for the defence of the place, which was extremely well ſituated for commerce[d].

The admiral and mr. Clive ſailed bac to Madras in triumph, and there another plan was formed for reſtoring the company's affairs upon the Ganges, recovering Calcutta, and taking vengeance on the cruel viceroy of Bengal. In October they ſet ſail again for the bottom of the bay; and about the beginning of December, arrived at Balaſore, in the kingdom of Bengal. Having croſſed the Braces, they proceeded up the river Ganges as far as Falta, where they found governor Drake, and the other perſons who had eſcaped on board of the ſhips when Calcutta was inveſted. Colonel Clive was diſembarked with his forces to attac the fort of Buſbudgia by land, while the admiral battered it by ſea: but the place being ill provided with cannon, did not hold out above an hour after the firing began. This conqueſt being atchieved at a very eaſy purchaſe, two of the great ſhips anchored between Tannay fort and a battery on the other ſide of the river, which were abandoned before one ſhot was diſcharged againſt either; thus the paſſage was laid open to Calcutta, the reduction of which we ſhall record among the tranſactions of the enſuing year.

Having thus, to the beſt of our power, given a faithful and exact detail of every material event, in which Great-Britain was concerned either at home, or in her ſettlements abroad, during the greateſt part of the year 1756, we ſhall now return to Europe, and endeavour to explain the beginning of a bloody war in Germany, which then ſeemed to have become the chief object of the Britiſh councils. On the eve of a rupture between France and England, it was natural for his Britannick majeſty to provide for the ſafety of his electoral dominions, the only quarter by which he was at all acceſſible to the efforts of the enemy, who he foreſaw would not fail to annoy him through that avenue. He at that time ſtood upon indifferent terms with the king of Pruſſia, who was conſidered as a partiſan and ally of France; and he knew that the houſe of Auſtria alone would not be ſufficient to ſupport him againſt two ſuch powerful antagoniſts. In this emergency, he had recourſe to the empreſs of Ruſſia, who, in conſequence of a large ſubſidy granted by England, engaged to furniſh a ſtrong body of forces for the defence of Hanover. His Pruſſian majeſty, ſtartled at the conditions of this treaty, took an opportunity to declare that he would not ſuffer foreign forces of any nation to enter the empire, either as principals or auxiliaries: a declaration which probably flowed from a jealouſy and averſion he had conceived to the court of Peterſburgh, as well as from a reſolution he had formed of ſtriking ſome great ſtroke in Germany, without any riſque of being reſtricted or controlled. He knew he ſhould give umbrage to the French king, who had already made preparations for penetrating into Weſtphalia: but he took it for granted he ſhould be able to exchange his connexions with France for an alliance with Great-Britain, which would be much leſs troubleſome, and much more productive of advantage: indeed, ſuch an alliance was the neceſſary conſequence of his declaration. Had his Britannick majeſty made a requiſition of the Ruſſian auxiliaries, he muſt have expoſed himſelf to the reſentment of a warlike monarch, who hovered on the ſkirts of his electorate at the head of 140,000 men, and could have ſubdued the whole country in one week; and if he forebore to avail himſelf of the treaty with the czarina, he did not know how ſoon the king of Pruſſia might be reconciled to his moſt chriſtian majeſty's deſign of invaſion. As for the empreſs-queen, her attention was engroſſed by ſchemes of her intereſt or preſervation; and her hands ſo full, that ſhe either could not or would not fulfil the engagements ſhe had contracted with her former and firmeſt allies. In theſe circumſtances the king of England ſought and obtained the alliance of Pruſſia, which, to the beſt of our comprehenſion, entailed upon Great-Britain the enormous burthen of extravagant ſubſidies, together with the intolerable expence of a continental war, without being productive of one advantage either poſitive or negative to England or Hanover. On the contrary, this connexion threw the empreſs-queen into the arms of France, whoſe friendſhip ſhe bought at the expence of the Barrier in the Netherlands, acquired with infinite labour, by the blood and treaſure of the maritime powers: it gave birth to a confederacy of deſpotic princes; ſufficient, if their joint force was fully exerted, to overthrow the liberties of all the free ſtates in Europe; and, after all, Hanover has been over-run, and ſubdued by the enemy: and the king of Pruſſia put to the ban of the empire. All theſe conſequences are, we apprehend, fairly deducible from the reſolution which his Pruſſian majeſty took, at this juncture, to precipitate a war with the houſe of Auſtria. The apparent motives that prompted him to this meaſure we ſhall preſently explain. In the mean time, the defenſive treaty between the empreſs-queen and France was no ſooner ratified, than the czarina was invited to accede to the alliance, and a private miniſter ſent from Paris to Peterſburgh, to negotiate the conditions of this acceſſion, which the empreſs of Ruſſia accordingly embraced: a circumſtance ſo agreeable to the court of Verſailles, that the marquis de L'Hopital was immediately appointed embaſſador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the court of Ruſſia. Applications were likewiſe made to the court of Madrid and Turin, ſolliciting their concurrence; but their Catholic and Sardinian majeſties wiſely reſolved to obſerve a neutrality. At the ſame time, intrigues were begun by the French emmiſſaries in the ſenate of Sweden, in order to kindle up a war between that nation and Pruſſia; and their endeavours ſucceeded in the ſequel, even contrary to the inclination of their ſovereign. At preſent a plot was diſcovered for altering the form of government, by increaſing the power of the crown; and ſeveral perſons of rank being convicted upon trial, were beheaded as principals in this conſpiracy. Although it did not appear that the king and queen was at all concerned in the ſcheme, his Swediſh majeſty thought himſelf ſo hardly treated by the diet, that he threatened to reſign his royalty, and retire into his own hereditary dominions. This deſign was extremely diſagreeable to the people in general, who eſpouſed his cauſe in oppoſition to the diet, by whom they conceived themſelves more oppreſſed than they ſhould have been under an unlimited monarchy.

[d] When the admiral entered their apartment, the whole family ſhedding floods of tears fell with their faces to the ground; from which being raiſed, the mother of Angria told him, in a piteous tone, the people had no king, ſhe no ſon, her daughter no huſband, their children no father. The admiral replying, 'they muſt look upon him as their father and their friend;' the youngeſt boy, about ſix years of age, ſeized him by the hand, and ſobbing exclaimed, 'then you ſhall be my father.' Mr Watſon was ſo affected with this pathetic addreſs, that the tears tricked down his cheeks, while he aſſured them they might depend upon his protection and friendſhip.

The king of Pruſſia, alarmed at theſe formidable alliances, ordered all his forces to be completed, and held in readineſs to march at the firſt notice; and a report was induſtriouſly circulated, that by a ſecret article in the late treaty between France and the houſe of Auſtria, theſe two powers had obliged themſelves to deſtroy the proteſtant religion, and overturn the freedom of the empire, by a forced election of a king of the Romans. The cry of religion was no impolitic meaſure; but it no longer produced the ſame effect as in times paſt. Religion was made a pretence on both ſides: for the partiſans of the empreſs-queen inſinuated, on all occaſions, that the ruin of the catholic faith in Germany was the principal object of the new alliance between the kings of Great-Britain and Pruſſia. It was in conſequence of ſuch ſuggeſtions, that his Britannick majeſty ordered his electoral miniſter at the diet to deliver a memorial to all the miniſters at Ratiſbon, expreſſing his ſurpriſe to find the treaty he had concluded with the king of Pruſſia induſtriouſly repreſented as a ground of apprehenſion and umbrage, eſpecially for religion. He obſerved, that as France had made open diſpoſitions for invading the electorate of Hanover, and diſturbing the peace of the empire; that as he had been denied, by the empreſs-queen, the ſuccours ſtipulated in treaties of alliance; and as he was refuſed aſſiſtance by certain ſtates of the empire, who even ſeemed diſpoſed to favour ſuch a diverſion; he had, in order to provide for the ſecurity of his own dominions, to eſtabliſh peace and tranquillity in the empire, and maintain its ſyſtem and privileges, without any prejudice to religion, concluded a defenſive treaty with the king of Pruſſia: that, by this inſtance of patriotic zeal for the welfare of Germany, he had done an eſſential ſervice to the empreſs-queen, and performed the part which the head of the empire, in dignity and duty, ought to have acted: that time would demonſtrate how little it was the intereſt of the empreſs-queen to engage in a ſtrict alliance with a foreign power, which, for upwards of two centuries, had ravaged the principal provinces of the empire, maintained repeated wars againſt the archducal houſe of Auſtria, and always endeavoured, as it ſuited her views, to excite diſtruſt and diſſention among the princes and ſtates that compoſe the Germanick body.

The court of Vienna formed two conſiderable armies in Bohemia and Moravia; yet pretended that they had nothing in view but ſelf-preſervation, and ſolemnly diſclaimed both the ſecret article, and the deſign which had been laid to their charge. His moſt Chriſtian majeſty declared, by his miniſter at Berlin, that he had no other intention but to maintain the public tranquillity of Europe; and this being the ſole end of all his meaſures, he beheld with ſurpriſe the preparations and armaments of certain potentates: that, whatever might be the view with which they were made, he was diſpoſed to make uſe of the power which God had put into his hands, not only to maintain the public peace of Europe againſt all who ſhould attempt to diſturb it, but alſo to employ all his forces, agreeably to his engagements, for the aſſiſtance of his ally, in caſe her dominions ſhould be attacked: finally, that he would act in the ſame manner in behalf of all the other powers with whom he was in alliance. This intimation made very little impreſſion upon the king of Pruſſia, who had already formed his plan, and was determined to execute his purpoſe. What his original plan might have been, we ſhall not pretend to diſcloſe; nor do we believe he imparted it to any confident or ally. It muſt be confeſſed, however, that the intrigues of the court of Vienna furniſhed him with a ſpecious pretence for drawing the ſword, and commencing hoſtilities. The empreſs-queen had ſome reaſon to be jealous of ſuch a formidable neighbour. She remembered his irruption into Bohemia, in the year 1744, at a time when ſhe thought that country, and all her other dominions, ſecure from his invaſion by the treaty of Breſlau, which ſhe had in no particular contravened. She caballed againſt him in different courts of Europe: ſhe concluded a treaty with the czarina, which, though ſeemingly defenſive, implied an intention of making conqueſts upon this monarch: ſhe endeavoured to engage the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, as a contradicting power in this confederacy; and, if he had not been afraid of a ſudden viſit from his neighbour of Pruſſia, it cannot be ſuppoſed but he would have been pleaſed to contribute to the humiliation of a prince who had once before, without the leaſt provocation, driven him from his dominions, taken poſſeſſion of his capital, routed his troops, and obliged him to pay a million of crowns, to indemnify him for the expence of this expedition: but he carefully avoided taking ſuch a ſtep as might expoſe him to another invaſion, and even refuſed to accede to the treaty of Peterſburgh, though it was expreſsly defenſive; the Caſus Fœderis being his Pruſſian majeſty's attacking either of the contradicting parties. It appears, however, that count de Bruhl, prime miniſter and favourite of the king of Poland, had, in conjunction with ſome of the Auſtrian miniſters, carried on certain ſcandalous intrigues, in order to embroil the king of Pruſſia with the empreſs of Ruſſia, between whom a miſunderſtanding had long ſubſiſted.

His Pruſſian majeſty, perceiving the military preparations of the court of Vienna, and having obtained intelligence of their ſecret negotiations with different powers in Europe, ordered M. de Klingraafe, his miniſter at the imperial court, to demand whether all thoſe preparations of war on the frontiers of Sileſia, were deſigned againſt him, and what were the intentions of her imperial majeſty? To this demand the empreſs replied, That in the preſent juncture ſhe had found it neceſſary to make armaments, as well for her own defence as for that of her allies; but they did not tend to the prejudice of any perſon or ſtate whatever. The king, far from being ſatisfied with this general anſwer ſent freſh orders to Klingraafe, to repreſent, that after the king had diſſembled as long as he thought conſiſtent with the ſafety and honour, the bad deſigns imputed to the empreſs would not ſuffer him longer to diſguiſe his ſentiments: that he was acquainted with the offenſive projects which the two courts had formed at Peterſburgh; that he knew they had engaged to attac him ſuddenly with an army of 200,000 men; a deſign which would have been executed in the ſpring of the year, had not the Ruſſian forces wanted recruits, their fleet mariners, and Livonia a ſufficient quantity of corn for their ſupport; that he conſtituted the empreſs arbiter of peace or war: if ſhe deſired the former, he required a clear and formal declaration, or poſitive aſſurance, that ſhe had no intention to attac him, either this year or the next; but he ſhould look upon an ambiguous anſwer as a declaration of war; and he called heaven to witneſs, that the empreſs alone would be guilty of the innocent blood that ſhould be ſpilt, and all the diſmal conſequences that would attend the commiſſion of hoſtilities.

A declaration of this nature might have provoked a leſs haughty court than that of Vienna, and, indeed, ſeems to have been calculated on purpoſe to exaſperate the pride of her imperial majeſty, whoſe anſwer he ſoon received, to this effect: that his majeſty the king of Pruſſia had already been employed, for ſome time, in all kinds of the moſt conſiderable preparations of war, and the moſt diſquieting with regard to the public tranquillity, when he thought fit to demand explanations of her majeſty, touching the military diſpoſitions that were making in her dominions; diſpoſitions on which ſhe had not reſolved till after the preparations of his Pruſſian majeſty had been made; that though her majeſty might have declined explaining herſelf on thoſe ſubjects, which required no explanation, ſhe had been pleaſed to declare, with her own mouth, to M. de Klingraafe, that the critical ſtate of public affairs rendered the meaſures ſhe was taking abſolutely neceſſary for her own ſafety, and that of her allies; but that in other reſpects, they tended to the prejudice of no perſon whatſoever: that her imperial majeſty had undoubtedly a right to form what judgment ſhe pleaſed of the circumſtances of the time; and likewiſe that it belonged to none but herſelf to eſtimate her own danger; that her declaration was ſo clear, ſhe never imagined it could be thought otherwiſe: that being accuſtomed to receive, as well as to practiſe the decorums which ſovereigns owe to each other, ſhe could not hear without aſtoniſhment and ſenſibility the contents of the memorial now preſented by M. de Klingraafe; ſo extraordinary, both in the matter and expreſſing the bounds of that moderation which ſhe had preſcribed to herſelf, were ſhe to anſwer the whole of its contents; nevertheleſs, ſhe thought proper to declare, that the information communicated to his Pruſſian majeſty of an offenſive alliance againſt him ſubſiſting between herſelf and the empreſs of Ruſſia, together with the circumſtances and pretended ſtipulations of that alliance, were abſolutely falſe and forged, for no ſuch treaty did exiſt, or even had exiſted. She concluded with obſerving, that this declaration would enable all Europe to judge of what weight and quality thoſe dreadful events were which Klingraafe's memorial announced; and to perceive that, in any caſe, they could not be imputed to her imperial majeſty. This anſwer, though ſeemingly explicit, was not deemed ſufficiently categorical, or at leaſt not ſuitable to the purpoſes of the king of Pruſſia, who, by his reſident at Vienna, once more declared, that if the empreſs-queen would ſign a poſitive aſſurance that ſhe would not attac his Pruſſian majeſty either this year or the next, he would directly withdraw his troops, and let things be reſtored to their former footing. This demand was evaded on pretence that ſuch an aſſurance could not be more binding than the ſolemn treaty by which he was already ſecured; a treaty which the empreſs-queen who had no intention to violate. But, before an anſwer could be delivered, the king had actually invaded Saxony, and publiſhed his declaration againſt the court of Vienna. The court of Vienna believing that the king of Pruſſia was bent upon employing his arms ſomewhere: being piqued at the dictatorial manner in which his demands were conveyed; unwilling to lay themſelves under further reſtrictions; apprehenſive of giving umbrage to their allies, and confident of having provided for their own ſecurity, reſolved to run the riſque of his reſentment, not without hopes of being indemnified in the courſe of the war for the part of Sileſia which the queen had been obliged to cede in the treaty of Breſlau.

Both ſides being thus prepared, and perhaps equally eager for action, the king of Pruſſia would no longer ſuſpend his operations, and the ſtorm firſt fell upon Saxony. He reſolved to penetrate through that country into Bohemia, and even to take poſſeſſion of it as a frontier, as well as for the convenience of ingreſs and egreſs to and from the Auſtrian dominions. Beſides, he had reaſon to believe the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, was connected with the czarina and the empreſs-queen; therefore, he thought it would be impolitic to leave that prince in any condition to give him the leaſt diſturbance. His army entered the Saxon territory towards the latter end of Auguſt, when he publiſhed a declaration, importing, that the unjuſt conduct and dangerous views of the court of Vienna againſt his majeſty's dominions laid him under the neceſſity of taking proper meaſures for protecting his territories and ſubjects; that for this purpoſe he could not forbear taking the diſagreeable reſolution to enter with his troops the hereditary dominions of his majeſty the king of Poland, elector of Saxony: but he proteſted before God and man, that on account of his perſonal eſteem and friendſhip for that prince, he would not have proceeded to this extremity, had he not ben forced to it by the laws of war, the fatality of the preſent conjuncture, and the neceſſity of providing for the defence and ſecurity of his ſubjects. He reminded the public of the tenderneſs with which he had treated the elector of Saxony, during the compaign of the year 1744, and of the bad conſequences reſulting to that monarch from his engagements with the enemies of Pruſſia. He declared that the apprehenſions of being expoſed again to ſuch enterprizes, had obliged him to take thoſe precautions which prudence dictated: but he proteſted in the moſt ſolemn manner, that he had no hoſtile views againſt the Poliſh majeſty, or his dominions; that his troops did not enter Saxony as enemies, and he had taken care that they ſhould obſerve the beſt order, and the moſt exact diſcipline: that he deſired nothing more ardently than the happy minute that ſhould procure him the ſatisfaction of reſtoring to his Poliſh majeſty his hereditary dominions, which he had ſeized only as a ſacred depoſitum. By his miniſter at Dreſden, he had demanded a free paſſage for his forces through the Saxon dominions; and this the king of Poland was ready to grant, with reaſonable limitations, to be ſettled by commiſſaries appointed for that purpoſe. But theſe were formalities which did not at all ſuit with his Pruſſian majeſty's diſpoſition or deſign. Even before this requiſition was made, a body of his troops, amounting to 15,000, under the command of prince Ferdinand, brother to the duke of Brunſwick, took poſſeſſion of Leipſick on the 20th day of September. Here he publiſhed a declaration, ſignifying, that it was his Pruſſian majeſty's intention to conſider and defend the inhabitants of that electorate as if they were his own ſubjects; and that he had given preciſe orders to his troops to obſerve the moſt exact diſcipline. As the firſt mark of his affection, he ordered them to provide the army with all ſorts of proviſion, according to a certain rate, on pain of military execution. That ſame evening notice was given to the corporation of merchants, that their debuties ſhould pay all taxes and cuſtoms to the king of Pruſſia; then he took poſſeſſion of the Cuſtom-houſe and Exciſe-office, and ordered the magazines of corn and meal to be opened for the uſe of his ſoldiers.

The king of Poland, apprehenſive of ſuch a viſitation, had ordered all the troops of his electorate to leave their quarters, and aſſemble in a ſtrong camp marked out for them between Pirna and Koningſtein, which was entrenched, and provided with a numerous train of artillery. Thither the king of Poland repaired, with his two ſons Xaverius and Charles; but the queen and the reſt of the royal family remained at Dreſden. Of this capital his Pruſſian majeſty, with the bulk of his army, took poſſeſſion on the 8th day of September, when he was viſited by lord Stormont, the Engliſh embaſſador at that court, accompanied by count Salmour, a Saxon miniſter, who, in his maſter's name, propoſed a neutrality. The king of Pruſſia profeſſed himſelf extremely well pleaſed with the propoſal; and as the moſt convincing proof of his neutrality, deſired the king of Poland would ſeparate his army, by ordering his troops to return to their former quarters. His Poliſh majeſty did not like to be ſo tutored in his own dominions: he depended for his own ſafety more upon the valour and attachment of his troops thus aſſembled, than upon the friendſhip of a prince who had invaded his dominions, and ſequeſtered his revenue without provocation: and he truſted too much to the ſituation of his camp at Pirna, which was deemed impregnable. In the mean time, the king of Pruſſia fixed his head-quarters at Seidlitz, about half a German league diſtant from Pirna, and poſted his army in ſuch a manner as to be able to intercept all convoys of proviſion deſigned for the Saxon camp: his forces extended on the right towards the frontiers of Bohemia, and the van-guard actually ſeized the paſſes that lead to the circles of Satzer and Leutmeritz in that kingdom; while prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick marched with a body of troops along the Elbe, and took poſt at this laſt place without oppoſition. At the ſame time the king covered his own dominions, by aſſembling two conſiderable bodies in the Upper and Lower-Sileſia, which occupied the paſſes that communicated with the circles of Buntzla and Koningſgratz. Hoſtilities were commenced on the 13th day of September by a detachment of Pruſſian huſſars, who attacked an Auſtrian eſcorte to a convoy of proviſions, deſigned for the Saxon camp; and having routed them, carried off a conſiderable number of loaded waggons. The magazines at Dreſden were filled with an immenſe quantity of proviſion and forage for the Pruſſian army, and the bakers were ordered to prepare a vaſt quantity of bread, for which purpoſe 30 new ovens were erected. When the king of Pruſſia firſt arrived at Dreſden, he lodged at the houſe of counteſs Moczinſka; and gave orders that the queen and royal family of Poland ſhould be be treated with all due veneration and reſpect:[e] even while the Saxon camp was blocked up on every ſide, he ſometimes permitted a waggon, loaded with freſh proviſion and game, to paſs unmoleſted for the uſe of his Poliſh majeſty.

During theſe tranſactions the greateſt part of the [e] His majeſty ſeems to have abated of this reſpect in the ſequel, if we may believe the aſſertion of his Poliſh majeſty's queen, and the court of Vienna, who affirmed, that the ſentinels were poſted within the palace where the queen and royal family reſided; as alſo at the door of the ſecret cabinet, where the papers relating to foreign tranſactions were depoſited. The keys of this cabinet were ſeized, and all the writings demanded. The whole Saxon miniſtry were diſcharged from their reſpective employments, and a new commiſſion was eſtabliſhed by the king of Pruſſia for the adminiſtration of affairs in general. When the queen entreated this prince to remove the ſentinels poſted within the palace, and contiguous paſſages, agreeably to his aſſurances that all due reſpect ſhould be obſerved towards the royal family, the king ordered the guards to be doubled, and ſent an officer to demand of her majeſty the keys of the ſecret cabinet. The queen obtained this officer's conſent, that the doors ſhould be ſealed up; but afterwards he returned with orders to break them open: then her majeſty, placing herſelf before the door, ſaid, ſhe truſted ſo much to the promiſe of the king of Pruſſia, that ſhe could not believe he had given ſuch orders. The officer declaring that his orders were poſitive, and that he durſt not diſobey them, ſhe continued in the ſame place, declaring, that if violence was to be uſed, he muſt begin with her. The officer returning to acquaint the king with what had paſſed, her majeſty conjured the miniſters of Pruſſia and England to remind his majeſty of his promiſe, but her repreſentations had no effect; the officer returned with freſh orders to uſe force, in ſpite of the oppoſition ſhe might make againſt it in perſon. The queen finding herſelf in danger of her life, at length withdrew; the doors were forced, the cheſts broke open, and all the papers ſeized, Pruſſian army advanced into Bohemia, under the command of Veldt-Mareſchal Keith, [f] who reduced the town and palace of Tetchen, took poſſeſſion of all the paſſes, and encamped near Auſſig, a ſmall town in Bohemia, at no great diſtance from the imperial army, amounting to 50,000 men, commanded by count Brown, an officer of Iriſh extract, who had often diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the field by his courage, vigilance, and conduct. His Pruſſian majeſty having left a conſiderable body of troops for the blockade of Pirna, aſſumed in perſon the command of Mareſchal Keith's corps, and advanced to give battle to the enemy. On the 29th day of September he formed his troops in two columns, and in the evening arrived with his van at Welmina, from whence he ſaw the Auſtrian army poſted with its right at Lowoſchulz, and its left towards the Egra. Having occupied with ſix battalions a hollow way, and ſome riſing grounds, which commanded the town of Lowoſchutz, he remained all night under arms at Welmina; and on the firſt day of October, early in the morning, formed his whole army in order of battle; the firſt line, conſiſting of the infantry occupied two hills, and a bottom betwixt them; the ſecond line being formed of ſome battalions, and the third compoſed of the whole cavalry. The Auſtrian general had taken poſſeſſion of Lowoſchutz, with a great body of infantry, and placed a battary of cannon in front of the town: he had formed his cavalry chequerwiſe, in a line between Lowoſchutz and the village of Sanſchitz; and poſted about 200 Croats and irregulars in the vineyards and avenues on his right. The morning was darkened with a thic fog, which vaniſhed about ſeven: then the Pruſſian cavalry advanced to attac the enemy's horſe, but received ſuch a fire from the irregulars, poſted in vineyards and ditches, as well as from a numerous artillery, that they were obliged to retire for protection to the rear of the Pruſſian infantry and cannon. There being formed, and led bac to the charge, they made an impreſſion on the Auſtrian cavalry, and drove the irregulars and other bodies of infantry from the ditches, defiles, and vineyards which they poſſeſſed: but they ſuffered ſo ſeverely in this dangerous ſervice, that the king ordered them to re-aſcend the hill, and take the poſt again behind the infantry, from whence they no more advanced. In the mean time a furious cannonading was maintained on both ſides with conſiderable effect. At length the left of the Pruſſian infantry was ordered to attac the town of Lowoſchutz in flank; but met with a very warm reception, and, in all likelihood, would have miſcarried, had not Veldt-Mareſchal Keith headed them in perſon: when he drew his ſword, and told them he would lead them on, he was given to underſtand, that all their powder and ſhot was exhauſted; he turned immediately to them with a chearful countenance, ſaid he was very glad they had no more ammunition, being well aſſured the enemy could not withſtand them at puſh of a bayonet; ſo ſaying, he advanced at their head, and driving the Auſtrians from Lowoſchutz, ſet the ſuburbs on fire. The infantry had been already obliged to quit the eminence on the right; and now the whole army quit the eminence on the right; and now their whole army retired to Budin, on the other ſide of the Egra. Some priſoners, colours, and pieces of cannon, were taken on both ſides; and the loſs of each might amount to 2,500 killed and wounded: ſo that on the whole, it was a drawn battle, though both generals claimed the victory. The detail of the action, publiſhed at Berlin, delares that the king of Pruſſia not only gained the battle, but that ſame day eſtabliſhed his head quarters at Lowoſchutz: whereas the Auſtrian gazette affirms, that Mareſchal count Brown obliged his Pruſſian majeſty to retire, and remained all night on the field of battle; but next day, finding his troops in want of water, he repaired to the camp of Budin. If the battle was at all deciſive, the advantage certainly fell to the Auſtrians; for his Pruſſian majeſty, who, in all probability, had hoped to winter at Pragu, was obliged, by the oppoſition he met with, to reſign this plan, and retreat before winter into the electorate of Saxony.

The Pruſſian army having rejoined that body which had been left to bloc up the Saxons at Pirna, his Poliſh majeſty and his troops were reduced to ſuch extremity of want, that it became indiſpenſably neceſſary to attempt an eſcape, or ſurrender to the king of Pruſſia. The former part of the alternative was choſen, and the plan concerted with count Brown, the Auſtrian general, who, in order to falicitate the execution, advanced privately with a body of troops to Litchtendorf, near Schandau; but the junction could not be effected. On the 14th day of October the Saxons threw a bridge of boats over the Elbe, near Konigſtein, to which caſtle they removed all their artillery; then ſtriking their tents in the night, paſſed the river undiſcovered by the enemy. They continued to retreat with all poſſible expedition; but the roads were ſo bad, they made little progreſs. Next day, when part of them had advanced about half way up a hill oppoſite to Konigſtein, and the reſt were entangled in a narrow plain, where there was no room to act, they perceived that the Pruſſians were in poſſeſſion of all the paſſes, and found themſelves ſurrounded on every ſide, fainting with hunger and fatigue, and deſtitute of every convenience. In this deplorable condition they remained, when the king of Poland, from the fortreſs of Konigſtein, ſent a letter to his general, the Veldt-Mareſchal count Rutowſki, veſting him with full and diſcretionary power to ſurrender, or take ſuch other meaſures as he ſhould judge moſt conducive to the preſervation of the officers and ſoldiers [g]. By this time count Brown had retired to Budin, ſo that there was no choice left. A capitulation was demanded: but, in effect, the whole Saxon army was obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion: and the ſoldiers were afterwards, by compulſion, incorporated with the troops of Pruſſia. The king of Poland being thus deprived of his electoral dominions, his troops, arms, artillery, and ammunition, thought it high time to provide for his own ſafety, and retired with all expedition to Poland. His Pruſſian majeſty cantoned his forces in the neighbourhood of Seidlitz, and along the Elbe towards Dreſden. His other army, which had entered Bohemia, under the command of the count de Schwerin, retired to the confines of the county of Glatz, where they were diſtributed in quarters of cantonment; ſo that this ſhort campaign was finiſhed by the beginning of November.

The king of Poland, in his diſtreſs, did not fail to implore the aſſiſtance and mediation of neutral powers. His miniſter at the Hague preſented a memorial to the ſtates-general, complaining, that the invaſion of Saxony was one of thoſe attacs againſt the law of nations, which from the great reſpect due to this law, demanded the aſſiſtance of every power intereſted in the preſervation of its own liberty and independency. He obſerved, that, from the firſt glimſe of miſunderſtanding between the court of Vienna and Berlin, he had expreſſly enjoined his miniſters at all the courts of Europe to declare, that it was his firm reſolution in the preſent conjuncture of affairs, to obſerve the ſtricteſt neutrality. He repreſented, that a free and neutral ſtate had been, in the midſt of peace, invaded by an enemy, who diſguiſed himſelf under the maſque of friendſhip, without alledging the leaſt complaint, or any pretenſion whatſoever; but founding himſelf ſolely on his own convenience, made himſelf maſter, by armed force, of all the cities and towns of the electorate, diſmantling ſome, and fortifying others: that he had diſarmed the burghers; carried off the magiſtrates as hoſtages for the payment of unjuſt and enormous contributions of proviſions and forage; ſeized the coffers, confiſcated the revenues of the electorate, broke open the arſenals, and tranſported the arms and artillery to his own town of Magdeburgh; aboliſhed the privy-council, and, inſtead of the lawful government, eſtabliſhed a directory, which acknowledged no other law but his own arbitrary will. He gave them to underſtand, that all theſe proceedings were no other than preliminaries to the unheard-of treatment which was reſerved for a queen, whoſe virtues ought to have commanded reſpect, even from her enemies: that, from the hands of that auguſt princeſs, the archives of the ſtate were forced away by menaces and violences, notwithſtanding the ſecu-

[g] The letter was to the following effect:

'Veldt-Mareſchal Count Rutowſki,

'It is not without extreme ſorrow I underſtand the deplorable ſituation, which a chain of misfortunes has reſerved for you, the beſt of my generals, and my whole army: but we muſt acquieſce in the diſpenſations of Providence, and conſole ourſelves with the rectitude of our ſentiments and intentions. They would force me, it ſeems, as you give me to underſtand by major-general the baron de Dyherrn, to ſubmit to conditions the more ſevere, in proportion as the circumſtances become more neceſſitous. I cannot hear them mentioned. I am a free monarch; ſuch I will live; ſuch I will die, and I will both live and die with honour. The fate of my army I leave wholly to your diſcretion. Let your council of war determine whether you muſt ſurrender priſoners of war, fall by the ſword, or die by famine. May your reſolutions, if poſſible, be conducted by humanity: whatever they may be, I have no longer any ſhare in them: and I declare you ſhall not be anſwerable for aught but one thing, namely, not to carry arms againſt me or my allies. I pray God may have you, mr. Mareſchal, in his holy keeping. Given at Konigſtein, the 14th of October, 1756.

'AUGUSTUS, Rex.'

rity which her majeſty had promiſed herſelf under the protection of all laws, human and divine; and notwithſtanding the repeated aſſurances given by the king of Pruſſia, that not only her perſon, and the place of her reſidence, ſhould be abſolutely ſafe, but that even the Pruſſian garriſon ſhould be under her direction. He obſerved, that a prince who declared himſelf protector of the proteſtant religion had begun the war, by cruſhing the very ſtate to which that religion owes its eſtabliſhment, and the preſervation of its moſt invaluable rights: that he had broke through the moſt reſpectable laws which conſtitute the union of the Germanick body, under colour of a defence which the empire ſtood in no need of, except againſt himſelf: that the king of Pruſſia, while he inſiſts on having entered Saxony as a friend, demands his army, the adminiſtration of his dominions, and, in a word, the ſacrifice of his whole electorate; and that the Pruſſian directory, in the declaration of motives, publiſhed under the noſe of a prince to whom friendſhip was pretended, thought it ſuperfluous to alledge even any pretext, to colour the uſurpation of his territories and revenues. Though this was certainly the caſe, in his Pruſſian majeſty's firſt expoſition of motives, the omiſſion was afterwards ſupplied, in a ſubſequent memorial to the ſtates-general; in which he charged the king of Poland, as an accomplice in, if not acceſſary to the treaty of Peterſburgh; and even taxed him with having agreed to a partition of ſome Pruſſian territories, when they ſhould be conquered. This treaty of partition, however, appears to have been made in time of actual war, before all cauſe of diſpute was removed by the peace of Dreſden.

While the Auſtrian and Pruſſian armies were in the field, their reſpective miniſters were not idle at Ratiſbon, where three imperial decrees were publiſhed againſt his Pruſſian majeſty: the firſt, ſummoning that prince to withdraw his troops from the electorate of Saxony: the ſecond, commanding all the vaſſals of the empire employed by the king of Pruſſia to quit that ſervice immediately; and the third, forbidding the members of the empire to ſuffer any levies of ſoldiers, for the Pruſſian ſervice, to be raiſed within their reſpective juriſdictions. The French miniſter declared to the diet, that the proceedings of his Pruſſian majeſty having diſcloſed to the world the project concerted between that prince and the king of England, to excite in the empire a religious war, which might be favourable to their particular views, his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, in conſequence of his engagement with the empreſs-queen, and many other princes of the empire, being reſolved to ſuccour them in the moſt efficacious manner, would forthwith ſend ſuch a number of troops to their aid, as might be thought neceſſary to preſerve the liberty of the Germanick body. On the other hand, the Pruſſian miniſter aſſured the diet, that his maſter would very ſoon produce the proofs that were come to his hands of the plan concerted by the courts of Vienna and Dreſden, for the ſubverſion of the electoral houſe, and for impoſing upon him a yoke, which ſeemed to threaten the whole empire.

About the ſame time, the Ruſſian preſident at the Hague communicated to the ſtates-general a declaration from his miſtreſs, importing, that her imperial majeſty having ſeen a memorial preſented at the court of Vienna by the king of Pruſſia's envoy extraordinary, was thereby convinced that his Pruſſian majeſty's intention was to attac the territories of the empreſs-queen; in which caſe, ſhe (the czarina) was inevitably obliged to ſuccour her with all her forces; for which end ſhe had ordered all her troops in Livonia to be forthwith aſſembled on the frontiers, and hold themſelves in readineſs to march: that, moreover, the Ruſſian admiralty had been enjoined to provide immediately a ſufficient number of gallies for tranſporting a large body of troops to Lubeck. The miniſters of the empreſs-queen, both at the Hague and at London, delivered memorials to the ſtates-general and his Britannick majeſty, demanding the ſuccours which theſe two powers were bound to afford the houſe of Auſtria by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle; but their high mightineſſes kept warily aloof, by dint of evaſion, and the king of Great-Britain was far otherwiſe engaged. The invaſion of Saxony had well nigh produced tragedies in the royal family of France. The dauphineſs, who was far advanced in her pregnancy, no ſooner learned the diſtreſsful circumſtances of her parents, the king and queen of Poland, than ſhe was ſeized with violent fits which occaſioned a miſcarriage, and brought her life into the moſt eminent danger. The Pruſſian miniſter was immediately ordered to quit Verſailles; and directions were diſpatched to the French miniſter at Berlin, to retire from that court without taking leave. Finally, the emperor of Germany concluded a new convention with the French king, regulating the ſuccours to be derived from that quarter: he claimed, in all the uſual forms, the aſſiſtance of the Germanick body, as guarantee of the pragmatic ſanction and treaty of Dreſden; and Sweden was alſo addreſſed on the ſame ſubject.

The king of Pruſſia did not paſſively bear all the imputations that were fixed upon his conduct. His miniſter at the Hague preſented a memorial, in anſwer to that of the Saxon reſident, in which he accuſed the court of Dreſden of having adobted every part of the ſcheme which his enemies had formed for his deſtruction. He affirmed that the Saxon miniſters had, in all the courts of Europe, played off every engine of unwarrantable politics, in order to pave the way for the execution of their project: that they had endeavoured to give an odious turn to his moſt innocent actions: that they had ſpared neither malicious inſinuations, nor even the moſt atrocious calumnies, to alineate all the world from his majeſty, and raiſe up enemies againſt him every where. He ſaid, he had received information that the court of Saxony intended to let his troops paſs freely, and afterwards wait for events which they might avail themſelves, either by joining his enemies, or making a diverſion in his dominions: that in ſuch a ſituation he could not avoid having recourſe to the only means which were left him for preventing his inevitable ruin, by putting it out of the power of Saxony to increaſe the number of his enemies. He aſſerted, that all the meaſures he had purſued in that electorate were but the neceſſary conſequences of the firſt reſolution he was forced to take for his own preſervation: that he had done nothing but deprived the court of Saxony of the means of hurting him; and this had been done with all poſſible moderation: that the country enjoyed all the ſecurity and all the quiet which could be expected in the very midſt of peace, the Pruſſian troops obſerving the moſt exact diſcipline: that all due reſpect was ſhown to the queen of Poland, who had been prevailed upon, by the moſt ſuitable repreſentations, to ſuffer ſome papers to be taken from the Paper-office, of which his Pruſſian majeſty already had copies; and thought it neceſſary, to aſcertain the dangerous deſign of the Saxon miniſtry againſt him, to ſecure the originals; the exiſtence and reality of which might otherwiſe have been denied. He obſerved that every man has a right to prevent the miſchief with which he is threatened, and to retort it upon its author; and that neither the conſtitutions nor the laws of the empire could obſtruct the exertion of a right ſo ſuperior to all others as that of ſelf-preſervation and ſelf-defence; eſpecially when the depoſitory of theſe laws is ſo cloſely united to the enemy, as manifeſtly to abuſe his power in her favour.

But the moſt important ſtep which his Pruſſian majeſty took in his own juſtification, was that of publiſhing another memorial, ſpecifying the conduct of the courts of Vienna and Saxony, and their dangerous deſigns againſt his perſon and intereſt, together with the original documents adduced as proofs of theſe ſiniſter intentions. As a knowledge of theſe pieces is requiſite to form a diſtinct idea of the motives which produced the dreadful war upon the continent, it will not be amiſs to uſher the ſubſtance of them to the reader's acquaintance. His Pruſſian majeſty affirms, that to arrive at the ſource of the vaſt plan upon which the courts of Vienna and Saxony had been employed againſt him ever ſince the peace of Dreſden, we muſt trace it as far bac as the war which preceded this peace: that the fond hopes which the two allied courts had conceived upon the ſucceſs of the campaign in the year 1744, gave occaſion to a treaty of eventual partition, ſtipulating that the court of Vienna ſhould poſſeſs the duchy of Sileſia and the county of Glatz; while the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, ſhould ſhare the duches of Magdeburgh and Croiſſen; the circles of Zullichow and Swibus, together with the Pruſſian part of Luſatio; that after the peace of Dreſden, concluded in the year 1745, there was no further room for a treaty of this nature; yet the court of Vienna propoſed to that of Saxony a new alliance, in which the treaty of eventual partition ſhould be renewed: but this laſt thought it neceſſary, in the firſt place, to give a greater conſiſtency to their plan, by grounding it upon an alliance between the empreſs-queen and the czarina. Accordingly, theſe two powers did, in fact, conclude a defenſive alliance at Peterſburgh in the courſe of the enſuing year: but the body or oſtenſible part of this treaty was compoſed merely with a view to conceal from the knowledge of the public ſix ſecret articles, the fourth of which was levelled ſingly againſt Pruſſia, according to the exact copy of it, which appeared among the documents. In this article, the empreſs-queen of Hungary and Bohemia ſets out with a proteſtation, that ſhe will religiouſly obſerve the treaty of Dreſden: but explains her real way of thinking upon the ſubject, a little lower, in the following terms: 'If the king of Pruſſia ſhould be the firſt to depart from this peace, by attacking either her majeſty the empreſs-queen of Hungary and Bohemia, or her majeſty the empreſs of Ruſſia, or even the republic of Poland; in all theſe caſes, the rights of the empreſs-queen to Sileſia and the county of Glatz would again take place, and recover their full effect; the two contracting parties ſhould mutually aſſiſt each other with 60,000 men to achieve theſe conqueſts.' The king obſerves upon this article, that every war which can ariſe between him and Ruſſia, on the republic of Poland, would be looked upon as a manifeſt infraction of the peace of Dreſden, and a revival of the rights of the houſe of Auſtria to Sileſia; though neither Ruſſia nor the republic of Poland is at all concerned in the treaty of Dreſden; and though the latter, with which the king lived in the moſt intimate friendſhip, was not even in alliance with the court of Vienna: that, according to the principles of the law of nature, received among all civilized nations, the moſt the court of Vienna could be authoriſed to do in ſuch caſes, would be to ſend thoſe ſuccours to her allies which are due to them by treaties, without her having the leaſt preference, on that account, to free herſelf from the particular engagements ſubſiſting between her and the king: he appealed, therefore, to the judgment of the impartial world, whether in this ſecret article the contracting powers had kept within the bounds of a defenſive alliance; or whether this article did not rather contain a plan of an offenſive alliance againſt the king of Pruſſia. He affirmed it was obvious, from this article, that the court of Vienna had prepared three pretences for the recovery of Sileſia; and that ſhe thought to attain her end, either by provoking the king to commence hoſtilities againſt her, or to kindle a war between his majeſty and Ruſſia by her ſecret intrigues and machinations: he alledged that the court of Saxony, being invited to accede to this alliance, eagerly accepted the invitation; furniſhed its miniſters at Peterſburgh with full powers for that purpoſe; and ordered them to declare that their maſter was not only ready to accede to the treaty itſelf, but alſo to the ſecret article againſt Pruſſia; and to join in the regulations made by the two courts, provided effectual meaſures ſhould be taken, as well for the ſecurity of Saxony, as for its indemnification and recompence, in proportion to the efforts and progreſs that might be made; that the court of Dreſden declared, if upon any freſh attac from the king of Pruſſia the empreſs-queen ſhould, by their aſſiſtance, not only re-conquer Sileſia, and the county of Glatz, but alſo reduce him within narrower bounds, the king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, would abide by the partition formerly ſtipulated between him and the empreſs-queen. He alſo declared that count Loſs, the Saxon miniſter at Vienna, was charged to open a private negotiation for ſettling an eventual partition of the conqueſt which might be made on Pruſſia, by laying down, as the baſis of it, the treaty of Leipſick, ſigned on the 18th day of May, in the year 1745, as would appear by the documents affixed. He owned it had been ſuppoſed, through the whole of this negotiation, that the king of Pruſſia ſhould be the aggreſſor againſt the court of Vienna; but he inſiſted, that even in this caſe the king of Poland could have no right to make conqueſts on his Pruſſian majeſty. He likewiſe acknowledged that the court of Saxony had not yet acceded in form to the treaty of Peterſburgh; but he obſerved, its allies were given to underſtand again and again, that it was ready to accede without reſtriction, whenever this could be done without riſque; and the advantages to be gained ſhould be ſecured in its favour, circumſtances proved by divers authentic documents, particularly by a letter from count Fleming to count de Bruhl, informing him that count Uhlefield had charged him to repreſent afreſh to his court, that they could not take too ſecure meaſures againſt the ambitious views of the king of Pruſſia; that Saxony, in particular, ought to be cautious, as being the moſt expoſed: that it was of the higheſt importance to ſtrengthen their old engagements upon the footing propoſed by the late count de Harrach in the year 1745; a ſtep which might be taken on occaſion of his Poliſh majeſty's acceſſion to the treaty of Peterſburgh. The anſwer of count Bruhl to this diſpatch imported, That the king of Poland was not averſe to treat in the utmoſt ſecreſy with the court of Vienna about ſuccours, by privite and confidential declarations relating to the fourth ſecret article of the treaty of Peterſburgh, on condition of reaſonable terms and advantages, which in this caſe ought to be granted to his majeſty. He quotted other diſpatches to prove the unwillingneſs of his Poliſh majeſty to declare himſelf, until the king of Pruſſia ſhould be attacked, and his forces divided; and that this ſcruple was admitted by the the allies of Saxony. From theſe premiſes he deduced this inference, that the court of Dreſden, without having acceded in form to the treaty of Peterſburgh, was not leſs an accomplice in the dangerous deſigns which the court of Vienna had grounded upon this treaty; and that having been diſpenſed with from a formal concurrence, it had only waited for that moment when it might, without running any great riſque, concur in effect, and ſhare the ſpoils of its neighbour. In expectation of this petition, he ſaid, the Auſtrian and Saxon miniſters laboured in concert and underhand with the more ardour, to bring the Caſus Fœderis into exiſtence; for it being laid down as a principle in the treaty, that any war whatever between him and Ruſſia would authoriſe the empreſs-queen to retake Sileſia, there was nothing more to be done but to kindle ſuch a war; for which purpoſe no method was found more proper than that of embroiling the king with the empreſs of Ruſſia; and to provoke that princeſs with all ſorts of falſe inſinuations, impoſtures, and the moſt atrocious calumnies, in laying to his majeſty's charge a variety of deſigns, ſometimes againſt Ruſſia, and even the perſon of the czarina; ſometimes views upon Poland, and ſometime intrigues in Sweden. By theſe and other ſuch contrivances, he affirmed they had kindled the animoſity of the empreſs to ſuch a degree, that in a council held in the month of October, in the year 1753, ſhe had reſolved to attac the king of Pruſſia, without any further diſcuſſion, whether he ſhould fall upon any of the allies of Ruſſia, or one of them ſhould begin with him: a reſolution which for that time was fruſtrated by their want of ſeamen and magazines; but the preparations were continued under pretence of keeping themſelves in a condition to fulfil their engagements contracted in the laſt ſubſidiary convention with England; and when all were finiſhed, the ſtorm would fall on the king of Pruſſia.

This is the ſubſtance of that famous memorial publiſhed by his Pruſſian majeſty, to which the juſtifying pieces or authentic documents were annexed; and to which a circumſtancial anſwer was exhibited by the partiſans of her imperial majeſty. Specious reaſons may, doubtleſs, be adduced on either ſide of almoſt any diſpute, by writers of ingenuity: but, in examining this conteſt, it muſt be allowed that both ſides adopted illicit practices. The empreſs-queen and the elector of Saxony had certainly a right to form defenſive treaties for their own preſervation; and, without all doubt, it was their intereſt and their duty to ſecure themſelves from the enterprizes of ſuch a formidable neighbour; but, at the ſame time, the contracting parties ſeem to have carried their views much farther than defenſive meaſures. Perhaps the court of Vienna conſidered the ceſſion of Sileſia as a circumſtance altogether compulſive, and, therefore, not binding againſt the rights of natural equity. She did not at all doubt that the king of Pruſſia would be tempted by his ambition and great warlike power to take ſome ſtep which might be juſtly interpreted into an infraction of the treaty of Dreſden; and in that caſe ſhe was determined to avail herſelf of the confederacy ſhe had formed, that ſhe might retrieve the countries ſhe had loſt by the unfortunate events of the laſt war, as well as bridle the dangerous power and diſpoſition of the Pruſſian monarch: and, in all probability, the king of Poland, over and above the ſame conſideration, was deſirous of ſome indemnification for the laſt irruption into his electoral dominions, and the great ſums he had paid for the ſubſequent peace. Whether they were authoriſed by the law of nature and nations to make repriſals by an actual partition of the countries they might conquer, ſuppoſing him to be the aggreſſor, we ſhall not pretend to determine: but it does not at all appear that his Pruſſian majeſty's danger was ſuch as entitled him to take thoſe violent ſteps which he now attempted to juſtify. By this time the flame of war was kindled up to a blaze that ſoon filled the empire with ruin and deſolation; and the king of Pruſſia had drawn upon himſelf the reſentment of the three greateſt powers in Europe, who laid aſide their former animoſities, and every conſideration of that balance which it had coſt ſuch blood and treaſure to preſerve, in order to conſpire his deſtruction. The king himſelf could not but foreſee his confederacy, and know the power it might exert: but probably he confided ſo much in the number, the valour and diſcipline of his troops: in the ſkill of his officers; in his own conduct and activity; that he hoped to cruſh the houſe of Auſtria by one rapid endeavour at the latter end of the ſeaſon, or at leaſt eſtabliſh himſelf in Bohemia, before her allies could move to her aſſiſtance. In this hope, however, he was diſappointed by the vigilance of the Auſtrian councils. He found the empreſs-queen in a condition to make head againſt him in every avenue to her dominions; and in a fair way of being aſſiſted by the circles of the empire. He ſaw himſelf threatened with the vengeance of the Ruſſian empreſs, and the ſword of France gleaming over his head, without any proſpect of aſſiſtance but that which he might derive from his alliance with Great-Britain. Thus the king of England exchanged the alliance of Ruſſia, who was his ſubſidiary, and the friendſhip of the empreſs-queen, his old and natural ally, for a new connexion with his Pruſſian majeſty, who could neither act as an auxiliary to Great-Britain, nor as a protector to Hanover; and for this connexion, the advantage of which was merely negative, ſuch a price was paid by England as had never been given by any other potentate of Europe, even for ſervices of the greateſt importance.

About the latter end of November the Saxon miniſter at Ratiſbon delivered to the diet a new and ample memorial, explaining the lamentable ſtate of that electorate, and imploring afreſh the aſſiſtance of the empire. The king of Pruſſia had alſo addreſſed a letter to the diet, demanding ſuccour of the ſeveral ſtates, agreeably to their guarantees of the treaties of Weſtphalia and Dreſden: but the miniſter of Mentz, as director of the diet, having refuſed to lay it before that aſſembly, the miniſter of Brandenburgh ordered it to be printed, and ſent to his court for further inſtructions. In the mean time, his Pruſſian majeſty thought proper to intimate to the king and ſenate of Poland, that ſhould the Ruſſian troops be permitted to march through that kingdom, they might expect to ſee their country made a ſcene of war and deſolation. In France the proſpect of a general and ſanguinary war did not at all allay the diſturbance which ſprang from the diſſention between the clergy and parliament, touching the bull Unigenitus. The king being again brought over to the eccleſiaſtical ſide of the diſpute, received a brief from the pope, laying it down as a fundamental article, that whoſoever refuſes to ſubmit to the bull Unigenitus is in the way to damnation: and certain caſes are ſpecified, in which the ſacraments are to be denied. The parliament of Paris, conſidering this brief or bull as a direct attac upon the rights of the Gallican church, iſſued an arret or decree, ſuppreſſing the ſaid bull; reſerving to themſelves the right of providing againſt the inconveniencies with which it might be attended; as well as the privilege to maintain in their full force the prerogatives of the crown, the power and juriſdiction of the biſhops, the liberties of the Gallican church, and the cuſtoms of the realm. The king, diſſatisfied with their interpoſition, declared his deſign to hold a bed of juſtice in perſon at the palace. Accordingly, on the 12th day of November, the whole body of his guards, amounting to 10,000 men, took poſt in the city of Paris: and next day the king repaired with the uſual ceremony to the palace, where the bed of juſtice was held: among other regulations, an edict was iſſued for ſuppreſſing the fourth and fifth chambers of inqueſts, the members of which had remarkably diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their oppoſition to the bull Unigenitus.

In England, the dearth of corn, ariſing in a great meaſure from the iniquitious practice of engroſſing, was ſo ſeverely felt by the common people, that inſurrections were raiſed in Shropſhire and Warwickſhire by the populace, in conjunction with the colliers, who ſeized by violence all the proviſion they could find; pillaging without diſtinction the millars, farmers, grocers, and butchers, until they were diſperſed by the gentlemen of the country, at the heads of their tenants and dependants. Diſorders of the ſame nature were excited by the colliers on the foreſt of Dean, and thoſe employed in the works in Cumberland. The corporations, noblemen, and gentlemen, in different parts of the kingdom, exerted themſelves for the relief of the poor, who were greatly diſtreſſed; and a grand council being aſſembled at St. James's on the ſame ſubject, a proclamation was publiſhed, for putting the laws in ſpeedy and effectual execution againſt the foreſtallers and engroſſers of corn.

The fear of an invaſion having now ſubſided, and Hanover being ſuppoſed in greater danger than Great-Britain, the auxiliaries of that electorate were tranſported from England to their own country. At the latter end of the ſeaſon, when the weather became ſevere, the inn-keepers of England refuſed to admit the Heſſian ſoldiers into winter quarters, as no proviſion had been made for that purpoſe by act of parliament; ſo that they were obliged to hut their camp, and remain in the open fields till January: but the rigour of this uncomfortable ſituation was ſoftened by the hand of generous charity, which liberally ſupplied them with all manner of refreſhment, and other conveniencies; an humane interpoſition, which reſcued the national character from the imputation of cruelty and ingratitude.

On the 2d day of December, his majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech that ſeemed to be dictated by the genius of England. He expreſſed his confidence, that, under the guidance of divine Providence, the union, fortitude, and affection of his people would enable him to ſurmount all difficulties, and vindicate the dignity of his crown againſt the ancient enemy of Great-Britain. He declared that the ſuccour and preſervation of America conſtituted a main object of his attention and ſollicitude; and obſerved, that the growing dangers to which the Britiſh colonies might ſtand expoſed, from late loſſes in that country, demanded reſolutions of vigour and diſpatch. He ſaid an adequate and firm defence at home ſhould maintain the chief place in his thoughts; and in this great view he had nothing ſo much at heart as to remove all grounds of diſſatisfaction from his people: for this end, he recommended to the care and diligence of the parliament the framing of a national militia, planned and regulated with equal regard to the juſt rights of his crown and people; an inſtitution which might become one good reſource in time of general danger. He took notice that the unnatural union of councils abroad, the calamities which, in conſequence of this unhappy conjunction, might, by irruptions of foreign armies into the empire, ſhake its conſtitution, overturn its ſyſtem, and threaten oppreſſion to the proteſtant intereſt on the continent, were events which muſt ſenſibly affect the minds of the Britiſh nation, and had fixed the eyes of Europe on this new and dangerous criſis. He gave them to underſtand that the body of his electoral troops, which were brought hither at the deſire of his parliament, he had now directed to return to his dominions in Germany, relying with pleaſure on the ſpirit and zeal of his people, in defence of his perſon and realm. He told the commons that he confided in their wiſdom, for preferring more vigorous efforts, though more expenſive, to a leſs effectual, and therefore leſs frugal plan of war; that he had placed before them the dangers and neceſſities of the public; and it was their duty to lay the burthens they ſhould judge unavoidable in ſuch a manner as would leaſt diſturb and exhauſt his people. He expreſſed his concern for the ſufferings of the poor, ariſing from the preſent dearth of corn, and for the diſturbances to which it had given riſe; and exhorted his parliament to conſider of proper proviſions for preventing the like miſchiefs hereafter. He concluded with remarking, that unproſperous events of war in the Mediterranean had drawn from his ſubjects ſignal proofs how dearly they tendered the honour of his crown; therefore, they could not, on his part fail to meet with juſt returns of unwearied care, and unceaſing endeavours for the glory, proſperity, and happineſs of his people.

The king having retired from the houſe of peers, the ſpeech was read by lord Sandys, appointed to act as ſpeaker to that houſe; then earl Gower moved for an addreſs, which, however, was not carried without objection. In one part of it his majeſty was thanked for having cauſed a body of electoral troops to come into England at the requeſt of his parliament; and this article was diſagreeable to thoſe who had diſapproved of the requeſt in the laſt ſeſſion. They ſaid they wiſhed to ſee the preſent addreſs unanimouſly agreed to by the lords; a ſatisfaction they could not have, if ſuch a paragraph ſhould be inſerted; for they ſtill thought the bringing over Hanoverian troops a prepoſterous meaſure; becauſe it had not only loaded the nation with an enormous expence, but alſo furniſhed the court of France with a plauſible pretence for invading the electorate, which otherwiſe it would have no ſhadow of reaſon to attac; beſides, the expedient was held in reprobation by the ſubjects in general, and ſuch a paragraph might be conſidered as an inſult on the people. Notwithſtanding theſe exceptions, which did not ſeem to be very important, the addreſs, including this paragraph, was approved by a great majority.

In the addreſs of the commons no ſuch paragraph was inſerted. As ſoon as the ſpeaker had recited his majeſty's ſpeech, mr. C. Townſhend propoſed the heads of an addreſs, to which the houſe unanimouſly agreed; and it was preſented accordingly. This neceſſary form was no ſooner diſcuſſed, than the houſe, with a warmth of humanity and benevolence ſuitable to ſuch an aſſembly, reſolved itſelf into a committee, to deliberate on that part of his majeſty's ſpeech which related to the dearth of corn that ſo much diſtreſſed the poorer claſs of people. A bill was immediately framed, to prohibit, for a time limited, the exportation of corn, malt, meal, flour, bread, biſcuit, and ſtarch; and a reſolution unanimouſly taken to addreſs the ſovereign, that an embargo might be forthwith laid upon all ſhips laden or to be laden with theſe commodities to be exported from the ports of Great-Britain and Ireland. At the ſame time, vice-admiral Boſcawen, from the board of admiralty, informed the houſe, that the king and the board having been diſſatisfied with the conduct of admiral Byng, in a late action with the French fleet in the Mediterranean, and for the appearance of his not having acted agreeably to his inſtructions for the relief of Minorca, he was then in cuſtody of the marſhal of the admiralty, in order to be tried by a court-martial: that although this was no more than what was uſual in like caſes, yet as admiral Byng was then a member of the houſe, and as his confinement might detain him ſome time from his duty there, the board of admiralty thought it a reſpect due to the houſe to inform them of the commitment and detainer of the ſaid admiral. This meſſage being delivered, the journal of the houſe in relation to rear-admiral Knowles [h] was read, and what mr. Boſcawen now communicated was alſo inſerted.

[1757] The committees of ſupply, and of ways and means, being appointed, took into conſideration the neceſſities of the ſtate, and made every ample proviſion for enabling his majeſty to maintain the war with vigour. They granted 55,000 men for the ſea-ſervice, including 11,419 marines; and for the land-ſervice 49,749 effective men, comprehending 4008 invalids. The ſupply was granted for the maintenance of theſe forces, as well as for the troops of Heſſe and Hanover; for the ordnance; the levy of new regiments; for aſſiſting his majeſty in forming and maintaining an army of obſervation, for the juſt and neceſſary defence and preſervation of his electoral dominions, and thoſe of his allies; and towards enabling him to fulfil his engagements with the king of Pruſſia; for the ſecurity of the empire againſt the irruption of foreign [i] armies, as well as for the ſupport of the common cauſe; for building and repairs of of ſhips, hiring tranſports, payment of half-pay officers, and the penſions of widows: for enabling his majeſty to diſcharge the like ſum, raiſed in purſuance of an act paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, and charged upon the firſt aids or ſupplies to be granted in this ſeſſion, for enabling the governors and guardians of the hoſpital for the maintenance and education of expoſed and deſerted young children to receive all ſuch children, under a certain age, as ſhould be brought to the ſaid hoſpital within the compaſs of one year; [k] for maintaining and ſupporting the new ſettlement of Nova Scotia; for repairing and finiſhing military roads; for making good his majeſty's engagements with the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, for the expence of marching, recruiting, and remounting German troops in the pay of Great-Britain; for empowering his majeſty to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred or to be incurred for the ſervice of the enſuing year, and to take all ſuch meaſures as might be neceſſary to diſappoint or defeat any enterprizes or deſigns of his enemies, as the exigency of affairs ſhould require: for the payment of ſuch perſons, in ſuch a manner as his majeſty ſhould direct, for the uſe and relief of his ſubjects in the ſeveral provinces of North and South Carolina and Virginia, in recompence for ſuch ſervices as, with approbation of his majeſty's commander in chief in America, they reſpectively had performed, or ſhould perform, either by putting theſe provinces in a ſtate of defence, or by acting with vigour againſt the enemy; for enabling the Eaſt-India company to defray the expence of a military force in their ſettlements, to be maintained in them, in lieu of a battalion of his majeſty's forces withdrawn from thoſe forts and factories; for the maintenance and ſupport of the forts on the coaſt of Africa; for widening the avenues, and rendering more ſafe and commodious the ſtreets and paſſages leading from Charing-croſs to the two houſes of parliament, the courts of juſtice, and the new bridge at Weſtminſter. [l] Such were the articles under which we may ſpecify the ſupplies of this year, on the whole amounting to 8,350,325l. 9s. 3d. It muſt be acknowledged for the honour of adminiſtration, that the houſe of commons could not have exhibited ſtronger marks of their attachments to the crown and perſon of their ſovereign, as well as of their deſire to ſee the force of the nation exerted with becoming ſpirit. The ſums granted by the committee of ſupply did not exceed 8,350,325l. 9s. 3d. the funds eſtabliſhed amounted to 8,689,511. 19s. 7d. ſo that there was an overplus of 338,726l. 10s. 4d. an exceſs which was thought neceſſary, in caſe the lottery, which was founded on a new plan, ſhould not ſucceed.

Some of theſe impoſitions were deemed grievous hardſhips by thoſe upon whom they immediately fell; and many friends of their country exclaimed againſt the projected army of obſervation in Germany, as the commencement of a ruinous continental war, which it was neither the intereſt of the nation to undertake, nor in their power to maintain, without ſtarving the operations by ſea, and in America, founded on Britiſh principles; without contracting ſuch an additional load of debts and taxes, as could not fail to terminate in bankruptcy and diſtreſs. To thoſe dependents of the miniſtry, who obſerved, that as Hanover was threatened by France for its connection with Great-Britain, it ought, in common gratitude, to be protected, they replied, that every ſtate, in aſſiſting any ally, ought to have a regard of its own preſervation: that if the king of England enjoyed by inheritance, or ſucceſſion, a province in the heart of France, it would be equally abſurd and unjuſt, in caſe of a rupture with that kingdom, to exhauſt the treaſures of Great-Britain in the defence of ſuch a province; and yet the inhabitants of it would have the ſame right to complain that they ſuffered for their connexion with England. They obſerved, that other dominions, electorates, and principalities in Germany were ſecured by the conſtitutions of the empire, as well as by fair and equal alliances with their co-eſtates; whereas Hanover ſtood ſolitary, like a hunted deer avoided by the herd, and had no other ſhelter but that of ſhrinking under the extended ſhield of Great-Britain: that the reluctance expreſſed by the German princes to undertake the defence of theſe dominions flowed from a firm perſuaſion, founded on experience, that England would interpoſe as a principal, and not only draw her ſword againſt the enemies of the electorate, but concentrate her chief ſtrength in that object, and waſte her treaſures in purchaſing their concurrence; that, excluſive of an ample revenue drained from the ſweat of the people, great part of which had been expended in continental effort, the whole national debt incurred ſince the acceſſion of the late king had been contracted in purſuance of meaſures totally foreign to the intereſt of theſe kingdoms: that ſince Hanover was the favourite object, England would ſave money, and great quantities of Britiſh blood, by allowing France to take poſſeſſion of the electorate, paying its ranſom at the peace, and indemnifying the inhabitants for the damage they might ſuſtain; an expedient that would be productive of another good conſequence; it would rouſe the German princes from their affected indifference, and oblige them to exert themſelves with vigour, in order to avoid the deteſted neighbourhood of ſuch an enterprizing invader.

The article of the ſupply relating to the army of obſerva-

[h] Rear-admiral Knowles being, in the month of December, 1749, tried at Deptford, before a court-martial, for his behaviour in and relating to an action which happened on the 1ſt day of October in the preceding year, between a Britiſh ſquadron under his command, and a ſquadron of Spain, the court was unanimouſly of opinion, that the ſaid Knowles, while he was ſtanding for the enemy, might, by a different diſpoſition of his ſquadron, have begun the attac with ſix ſhips as early in the day as four of them were engaged; and that, therefore, by his neglecting ſo to do, he gave the enemy a manifeſt advantage: that the ſaid Knowles remained on board the ſhip Cornwall with his flag, after ſhe was diſabled from continuing the action, though he might, upon her being diſabled, have ſhifted his flag on board another ſhip; and the court were unanimouſly of opinion he ought to have done ſo, in order to have conducted and directed, during the whole action, the motions of the ſquadron entruſted to his care and conduct. Upon conſideration of the whole conduct of the ſaid Knowles, relating to that action, the court did unanimouſly agree that he fell under part of the 14th article of the articles of war, namely, the word Negligence, and no other; and alſo under the 23d article.——The court, therefore, unanimouſly adjudged that he ſhould be reprimanded for not bringing up the ſquadron in cloſer order than he did, and not beginning the attac with as great force as he might have done; and alſo for not ſhifting his flag, upon the Cornwall's being diſabled.

[i] Nothing could more glorioufly evince the generoſity of a Britiſh parliament than this interpoſition for defending the liberties of Germany, in conjunction with two electors only, againſt the ſenſe of the other ſeven, and in direct oppoſition to the meaſures taken by the head of the empire, who, in the ſequel, ſtigmatiſed theſe two princes as rebels, and treated one of them as an out-law.

[k] This charity, eſtabliſhed by voluntary contribution, might, under proper reſtrictions, prove beneficial to the common-wealth, by reſcuing deſerted children from miſery and death, and qualifying them for being ſerviceable members of the community; but ſince the liberality of parliament hath enabled the governors and corporation to receive all the children that are preſented, without queſtion or limitation, the yearly expence hath ſwelled into a national grievance, and the humane purpoſes of the original inſtitution are in a great meaſure defeated. Inſtead of an aſylum for poor forlorn orphans and abandoned foundlings, it is become a general receptacle for the offſpring of the diſſolute, who care not to work for the maintenance of their families. The hoſpital itſelf is a plain edifice, well contrived for œconomy and convenience, ſtanding on the north ſide of the city, and a little detached from it, in an agreeable and ſalubrious ſituation. The hall is adorned with ſome good paittings, the chapel is elegant, and the regulations are admirable.

tion took riſe from a meſſage ſigned by his majeſty, and preſented by mr. Pitt, now promoted to the office of principal ſecretary of ſtate, a gentleman who had, upon ſundry occaſions, combated the gigantic plan of continental connexions with all the ſtrength and reaſon, and all the powers of eloquence. He now imparted to the houſe an intimation importing, It was always with reluctance that his majeſty aſked extraordinary ſupplies of his people; but as the united councils, and the formidable preparations of France and her allies threatened Europe in general with the moſt alarming conſequence; and as theſe unjuſt and vindictive deſigns were particularly and immediately bent againſt his majeſty's electorate dominions, and thoſe of his good ally, the king of Pruſſia, his majeſty confided in the experienced zeal and affection of his faithful commons, that they would chearfully aſſiſt him in forming and maintaining an army of obſervation, for the juſt and neceſſary defence and preſervation of thoſe territories, and enable him to fulfil his engagements with his Pruſſian majeſty, for the ſecurity of the empire againſt the irruption of foreign armies, and for the ſupport of the common cauſe. Poſterity will hardly believe, that the emperor and all the princes in Germany were in a conſpiracy againſt their country, except the king of Pruſſia, the elector of Hanover, and the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel; and they will no doubt, be ſurpriſed, that Great-Britain, after all the treaties ſhe had made, and the numberleſs ſubſidies ſhe had granted, ſhould not have an ally, left except one prince, ſo embarraſſed in his own affairs, that he could grant her no ſuccour, whatever aſſiſtance he might demand. The king's meſſage met with as favourable a reception as he could have deſired. It was read in the houſe of commons, together with a copy of the treaty between his majeſty and the king of Pruſſia, including the ſecret and ſeparate article, and the declaration ſigned on each ſide by the plenipotentiaries at Weſtminſter: the requeſt was granted, and the convention approved. With equal readineſs did they gratify his majeſty's inclination, ſignified in another meſſage, delivered on the 17th day of May, by lord Bateman, intimating, That, in this critical juncture, emergencies might ariſe of the utmoſt importance, and be attended with the moſt pernicious conſequences, if proper means ſhould not be immediately applied to prevent or defeat them; his majeſty was, therefore, deſirous that the houſe would enable him to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred or to be incurred for the ſervice of the current year; and to take all ſuch meaſures as might be neceſſary to diſappoint or defeat any enterprizes or deſigns of his enemies, as the exigency of affairs might require. The committee of ſupply forthwith granted a very large ſum for theſe purpoſes, including the charge of German mercenaries. A like meſſage being at the ſame time communicated to the upper-houſe, their lordſhips voted a very loyal addreſs upon the occaſion; and when the article of ſupply, which it produced among the commons fell under their inſpection, they unanimouſly agreed to it, by way of a clauſe of appropriation.

We have already obſerved, that the firſt bill which the commons paſſed in this ſeſſion, was for the relief of the poor, by prohibiting the exportation of corn; but this remedy not being judged adequate to the evil, another bill was framed, removing, for a limited time, the duty then payable upon foreign corn and flour imported: as alſo permitting, for a certain time, all ſuch foreign corn, grain, meal, bread, biſcuit, and flour, as had been or ſhould be taken from the enemy, to be landed and expended in the kingdom duty free. In order ſtill more to reduce the high price of corn, and to prevent any ſupply of proviſions from being ſent to our enemies in America, a third bill was brought in, prohibiting, for a time therein limited, the exportation of corn, grain, meal, malt, flour, bread, biſcuit, ſtarch, beef, pork, bacon, or other victual, from any of the Britiſh plantations, unleſs to Great-Britain or Ireland, or from any one colony to another. To this act two clauſes were added, for allowing thoſe neceſſaries, mentioned above, to be imported in foreign built ſhips, and from any ſtate in amity with his majeſty, either into Great-Britain or Ireland; and for exporting from Southampton or Exeter to the Iſle of Man, for the uſe of the inhabitants, a quantity of wheat, barley, oats, meal, or flour, not exceeding 2500 quarters. The commons would have ſtill improved their humanity, had they contrived and eſtabliſhed ſome effectual method to puniſh thoſe unfeeling villains, who, by engroſſing and hoarding up great quantities of grain, had created this artificial ſcarcity, and deprived their fellow-creatures of bread, with a view to their own private advantage. Upon a ſubſequent report of the committee, the houſe reſolved, that, to prevent the high price of wheat and bread, no ſpirits ſhould be diſtilled from wheat for a limited time. While the bill, formed on this reſolution, was in embrio, a petition was preſented to the houſe by the brewers of London, Weſtminſter, Southwark, and parts adjacent, repreſenting, that, when the reſolution paſſed, the price of malt, which was before too high, immediately roſe to ſuch a degree, that the petitioners found themſelves utterly incapable of carrying on buſineſs at the price malt then bore, occaſioned, as they conceived, from an apprehenſion of the neceſſity the diſtillers would be under to make uſe of the beſt pale malt, and ſubſtitute the beſt barley in lieu of wheat: that, in ſuch a caſe, the markets would not be able to ſupply a ſufficient quantity of barley for the demands of both profeſſions, beſides other neceſſary uſes: they, therefore, prayed, that in regard to public revenue, to which the trade of the petitioners ſo largely contributed, proper meaſures might be taken for preventing the public loſs, and relieving their particular diſtreſs. The houſe would not lend a deaf ear to a remonſtrance in which the revenue was concerned. The members appointed to prepare the bill immediately received inſtructions to make proviſion in it to reſtrain, for a limited time, the diſtilling of barley, malt, and all grain whatſoever. The bill was framed accordingly, but did not paſs without ſtrenuous oppoſition. To this prohibition it was objected, that there are always large quantities of wheat and barley in the kingdom ſo damaged, as to be unfit for any uſe but the diſtillery, conſequently a reſtriction of this nature would ruin many farmers, and others employed in the trade of malting. Particular intereſts, however, muſt often be ſacrificed to the welfare of the community; and the preſent diſtreſs prevailed over the proſpect of this diſadvantage. If he had allowed any ſort of grain to be diſtilled, it would have been impoſſible to prevent the diſtilling of every kind. The prohibition was limited to two months; but at the expiration of that term, the ſcarcity ſtill continuing, it was protracted by a new bill to the 11th day of December, with a proviſo, empowering his majeſty to put an end to it at any time after the 11th day of May, if ſuch a ſtep ſhould be judged for the advantage of the kingdom.

The next bill that engaged the attention of the commons was a meaſure of the utmoſt national importance, though ſecretly diſliked by many individuals of the legiſlature, who nevertheleſs did not venture to avow their diſapprobation. The eſtabliſhment of a militia was a very popular and deſirable object, but attended with numberleſs difficulties, and a competition of intereſts which it was impoſſible to reconcile. It had formerly been an inexhauſtible ſource of contention between the crown and the commons; but now both apparently concurred in rendering it ſerviceable to the common-wealth; though ſome acquieſced in the ſcheme, who were not at all hearty in its favour. On the fourth day of December, a motion was made for the bill, by colonel George Townſhend, eldeſt ſon of lord viſcount Townſhend, a gentleman of courage, ſenſe, and probity; endued with penetration to diſcern, and honeſty to purſue the real intereſt of his country, in defiance of power, in contempt of private advantages. Leave being given to bring in a bill for the better ordering of the militia forces in the ſeveral counties of England, the taſk of preparing it was allotted to mr. Townſhend, and a conſiderable number of the moſt able members in the houſe, comprehending his own brother, mr. Charles Townſhend, whoſe genius ſhone with diſtinguiſhed luſtre: he was keen, diſcerning, eloquent, and accurate; poſſeſſed a remarkable vivacity of parts, with a ſurpriſing ſolidity of underſtanding: was a wit without arrogance, a patriot without prejudice, and a courtier without dependence.

While the militia bill remained under conſideration of the houſe, a petition for a conſtitutional and well regulated militia was preſented by the mayor, jurats, and commonality of the King's-town and pariſh of Maidſtone, in Kent, in common-council aſſembled. At the ſame time remonſtances were offered by the proteſtant diſſenting miniſters of the three denominations in and about the cities of London and Weſtminſter; by the proteſtant diſſenters of Shrewſbury; the diſſenting miniſters of Devonſhire; the proteſtant diſſenters, being freeholders and burgeſſes of the town, and county of the town of Nottingham, joined with other inhabitants of the church of England, expreſſing their apprehenſion, that in the bill then depending, it might be propoſed to enact, that the ſaid militia ſhould be exerciſed on the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, and praying that no clauſe for ſuch purpoſe might paſs into a law. Though nothing could be more ridiculouſly fanatic and impertinent than the declaration of ſuch a ſcruple againſt a practice ſo laudable and neceſſary, in a country where that day of the week is generally ſpent in merry-making, riot, and debauchery, the houſe paid ſo much regard to the ſqueamiſh conſciences of thoſe puritanical petitioners, that Monday was pitched upon for the day of exerciſe to the militia, though on ſuch working days they might be much more profitable employed, both for themſelves and their country; and that no religious pretence ſhould be left for oppoſing the progreſs and execution of the bill, proper clauſes were inſerted for the relief of the quakers. Another petition and counter-petition were delivered by the magiſtrates, freeholders, and burgeſſes of the town of Nottingham, in relation to their particular franchiſes, which were accordingly conſidered in framing the bill.

After mature deliberation, and divers alterations, it paſſed the lower-houſe, and was ſent to the lords for their concurrence: here it underwent ſeveral amendments, one of which was the reduction of the number of militia-men to one-half of what the commons had propoſed; namely, to 32,340 men for the whole kingdom of England and Wales. The amendments being canvaſed in the lower-houſe, met with ſome oppoſition, and divers conferences with their lordſhips enſued: at length, however, the two houſes agreed to every article, and the bill ſoon received the royal ſanction. No proviſion, however, was made for clothes, arms, accoutrements, and pay: had regulations been made for theſe purpoſes, the act would have become a money-bill, in which the lords could have made no amendment: in order, therefore, to prevent any difference between the two houſes, on a diſpute of privileges not yet determined, and that the houſe of peers might make what amendments they ſhould think expedient, the commons left the expence of the militia to be regulated in a ſubſequent bill, during the following ſeſſion, when they could with more certainty compute what ſum would be neceſſary for theſe purpoſes. After all, the bill ſeemed to be crude, imperfect, and ineffectual, and the promoters of it were well aware of its defects; that they were apprehenſive that it would have been dropped altogether, had they inſiſted upon the ſcheme's being executed in its full extent. They were eager to ſeize this opportunity of trying an experiment, which might afterwards be improved to a greater national advantage; and, therefore, they acquieſced in many reſtrictions and alterations, which otherwiſe would not have been adobted.

The next meaſure that fell under conſideration of the houſe was rendered neceſſary by the inhoſpital perſeverance of the publicans and inn-holders, who conceived themſelves not obliged by law to receive or give quarters in their houſes to any foreign troops, and accordingly refuſed admittance to the Heſſian auxiliaries, who began to be dreadfully incommoded by the ſeverity of the weather. This objection implying an attac upon the prerogative, the government did not think fit, at this juncture, to diſpute any other way, than by procuring a new law in favour of thoſe foreigners. It was intituled, 'a bill to make proviſion for quartering the foreign troops now in this kingdom,' prepared by lord Barrington, the chancellor of the exchequer, and the ſollicitor-general, and immediately paſſed without oppoſition. This ſtep being taken, another bill was brought in, for the regulation of the marine-forces while on ſhore. This was almoſt a tranſcript of the mutiny act, with this material difference: it empowered the admiralty to grant commiſſions for holding general courts-martial, and to do every thing, and in the ſame manner, as his majeſty is empowered to do by the uſual mutiny-bill; conſequently, every clauſe was adopted without queſtion.

The ſame favourable reception was given to a bill for the more ſpeedy and effectual recruiting his majeſty's land forces and marines; a law which threw into the hands of many worthleſs magiſtrates an additional power of oppreſſing their fellow-creatures: all juſtices of the peace, commiſſioners of the land-tax, magiſtrates of corporations and boroughs, were empowered to meet by direction of the ſecretary at war, communicated in precepts iſſued by the high-ſheriffs, or their deputies, within their reſpective diviſions, and at their uſual place of meeting, to qualify themſelves for the execution of the act: then they were required to appoint the times and places for their ſucceeding meetings; to iſſue precepts to the proper officers for theſe ſucceeding meetings; and to give notice of the time and place of every meeting to ſuch military officer, as, by notice from the ſecretary at war, ſhould be directed to attend that ſervice. The annual bill for preventing mutiny and deſertion met with no objection, and indeed contained nothing eſſentially differerent from that which had paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion. The next law enacted was for the further preventing embezzlements of goods and apparel by thoſe with whom they are entruſted, and putting a ſtop to the practice of gaming in public houſes. By this bill a penalty was inflicted on pawnbrokers, in a ſummary way, for receiving goods, knowing them not to be the property of the pledger, and pawned without the authority of the owner.[m] With reſpect to gaming, the act ordained, that all publicans ſuffering journeymen, labourers, ſervants, or apprentices to game with cards, dice, ſhuffle-boards, miſſiſippi, or billard-tables, ſkittles, nine-pins, &c. ſhould forfeit 40s. for the firſt offence, and for every ſubſequent offence 10l. ſhall be levied by diſtreſs.

Divers inconveniences having reſulted from the interpoſition of juſtices, who, in purſuance of an act of parliament paſſed in the preſent reign, aſſumed the right of eſtabliſhing rates for the payment of wages to weavers, ſeveral petitions were offered to the houſe of commons, repreſenting the evil conſequences of ſuch an eſtabliſhment; and although theſe arguments were anſwered and oppoſed in counter-petitions, the commons, actuated by a laudable concern for the intereſt of the woolen-manufacture, after due deliberation, removed the grievance by a new bill, repealing ſo much of the former act as empowered juſtices of the peace to make rates for the payment of wages[n].—The commons were not more forward to provide ſupplies for proſecuting the war with vigour, than ready to adopt new regulations for the advantage of trade and manufactures. The ſociety of the free Britiſh fiſhery preſented a petition, alledging, that they had employed the ſum of 130,305l. 8s. 6d. together with the entire produce of their fiſh, and all the monies ariſing from the ſeveral branches allowed on the tonnage of their ſhipping, and on the exportation of their fiſh, in carrying on the ſaid fiſhery; and that from their being obliged, in the infancy of the undertaking to incur a much larger expence than was at that time foreſeen, they now found themſelves ſo far reduced in their capital, as to be utterly incapable of further proſecuting the fiſheries with any hope of ſucceſs, unleſs indulged with the further aſſiſtance of parliament. They prayed, therefore, that, towards enabling them to carry on the ſaid fiſheries, they might have liberty to make uſe of ſuch nets as they ſhould find beſt adapted to the ſaid fiſheries; each buſs, nevertheleſs, carrying to ſea the ſame quantity and depth of netting, which, by the fiſhery acts, they were bound to carry: that the bounty of thirty ſhillings per ton, allowed by the ſaid acts on the veſſels employed in the fiſhery, might be increaſed; and for as much as many of the ſtoc-proprietors were unable to advance any further ſum for proſecuting this branch of commerce, and others unwilling, in the preſent ſituation, and under the preſent reſtraint, to riſque any further ſum in the undertaking, that the ſtoc of the ſociety, by the ſaid acts made unalienable, except in caſe of death or bankruptcy, for a term of years, might forthwith be made transferable; and that the petitioners might be at liberty, between the intervals of the fiſhing ſeaſons, to employ the buſſes in ſuch a manner as they ſhould find for the advantage of the ſociety. While the committee was employed in deliberating on the particulars of this remonſtrance, another was delivered from the free Britiſh fiſhery-chamber of Whitehaven in Cumberland, repreſenting, that as the law then ſtood, they went to Shet-

[m] It was enacted, that perſons pawning, exchanging, or diſpoſing of goods, without leave of the owner, ſhould ſuffer in the penalty of twenty ſhillings; and on non-payment, be committed for 14 days to hard labour; afterwards, if the money could not then be paid, or to be whipped publicly in the houſe of correction, or ſuch other place as the juſtice of the peace ſhould appoint, on publication of the proſecutor: that every pawnbroker ſhould make entry of the perſon's name and place of abode who pledges any goods with him; and the pledger, if he required it, ſhould have a duplicate of that entry: that a pawnbroker, receiving linen and apparel entruſted to others to be waſhed or mended, ſhould forfeit double the ſum lent upon it, and reſtore the goods: that upon oath of any perſon whoſe goods are unlawfully pawned or exchanged, the juſtice ſhould iſſue a warrant to ſearch the ſuſpected perſon's houſe; and upon refuſal of admittance the officer might break open the door: that goods pawned for any ſum not exceeding 10l. might be recovered within two years, the owner making oath of the pawning and tendering the principal, intereſt, and the charges: that goods remaining unredeemed for two years ſhould be forfeited and ſold, the overplus to be accounted for to the owner on demand.

[n] It likewiſe imported, that all contracts or agreements made between clothiers and weavers, in reſpect to wages, ſhould, from and after the firſt of May, in the year 1757, be valid, notwithſtanding any rate eſtabliſhed, or to be eſtabliſhed; but that theſe contracts or agreements ſhould extend only to the actual prices or rates of workmanſhip or wages, and not the payment thereof in any other manner than in money: and that if any clothier ſhould refuſe or neglect to pay the weaver the wages or price agreed on, in money, within two days after the work ſhould be performed or delivered, the ſame being demanded, ſhould forfeit forty ſhillings for every ſuch offence.

land, and returned at a great expence and loſs of time; and while the war continued durſt not ſtay there to fiſh, beſides being obliged to run the moſt imminent riſques, by going and returning without convoy: that, ever ſince the inſtitution of the preſent fiſhery, experience had fully ſhown the fiſhery of Shetland not worth following, as thereby the petitioners had loſt two months of a much better fiſhery in St. George's channel, within one day's ſail of Whitehaven: they took notice, that the free Britiſh fiſhery ſociety had applied to the houſe for further aſſiſtance and relief; and prayed that Campbel-town, in Argyleſhire, might be appointed the place of rendezvous for the buſſes belonging to Whitehaven, for the ſummer as well as the winter fiſhery, that they might be enabled to fiſh with greater advantage. The committee, having conſidered the matter of both petitions, were of opinion that the petitioners ſhould be at liberty to uſe ſuch nets as they ſhould find beſt adapted to the white herring fiſhery: that the bounty of thirty ſhillings per ton ſhould be augmented to fifty: that the petitioners ſhould be allowed, during the intervals of the fiſhing ſeaſons, to employ their veſſels in any other lawful buſineſs, provided they ſhould have been employed in the herring-fiſhery during the proper ſeaſons: that they might uſe ſuch barrels for packing the fiſh, as they then uſed, or might hereafter find beſt adapted for that purpoſe: that they ſhould have liberty to make uſe of any waſte or uncultivated land, one hundred yards at the leaſt above high-water mark, for the purpoſe of drying their nets; and that Campbel-town would be the moſt proper and convenient place for the rendezvous of the buſſes belonging to Whitehaven. This laſt reſolution, however, was not inſerted in the bill which contained the other five, and in a little time received the royal aſſent.

Such are the connexions, dependencies, and relations ſubſiſting between the mechanicle arts, agriculture, and manufactures of Great-Britain, that it requires ſtudy, deliberation, and enquiry in the legiſlature to diſcern and diſtinguiſh the whole ſcope and conſequences of many projects offered for the benefit of the common-wealth. The ſociety of merchant adventurers in the city of Briſtol alledged, in a petition to the houſe of commons, that great quantities of bar-iron were imported into Great-Britain from Sweden, Ruſſia, and other parts, chiefly purchaſed with ready money, ſome of which iron was exported again to Africa and other places; and the reſt wrought up by the manufacturers. They affirmed that bar-iron, imported from North-America, would anſwer the ſame purpoſes; and the importation of it tend not only to the great advantage of the kingdom, by increaſing its ſhipping and navigation; but alſo to the benefit of the Britiſh colonies: that by an act paſſed in the 23d year of his preſent majeſty's reign, the importation of bar-iron from America into the port of London, duty free, was permitted: but its being carried coaſtways, or farther by land than ten miles, had been prohibited; ſo that ſeveral very conſiderable manufacturing towns were deprived of the uſe of American iron, and the out-ports prevented from employing it in their export commerce: they requeſted, therefore, that bar-iron might be imported from North-America into Great-Britain, duty free, by all his majeſty's ſubjects. This requeſt being re-enforced by many other petitions from different parts of the kingdom, other claſſes of men, who thought their ſeveral intereſts would be affected by ſuch a meaſure, took the alarm; and in divers counter-petitions ſpecified many ill conſequences which they alledged would ariſe from its being enacted into a law. Pamphlets were publiſhed on both ſides of the queſtion, and violent diſputes were kindled upon this ſubject, which was juſtly deemed a matter of national importance.

The oppoſers of the bill obſerved, that large quantities of iron were yearly produced at home, and employed multitudes of poor people, there being no leſs than 109 forges in England and Wales, beſides thoſe erected in Scotland, the whole producing 18,000 tons of iron: that as the mines in Great-Britain are inexhauſtible, the produce would of late years have been conſiderably increaſed, had not the people been kept under continual apprehenſion of ſeeing American iron admitted duty free: a ſuppoſition which had prevented the traders from extending their works, and diſcouraged many from engaging in this branch of traffic: they alledged that the iron works already carried on in England occaſioned a conſumption of 190,000 cords of wood, produced in coppices that grow upon barren lands, which could not otherwiſe be turned to any good account: that as the coppices afford ſhade, and preſerve a moiſture in the ground, the paſture is more valuable with the wood, than it would be if the coppices were grubbed up; conſequently, all the eſtates where theſe now grow would ſink in their yearly value: that theſe coppices, now cultivated and preſerved for the uſe of the iron works, are likewiſe abſolutely neceſſary for the manufacture of leather, as they furniſh bark for the tanners; and that, according to the management of theſe coppices, they produced a great number of timber trees, ſo neceſſary for the purpoſes of building. They aſſerted, that neither the American iron, nor any that had yet been found in Great-Britain, was ſo proper for converting into ſteel as that which comes from Sweden, particularly that ſort called ore ground; but as there are mines in the northern parts of Britain, nearly in the ſame latitude with thoſe of Sweden, furniſhed with ſufficient quantities of wood, and rivers for mills and engines, it was hardly to be doubted but that people would find metal of the ſame quality, and, in a few years, be able to prevent the neceſſity of importing iron either from Sweden or Ruſſia. They inferred that American iron could never interfere with that which Great-Britain imported from Sweden, becauſe it was not fit for edge-tools, anchors, chain-plates, and other particulars neceſſary in ſhip-building; nor diminiſh the importation of Ruſſian iron, which was not only harder than the American and Britiſh, but alſo could be afforded cheaper than that brought from our own plantations, even though the duty of this laſt ſhould be removed. The importation of American iron, therefore, duty free, could interfere with no other ſort but that produced in Britain, with which, by means of this advantage, it would claſh ſo much, as to put a ſtop in a little time to all the iron works now carried on in the kingdom, and reduce to beggary a great number of families whom they ſupport. To theſe objections the favourers of the bill ſollicited replied, that when a manufacture is much more valuable than the rough materials, and theſe cannot be produced at home in ſufficient quantities, and at ſuch a price as is conſiſtent with the preſervation of the manufacture, it is the intereſt of the legiſlature to admit a free importation of theſe materials, even from foreign countries, although it ſhould put an end to the production of that material in this iſland: that as the neighbours of Great-Britain are now more attentive than ever to their commercial intereſts, and endeavouring to manufacture their rough materials at home, this nation muſt take every method for lowering the price of materials, otherwiſe in a few years it will loſe the manufacture; and, inſtead of ſupplying other countries, be furniſhed by them with all the fine toys and utenſils made of ſteel and iron: that being in danger of loſing not only the manufacture but the produce of iron, unleſs it can be procured at a cheaper rate than that for which it is ſold at preſent, the only way of attaining this end, is by diminiſhing the duty payable upon the importation of foreign iron, or by rendering it neceſſary for the undertakers of the iron mines in Great-Britain to ſell their produce cheaper than it has been for ſome years afforded: that the moſt effectual method for this purpoſe is to raiſe up a rival, by permitting a free importation of all ſorts of iron from the American plantations: that American iron can never be ſold ſo cheap as that of Britain can be afforded; for, in the colonies, labour of all kinds is much dearer than in England: if a man employs his own ſlaves, he muſt reckon in his charge a great deal more than the common intereſt of their purchaſe money, becauſe when one of them dies, or eſcapes from his maſter, he loſes both intereſt and principal: that the common intereſt of money in the plantations is conſiderably higher than in England, conſequently no man in that country will employ his money in any branch of trade by which he cannot gain conſiderably more per cent. than it is expected in Great-Britain, where the intereſt is low, and profit moderate; a circumſtance which will always give a great advantage to the Britiſh miner, who likewiſe enjoys an exemption from freight and inſurance, which lie heavy upon the American adventurer, eſpecially in time of war. With reſpect to the apprehenſion of the leather tanners, they obſerved, that as the coppices generally grew on barren lands, not fit for tillage, and improved the paſturage, no proprietor would be at the expence of grubbing up the wood to ſpoil the paſture, as he could make no other uſe of the land on which it was produced. The wood muſt be always worth ſomething, eſpecially in counties where there is not plenty of coal, and the timber trees would produce conſiderable advantage: therefore, if there was not one iron mine in Great-Britain, no coppices would be grubbed up, unleſs it grew on a rich ſoil, which would produce corn inſtead of cord wood; conſequently, the tanners have nothing to fear, eſpecially as planting hath become a prevailing taſte among the landholders of the iſland. The committee appointed to prepare the bill ſeriouſly weighed and canvaſſed theſe arguments, examined diſputed facts, and inſpected papers and accounts relating to the produce, importation and manufactory of iron. At length mr. John Pitt reported to the houſe their opinion, implying that the liberty granted by an act paſſed in the 23d year of his majeſty's reign, of importing bar-iron from the Britiſh colonies in America into the port of London, ſhould be extended to all the other ports of Great-Britain; and that ſo much of that act as related to this clauſe ſhould be appealed. The houſe having agreed to theſe reſolutions, and the bill being brought in accordingly, another petition was preſented by ſeveral noblemen, gentlemen, freeholders, and other proprietors, owners, and poſſeſſors of coppices and woodlands, in the weſt-riding of Yorkſhire, alledging that a permiſſion to import American bar-iron duty free would be attended with numberleſs ill conſequences both of public and private nature; ſpecifying certain hardſhips to which they in particular would be expoſed; and praying, that if the bill ſhould paſs they might be relieved from the preſſure of an act paſſed in the reign of Henry VIII. obliging the owners of coppice-woods to preſerve them, under ſevere penalties; and be permitted to fell and grub up their coppice-woods, in order to a more proper cultivation of the ſoil, without being reſtrained by the fear of malicious and intereſted proſecutions. In conſequence of this remonſtrance, a clauſe was added to the bill, repealing ſo much of the act of Henry VIII. as prohibited the converſion of coppice or under-woods into paſture or tillage; then it paſſed through both houſes, and received the royal ſanction. As there was not time, after this affair came upon the carpet, to obtain any new accounts from America, and as it was thought neceſſary to know the quantities of iron made in that country, the houſe preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, deſiring he would be pleaſed to give directions that there ſhould be laid before them, in the next ſeſſion of parliament, an account of the quantity of iron made in the American colonies, from Chriſtmas, in the year 1749, to the 5th day of January, in the year 1756, each year being diſtinguiſhed.

From this important object, the parliament converted its attention to a regulation of a much more private nature. In conſequence of a petition by the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, a bill was brought in, and paſſed into a law without oppoſition, for the more effectual preſervation and improvement of the fry and ſpawn of fiſh in the river Thames and waters of Medway, and for the better regulating the fiſhery in thoſe rivers. The two next meaſures taken for the benefit of the public were, firſt a bill to render more effectual the ſeveral laws then in being, for the amendment and preſervation of the highways and turnpike roads of the kingdom; the other for the more effectually preventing the ſpreading of the contagious diſtemper which at that time raged among the horned cattle. A third aroſe from the diſtreſs of poor ſilk manufacturers, who were deſtitute of employment, and deprived of all means of ſubſiſting, through the interruption of the Levant trade, occaſioned by the war, and the delay of the merchant ſhips from Italy. In order to remedy this inconvenience, a bill was prepared, enacting that any perſons might import from any place, in any ſhip or veſſel whatſoever, till the 1ſt day of December, 1757, organzine thrown ſilk of the growth or production of Italy, to be brought to the Cuſtom-houſe of London, whereſoever landed: but that no Italian thrown ſilk, coarſer than Bologna, nor any tram of the growth of Italy; nor any other thrown ſilk of the growth or production of Turkey, Perſia, Eaſt-India, or China, ſhould be imported by this act, under the penalty of the forfeiture thereof. Notwithſtanding ſeveral petitions preſented by the merchants, owners, and commanders of ſhips, and others trading to Leghorn, and other ports of Italy; as well as by the importers and manufacturers of raw ſilks, repreſenting the evil conſequences that would probably attend the paſſing of ſuch a bill, the parliament agreed to this temporary deviation from the famous act of navigation, for a preſent ſupply to the poor manufacturers.

The next civil regulation eſtabliſhed in this ſeſſion of parliament was in itſelf judicious, and, had it been more eagerly ſuggeſted, might have been much more beneficial to the public. In order to diſcourage the practice of ſmuggling, and prevent the deſperadoes concerned therein from inliſting in the ſervice of the enemy, a law was paſſed, enacting, that every perſon who had been, before the 1ſt of May in the preſent year, guilty of illegal running, concealing, receiving or carrying any wool, or prohibited goods, or any foreign commodities liable to duties, the ſame not having been paid or ſecured; or of aiding therein, or had been found with fire-arms, or weapons, in order to be aiding to ſuch offenders; or had been guilty of receiving ſuch goods after ſeizure; or of any act whatſoever, whereby perſons might be deemed runners of foreign goods; or of hindering, wounding, or beating any officer in the execution of his duty, or aſſiſting therein, ſhould be indemnified from all ſuch offences, concerning which no ſuit ſhould then have been commenced, or compoſition made, on condition that he ſhould, before being apprehended or proſecuted, and before the 1ſt day of December, enter himſelf with ſome commiſſioned officer of his majeſty's fleet, to ſerve as a common ſailor; and ſhould, for three years from ſuch entry, unleſs ſooner duely diſcharged, actually ſerve and do duty in that ſtation, and regiſter his name, &c. with the clerk of the peace of the county where he reſided, as the act preſcribes. An attempt was made in favour of the ſeamen employed in the navy, who had been very irregularly paid, and ſubject to grievous hardſhips in conſequence of this irregularity. Mr Grenville, brother to earl Temple, moved for leave to bring in a bill for the encouragement of ſeamen employed in his majeſty's navy, and for eſtabliſhing a regular method for the punctual, ſpeedy, and certain payment of their wages, as well as for reſcuing them from the arts of fraud and impoſition. The propoſal was corroborated by divers petitions: the bill was prepared, read, printed, and after it had undergone ſome amendment, paſſed into the houſe of lords, where it was encountered with ſeveral objections, and dropped for this ſeſſion of parliament.

The houſe of commons being deſirous of preventing for the future ſuch diſtreſſes as the poor had lately undergone, appointed a committee to conſider of proper proviſions to reſtrain the price of corn and bread within due bounds for the future. For this purpoſe they were empowered to ſend for perſons, papers, and records, and it was reſolved that all who attended the committee ſhould have voices. Having enquired into the cauſes of the late ſcarcity, they agreed to ſeveral reſolutions, and a bill was brought in, to explain and amend the laws againſt regraters, foreſtallers, and engroſſers of corn. The committee alſo received inſtructions to enquire into the abuſes of millers, mealmen, and bakers, with regard to bread, and to conſider of proper methods to prevent them in the ſequel, but no further progreſs was made in this important affair, which was the more intereſting, as the lives of individuals, in a great meaſure, depended upon a ſpeedy reformation; for the millers and bakers were ſaid to have adulterated their flour with common whiting, lime, bone-aſhes, allum, and other ingredients pernicious to the human conſtitution; a conſummation of villainy for which no adequate puniſhment could be inflicted. Among the meaſures propoſed in parliament which did not ſucceed, one of the moſt remarkable was a bill prepared by mr. Roſe Fuller, mr. Charles Townſhend, and mr. Banks, to explain, amend, and render more effectual a law paſſed in the reign of king William III. intituled, 'An act to puniſh governors of plantations, in this kingdom, for crimes committed by them in the plantations.' This bill was propoſed in conſequence of ſome complaints, ſpecifying acts of cruelty, folly and oppreſſion, by which ſome Britiſh governors had lately been diſtinguiſhed; but before the bill could be brought in the parliament was prorogued.

But no ſtep taken by the houſe of commons, in the courſe of this ſeſſion, was more intereſting to the body of the people than the enquiry into the loſs of Minorca, which had excited ſuch loud and univerſal clamour. By addreſſes to the king, unanimouſly voted, the commons requeſted that his majeſty would give directions for laying before them copies of all the letters and papers containing any intelligence received by the ſecretaries of ſtate, the commiſſioners of the admiralty, or any others of his majeſty's miniſters, in relation to the equipment of the French fleet at Toulon, or the deſigns of the French on Minorca, or any other of his majeſty's poſſeſſions in Europe, ſince the firſt day of January 1755, to the firſt day of Auguſt 1756. They likewiſe deſired to peruſe a liſt of the ſhips of war that were equipped and made ready for ſea, from the firſt of Auguſt, in the year 1755, to the 30th of April, in the following year; with the copies of all ſailing orders ſent to the commanders during that period; as alſo the ſtate and condition of his majeſty's ſhips in the ſeveral ports of Great-Britain at the time of admiral Byng's departure, with the ſquadron under his command, for the relief of Fort St. Philip, during the period of the time above-mentioned, according to the monthly returns made by the admiralty, with the number of ſeamen muſtered and bor'n on board the reſpective ſhips. They demanded copies of all orders and inſtructions given to that admiral, and of letters written to and received from him, during his continuance in that command, either by the ſecretaries of ſtate, or lords of the admiralty, relating to the condition of his ſquadron, and to the execution of his orders. In a word, they required the inſpecton of all papers which could, in any manner, tend to explain the loſs of Minorca, and the miſcarriage of mr. Byng's ſquadron. His majeſty complied with every article of their requeſts: the papers were preſented to the houſe, ordered to lie upon the table for the peruſal of the members, and finally referred to the conſideration of the committee of the whole houſe. In the courſe of their deliberations they addreſſed his majeſty for more information, till at length the truth ſeemed to be ſmothered under ſuch an enormous burthen of papers as the efforts of a whole ſeſſion could not have properly removed. Indeed, many diſcerning perſons without doors began to deſpair of ſeeing the myſtery unfolded, as ſoon as the enquiry was undertaken by a committee of the whole houſe. They obſerved, that an affair of ſuch a dark, intricate, and ſuſpicious nature ought to have been referred to a ſelect and ſecret committee, choſen by ballot, empowered to ſend for perſons, papers, and records, and to examine witneſſes in the moſt ſolemn and deliberate manner: that the names of the committee ought to have been publiſhed, for the ſatisfaction of the people, who could have judged with ſome certainty whether the enquiry would be carried on with ſuch impartiality as the national misfortune required. They ſuſpected that this reference to a committee of the whole houſe was a mal contrivance, to prevent a regular and minute inveſtigation, to introduce confuſion and conteſts, to puzzle, perplex, and obumbrate; to teaſe, fatigue, and diſguſt the enquirers, that the examination might be hurried over in a ſuperficial and perfunctory manner; and the miniſtry, from this anarchy and confuſion of materials, half explored and undigeſted, derive a general parliamentary approbation, to which they might appeal from the accuſations of the people. A ſelect committee would have probably examined ſome of the clerks of the reſpective offices, that they might certainly know whether any letters or papers had been ſuppreſſed, whether the extracts had been faithfully made, and whether there might not be papers of intelligence, which, though proper to be ſubmitted to a ſelect and ſecret committee, could not, conſiſtently with the honour of the nation, be communicated to a committee of the whole houſe. Indeed, it does not appear that the miniſters had any foreign intelligence or correſpondence that could be much depended upon in any matter of national importance, and no evidence was examined on the occaſion; a circumſtance the leſs to be regretted, as in times paſt evil miniſters have generally found means to render ſuch enquiries ineffectual; and the ſame arts would, at any rate, have operated with the ſame efficacy, had a ſecret committee been employed at this juncture. Be that as it may, ſeveral reſolutions were reported from the committee, though ſome of them were not carried by the majority without violent diſpute and ſevere altercation. The firſt and laſt of their reſolutions require particular notice. By the former, it appeared to the committee, that his majeſty, from the 27th day of Auguſt, in the year 1755, to the 20th day of April in the ſucceeding year, received ſuch repeated and concurrent intelligence, as gave juſt reaſon to believe that the French king intended to invade his dominions of Great-Britain or Ireland. In the latter they declared their opinion, that no greater number of ſhips of war could be ſent into the Mediterranean than were actually ſent thither under the command of admiral Byng; nor any greater re-enforcement than the regiment which was ſent, and the detachment equal to a battalion, which was ordered to the relief of Fort St. Philip, conſiſtently with the ſtate of the navy, and the various ſervices eſſential to the ſafety of his majeſty's dominions, and the intereſts of his ſubjects. It muſt have been ſomething more powerful than ordinary conviction that ſuggeſted theſe opinions. Whatever reports might have been circulated by the French miniſtry, in order to amuſe, intimidate, and detach the attention of the Engliſh government from America and the Mediterranean, where they really intended to exert themſelves, yet the circumſtances of the two nations being conſidered, one would think there could have been no juſt grounds to fear an invaſion of Great-Britain or Ireland, eſpecially when other intelligence ſeemed to point out much more probable ſcenes of action. But the laſt reſolution is ſtill more incomprehenſible to thoſe who know not exactly the baſis on which it was raiſed. The number of ſhips of war in actual commiſſion amounted to 250, having on board 50,000 ſeamen and marines. Intelligence and repeated information of the French deſign upon Minorca had been conveyed to the miniſtry of England, about ſix months before it was put in execution. It is credible, that in all this time the nation could not equip or ſpare above 11 ſhips of the line and ſix frigates, to ſave the important iſland of Minorca? It is eaſy to conceive, that from a ſtanding army of 50,000 men one regiment of troops could not have been detached to re-enforce a garriſon, well known to be inſufficient for the works it was deſtined to defend? To perſons of common intellects it appeared, that intelligence of the armament of Toulon was conveyed to the admiralty as early as the month of September, in the year 1755, with expreſs notice that it would conſiſt of 12 ſhips of the line; that the deſign againſt Minorca was communicated as early as the 27th day of Auguſt, by conſul Banks, of Carthagena; confirnmed by letters from conſul Bartes, at Geno, dated on the 17th and 26th of January, and received by mr. Fox, ſecretary of ſtate, on the 4th and 11th of February, as well as by many ſubſequent intimations: that, notwithſtanding theſe repeated adviſes, even after hoſtilities had commenced in Europe, when the garriſon of Minorca amounted to no more than four incomplete regiments, and one company of artillary, 42 officers being abſent, and the place otherwiſe unprovided for a ſiege, when the Mediterranean ſquadron, commanded by mr. Edgecumbe, conſiſted of two ſhips of the line, and five frigates; neither ſtores, ammunition, or proviſion, the abſent officers belonging to the garriſon, recruits for the regiments, though ready raiſed, miners, nor any additional troops, were ſent to the iſland, nor the ſquadron augmented, till admiral Byng ſailed from Spithead on the 6th day of April, with no more ſhips of the line than, by the moſt early and authentic intelligence, the government were informed would ſail from Toulon, even when mr. Byng ſhould have been joined by commodore Edgecumbe; a junction upon which no dependence ought to have been laid; that this ſquadron contained no troops but ſuch as belonged to the four regiments in garriſon, except one battalion to ſerve in the fleet as marines, unleſs we include the order for another to be embarked at Gibraltar, which order was neither obeyed nor underſtood: that, conſidering the danger to which Minorca was expoſed, and the forwardneſs of the enemy's preparations at Toulon, admiral Oſborne, with 13 ſhips of the line and one frigate, who returned on the 16th of February, after having conveyed a fleet of merchant-ſhips, might have been detached to Minorca, without hazarding the coaſt of Great-Britain; for at that time, excluſive of this ſquadron, there were eight ſhips of the line and 32 frigates ready manned, and 32 ſhips of the line and five frigates almoſt equipped: that admiral Hawke was ſent with 14 ſhips of the line and one frigate to cruiſe in the bay of Biſcay, after repeated intelligence had been received that the French fleet had ſailed for the Weſt-Indies, and the eleven ſhips remained at Breſt and Rochefort were in want of hands and cannon, ſo that they could never ſerve to cover any embarkation or deſcent, conſequently mr. Hawke's ſquadron might have been ſpared for the relief of Minorca: that, inſtead of attending to this important object, the admiralty, on the 8th day of March ſent two ſhips of the line and three frigates to intercept a coaſting convoy off Cape Barfleur; on the 11th of the ſame month they detached two ſhips of the line to the Weſt-Indies, and on the 19th two more to North-America, where they could be of little immediate ſervice; on the 23d two of the line and three frigates a convoy off Cherbourg; and on the 1ſt of April five ſhips of the line, including three returned from this laſt ſervice, to re-enforce ſir Edward Hawke, already too ſtrong for the French fleet bound to Canada: that all theſe ſhips might have been added to mr. Byng's ſquadron, without expoſing Great-Britain or Ireland to any hazard of invaſion: that at length mr. Byng was detached with 10 great ſhips only, and even denied a frigate to repeat ſignals, for which he petitioned; although at that very time there were in port, excluſive of his ſquadron, 17 ſhips of the line and 13 frigates ready for ſea, beſides 11 of the line and 19 frigates almoſt equipped. From theſe and other circumſtances, particulariſed and urged with great vivacity, many individuals inferred, that a great number of ſhips might have been detached to the Mediterranean than were actually ſent with admiral Byng: that the not ſending an earlier and ſtronger force was one great cauſe of Minorca's being loſt, and co-operated with the delay of the miniſtry in ſending thither a re-enforcements of troops, their neglect in ſuffering the officers of the garriſon to continue abſent from their duty, and their omitting to give orders for raiſing miners to ſerve in the fortreſs of Mahon.

The next enquiry in which the houſe of commons engaged related to the contracts for victualling the forces in America, which were ſuppoſed by ſome patriots to be fraudulent and unconſcionable. This ſuſpicion aroſe from an ambiguous expreſſion, on which the contractor being interrogated by the committee appointed to examine the particulars, he prudently interpreted it in ſuch a manner as to ſcreen himſelf from the reſentment of the legiſlature. The houſe, therefore, reſolved that the contract entered into on the 26th day of March, in the year 1756, by the commiſſioners of the treaſury, with William Baker, Chriſtopher Kilby, and Richard Baker of London, merchants, for furniſhing proviſions to the forces under the command of the earl of Loudoun was prudent and neceſſary, and properly adapted to the ſecuring a conſtant and effectual ſupply for thoſe forces in America.

The preceding ſeſſion an addreſs had been preſented to the king by the houſe of commons, deſiring his majeſty would give orders for laying before them ſeveral papers relating to diſputes which had lately happened between his excellency Charles Knowles, eſq. and ſome of the principal inhabitants of the iſland of Jamaica. This governor was accuſed of many illegal, cruel, and arbitrary acts, during the courſe of his arbitration: but theſe imputations he incurred by an exertion of power which was in itſelf laudable, and well intended for the commercial intereſt of the iſland. This was his changing the ſeat of government, and procuring an act of aſſembly for removing the ſeveral laws, records, books, papers, and writings belonging to ſeveral offices in that iſland, from Spaniſh-Town to Kingſton; and for obliging the ſeveral officers to keep their offices, and hold a ſupreme court of judicature, at this laſt place, to which he had moved the ſeat of government. Spaniſh-Town, otherwiſe called St. Jago de la Vega, the old capital, was an inconſiderable inland place, of no ſecurity, trade, or importance; whereas, Kingſton was the centre of commerce, ſituated on the ſide of a fine harbour filled with ſhips, well ſecured from the inſults of an enemy, large, wealthy, and flouriſhing. Here the merchants dwell, and ſhip the greateſt part of the ſugars that grow upon the iſland. They found it extremely inconvenient and expenſive to take out their clearances at Spaniſh-Town, which ſtands at a conſiderable diſtance, and the ſame inconvenience and expence being felt by the reſt of the inhabitants, who had occaſion to proſecute ſuits at law, or attend the aſſembly of the iſland, they joined in repreſentations to the governor, requeſting, that, in conſideration of theſe inconveniences, added to that of the weakneſs of Spaniſh-Town and the importance of Kingſton, the ſeat of government might be removed. He complied with their requeſt, and in ſo doing entailed upon himſelf the hatred and reſentment of certain powerful planters, who poſſeſſed eſtates in and about the old town of St. Jago de la Vega, thus deſerted. This ſeems to have been the real ſource of the animoſity and clamour incurred by mr. Knowles, againſt whom a petition, ſigned by 19 members of the aſſembly, had been ſent to England, and preſented to his majeſty. In the two ſeſſions preceding this year the affair had been brought into the houſe of commons, where this governor's character was painted in frightful colours, and divers papers relating to the diſpute were examined. Mr Knowles having by this time returned to England, the ſubject of his adminiſtration was revived, and referred to a committee of the whole houſe.

In the mean time, petitions were preſented by ſeveral merchants of London and Liverpool, concerned in the trade to Jamaica, alledging, that the removal of the public courts, offices, and records of the iſland of Jamaica to Kingſton, and fixing the ſeat of government there, had been productive of many important advantages, by rendering the ſtrength of the iſland more formidable, the property of the traders and inhabitants more ſecure, and the proſecution of all commercial buſineſs more expeditious and leſs expenſive than formerly; therefore, praying that the purpoſes of the act paſſed in Jamaica for that end might be carried into effectual execution, in ſuch manner as the houſe ſhould think proper. The committee having examined a great number of papers, agreed to ſome reſolutions, importing, that a certain reſolution of the aſſembly of Jamaica, dated on the 29th day of October, in the year 1753, implying a claim of right in that aſſembly to raiſe and apply public money without the conſent of the governor and council, was illegal, repugnant to the terms of his majeſty's commiſſion to his governor of the ſaid iſland, and derogatory of the rights of the crown and people of Great-Britain: that the ſix laſt reſolutions taken in the aſſembly of Jamaica, on the 29th day of October, in the year 1753, proceeded on a manifeſt miſapprehenſion of the king's inſtruction to his governor, requiring him not to give his aſſent to any bill of an unuſual or extraordinary nature and importance, wherein his majeſty's prerogative, or the property of his ſubjects, might be prejudiced, or the trade or ſhipping of the kingdom any ways affected, unleſs there ſhould be a clauſe inſerted, ſuſpending the execution of ſuch bill until his majeſty's pleaſure ſhould be known; that ſuch inſtruction was juſt and neceſſary, and no alteration of the conſtitution of the iſland, nor any way derogatory to the rights of the ſubjects in Jamaica. From theſe reſolutions the reader may perceive the nature of the diſpute which had ariſen between the people of Jamaica and their governor, vice-admiral Knowles, whoſe conduct on this occaſion ſeems to have been juſtified by the legiſlature. The parliament, however, forbore to determine the queſtion, whether the removal of the courts of judicature from Spaniſh-Town to Kingſton was a meaſure calculated for the intereſt of the iſland in general.

The laſt ſubject which we ſhall mention, as having fallen under the cognizance of the commons during this ſeſſion of parliament, was the ſtate of Milford-Haven on the coaſt of Wales, one of the moſt capacious, ſafe, and commodious harbours in Great-Britain. Here the country affords many conveniences for building ſhips of war, and erecting forts, docs, quays, and magazines. It might be fortified at a very ſmall expence, ſo as to be quite ſecure from any attempts of the enemy, and rendered by far the moſt uſeful harbour in the kingdom for fleets, cruiſers, trading ſhips, and packet-boats, bound to and from the weſtward, for from hence they may put to ſea almoſt with any wind, and even at low-water: they may weather Scilly and Cape-Clear when no veſſel can ſtir from the Britiſh channel, or out of the French ports of Breſt and Rochefort, and as a poſt can travel from hence in three days to London, it might become the centre of very uſeful ſea intelligence. A petition from ſeveral merchants in London was preſented, and recommended to the houſe in a meſſage from the king, ſpecifying the advantages of this harbour, and the ſmall expence at which it might be fortified, and praying that the houſe would take this important ſubject into conſideration. Accordingly, a committee was appointed for this purpoſe, with power to ſend for perſons, papers, and records; and every circumſtance relating to it was examined with accuracy and deliberation. At length the report being made to the houſe by mr. Charles Townſhend, they unanimouſly agreed to an addreſs, repreſenting to his majeſty, that many great loſſes had been ſuſtained by the trade of the kingdom, in time of war, from the want of a ſafe harbour on the weſtern coaſt of the iſland, for the reception and protection of merchant ſhips, and ſending out cruiſers; that the harbour of Milford-Haven, in the county of Pembroke, is moſt advantageouſly ſituated, and, if properly defended and ſecured, in every reſpect adapted to the anſwering thoſe important purpoſes: they, therefore, humbly beſought his majeſty, that he would give immediate directions for erecting batteries, with proper cover, on the ſides of the ſaid harbour, in the moſt convenient places for guarding the entrance called Hubberſtone-road, and alſo ſuch other fortifications as might be neceſſary to ſecure the interior parts of the harbour, and that, until ſuch batteries and fortifications could be completed, ſome temporary defence might be provided for the immediate protection of the ſhips and veſſels lying in the ſaid harbour; finally, they aſſured him the houſe would make good to his majeſty all ſuch expences as ſhould be incurred for theſe purpoſes. The addreſs met with a gracious reception, and a promiſe that ſuch directions ſhould be given. The harbour was actually ſurveyed, the places were pitched upon for batteries, and the eſtimates prepared, but no further progreſs had ſince been made.

We have now finiſhed the detail of all the material tranſactions of this ſeſſion, except what relates to the fate of admiral Byng, which now claims our attention. In the mean time, we may obſerve, that on the 4th day of July the ſeſſion was cloſed with his majeſty's harangue, the moſt remarkable and pleaſing paragraph of which turned upon his royal aſſurance, that the ſuccour and preſervation of his dominions in America had been his conſtant care, and, next to the ſecurity of his kingdoms, ſhould continue to be his great and principal object. He told them he had taken ſuch meaſures as, he truſted, by the bleſſing of God, might effectually diſappoint the deſigns of the enemy in thoſe parts; that he had no further view but to vindicate the juſt rights of his crown and ſubjects from the moſt injurious encroachments; to preſerve tranquillity, as far as the circum-ſtances of things might admit; to prevent the true friends of Britain, and the liberties of Europe from being oppreſſed and endangered by any unprovoked and unnatural conjunction.

Of all the tranſactions that diſtinguiſhed this year, the moſt extraordinary was the ſentence executed on admiral Byng, the ſon of that great officer who had acquired ſuch honour by his naval exploits in the preceeding reign, and was ennobled for his ſervices, by the title of lord viſcount Torrington. His ſecond ſon, John Byng, had from his earlieſt youth been trained to his father's profeſſion; and was generally eſteemed one of the beſt officers in the navy, when he embarked in that expedition to Minorca, which covered his character with diſgrace, and even expoſed him to all the horrors of an ignominious death. On the 28th day of December, his trial began before a court-martial, held on board the ſhip St. George, in the harbour of Portſmouth, to which place mr. Byng had been conveyed from Greenwich by a party of horſe-guards, and inſulted by the populace in every town and village through which he paſſed. The court having proceeded to examine the evidences for the crown and the priſoner, from day to day, in the courſe of a long ſitting, agreed unanimouſly to 37 reſolutions, implying their opinion, that admiral Byng, during the engagement between the Britiſh and French fleets on the 20th day of May laſt, did not do his utmoſt endeavour to take, ſeize, and deſtroy the ſhips of the French king, which it was his duty to have engaged, and to aſſiſt ſuch of his majeſty's ſhips as were engaged, which it was his duty to have aſſiſted; and that he did not exert his utmoſt power for the relief of St. Philip's-caſtle. They, therefore, unanimouſly agreed, that he fell under part of the twelfth article of an act of parliament paſſed in the 22d year of the preſent reign, for amending, explaining, and reducing into one act of parliament the laws relating to the government of his majeſty's ſhips, veſſels, and forces by ſea; and as that article poſitively preſcribed death, without any alternative left to the diſcretion of the court under any variation of circumſtances, they unanimouſly adjudged the ſaid admiral John Byng to be ſhot to death, at ſuch time and on board of ſuch ſhips as the lord-commiſſioners of the admiralty ſhould pleaſe to direct. But as it appeared, by the evidence of the officers who were near the admiral's perſon, that no backwardneſs was perceivable in him during the action, nor any mark of fear or confuſion either in his countenance or behaviour; but that he delivered his orders coolly and diſtinctly, without ſeeming deficient in perſonal courage, and from other circumſtances they believed his miſconduct did not ariſe either from cowardice or diſaffection, they unanimouſly and earneſtly recommended him as a proper object of mercy. The admiral himſelf behaved through the whole trial with the moſt chearful compoſure, ſeemingly the effect of conſcious innocence, upon which, perhaps, he too much relied. Even after he had heard the evidence examined againſt him, and finiſhed his own defence, he laid his account in being honourably acquitted, and ordered his coach to be ready for conveying him directly from the tribunal to London. A gentleman, his friend, by whom he was attended, having received intimation of the ſentence to be pronounced, thought it his duty to prepare him for the occaſion, that he might ſummon all his fortitude to his aſſiſtance, and accordingly made him acquainted with the information he had received. The admiral gave tokens of ſurpriſe and reſentment, but betrayed no marks of fear or diſorder either then or in the court when the ſentence was pronounced. On the contrary, while divers members of the court-martial manifeſted grief, anxiety, and trepidation, ſhedding tears, and ſighing with extraordinary emotion, he heard his doom denounced without undergoing the leaſt alteration of feature, and made a low obeiſance to the preſident and the other members of the court as he retired.

The officers who compoſed this tribunal were ſo ſenſible of the law's ſeverity, that they unanimouſly ſubſcribed a letter to the board of admiralty, containing this remarkable paragraph:—'We cannot help laying the diſtreſſes of our minds before your lordſhips on this occaſion, in finding ourſelves under a neceſſity of condemning a man to death, from the great ſeverity of the 12th article of war, part of which he falls under, which admits of no mitigation if the crime ſhould be committed by an error in judgment; and, therefore, for our own conſciences' ſake, as well as in juſtice to the priſoner, we pray your lordſhips, in the moſt earneſt manner, to recommend him to his majeſty's clemency.' The lords of the admiralty, inſtead of complying with the requeſt of the court-martial, tranſmitted their letter to the king, with copies of their proceedings, and a letter from themſelves to his majeſty, ſpecifying a doubt with regard to the legality of the ſentence, as the crime of negligence, for which the admiral had been condemned, was not expreſſed in any part of the proceedings. At the ſame time, copies of two petitions from George lord viſcount Torrington, in behalf of his kinſman admiral Byng, were ſubmitted to his majeſty's royal wiſdom and determination. All the friends and relations of the unhappy convict employed and exerted their influence and intereſt for his pardon; and as the circumſtances had appeared ſo ſtrong in his favour, it was ſuppoſed that the ſceptre of royal mercy would be extended for his preſervation: but infamous arts were uſed to whet the ſavage appetite of the populace for blood. The cry of vengeance was aloud throughout the land: ſullen clouds of ſuſpicion and malevolence interpoſing, were ſaid to obſtruct the genial beams of the best virtue that adorns the throne; and the ſovereign was given to underſtand that the execution of admiral Byng was a victim abſolutely neceſſary to appeaſe the fury of the people. His majeſty, in conſequence of the repreſentation made by the lords of the admiralty, referred the ſentence to the conſideration of the twelve judges, who were unanimouſly of opinion that the ſentence was legal. This report being tranſmitted from the privy-council to the admiralty, their lordſhips iſſued a warrant for executing the ſentence of death on the 28th day of February. One gentleman at the board, however, refuſed to ſubſcribe the warrant, aſſigning for his refuſal the reaſons which we have inſerted by way of note, for the ſatisfaction of the reader [m].

Though mercy was denied to the criminal, the crown ſeemed to do nothing that ſhould be thought inconſiſtent with law. A member of parliament, who had ſat upon the court-martial at Portſmouth, roſe up in his place, and made application to the houſe of commons in behalf of himſelf and ſeveral other members of that tribunal, praying the aid of the legiſlature, to be releaſed from the oath of ſecrecy impoſed on courts-martial, that they might diſcloſe the grounds on which ſentence of death had paſſed on admiral

[m] Admiral F———s's reaſons for not ſigning the warrant for admiral Byng's execution:

'It may be thought great preſumption in me to differ from ſo great authority as that of the twelve judges; but when a man is called upon to ſign his name to an act which is to give authority to the ſhedding of blood, he ought to be guided by his own conſcience, and not by the opinions of other men.

'In the caſe before us, it is not the merit of admiral Byng that I conſider: whether he deſerves death or not, it is not a queſtion for me to decide; but whether or not his life can be taken away by the ſentence pronounced on him by the court-martial, and after having ſo clearly explained their motive for pronouncing ſuch a ſentence, is the point which alone has employed my moſt ſerious conſideration.

'The 12th article of war, on which admiral Byng's ſentence is grounded, ſays (according to my underſtanding of its meaning) 'That every perſon, who, in time of action, ſhall withdraw, keep back, or not come into fight, or do his utmoſt, &c. through motives of cowardice, negligence, or diſaffection, ſhall ſuffer death.' The court-martial does, in expreſs words, acquit admiral Byng of cowardice and diſaffection, and does not name the word negligence, admiral Byng does not, as I conceive, fall under the letter or deſcription of the 12th article of war. It may be ſaid, that negligence is implied, though the word is not mentioned, otherwiſe the court-martial would not have brought his offence under the 12th article, having acquitted him of cowardice and diſaffection. But it muſt be acknowledged that the negligence implied, cannot be wilful negligence; for wilful negligence, in admiral Byng's ſituation, muſt have proceeded either from cowardice or diſaffection, and he is expreſsly acquitted of both theſe crimes: beſides, theſe crimes, which are implied only, and not named, may indeed juſtify ſuſpicion and private opinion, but cannot ſatisfy the conſcience in caſe of blood.

'Admiral Byng's fate was referred to a court-martial, his life and death were left to their opinions. The court-martial condemn him to death, becauſe, as they expreſsly ſay, they were under a neceſſity of doing ſo by reaſon of the letter of the law, the ſeverity of which they complained of, becauſe it admits of no mitigation. The court-martial expreſsly ſay, that for the ſake of their conſciences, as well as in juſtice to the priſoner, they moſt earneſtly recommend him to his majeſty for mercy; it is evident, then, that, in the opinions and conſciences of the judges, he was not deſerving of death.

'The queſtion then is, ſhall the opinions or neceſſities of the court-martial determine admiral Byng's fate? If it ſhould be the latter, he will be executed contrary to the intentions and meaning of his judges; if the former, his life is not forfeited. His judges declare him not deſerving of death; but, miſtaking either the meaning of the law, or the nature of his offence, they bring him under an article of war, which, according to their own deſcription of his offence, he does not, I conceive, fall under; and then they condemn him to death, becauſe, as they ſay, the law admits of no mitigation. Can a man's life be taken away by ſuch a ſentence! I would not willingly be miſunderſtood, and have it believed that I judge of admiral Byng's deſerts: that was the buſineſs of a court-martial, and it is my duty only to act according to my conſcience: which, after deliberate conſideration, aſſiſted by the beſt light a poor underſtanding can afford it, remains ſtill in doubt, and therefore I cannot conſent to ſign a warrant whereby the ſentence of the court-martial may be carried into execution; for I cannot help thinking, that however criminal admiral Byng may be, his life is not forfeited by that ſentence. I do not mean to find fault with other men's opinions; all I endeavour at, is to give reaſons for my own; and all I deſire or wiſh is that I may not be miſunderſtood; I do not pretend to judge admiral Byng's deſerts, nor give any opinion on the propriety of the act.

'Signed, 6th Feb. 1757, at the Admiralty. 'J. F—s.'

Byng, and, perhaps, diſcover ſuch circumſtances as might ſhow the ſentence to be improper. Although this application produced no reſolution in the houſe, the king, on the 26th day of February, ſent a meſſage to the commons by mr. Secretary Pitt, importing, that though he had determined to let the law take its courſe with relation to admiral Byng, and reſiſted all ſollicitations to the contrary, yet, as a member of the houſe had expreſſed ſome ſcruples about the ſentence, his majeſty had thought fit to reſpite the execution of it, that there might be an opportunity of knowing, by the ſeparate examination of the members of the court-martial, upon oath, what grounds there were for ſuch ſcruples, and that his majeſty was reſolved ſtill to let the ſentence be carried into execution, unleſs it ſhould appear from the ſaid examination, that admiral Byng was unjuſtly condemned. The ſentence might be ſtrictly legal, and, at the ſame time, very ſevere, according to the maxim, ſummum jus ſumma injuria. In ſuch caſes, and perhaps in ſuch caſes only, the rigour of the law ought to be ſoftened by the lenient hand of the royal prerogative. That this was the caſe of admiral Byng appears from the warm and eager interceſſion of his jury, a ſpecies of interceſſion which hath generally, if not always, prevailed at the foot of the throne, when any thing favourable for the criminal had appeared in the courſe of the trial. How much more then might it have been expected to ſucceed, when earneſtly urged as a caſe of conſcience, in behalf of a man whom his judges had expreſsly acquitted of cowardice and treachery, the only two imputations that rendered him criminal in the eyes of the nation! Such an interpoſition of the crown in parliamentary tranſactions was irregular, unneceſſary, and at another juncture might have been productive of violent heats and declamation. At preſent, however, it paſſed without cenſure, as the effect of inattention, rather than a deſign to encroach upon the privileges of the houſe.

The meſſage being communicated, a bill was immediately brought in, to releaſe the members of the court-martial from the obligation of ſecrecy, and paſſed through the lower-houſe without oppoſition: but in the houſe of lords it appeared to be deſtitute of a proper foundation. They ſent a meſſage to the commons, deſiring them to give leave that ſuch of the members of the court-martial as were members of that houſe might attend their lordſhips, in order to be examined on the ſecond reading of the bill; accordingly, they and the reſt of the court-martial attended, and anſwered all queſtions without heſitation. As they did not inſiſt upon any excuſe, nor produce any ſatisfactory reaſon for ſhewing that the man they had condemned was a proper object of mercy, their lordſhips were of opinion that there was no occaſion for paſſing any ſuch bill, which, therefore, they almoſt unanimouſly rejected. It is not eaſy to conceive what ſtronger reaſons could be given for proving mr. Byng an object of mercy than thoſe mentioned in the letter ſent to the board of admiralty by the members of the court-martial, who were empowered to try the imputed offence, conſequently muſt have been deemed well qualified to judge of his conduct.

The unfortunate admiral being thus abandoned to the ſtroke of juſtice, prepared himſelf for death with reſignation and tranquillity. He maintained a ſurpriſing chearfulneſs to the laſt, nor did he, from his condemnation to his execution, exhibit the leaſt ſign of impatience or apprehenſion. During that interval he had remained on board of the Minarque, a third-rate ſhip of war, anchored in the harbour of Portſmouth, under a ſtrong guard, in cuſtody of the marſhal of the admiralty. On the 14th of March, the day fixed for his execution, the boats belonging to the ſquadron at Spithead being manned and armed, containing their captains and officers, with a detachment of marines, attended this ſolemnity in the harbour, which was alſo crowded with an infinite number of other boats and veſſels filled with ſpectators. About noon the admiral having taken leave of a clergyman, and two friends who accompanied him, walked out of the great cabin to the quarter-dec, where two files of marines were ready to execute the ſentence. He advanced with a firm deliberate ſtep, a compoſed and reſolute countenance, and reſolved to ſuffer with his face uncovered, until his friends repreſenting that his looks would poſſibly intimidate the ſolders, and prevent their taking aim properly, he ſubmitted to their requeſt, threw his hat on the dec, kneeled on a cuſhion, tied one white handkerchief over his eyes, and dropped the other as a ſignal for his executioners, who fired a volley ſo deciſive, that five balls paſſed through his body, and he dropped down dead in an inſtant. The time in which this tragedy was acted, from his walking out of the cabin to his being depoſited in the coffin, did not exceed three minutes.

Thus fell, to the aſtoniſhment of all Europe, admiral John Byng, who, whatever his errors and indiſcretions might have been, ſeems to be raſhly condemned, meanly given up, and cruelly ſacrificed to vile conſiderations. The ſentiments of his own fate he avowed on the verge of eternity, when there was no longer any cauſe of diſſimulation, in the following declaration, which, immediately before his death, he delivered to the marſhal of the admiralty. 'A few moments will now deliver me from the virulent perſecution, and fruſtrate the further malice of my enemies. Nor need I envy them a life ſubject to the ſenſations my injuries, and the injuſtice done me muſt create; perſuaded I am that juſtice will be done to my reputation hereafter: the manner and cauſe of raiſing and keeping up the popular clamour and prejudice againſt me will be ſeen through. I ſhall be conſidered (as I now perceive myſelf) a victim deſtined to divert the indignation and reſentment of an injured and deluded people from the proper objects. My enemies themſelves muſt now think me innocent. Happy for me, at this my laſt moment, that I know my own innocence, and am conſcious that no part of my country's misfortunes can be owing to me. I heartily wiſh the ſhedding my blood may contribute to the happineſs and ſervice of my country, but cannot reſign my juſt claim to a faithful diſcharge of my duty according to the beſt of my judgement, and the utmoſt exertion of my ability for his majeſty's honour, and my country's ſervice. I am ſorry my endeavours were not attended with more ſucceſs, and that the armament under my command proved too weak to ſucceed in an expedition of ſuch moment. Truth has prevailed over calumny and falſehood, and juſtice has wiped off the ignominious ſtain of my ſuppoſed want of perſonel courage, and the charge of diſaffection. My heart acquits me of theſe crimes: but who can be preſumptuouſly ſure of his own judgement? If my crime is an error in judgement, or differing in opinion from my judges, and if yet the error in judgement ſhould be on their ſide, God forgive them, as I do, and may the diſtreſs of their minds, and uneaſineſs of their conſciences, which in juſtice to me they have repreſented, be believed, and ſubſide as my reſentment has done. The Supreme Judge ſees all hearts and motives, and to him I muſt ſubmit the juſtice of my cauſe.'

Notwithſtanding all that has been ſaid in his favour, notwithſtanding the infamous arts that were practiſed to keep up the cry againſt him, notwithſtanding this ſolemn appeal to heaven in his laſt moments, and even ſelf-conviction of innocence, the character of admiral Byng, in point of perſonal courage, will ſtill, with many people remain problematical. They will ſtill be of opinion, that if the ſpirit of a Britiſh admiral had been properly exerted the French fleet would have been defeated, and Minorca relieved. A man's opinion of danger varies at different times, in conſequence of an irregular tide of animal ſpirits, and he is actuated by conſiderations which he dares not avow. After an officer, thus influenced, has heſitated or kept aloof in the hour of trial, the mind, eager for its own juſtification, aſſembles, with ſurpriſing induſtry, every favourable circumſtance of excuſe, and broods over them with parental partiality, until it becomes not only ſatisfied, but even enamoured of their beauty and complexion, like a doating mother, blind to the deformity of her own offſpring. Whatever mr. Byng's internal feelings might have been, whatever conſequences might have attended his behaviour on that occaſion; as the tribunal before which he was tried acquitted him expreſsly of cowardice and treachery, he was without all doubt, a proper object for royal clemency, and ſo impartial poſterity will judge him, after all thoſe diſhonourable motives of faction and of fear, by which his fate was influenced, ſhall be loſt in oblivion, or remembered with diſdain. The people of Great-Britain, naturally fierce, impatient, and clamorous, have been too much indulged, upon every petty miſcarriage, with trials, courts-martial, and diſmiſſions, which tend only to render their military commanders raſh and precipitate, the populace more licentious and intractable, and to diſgrace the national character in the opinion of mankind.

Though the parliament of Great-Britain unanimouſly concurred in ſtrengthening the hands of government, for a vigorous proſecution of the war, thoſe liberal ſupplies had like to have proved ineffectual, through a want of harmony in her councils. In the courſe of the laſt year the clamorous voice of diſſatisfaction had been raiſed by a ſeries of diſappointments and miſcarriages, which were imputed to want of intelligence, ſagacity, and vigour in the adminiſtration. The defeat of Braddock, the reduction of Oſwego, and other forts in America, the delay of armamenrs, the neglect of opportunities, ineffectual cruiſes, abſurd diſpoſitions of fleets and ſquadrons, the diſgrace in the Mediterranian, and the loſs of Minorca, were numbered among the misfortunes that flowed from the crude deſigns of a weak diſpirited miniſtry; and the proſpect of their acquieſcing in a continental war brought them ſtill farther in the contempt and deteſtation with the body of the people. In order to conciliate the good-will of thoſe whom their conduct had diſobliged, to acquire a freſh ſtoc of credit with their fellow-ſubjects, and remove from their own ſhoulders part of what future cenſure might enſue, they admitted into a ſhare of the adminiſtration a certain ſet of gentlemen, remarkable for their talents and popularity, headed by mr. Pitt and mr. Legge, eſteemed the two moſt illuſtrious patriots of Great-Britain, alike diſtinguiſhed and admired for their unconquerable ſpirit and untainted integrity. The former of theſe was appointed ſecretary of ſtate, the other chanceller of the exchequer; and their friends were veſted with other honourable though ſubordinate offices.

So far the people were charmed with the promotion of individuals, upon whoſe virtues and abilities they had the moſt perfect reliance: but theſe new ingredients would never thoroughly mix with the old leven. The adminiſtration became an emblem of the image that Nebuchadnezzar ſaw in his dream, the leg was of iron, and the foot was of clay. The old junto found their new aſſociates very unfit for their purpoſes. They could neither perſuade, cajole, nor intimidate them into meaſures which they thought repugnant to the true intereſt of their country. The new miniſters combated in council every ſuch plan, however patroniſed: they openly oppoſed in parliament every deſign which they deemed unworthy of the crown, or prejudicial to the people, even though diſtinguiſhed by the predilection of the ſovereign. Far from bargaining for their places and ſurrendering their principles by capitulation, they maintained in office their independency and candour with the moſt vigilant circumſpection, and ſeemed determined to ſhow, that he is the beſt miniſter to the ſovereign who acts with the greateſt probity towards the ſubject. Thoſe who immediately ſurrounded the throne were ſuppoſed to have concealed the true characters of theſe faithful ſervants from the knowledge of their royal maſter; to have repreſented them as obſtinate, imperious, ignorant, and even lukewarm in their loyalty; and to have declared, that with ſuch colleagues it would be impoſſible to move the machine of the government according to his majeſty's inclination. Theſe ſuggeſtions, artfully inculcated, produced the deſired effect: on the 9th day of April mr. Pitt, by his majeſty's command, reſigned the ſeals of ſecretary of ſtate for the ſouthern department. In the room of mr. Legge, the king was pleaſed to grant the office of chancellor of the exchequer to the right honourable lord Mansfield, chief-juſtice of the court of King's-Bench the ſame perſonage whom we have mentioned before under the name of mr. Murray, ſollicitor-general, now promoted or enobled for his extraordſnary merit and important ſervices. The fate of mr. Pitt was extended to ſome of his principal friends: the board of admiralty was changed, and ſome other removals were made with the ſame intention.

What was intended as a diſgrace to mr. Pitt and mr. Legge turned out one of the moſt ſhining circumſtances of their characters. The whole nation ſeemed to riſe up, as one man, in the vindication of their fame: every mouth was opened in their praiſe; and a great number of reſpectable cities and corporations preſented them with the freedom of their reſpective ſocieties, encloſed in gold boxes of curious workmanſhip, as teſtimonies of their peculiar veneration. What the people highly eſteem, they in a manner idolize. Not content with making offerings ſo flattering and grateful to conſcious virtue, they conceived the moſt violent prejudices againſt thoſe gentlemen who ſucceeded in the adminiſtration; fully convinced, that the ſame perſons who had ſunk the nation in the preſent diſtreſsful circumſtances, who had brought on her diſhonour, and reduced her to the verge of deſtruction, were by no means the fit inſtruments of her delivery and redemption. The whole kingdom catched fire at the late changes; nor could the power, the cunning and the artifice of a faction long ſupport it againſt the united voice of Great-Britain, which ſoon pierced the ears of the ſovereign. It was not poſſible to perſuade the people that ſalutary meaſures could be ſuggeſted or purſued, except by the few, whoſe zeal for the honour of their country, and ſteady adherence to an upright diſintereſted conduct, had ſecured their confidence, and claimed their veneration. A great number of addreſſes, dutifully and loyally expreſſed, ſollicited the king, ever ready to meet half way the wiſhes of his faithful people, to reſtore mr. Pitt and mr. Legge to their former employments. Upon this they reſted the ſecurity and honour of the nation, as well as the public expectation of the ſpeedy and ſucceſsful iſſue of a war, hitherto attended with diſgraces and misfortunes. Accordingly, his majeſty was graciouſly pleaſed to redeliver the ſeals to mr. Pitt, appointed him ſecretary of ſtate for the ſouthern department, on the 29th day of June, and five days after the office of chancellor of the exchequer was reſtored to mr. Legge: promotions that afforded univerſal ſatisfaction.

It would not, perhaps, be poſſible to exclude from a ſhare in the adminiſtration all who were not perfectly agreeable to the people: however unpopular the late miniſtry might appear, ſtill they poſſeſſed ſufficient influence in the privy-council, and credit in the houſe of commons, to thwart every meaſure in which they did not themſelves partake. This conſideration, and very recent experience, probably dictated the neceſſity of a coalition, ſalutary in itſelf and prudent, becauſe it was the only means of aſſuaging the rage of faction, and healing thoſe diviſions, more pernicious to the public than the moſt miſtaken and blundering councils. Sir Robert Henley was made lord-keeper of the great ſeal, and ſworn of his majeſty's privy-council, on the 13th day of June; the cuſtody of the privy-ſeal was committed to earl Temple: his grace the duke of Newcaſtle, mr. Legge, mr. Nugent, lord viſcount Duncannon, and mr. Grenville, were appointed commiſſioners for executing the office of treaſurer of his majeſty's exchequer: lord Anſon, admirals Boſcawen and Forbes, dr. Hay, mr. Weſt, mr. Hunter, and mr. Elliot, to preſide at the board of admiralty: mr. Fox was gratified with the office of receiver and paymaſter-general of all his majeſty's guards, garriſons, and land forces; and the earl of Thomond was made treaſurer of the king's houſehold, and ſworn of his majeſty's privy-council. Other promotions likewiſe took place, with a deſign to gratify the adherents of either party; and ſo equally was the royal favour diſtributed, that the utmoſt harmony for a long time ſubſiſted. Ingredients ſeemingly heterogeneous conſolidated into one uniform maſs, ſo as to produce effects far exceeding the moſt ſanguine expectations; and this prudent arrangement proved diſpleaſing only to thoſe whom violent party attachment had inſpired with a narrow and excluſive ſpirit.

The accumulated loſſes and diſappointments of the preceding year made it abſolute neceſſary to retrieve the credit of the Britiſh arms and councils by ſome vigorous and ſpirited enterprize, which ſhould at the ſame time produce ſome change in the circumſtances of his Pruſſian majeſty, already depreſſed by the repulſe of Colin, and in danger of being attacked by the whole power of France, now ready to fall upon him, like a torrent, which had ſo lately ſwept before in the army of obſervation, now on the brink of diſgrace. A well-planned and vigorous defence on the coaſt of France, it was thought would probably give a deciſive blow to the marine of that kingdom, and at the ſame time effect a powerful diverſion in favour of the Pruſſian monarch and the duke of Cumberland, driven from all his poſts in the electorate of Hanover, by drawing a part of the French forces to the defence and protection of their own coaſts. Both were objects of great concern, upon which the ſovereign and miniſtry were ſeduloufly bent. His royal highneſs the duke in a particular manner, urged the neceſſity of ſome enterprize of this nature, as the only expedient to obviate the ſhameful convention now in agitation. The miniſtry foreſaw, that, by deſtroying the enemy's ſhipping, all ſuccours would be cut off from America, whither they were daily tranſporting troops; the Britiſh commerce ſecured, without thoſe convoys ſo inconvenient to the board of admiralty, and to the merchants; and thoſe ideal fears of an invaſion, that had in ſome meaſure affected the public credit, wholly diſpelled.

From theſe conſiderations a powerful fleet was ordered to be got in readineſs to put to ſea on the ſhorteſt notice, and ten regiments of foot were marched to the Iſle of Wight. The naval armament, conſiſting of 18 ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, fire-ſhips, bomb-ketches, and tranſports, was put under the command of ſir Edward Hawke, an officer whoſe faithful ſervices recommended him, above all others, to this command; and rear-admiral Knowles was appointed his ſubaltern. Sir John Mordaunt was preferred to take the command of the land forces; and both ſtrictly enjoined to act with the utmoſt unanimity and harmony. Europe beheld with aſtoniſhment theſe mighty preparations. The deſtination of the armament was wrapped in the moſt profound ſecrecy: it exerciſed the penetration of politicians, and filled France with very ſerious alarms. Various were the impediments which obſtructed the embarkation of the troops for ſeveral weeks, while mr. Pitt expreſſed the greateſt uneaſineſs at the delay, and repeatedly urged the commander in chief to expedite his departure; but a ſufficient number of tranſports, owing to ſome blunder in the contractors had not yet arrived. The troops expreſſed an eager impatience to ſignalize themſelves againſt the enemies of the liberties of Europe; but the ſuperſtitious drew unfavourable preſages from the dilatorineſs of the embarkation. At laſt the tranſports arrived, the troops were put on board with all expedition, and the fleet got under ſail on the 8th day of September, attended with the prayers of every man warmed with the love of his country, and ſollicitous for her honour. The public, big with expectation, dubious where the ſtroke would fall, but confident of its ſucceſs, were impatient for tidings from the fleet; but it was not till the 14th that even the troops on board began to conjecture that a deſcent was meditated on the coaſt of France near Rochefort or Rochelle.

On the 20th the fleet made the iſle of Oleron, and then ſir Edward Hawke ſent an order to vice-admiral Knowles, requiring him, if the wind permitted the fleet, to proceed to Baſque road, to ſtand in as near to the Iſle of Aix as the pilot would carry him, with ſuch ſhips of his diviſion as he thought neceſſary for the ſervice, and to batter the fort till the garriſon ſhould either abandon or ſurrender it. But the immediate execution of this order was fruſtrated by a French ſhip of war's ſtanding into the very middle of the fleet, and continuing in that ſtation for ſome time before ſhe diſcovered her miſtake, or any of the captains had a ſignal thrown out to give chaſe. Admiral Knowles, when too late, ordered the Magnanime, captain Howe, and Torbay, captain Keppel, on that ſervice, and thereby retarded the attac upon which he was immediately ſent. A ſtroke of policy greatly to be admired, as from hence he gained time to aſſure himſelf of the ſtrength of the fortifications of Aix, before he ran his majeſty's ſhips into danger.

While the above ſhips, with the addition of the Royal William, were attending the French ſhip of war ſafe into the river Garonne, the remainder of the fleet was beating to windward off the Iſle of Oleron; and the commander in chief publiſhing orders and regulations which did credit to his judgment, and would have been highly uſeful had there ever been occaſion to put them in execution. On the 23d the van of the fleet, led by captain Howe in the Magnanime, ſtood towards Aix, a ſmall iſland ſituated in the mouth of the river Charente, leading up to Rochefort, the fortifications half finiſhed, and mounted with about 30 cannon and mortars, the garriſon compoſed of 600 men, and the whole iſland about five miles in circumference. As the Magnanime approached, the enemy fired briſkly upon her; but captain Howe, regardleſs of their faint endeavours, kept on his courſe without flinching, dropped his anchors cloſe to the walls, and poured in ſo inceſſant a fire as ſoon ſilenced their artillery. It was however, near an hour before the fort ſtruc, when ſome forces were landed to take poſſeſſion of ſo important a conqueſt, with orders to demoliſh the fortifications, the care of which was intruſted to vice-admiral Knowles.

Inconſiderable as this ſucceſs might appear, it greatly elated the troops, and was deemed an happy omen of further advantages; but, inſtead of embarking the troops that night, as was univerſally expected, ſeveral ſucceſſive days were ſpent in councils of war, ſoundings of the coaſt, and deliberations whether the king's expreſs orders were practicable, or to be complied with. Eight days were elapſed ſince the firſt appearance of the fleet on the coaſt, and the alarm was given to the enemy. Sir Edward Hawke, indeed, propoſed laying a 60 gun ſhip againſt Fouras, and battering that fort, which it was thought would help to ſecure the landing of the troops, and falicitate the enterprize on Rochefort. This a French pilot on board (Thierry) undertook; but after a ſhip had been lighted for the purpoſe, vice-admiral Knowles reported that a bomb-ketch had run a-ground at above the diſtance of two miles from the fort; upon which the project of battering or bombarding the fort was abandoned. The admiral likewiſe propoſed to bombard Rochelle; but this overture was over-ruled, for reaſons which we need not mention. It was at length determined, in a council of war held on the 8th, to make a deſcent, and attac the forts leading to and upon the mouth of the river Charente. An order, in conſequence of this reſolution, was immediately iſſued for the troops to be ready to embark from the tranſports in the boats preciſely at 12 o'clock at night. Accordingly, the boats were prepared, and filled with the men at the time appointed, and now they remained beating againſt each other, and the ſides of the ſhips, for the ſpace of four hours, while the council were determining whether, after all the trouble given, they ſhould land; when at length an order was publiſhed for the troops to return to their reſpective tranſports, and all thoughts of a deſcent, to appearance, were wholly abandoned. The ſucceeding days were employed in blowing up and demoliſhing the fortifications of Aix; after which, the land officers in a council of war, took the final reſolution of returning to England without any further attempts, fully ſatisfied they had done all in their power to execute the deſigns of the miniſtry, and chooſing rather to oppoſe the frowns of an angry ſovereign, the murmurs of an incenſed nation, and the contempt of mankind, than fight a handful of daſtardy militia. Such was the iſſue of an expedition that raiſed the expectation of all Europe, threw the coaſts of France into the utmoſt confuſion, and coſt the people of England little leſs than a million of money.

The fleet was no ſooner returned than the whole nation was in a ferment. The public expectation had been wound up to the higheſt pitch, and now the diſappointment was proportioned to the ſanguine hopes conceived that the pride of France would have been humbled by ſo formidable an armament. The miniſtry, and with them the national voice, exclaimed againſt the commanding officers, and the military men retorted the calumny, by laying the blame on the projectors of the enterprize, who had put the nation to great expence before they had obtained the neceſſary information. Certain it was, that blame muſt fall ſomewhere, and the miniſtry reſolved to acquit themſelves and fix the accuſation, by requeſting his majeſty to appoint a board of officers of character and ability to enquire into the cauſes of the late miſcarriage. This alone it was that could appeaſe the public clamours, and afford general ſatisfaction. The enemies of mr. Pitt endeavoured to wreſt the miſcarriage of the expedition to his prejudice, but the wiſpers of faction was ſoon drowned in the voice of the whole people of England, who never could perſuade themſelves that a gentlemen, raiſed to the height of power and popularity by mere dint of ſuperior merit, integrity, and diſintereſtedneſs, would now ſacrifice his reputation by a moc armament, or hazard incurring the deriſion of Europe, by neglecting to obtain all the neceſſary previous information, or doing whatever might contribute to the ſucceſs of the expedition. It was aſked whether reaſon or juſtice dictated, that a late unfortunate admiral ſhould be capitally puniſhed for not trying and exerting his utmoſt ability to relieve Fort St. Philip's, inveſted by a powerful army and ſurrounded with a numerous fleet, while no charge of negligence or cowardice was brought againſt thoſe who occaſioned the miſcarriage of a well-concerted and well-appointed expedition? The people, they ſaid, were not to be quieted with the reſolutions of a council of war, compoſed of men, whoſe inactivity might frame excuſes for declining to expoſe themſelves to danger. It was publicly mentioned, that ſuch bacwardneſs appeared among the general officers before the fleet reached the iſle of Oleron as occaſioned the admiral to declare with warmth, that he would comply with his orders, and go into Baſque road, whatever might be the conſequence. It was aſked why the army did not land on the night of the 23d or 24th, and whether the officers ſent out to reconnoitre had returned with ſuch intelligence as ſeemed to render a deſcent impracticable? It was aſked, whether the commander in chief had complied with his majeſty's orders, 'to attempt, as far as ſhould be found practicable, a deſcent on the coaſt of France, at or near Rochefort, in order to attac, and, by a vigorous impreſſion, force that place; and to burn and deſtroy, to the utmoſt of his power, all docs, magazines, arſenals, and ſhipping, as ſhall be found there?' Such rumours as theſe, every where propogated, rendered an enquiry no leſs neceſſary to the reputation of the officers on the expedition than to the miniſter who had projected it. Accordingly, a board, conſiſting of three officers of rank, reputation, and ability, was appointed by his majeſty, to enquire into the reaſons why the fleet returned without having executed his majeſty's orders.

The three general officers, who met on the 21ſt of the ſame month, were Charles, duke of Marlborough, lieutenant-general, major-generals lord George Sackville and John Waldegrave. To judge of the practicability of executing his majeſty's orders, it was neceſſary to enquire into the nature of the intelligence upon which the expedition was projected. The firſt and moſt important was a letter ſent to ſir John, afterwards lord Ligonier, by lieutenant-colonel Clark. This letter had been frequently examined in the privy-council, and contained in ſubſtance, that colonel Clark, in returning from Gibraltar, in the year 1754, had travelled along the weſtern coaſt of France to obſerve the conditions of the fortifications, and judge how far a deſcent would be practicable, in caſe of a rupture between Great-Britain and France. On his coming to Rochefort, where he was attended by an engineer, he was ſurpriſed to find the greateſt part of a good rampart, with a revetement, flanked only with redans: no outworks, no covered-way, and in many places no ditch, ſo that the bottom of the wall was ſeen at a diſtance. He remembered, that in other places, where the earth had been taken out to form the rampart, there was left round them a conſiderable height of ground, whence an enemy might draw a great advantage: that for above the length of a front, or two or three hundred yards, there was no rampart, or even entrenchment, but only ſmall ditches, in the low and marſhy grounds next the river, which however were dry at low-water; yet the bottom remained muddy and ſlimy. Towards the river no rampart, no batteries, no parapet, on either ſide appeared, and on the land ſide he obſerved ſome high ground within the diſtance of 150 or 200 yards of the town, in which condition the colonel was told by the engineer the place had remained for above 70 years. To prevent giving umbrage, he drew no plan of the place, and even burnt the few ſketches he had by him: however, as to utility, the colonel declared himſelf as much ſatisfied as if he had taken a plan. He could not aſcertain the direct height of the rampart, but thought it could not exceed 25 feet, including the parapet. The river might be about 130 feet broad, and the entrance defended by two or three ſmall redoubts. As to forces, none are ever garriſoned at Rochefort, except marines, which, at the time the colonel was on the ſpot, amounted to about 1000. This was the firſt intelligence the miniſtry received of the ſtate of Rochefort, which afforded ſufficient room to believe that an attac by ſurpriſe might be attended with happy conſequences. It was true, that colonel Clark made his obſervations in time of peace, but it was likewiſe probable, that no great alterations were made on account of the war, as the place had remained in the ſame condition during the two or three laſt wars with France, when they had the ſame reaſons as now to expect their coaſts would be inſulted. The next information was obtained from Joſeph Thierry, a French pilot, of the proteſtant religion, who paſſed ſeveral examinations before the privy-council. This perſon declared that he had followed the buſineſs of a pilot on the coaſt of France for the ſpace of 20 years, and ſerved as firſt pilot in ſeveral of the king's ſhips: that he had, in particular, piloted the Magnanime, before ſhe was taken by the Engliſh, for about 22 months, and had often conducted her into the road of the Iſle of Aix; and that he was perfectly acquainted with the entrance, which, indeed, is ſo eaſy as to render a pilot almoſt unneceſſary. The road, he ſaid, afforded good anchorage in 12 or 14 fathom water, as far as Bayonne; the channel between the iſlands of Oleron and Rhé was three leagues broad, and the banks neceſſary to be avoided lay near the land, except one called the Boiard, which is eaſily diſcerned by the breakers. He affirmed that the largeſt veſſels might draw up cloſe to the fort of Aix, which he would undertake the Magnanime alone ſhould deſtroy; that the largeſt ſhips might come up to the Vigerot, two miles diſtant from the mouth of the river, with all their cannon and ſtores: that men might be landed to the north of fort Fouras, out of ſight of the fort, upon a meadow where the ground is firm and level, under cover of the cannon of the fleet. This landing place is reckoned at about five miles from Rochefort, the way dry, and no way intercepted by ditches and moraſſes. He ſaid great part of the city was encompaſſed by a wall; but towards the river, on both ſides, for about ſixty paces, it was encloſed only with palliſades, without a foſſé. To the intelligence of col. Clark and Thierry the miniſtry added a ſecret account obtained of the ſtrength and diſtribution of the French forces, whence it appeared highly probable that no more than 10,000 men could be allowed for the defence of the whole coaſt, from St. Valery to Bourdeaux. In conſequence of the above information the ſecret expedition was planned; inſtructions were given to ſir John Mordaunt and admiral Hawke to make a vigorous impreſſion on the French coaſt, and all the other meaſures projected, which it was imagined would make an effectual diverſion, by obliging the enemy to employ a great part of their forces at home, diſturb and ſhake the credit of their public loans, impair the ſtrength and reſources of their navy, diſconcert their extenſive and dangerous operations of war, and, finally, give life, ſtrength, and luſtre to the common cauſe and his majeſty's arms. The board of enquiry took next into conſideration the ſeveral letters and explanatory inſtructions ſent to ſir John Mordaunt, in conſequence of ſome difficulties which might poſſibly incur, ſtated by that general in letters to the miniſter, previous to his ſailing. Then they examined the report made to ſir Edward Hawke by admiral Broderick, and the captains of men of war ſent to ſound the French ſhore from Rochelle to fort Fouras, dated September the twenty-ninth; the reſult of the councils of war on the twenty-fifth and twenty-eighth; ſir Edward Hawke's letter to ſir John Mordaunt on the twenty-ſeventh, and the general's anſwer on the twenty-ninth: after which ſir John Mordaunt was called upon to give his reaſons for not putting his majeſty's inſtructions and orders in execution. This he did in ſubſtance as follows: The attempt on Rochefort he underſtood was to have been on the footing of a coup de main or ſurpriſe, which it would be impoſſible to execute if the deſign was diſcovered or the alarm taken. He alſo underſtood that an attempt could not be made, nay, that his majeſty did not require it ſhould, unleſs a proper place for debarking, and a ſafe retreat for the troops was diſcovered; particularly where the ſhips could protect them, and a ſafe communication with the fleet, and conveyance of ſupplies from it, were found. His ſentiments, he ſaid, were confirmed by a paper to this purpoſe, delivered to him by ſir John Ligonier, on his firſt being appointed to command the expedition. It was likewiſe probable, he thought, that although Rochefort ſhould have remained in the ſituation in which colonel Clark and the pilot Thierry had ſeen it three years before, yet that a few days preparation could make it ſufficiently defenſible againſt a coup de main. Judging, therefore, the dependence on ſuch an operation alone improper, he applied to the miniſtry for two more old battalions, and artillery for a regular attac to force the place, which, from its conſtruction, appeared as difficult to be made defenſible againſt the latter, as eaſily ſecured againſt the former. But this requeſt being refuſed, he ſtill thought it his duty to obey his orders on the footing on which the expedition was planned, eſpecially as he underſtood his inſtructions were diſcretionary, regarding the circumſtances of the time, the condition of the place, and the nature of the ſervice. He recited the poſitive and credible intelligence received, as well before the embarkation as during the voyage, of the alarm given to France, and the preparations made along the French coaſts from Breſt and St. Maloes to Rochefort: the accidents that kept the fleet hovering along the coaſts, and prevented the poſſibility of an attempt by ſurpriſe; the reports of all the gentlemen employed in ſounding the coaſts, ſo contrary to the intelligence given by Thierry the pilot: the opinion of the council of war, by which he was enjoined to act, and with which his own judgement concurred: the endeavours uſed, after the 26th, to find out ſome expedient for annoying the enemy and executing his majeſty's inſtructions: the attempt made to land, in conſequence of the reſolution of the ſecond council of war, which was prevented by boiſterous and ſtormy weather, and, laſtly, the reaſons that determined him, in concert with the other land officers, return to England.

Having conſidered all theſe circumſtances, and examined ſeveral officers who ſerved in the expedition, the court of enquiry gave in the following report to his majeſty:—"It appears to us, that one cauſe of the expedition having failed is the not attacking fort Fouras by ſea, at the ſame time that it could have been attacked by land, agreeably to the firſt deſign, which certainly muſt have been of the greateſt utility towards carrying his majeſty's inſtructions into execution. It was at firſt reſolved by admiral Hawke (Thierry, the pilot, having undertaken the ſafe conduct of a ſhip to fort Fouras for that purpoſe) but afterwards laid aſide, upon the repreſentation of vice-admiral Knowles, that the Barfleur, the ſhip deſigned for that ſervice, was a-ground, at the diſtance of between four or five miles from the ſhore: but as neither ſir Edward Hawke or the pilot could attend to give any information upon that head, we cannot preſume to offer any certain opinion thereupon. We conceive another cauſe of the failure of the expedition to have been, that, inſtead of attempting to land when the report was received on the 24th of September, from rear-admiral Broderick, and the captains who had been out to ſound and recognoitre, a council of war was ſummoned, and held on the 25th, in which it was unanimouſly reſolved not to land, as the attempt on Rochefort was neither adviſeable or practicable: but it does not appear to us that there were then, or at any time afterwards, either a body of troops or batteries on ſhore ſufficient to have prevented the attempting a deſcent, in purſuance of his inſtructions ſigned by your majeſty: neither does it appear to us that there were any reaſons ſufficient to induce the council of war to believe that Rochefort was ſo changed in reſpect to its ſtrength, or poſture of defence, ſince the expedition was firſt reſolved on in England, as to prevent all attempts of an attac upon the place, in order to burn and deſtroy the docs, magazines, arſenals. and ſhipping, in obedience to your majeſty's command. And we think ourſelves obliged to remark, in the council of war on the 28th of September, that no reaſon could have exiſted ſufficient to prevent the attempt of landing the troops, as the council then unanimouſly reſolved to land with all poſſible diſpatch. We beg leave alſo to remark, that after it being unanimouſly reſolved to land, in the council of war of the 28th of September, the reſolution was taken of returning to England, without any regular or general meeting of the ſaid council: but as the whole operation was of ſo inconſiderable a nature, we do not offer this to your majeſty as a cauſe of the failure of the expedition, ſince we cannot but look upon the expedition to have failed from the time the great object of it was laid aſide in the council of war of the 25th.'

The report, ſigned by the general officers Marlborough, Sackville, and Waldgrave, probably laid the foundation for the court-martial which ſat ſoon after upon the conduct of the commander in chief on the expedition. The enemies of the miniſter made a handle of the miſcarriage to leſſen him in the eſteem of the public, by laying the whole blame on his forming a project ſo expenſive to the nation, on intelligence not only ſlight at the firſt view, but falſe upon further examination. But the people were ſtill his advocates, they diſcerned ſomething myſterious in the whole conduct of the commander in chief. They plainly perceived that caution took place of vigour, and that the hours for action were ſpent in deliberations and councils of war. Had he debarked the troops, and made ſuch an attac as would have diſtinguiſhed his courage, the voice of the people would have acquitted him, however unſucceſsful, though prudence, perhaps, might have condemned him. Even Braddock's raſhneſs they deemed preferable to Mordaunt's inactivity: the loſs of ſo many brave lives was thought leſs injurious and diſgraceful to the nation than the too ſafe return of the preſent armament. The one demonſtrated that the Britiſh ſpirit ſtill exiſted; the other ſeemed to indicate the too powerful influence of wealth, luxury, and thoſe manners which tend to debauch and enaſculate the mind. A public trial of the commander in chief was expected by the people, and it was graciouſly granted by his majeſty. It is even thought that ſir John Mordaunt himſelf demanded to have his conduct ſcrutinized, by which method alone he was ſenſible his character could be reeſtabliſhed. His majeſty's warrant for holding a court-martial was accordingly ſigned on the 3d day of December. The court was compoſed of nine lieutenant-generals, nine major-generals, and three colonels, who ſat on the 14th, and continued by ſeveral adjournments to the 20th. Lieutenant-general ſir John Mordaunt came priſoner before the court, and the following charge was exhibited againſt him: namely, That he being appointed by the king commander in chief of his majeſty's forces ſent on an expedition to the coaſt of France, and having received orders and inſtructions relative thereto from his majeſty, under his royal ſign-manuel, and alſo by one of his principal ſecretaries of ſtate, had diſobeyed his majeſty's ſaid orders and inſtructions. The proceedings of this court were nearly ſimilar to thoſe of the court of enquiry. The ſame evidences were examined, with the addition of ſir Edward Hawke's depoſition; and a defence differing in no eſſential point from the former, made by the priſoner, but the judgement given was clear and explicit. Sir John Mordaunt was unanimouſly found not guilty, and therefore acquitted, while the public opinion remained unaltered, and many perſons inveighed as bitterly againſt the lenity of the preſent court-martial as they had formerly againſt the ſeverity of the ſentence paſſed upon a late unfortunate admiral. The evidence of one gentleman in particular drew attention: he was accuſed of tergiverſation, and of ſhowing that partial indulgence which his own conduct required. He publicly defended his character: his performance was cenſured, and himſelf diſmiſſed the ſervice by his ſovereign.

Beſides the diverſion intended by a deſcent on the coaſt of France, ſeveral other methods were employed to amuſe the enemy, as well as to protect the trade of the kingdom, ſecure our colonies in the Weſt-Indies, and inſure the continuance of the extraordinary ſucceſs which had lately bleſſed his majeſty's arms in the Eaſt-Indies; but theſe we could not mention before without breaking the thread of our narration. On the 9th of February admiral Weſt ſailed with a ſquadron of men of war to the weſtward, as did admiral Coats with the fleet under his convoy to the Weſt-Indies, and commodore Stevens with the trade to the Eaſt-Indies in the month of March. Admiral Holbourn and commodore Holms, with 11 ſhips of the line, a fire-ſhip, bomb-ketch, and 50 tranſports, ſailed from St. Helen's for America in April. The admiral had on board 6200 effective men, excluſive of officers, under the command of general Hopſon, aſſiſted by lord Charles Hay. In May admiral Oſborne, who had been forced bac to Plymouth with his ſquadron by ſtreſs of weather, ſet ſail for the Mediterranean, as did two ſhips of war ſent to convoy the American trade.

In the mean time, the privateers fitted out by private merchants and ſocieties greatly annoyed the French commerce. The Antigallican, a private ſhip of war, equipped by a ſociety of men who aſſumed that name, took the duke de Penthievre Indiaman off the port of Corunna, and carried her into Cadiz. The prize was eſtimated worth 200,000l. and immediate application was made by France to the court of Spain for reſtitution, while the proprietors of the Antigallican were ſquandering in mirth, feſtivity, and riot, the imaginary wealth ſo eaſily and unexpectedly acquired. Such were the remonſtrances made to his catholick majeſty with reſpect to the illegality of the prize, which the French Eaſt-India company aſſerted was taken within ſhot of a neutral port, that the Penthievre was firſt violently wreſted out of the hands of the captors, then detained as a depoſit, with ſealed hatches, and a Spaniſh guard on board, till the claims of both parties could be examined, and at laſt adjudged to be an illegal capture, and conſequently reſtored to the French, to the great diſappointment of the owners of the privateer. Beſides the ſucceſs which attended a great number of other privateers, the lords of the admiralty publiſhed a liſt of above 30 ſhips of war and privateers taken from the enemy, in the ſpace of four months, by the Engliſh ſloops and ſhips of war, excluſive of the duke d'Aquitaine Indiaman, now fitted out as a ſhip of war, taken by the Eagle and Medway; the Pondicherry Indiaman, valued at 160,000l. taken by the Dover man of war; and above ſix privateers brought into port by the diligent and brave captain Lockhart, for which he was honoured with a variety of preſents of plate by ſeveral corporations, in teſtimony of their eſteem and regard. This run of good fortune was not, however, without ſome retribution on the ſide of the enemy, who, out of 21 ſhips homeward-bound from Carolina, made prizes of 19, whence the merchants ſuſtained conſiderable damage, and a great quantity of valuable commodities, indigo in particular, was loſt to this country.

Notwithſtanding the large imports of grain from different parts of Europe and America, the artifice of engroſſers ſtill kept up the price of corn. So incenſed were the populace at the iniquitous combinations entered into to fruſtrate the endeavours of the legiſlature, and to oppreſs the poor, that they roſe in a tumultuous manner in ſeveral counties, ſometimes to the number of 5 or 6000, and ſeiſed upon the grain brought to market. Nor was it indeed to be wondered at, conſidering the diſtreſs to which many perſons were reduced. The difficulty of obtaining the neceſſaries of life raiſed the price of labour at the moſt unſeaſonable time, when all manufacturers were overſtocked for want of a proper market, which obliged them to diſmiſs above half the hands before employed. Hence aroſe the moſt pitiable condition of ſeveral thouſands of uſeful induſtrious ſubjects; a calamity attended only with one advantage to the public, namely, the facility with which recruits were raiſed for his majeſty's ſervice. At laſt the plentiful crops with which it pleaſed Providence to bleſs theſe kingdoms, the prodigious quantities of corn imported from foreign countries, and the wiſe meaſures of the legiſlature, broke all the villainous ſchemes ſet on foot by the foreſtallers and engroſſers, and reduced the price of corn to the uſual ſtandard. The public joy on this event was greatly augmented by the ſafe arrival of the fleet from the Leeward iſlands, conſiſting of 92 ſail, and of the Straits fleet, eſteemed worth three millions ſterling, whereby the ſilk manufacturers in particular were again employed, and their diſtreſſes relieved. About the ſame time the India company was highly elated with the joyful account of the ſafe arrival and ſpirited conduct of three of their captains, attacked in their paſſage homeward by two French men of war, one of 64, the other of 26 guns. After a warm engagement, which continued for three hours, they obliged the French ſhips to ſheer off, with ſcarce any loſs on their own ſide. When the engagement began, the captains had promiſed a reward of 1000l. to the crews, by way of incitement to their valour; and the company doubled the ſum, in recompenſe of their fidelity and courage.

His majeſty having taken into conſideration the incredible damage ſuſtained by the commerce of theſe kingdoms, for want of proper harbours and forts on the weſtern coaſt to receive and protect merchant-men, was graciouſly pleaſed to order that a temporary ſecurity ſhould be provided for the ſhipping which might touch at Milford-Haven, until the fortifications voted in parliament could be erected. How far his majeſty's directions were complied with, the number of merchant-ſhips taken by the enemy's privateers upon that coaſt ſufficiently indicated.

Whatever reaſons the government had to expect the campaign ſhould be vigorouſly puſhed in America, almoſt every circumſtance turned out contrary to expectation. Not all the endeavours of the earl of Loudoun to quiet the diſſentions among the different provinces, and to eſtabliſh unanimity and harmony, could prevail. Circumſtances required that he ſhould act the part of a mediator, in order to raiſe the neceſſary ſupplies for proſecuting the war, without which it was impoſſible he could appear in the character of a general. The enemy, in the mean time, were purſuing the blow given at Oſwego, and taking advantage of the diſtraction that appeared in the Britiſh councils. By their ſucceſſes in the preceding campaign, they remained maſters of all the lakes. Hence they were furniſhed with the means of practiſing on the Indians in all the different diſtricts, and obliging them by rewards, promiſes, and menaces to act in their favour. Every acceſſion to their ſtrength was a real dimunition of that of the Britiſh commander; but then the ignorance or puſillanimity of ſome of the inferior officers in our bac ſettlements was, in effect, more beneficial to the enemy than all the vigilance and activity of Montcalm. In conſequence of the ſhameful loſs of Oſwego, they voluntarily abandoned to the mercy of the French general the whole country of the Five Nations, the only body of Indians who had inviolably performed their engagements, or indeed who had preſerved any ſincere regard for the Britiſh government. The communication with theſe faithful allies was now cut off, by the imprudent demolition of the forts we poſſeſſed at the great carrying-place. A ſtrong fort, indeed, was built at Wincheſter, and called Fort Loudoun, after the commander in chief, and 400 Cherokee Indians joined the Engliſh forces at Fort Cumberland: but this re-enforcement by no means counterbalanced the loſſes ſuſtained in conſequence of our having imprudently ſtopped up Wood-creek, and filled it with logs. Every perſon the leaſt acquainted with the country readily perceived the weakneſs of theſe meaſures, by which our whole frontier was left open and expoſed to the irruption of the ſavages in the French intereſt, who would not fail to profit by our blunders, too notorious to eſcape them. By the removal of theſe barriers, a path was opened to our fine ſettlements on thoſe grounds called the German Flats, and along the Mohawk's river, which the enemy deſtroyed with fire and ſword before the end of the campaign.

In the mean time lord Loudoun was taking the moſt effectual ſteps to unite the provinces, and raiſe a force ſufficient to give ſome deciſive blow. The attac on Crown-Point, which had been ſo long meditated, was laid aſide, as of leſs importance than the intended expedition to Louſbourg, now ſubſtituted in its place, and undoubtedly a more conſiderable object in itſelf. Admiral Holbourne arrived at Hallifax, with the ſquadron and tranſports under his command, on the 9th of July; and it was his lordſhip's intention to repair thither with all poſſible diligence, in order to take upon him the command of the expedition; but a variety of accidents interpoſed. It was with the utmoſt difficulty he at length aſſembled a body of 6000 men, with which he inſtantly began his march to join the troops lately arrived from England. When the junction was affected, the whole forces amounted to 12,000 men; an army that raiſed great expectations. Immediately ſome ſmall veſſels were ſent out to examine and reconnoitre the condition of the enemy, and the intermediate time was employed in embarking the troops, as ſoon as the tranſports arrived. The return of the ſcouts totally altered the face of affairs: they brought the unwelcome news, that M. de Bois de la Mothe, who ſailed in the month of May from Breſt with a large fleet of ſhips of war and tranſports, was now ſafe at anchor in the harbour of Louiſbourg. Their intelligence was ſupported by the teſtimony of ſeveral deſerters; yet ſtill it wanted confirmation, and many perſons believed their account of the enemy's ſtrength greatly magnified. Such devices, however, could not but occaſion extraordinary fluctuations in the councils of war at Hallifax. Some were for ſetting aſide all thoughts of the expedition for that ſeaſon; while others more warm in their diſpoſitions, and ſanguine in their expectations, were for proſecuting it with vigour, in ſpite of all dangers and difficulties. Their diſputes were carried on with great vehemence, when a packet bound from Louiſbourg in France was taken by one of the Engliſh ſhips ſtationed at Newfoundland. She had letters on board, which put the enemy's ſuperiority beyond all doubt, at leaſt by ſea. It clearly appeared there were at that time in Louiſbourg 6000 regular troops, 3000 natives, and 1300 Indians, with 17 ſhips of the line, and three frigates moored in the harbour; that the place was well ſupplied with ammunition, proviſion, and every kind of military ſtores; and that the enemy wiſhed for nothing more than an attac, which it was probable would terminate to the diſgrace of the aſſailants, and ruin of the Britiſh affairs in America. The commanders at Hallifax were fully appriſed of the conſequences of an unſucceſsful attempt; it was, therefore, almoſt unanimouſly reſolved to poſtpone the expedition to ſome more convenient opportunity, eſpecially as the ſeaſon was now far advanced, which alone would be ſufficient to fruſtrate their endeavours, and render the enterprize abortive. This reſolution ſeems, indeed, to have been the moſt eligible in their circumſtances, whatever conſtructions might afterwards be given, with intention to prejudice the public againſt the commander in chief.

Lord Loudoun's departure from New-York, with all the forces he was able to collect, afforded the marquis de Montcalm the faireſt occaſion of improving the ſucceſſes of the former campaign. That general had, in the very commencement of the ſeaſon, made three different attacs on Fort William-Henry, in all of which he was repulſed by the vigour and reſolution of the garriſon. But his diſappointment here was balanced by an advantage gained by a party of regulars and Indians at Ticonderoga. Colonel John Parker with a detachment of near 400 men, went by water, in whale and bay-boats, to attac the enemy's advanced guard at that place. Landing at night on an iſland, he ſent before dawn three boats to the main-land, which the enemy way-laid and took. Having procured the neceſſary intelligence from the priſoners of the colonel's deſigns, they contrived their meaſures, placed 300 men in ambuſh behind the point where he propoſed landing, and ſent three batteaux to the place of rendezvous. Colonel Parker miſtaking theſe for his own boats, eagerly put to ſhore, was ſurrounded by the enemy, re-enforced with 400 men, and attacked with ſuch impetuoſity, that, of the whole detachment, only two officers and 70 private men eſcaped. Fluſhed with this advantage, animated by the abſence of the Britiſh commander in chief, then at Hallifax, and fired with a deſire to revenge the diſgrace he had lately ſuſtained before Fort Henry, Montcalm drew together all his forces, with intention to lay ſiege to that place. Fort William-Henry ſtands on the ſouthern coaſt of Lake George: it was built with a view to protect and cover the frontiers of the Engliſh colonies, as well as to command the lake: the fortifications were good, defended by a garriſon of near 3000 men, and covered by an army of 4000, under the conduct of general Webb, poſted at no great diſtance. When the marquis de Montcalm had aſſembled all the forces at Crown-Point, Ticonderoga, and the adjacent poſts, together with a conſiderable body of Canadians and Indians, amounting in the whole to near 10,000 men, he marched directly to the fort, made his approaches, and began to batter it with a numerous train of artillery. On the very day he inveſted the place, he ſent a letter to colonel Monro, the governor, telling him, he thought himſelf obliged, in humanity, to deſire he would ſurrender the fort, and not provoke the great number of ſavages in the French army by a vain reſiſtance. 'A detachment of your garriſon has lately, (ſays he) experienced their cruelty; I have it yet in my power to reſtrain them, and oblige them to obſerve a capitulation, as none of them hitherto are killed. Your perſiſting in the defence of your fort can only retard its fate a few days, and muſt of neceſſity expoſe an unfortunate garriſon, who can poſſibly receive no relief, conſidering the precautions taken to prevent it. I demand a deciſive anſwer, for which purpoſe I have ſent the ſieur Funtbrune one of my aides-du-camp. You may credit what he will inform you of, from Montcalm.' General Webb beheld his preparations with an indifference and ſecurity bordering on infatuation. It is credibly reported, that he had private intelligence of all the French general's deſigns and motions; yet, either deſpiſing his ſtrength, or diſcrediting the information, he neglected collecting the militia in time, which, in conjunction with his own forces, would probably have obliged Montcalm to relinquiſh the attempt, or, at leaſt, have rendered his ſucceſs very doubtful and hazardous. The enemy meeting with no diſturbance from the quarter they moſt dreaded, proſecuted the ſiege with vigour, and were warmly received by the garriſon, who fired with great ſpirit till they had burſt almoſt all their cannon, and expended their ammunition. Neither Montcalm's promiſes or threats could prevail upon them to ſurrender, while they were in a condition to defend themſelves, or could reaſonably expect aſſiſtance from general Webb. They even perſiſted to hold out after prudence dictated they ought to ſurrender. Colonel Monro was ſenſible of the importance of his charge, and imagined that general Webb, though ſlow in his motions, would ſurely make ſome vigorous efforts either to raiſe the ſiege, or force a ſupply of ammunition, proviſion, and other neceſſaries into the garriſon. At length neceſſity obliged him, after ſuſtaining a ſiege from the 3d to the 9th day Auguſt, to hang out a flag of truce, which was immediately anſwered by the French commander. Hoſtages were exchanged, and articles of capitulation ſigned by both parties. It was ſtipulated, that the garriſon of Fort William-Henry, and the troops in the retrenched camp, ſhould march out with their arms, the baggage of the officers and ſoldiers, and all the uſual neceſſaries of war; eſcorted by a detachment of French troops, and interpreters attached to the ſavages: that the gate of the fort ſhould be delivered to the troops of the moſt chriſtian king, immediately after ſigning the capitulation; and the retrenched camp, on the departure of the Britiſh forces: that the artillery, warlike ſtores, proviſion, and in general every thing, except the effects of the ſoldiers and officers, ſhould, upon honour, be delivered to the French troops; for which purpoſe it was agreed there ſhould be delivered, with the capitulation, an exact inventory of the ſtores, and other particulars ſpecified: that the garriſon of the fort, and the troops in the retrenchment and dependencies, ſhould not ſerve for the ſpace of 18 months, from the date of the capitulation, againſt his moſt chriſtian majeſty, or his allies: that with the capitulation there ſhould be delivered an exact ſtate of the troops, ſpecifying the names of the officers, engineers, artillery men, commiſſaries, and all employed: that the officers and ſoldiers, Canadians, women, and ſavages, made priſoners by land ſince the commencement of the war in North-America, ſhould be delivered in the ſpace of three months at Carrilon; in return for whom an equal number of the garriſon of Fort William-Henry ſhould be capacitated to ſerve, agreeably to the return given by the Engliſh officer, and the receipt of the French commanding officers, of the priſoners ſo delivered: that an officer ſhould remain as an hoſtage, till the ſafe return of the eſcort ſent with the troops of his Britannick majeſty: that the ſic and wounded, not in a condition to be tranſported to Fort Edward, ſhould remain under the protection of the marquis de Montcalm; who engaged to uſe them with tenderneſs and humanity, and to return them as ſoon as recovered: that proviſion for two days ſhould be iſſued out for the Britiſh troops: that in teſtimony of his eſteem and reſpect for colonel Monro and his garriſon, on account of their gallant defence, the marquis de Montcalm ſhould return one cannon, a ſix-pounder.—Whether the marquis de Montcalm was really aſſiduous to have theſe articles punctually executed we cannot pretend to determine; but certain it is, they were perfidiouſly broke, in almoſt every inſtance. The ſavages in the French intereſt either paid no regard to the capitulation, or were permitted, from views of policy, to act the moſt treacherous, inhuman, and inſiduous part. They fell upon the Britiſh troops as they marched out, deſpoiled them of their few remaining effects, dragged the Indians in the Engliſh ſervice out of their ranks, and aſſaſſinated them with circumſtances of unheard-of barbarity. Some Britiſh ſoldiers, with their wives and children, are ſaid to have been ſavagely murdered by thoſe brutal Indians, whoſe ferocity the French commander could not effectually reſtrain. The greater part of the Engliſh garriſon, however, arrived at Fort Edward, under protection of the French eſcort. The enemy demoliſhed the fort, carried off the effects, proviſion, artillery, and every thing elſe left by the garriſon, together with the veſſels preſerved in the lake, and departed, without purſuing their ſucceſs by any other attempt. Thus ended the third campaign in America, where, with an evident ſuperiority over the enemy, an army of twenty thouſand regular troops, a great number of provincial forces, and a prodigious naval power, not leſs than twenty ſhips of the line, we abandoned our allies, expoſed our people, ſuffered them to be cruelly maſſacred in ſight of our troops, and relinquiſhed a large and valuable tract of country, to the eternal reproach and diſgrace of the Britiſh name.

As to the naval tranſactions in this country, though leſs infamous, they were not leſs unfortunate. Immediately on lord Loudoun's departure from Hallifax, admiral Holbourn, now freed from the care of the tranſports, ſet ſail for Louiſbourg, with fifteen ſhips of the line one ſhip of fifty guns, three ſmall frigates, and a fire ſhip. What the object of this cruiſe might have been can only be conjectured. Some imagine curioſity was the admiral's ſole motive, and the deſire of informing himſelf with certainty of the enemy's ſtrength, while others perſuaded themſelves that he was in hopes of drawing M. de la Mothe to an engagement, notwithſtanding his ſuperiority in number of ſhips and weight of metal. Be this as it may, the Britiſh ſquadron appeared off Louiſbourg on the 20th day of Auguſt, and approaching within two miles of the batteries, ſaw the French admiral make the ſignal to unmoor. Mr Holbourn was greatly inferior in ſtrength, and it is obvious that his deſign was not to fight the enemy, as he immediately made the beſt of his way to Hallifax. About the middle of September, being reenforced with four ſhips of the line, he again proceeded to Louiſbourg, probably with intention, if poſſible, to draw the enemy to an engagement; but he found de la Mothe too prudent to hazard an unneceſſary battle, the loſs of which would have greatly expoſed all the French colonies. Here the Engliſh ſquadron continued cruiſing until the twenty-fifth, when they were overtaken by a terrible ſtorm from the ſouthward. When the hurrican began, the fleet was about forty leagues diſtant from Louiſbourg: but were driven in twelve hours within two miles of the rocs and breakers on that coaſt, when the wind providentially ſhifted. The ſhip Tilbury was wrecked upon the rocs, and half her crew drowned. Eleven ſhips were diſmaſted, others threw their guns overboard; and all returned in a very ſhattered condition to England, at a very unfavourable ſeaſon of the year. In this manner ended the expedition to Louiſbourg, more unfortunate to the nation than the preceding deſigns upon Rochefort; leſs diſgraceful to the commanders, but equally the occaſion of ridicule and triumph to our enemies. Indeed, the unhappy conſequences of the political diſputes at home, the inſtability of the adminiſtration, and the frequent revolutions in our councils, were ſtrongly manifeſted by that languor infuſed into all our military operations, and general unſteadineſs in our purſuits. Faction in the mother country produced diviſions and miſconduct in the colonies. No ambition to ſignalize themſelves appeared among the officers, from the uncertainty whether their ſervices were to be rewarded or condemned. Their attachment to particular perſons weakened the love they ought to have entertained for their country in general, and deſtroyed that ſpirit of enterpriſe, that firmneſs and reſolution which conſtitutes the commander, and without which the beſt capacity, joined to the moſt uncorruptible integrity, can effect nothing.

The French king not only exerted himſelf againſt the Engliſh in America, but even extended his operations to their ſettlements in Africa, which he ſent one of his naval commanders, with a ſmall ſquadron, to reduce. This gentleman, whoſe name was Kerſin, had ſcoured the coaſt of Guinea, and made prize of ſeveral Engliſh trading ſhips: but his chief aim was to reduce the caſtle at Cape-coaſt, of which had he gained poſſeſſion, the other ſubordinate forts would have ſubmitted without oppoſition. When mr. Bell, the governor of this caſtle, received intelligence that M. de Kerſin was a few leagues to windward, and certainly intended to attac Cape-coaſt, his whole garriſon did not exceed 30 white men, excluſive of a few Mulatto ſoldiers: his ſtoc of ammunition was reduced to half a barrel of gunpowder; and his fortifications were ſo craſy and inconſiderable, that, in the opinion of the beſt engineers, they could not have ſuſtained for 20 minutes the fire of one great ſhip, had it been properly directed and maintained. In theſe circumſtances, few people would have dreamed of making any preparation for defence; but mr. Bell entertained other ſentiments, and acquitted himſelf with equal courage and diſcretion. He forthwith procured a ſupply of gunpowder, and a re-enforcement of about 50 men, from certain trading veſſels that happened to be upon that part of the coaſt. He mounted ſome ſpare cannon upon an occaſional battery, and aſſembling a body of 1200 negroes well armed, under the command of their chief, on whoſe attachment he could depend, ordered them to take poſt at the place where he apprehended the enemy would attempt a landing. Theſe precautions were hardly taken when the French ſquadron, conſiſting of two ſhips of the line and a large frigate, appeared, and in a little time their attac began, but they met with ſuch a warm reception, that in leſs than two hours they deſiſted, leaving the caſtle very little damaged, and immediately made ſail for the Weſt-Indies, very much to the diſappointment and mortification of the Dutch officers belonging to the fort of Elmina, in the ſame neighbourhood, who made no ſcruple of expreſſing their wiſhes publicly in favour of the French commodore, and at a diſtance viewed the engagement with the moſt partial eagerneſs and impatience. M. de Kerſin was generally blamed for his want of conduct and reſolution in this attempt: but he is ſaid to have been deceived in his opinion of the real ſtate of Cape-coaſt caſtle by the vigorous and reſolute exertions of the governor, and was apprehenſive of loſing a maſt in the engagement; a loſs which he could not have repaired on the whole coaſt of Africa. Had the fort of Cape-coaſt been reduced on this occaſion, in all probability every petty republic of the negroes ſettled under the protection of the forts on the Gold Coaſt would have revolted from the Britiſh intereſt: for while the French ſquadron, in their progreſs along ſhore, hovered in the offing at Anamaboe, an Engliſh ſettlement a few leagues to leeward of Cape-coaſt, John Corrantee, the caboceiro, chief magiſtrate and general of the Blacs, on that part of the coaſt, whoſe adopted ſon had a few years before been careſſed, and even treated as a prince in England, taking it for granted that this enterprize of the French would be attended with ſucceſs, actually ſent ſome of his dependants, with a preſent of refreſhments for their commodore; the delivery of which, however, was prevented by mr. Brew, the Engliſh chief of the fort, who ſhattered in pieces the canoe before it could be launched, and threatened with his cannon to level the blac town with the duſt. The caboceiro, though thus anticipated in his deſign, reſolved to be among the firſt who ſhould compliment M. de Kertin on his victory at Cape-coaſt; and, with this view, prepared an embaſſy or deputation to go there by land; but underſtanding that the French had failed in their attempt, he ſhifted his deſign, without the leaſt heſitation, and diſpatched the ſame embaſſy to mr. Bell, whom he congratulated on his victory, aſſuring him he had kept his men ready armed to march at the firſt ſummons to his aſſiſtance.

In the Eaſt-Indies the ſcene was changed greatly to the honour and advantage of Great-Britain. There the commanders acted with that harmony, ſpirit, and unanimity becoming Britons, zealous for the credit of their king and the intereſt of their country. We left admiral Watſon and colonel Clive advancing to Calcutta, to revenge the cruel tragedy acted upon their countrymen the preceding year. On the 28th of December, the fleet proceeded up the river: next day, colonel Clive landed, and with the aſſiſtance of the ſquadron, in 24 hours made himſelf maſter of Buſbudgia, a place of great ſtrength, though very ill defended. On the 1ſt of January the admiral, with two ſhips, appeared before the town of Calcutta, and was received by a briſk fire from the batteries. This ſalute was returned ſo warmly, that the enemies guns were ſoon ſilenced, and in leſs than two hours the place and fort were abandoned. Colonel Clive, on the other ſide, had inveſted the town, and made his attac with that vigour and intrepedity peculiar to himſelf, which greatly contributed to the ſudden reduction of the ſettlement. As ſoon as the fort was ſurrendered, the brave and active captain Coote, with his majeſty's troops, took poſſeſſion, and found 91 pieces of cannon, four mortars, abundance of ammunition, ſtores, and proviſion, with every requiſite for ſuſtaining an obſtinate ſiege. Thus the Engliſh were re-eſtabliſhed in the two ſtrongeſt fortreſſes in the Ganges, with the inconſiderable loſs of nine ſeamen killed, and three ſoldiers. A few days after, Hughley, a city of great trade, ſituated higher up the river, was reduced with as little difficulty, but infinitely greater prejudice to the nabob, as here his ſtore-houſes of ſalt, and vaſt graneries for the ſupport of his army, were burnt and deſtroyed. Incenſed at the almoſt inſtantaneous loſs of all his conqueſts, and demolition of the city of Hughley, the viceroy of Bengal diſcouraged all advances to an accommodotion which was propoſed by the admiral and chiefs of the company, and aſſembled an army of 20,000 horſe and 15,000 foot, fully reſolved to expel the Engliſh out of his dominions, and take ample vengeance for the diſgrace he had lately ſuſtained. He was ſeen marching by the Engliſh camp in his way to Calcutta on the 2d of February, where he encamped about a mile from the town. Colonel Clive immediately made application to the admiral for a re-enforcement, and 600 men, under the command of captain Warwick, were accordingly drafted from the different ſhips, and ſent to aſſiſt his little army. Clive drew out his forces, advanced in three columns towards the enemy, and began the attac ſo vigorouſly, that the viceroy retreated, after a feeble reſiſtance, with the loſs of 1000 men killed, wounded and taken priſoners, 500 horſes, great number of draft bullocks, and four elephants. Though this advantage was leſs deciſive than could be wiſhed, yet it ſufficiently intimidated the nabob into conceſſions much to the honour and advantage of the company. Admiral Watſon gave him to underſtand in a letter, that this was no more than a ſpecimen of what the Britiſh arms, when provoked, could perform. The ſuba deſired the negotiation might be renewed, and in a few days the treaty was concluded. He promiſed not to diſturb the Engliſh in any of thoſe privilegs or poſſeſſions ſpecified in the firm and granted by the mogul: that all merchandize belonging to the company ſhould paſs and repaſs in every part of the province of Bengal, free of duty: that all the Engliſh factories ſeiſed the preceding year, or ſince, ſhould be reſtored, with the money, goods, and effects appertaining: that all damages ſuſtained by the Engliſh ſhould be repaired, and their loſſes repaid: that the Engliſh ſhould have liberty to fortify Calcutta in whatever manner they thought proper without interruption: that they ſhould have liberty of coining all the gold and bullion they imported, which ſhould paſs current in the province: that he would remain in ſtrict friendſhip and alliance with the Engliſh, uſe his utmoſt endeavours to heal up the late diviſions, and reſtore the former good underſtanding between them. All which ſeveral articles were ſolemnly ſigned and ſealed with the nabob's own hand.

Such were the terms obtained for the company by the ſpirited and gallant conduct of the two Engliſh commanders. They had however, too much diſcernment to rely on the promiſe of a barbarian, who had ſo perfidiouſly broke former engagements; but they prudently diſſembled their ſentiments, until they had thoroughly reinſtated the affairs of the company, and reduced the French power in this province. In order to adjuſt the points that required diſcuſſion, the ſelect committee for the company's affairs appointed mr. Watts, who had been releaſed from his former impriſonment, as their commiſſary at the court of the ſuba, to whom he was perſonally known, as well as to his miniſters, among whom he had acquired a conſiderable influence. Nothing leſs could have balanced the intereſt which the French, by their art of intriguing, had raiſed among the favourites of the viceroy. While mr. Watts was employed at Maxadavad, in counter-working thoſe intrigues, and keeping the ſuba ſteady to his engagements, the admiral and mr. Clive reſolved to avail themſelves of their armament in attacking the French ſettlements in Bengal. The chief object of their deſigns was the reduction of Chandernagore, ſituated higher up the river than Calcutta, of conſiderable ſtrength, and the chief importance of any poſſeſſed by that nation in the bay. Colonel Clive being re-enforced by 300 men from Bombay, began his march to Chandernagore, at the head of 700 Europeans and 1600 Indians, where, on his firſt arrival, he took poſſeſſion of all the out-poſts, except one redoubt mounted with eight pieces of cannon, which he left to be ſilenced by the admiral. On the 18th of March the admirals Watſon and Pococke arrived within two miles of the French ſettlement, with the Kent, Tiger, and Saliſbury men of war, and found their paſſage obſtructed by booms laid acroſs the river, and ſeveral veſſels ſunk in the channel. Theſe difficulties being removed, they advanced early on the 24th, and drew up in a line before the fort, which they battered with great fury for three hours; while colonel Clive was making his approaches on the land ſide, and playing vigorouſly from the batteries he had raiſed. Their united efforts ſoon obliged the enemy to ſubmiſſion. A flag of truce was waved over the walls, and the place ſurrendered by capitulation. The keys were delivered to captain Latham of the Tiger, and in the afternoon colonel Clive, with the king's troops, took poſſeſſion. Thus the reduction of a ſtrong fortreſs, garriſoned by 500 Europeans, and 1200 Indians, defended by 123 pieces of cannon, and three mortars, well provided with all kinds of ſtores and neceſſaries, and of very great importance to the enemy's commerce in India, was accompliſhed with a loſs not exceeding 40 men on the ſide of the conquerors. By the treaty of capitulation the director, counſellors, and inferior ſervants of the ſettlement were allowed to depart with their wearing apparel: the jeſuits were permitted to take away their church ornaments, and the natives to remain in full exertion of their liberties; but the garriſon were to continue priſoners of war. The goods and money found in the place were conſiderable; but the principal advantage aroſe from the ruin of the head ſettlement of the enemy on the Ganges, which could not but interfere with the Engliſh commerce in theſe parts.

Succeſs had hitherto attended all the operations of the Britiſh commanders, becauſe they were concerted with foreſight and unanimity; and executed with that vigour and ſpirit which deſervedly raiſed them high in the eſteem of their country. They reduced the nabob to reaſonable terms of accommodation before they alarmed the French; and now the power of the latter was deſtroyed they entered upon meaſures to oblige the treacherous viceroy to a ſtrict performance of the treaty he had ſo lately ſigned. However ſpacious his promiſes were, they found him extremely dilatory in the execution of ſeveral articles of the treaty, which, in effect, was the ſame as the Engliſh commerce as if none had been concluded. The company's goods were loaded with high duties, and ſeveral other infractions of the peace committed upon ſuch frivolous pretences as evidently demonſtrated that he ſought to come to an open rupture as ſoon as his projects were ripe for execution. In a word, he diſcovered all along a manifeſt partiality to the French, whoſe emiſſaries cajoled him with promiſes that he ſhould be joined by ſuch a body of their European troops, under M. de Buſſy, as would enable him to cruſh the power of the Engliſh, whom they had taught him to fear and to hate. As recommencing hoſtilities againſt ſo powerful a prince was in itſelf dangerous, and, if poſſible, to be avoided, the affair was laid before the council of Calcutta, and canvaſſed with all the circumſpection and caution that a meaſure required, on which depended the fate of the whole trade of Bengal. Mr Watts from time to time ſent them intelligence of every tranſaction in the ſuba's cabinet, and although that prince publicly declared he would cauſe him to be impeled as ſoon as the Engliſh troops ſhould be put in motion within the kingdom of Bengal, he bravely ſacrificed his own ſafety to the intereſt of the company, and exhorted them to proceed with vigour in their military operations. During theſe deliberations a moſt fortunate incident occurred, that ſoon determined the council to come to an open rupture. The leading perſons in the viceroy's court found themſelves oppreſſed by his haughtineſs and inſolence. The ſame ſpirit of diſcontent appeared among the principal officers of his army: they were well acquainted with his perfidy, ſaw his preparations for war, and were ſenſible that the peace of the country could never be reſtored, unleſs either the Engliſh were expelled or the nabob depoſed. In conſequence, a plan was concerted for diveſting him of all his power; and the conſpiracy was conducted by Jaffier Ali Khan, his prime miniſter and chief commander, a nobleman of great influence and authority in the province. The project was communicated by Ali Khan to mr. Watts, and ſo improved by the addreſs of that gentleman as in a manner to enſure ſucceſs. A treaty was actually concluded between this Meer Jaffier Ali Khan and the Engliſh company; and a plan concerted with this nobleman and other mal-contents for their defection from the viceroy. Theſe previous meaſures being taken, colonel Clive was ordered to take the field with his little army. Admiral Watſon undertook the defence of Chandernagore, and the garriſon was detached to re-enforce the colonel, together with 50 ſeamen to be employed as gunners, and in directing the artillery. Then mr. Watts, deceiving the ſuba's ſpies, by whom he was ſurrounded, withdrew himſelf from Muxadavad, and reached the Engliſh camp in ſafety. On the 19th of June a detachment was ſent to attac Cutwa fort and town, ſituated on that branch of the river forming the iſland of Caſſimbuzar. This place ſurrendered at the firſt ſummons; and here the colonel halted with the army for three days, expecting advices from Ali Khan. Diſappointed of the hoped-for intelligence he croſſed the river, and marched to Plaiſſey, where he encamped. On the 23d, at day-break, the ſuba advanced to attac him, at the head of 15,000 horſe, and near 30,000 infantry, with about 40 pieces of heavy cannon, conducted and managed by French gunners, on whoſe courage and dexterity he placed great dependance. They began to cannonade the Engliſh camp about ſix in the morning, but a ſevere ſhower falling at noon they withdrew their artillery. Colonel Clive ſeiſed this opportunity to take poſſeſſion of a rank and two other poſts of conſequence, which they in vain endeavoured to retake. Then he ſtormed an angle of their camp, covered with a double breaſt-work, together with an eminence which they occupied. At the beginning of this attac, ſome of their chiefs being ſlain, the men were ſo diſpirited that they ſoon gave way; but ſtill Meer Jaffier Ali Khan, who commanded their left wing, forbore declaring himſelf openly. After a ſhort conteſt the enemy were put to flight, the nabob's camp, baggage, and 50 pieces of cannon taken, and a moſt complete victory obtained. The colonel purſuing his advantage, marched to Maxadavad, the capital of the province, and was there joined by Ali Khan and the malcontents. It was before concerted that this nobleman ſhould be inveſted with the dignity of nabob; accordingly, the colonel proceeded ſolemnly to depoſe Surajah Dowlat, and with the ſame ceremony, to ſubſtitute Ali Khan in his room, who was publicly acknowledged by the people as ſuba or viceroy, of the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orixa. Soon after, the late viceroy was taken, and put to death by his ſucceſſor, who readily complied with all the conditions of his elevation. He conferred on his allies very liberal rewards, and granted the company ſuch extraordinary privileges as fully demonſtrated how juſtly he merited their aſſiſtance. By this reliance, and the reduction of Chandernagore, the French were entirely excluded the commerce of Bengal and its dependencies; the trade of the Engliſh company was reſtored, and increaſed beyond their ſanguine hopes: a new ally was acquired, whoſe intereſt obliged him to remain firm to his engagements; a vaſt ſum was paid to the company and the ſufferers at Calcutta, to indemnify them for their loſſes; the ſoldiers and ſeamen were gratified with 6000l. as a reward for the courage and intrepidity they exerted; and a variety of other advantages gained, which it would be unneceſſarily to enumerate. In a word, in the ſpace of 14 days a great revolution was effected, and the government of a vaſt country, ſuperior in wealth, fertility, extent, and number of inhabitants to moſt European kingdoms, transferred by a handful of troops, conducted by an officer untutored in the art of war, and a general rather by intuition than inſtruction and experience. But the public joy at theſe ſignal ſucceſſes was conſiderably diminiſhed by the death of admiral Watſon, and the loſs of Vizagapatum, an Engliſh ſettlement on the Coromandel coaſt. The admiral fell a victim to the unwholſomeneſs of the climate, on the 16th of Auguſt, univerſally eſteemed and regretted; and the factory and fort at Vizagapatam were ſurrendered to the French, a few days after colonel Clive had defeated the nabob.

We now turn our eyes to the continent of Europe, where we ſee the beginning of the year marked with a ſtriking inſtance of the dreadful effects of frantic enthuſiaſm. France had long enjoyed a monarch, eaſy, complying, good-natured, and averſe to all that wore the appearance of buſineſs or of war. Contented with the pleaſure of indolence, he ſaw no greatneſs beyond what he enjoyed, nor purſued any ambitious aim through the dictates of his own diſpoſition. Of all men on earth ſuch a prince had the greateſt reaſon to expect an exemption from plots againſt his perſon, and cabals among his ſubjects; yet was an attempt made upon his life by a man, who, though placed in the loweſt ſphere of fortune, had reſolution to face the greateſt dangers, and enthuſiaſm ſufficient to ſuſtain without ſhrinking, all the tortures which the cruelty of man could invent, or his crimes render neceſſary. The name of this fanatic was Robert Francis Damien, born in the ſuburb of St. Catherine, in the city of Arras. He had lived in the ſervice of ſeveral families, whence he was generally diſmiſſed on account of the impatience, the melancholy, and ſullenneſs of his diſpoſition. So humble was the ſtation of a perſon, who was reſolved to ſtep forth from obſcurity, and, by one deſperate effort, draw upon himſelf the attention of all Europe. On the 5th day of January, as the king was ſtepping into his coach, to return to Trianon, whence he had that day come to Verſailles, Damien, mingling among his attendance, ſtabbed him with a knife on the right ſide, between the fourth and fifth ribs. His majeſty, applying his hand immediately to his ſide, cried out, 'I am wounded! Seize him; but do not hurt him.' Happily, the wound was not dangerous; as the knife, taking an oblique direction, miſſed the vital parts. As for the aſſaſſin, he made no attempts to eſcape; but ſuffering himſelf quietly to be ſeized, was conveyed to the guard-room, where being interrogated if he committed the horrid action, he boldly anſwered in the affirmative. A proceſs againſt him was inſtantly commenced at Verſailles: many perſons, ſuppoſed acceſſaries to the deſign upon the king's life, were ſent to the Baſtile; the aſſaſſin himſelf was put to the torture, and the moſt excruciating torments were applied, with intention to extort a confeſſion of the reaſons that could induce him to ſo execrable an attempt upon his ſoverign. Inciſions were made into the muſcular parts of his legs, arms and thighs, into which boiling oil was poured. Every refinement on cruelty, that human invention could ſuggeſt, was practiſed without effect: nothing could overcome his obſtinacy; and his ſilence was conſtrued into a preſumption, that he muſt have had accomplices in the plot. To render his puniſhment more public and conſpicuous, he was removed to Paris, there to undergo a repetition of all his former tortures, with ſuch additional circumſtances as the moſt fertile and cruel diſpoſitions could deviſe for increaſing his miſery and torment. Being conducted to the Concergerie, an iron bed, which likewiſe ſerved for a chair, was prepared for him, and to this he was faſtened with chains. The torture was again applied, and a phyſician ordered to attend, to ſee what degree of pain he could ſupport. Nothing, however, material was extorted; for what he one moment confeſſed, he recanted the next. It is not within our province, and we conſider it as a felicity, to relate all the circumſtances of the cruel and tragical event. Sufficient it is, that after ſuffering the moſt exquiſite torments that human nature could invent, or man ſupport, his judges thought proper to terminate his miſery by a death ſhocking to imagination, and ſhameful to humanity. On the 28th day of March he was conducted, amidſt a vaſt concourſe of the populace, to the Greve, the common place of execution, ſtripped naked, and faſtened to the ſcaffold by iron gyves. One of his hands was then burnt in liquid flaming ſulpher; his thighs, legs and arms were torn with red hot ſpincers; boiling oil, melted lead, reſin, and ſulphur were poured into the wounds; tight ligatures tied round his limbs to prepare him for diſmemberment; young and vigorous horſes applied to the draft, and the unhappy criminal pulled with all their force to the utmoſt extenſion of his ſinews for the ſpace of an hour, during all which time he preſerved his ſenſes and conſtancy. At length the phyſician and ſurgeon attending declared it would be impoſſible to accompliſh the diſmemberment, unleſs the tendons were ſeparated; upon which orders were given to the executioner to cut the ſinews at the joints of the arms and legs. The horſes drew afreſh: a thigh and an arm were ſeparated, and after ſeveral pulls, the unfortunate wretch expired under the extremity of pain. His body and limbs were reduced to aſhes under the ſcaffold; his father, wife, daughter, and family baniſhed the kingdom for ever; the name of Damien effaced and obliterated, and the innocent involved in the puniſhment of the guilty. Thus ended the procedure againſt Damien and his family, in a manner not very favourable to the avowed clemency of Louis, or the acknowledged humanity of the French nation. It appeared from undoubted evidence, that the attempt on the king's life was the reſult of inſanity, and a diſturbed imagination. Several inſtances of a diſordered mind had before been obſerved in his conduct, and the deteſtation juſtly due to the enormity of his crime ought now to have been abſorbed in the conſideration of his misfortune, the greateſt that can befal human nature.

Another remarkable event in France, in the beginning of this year, was the change in the miniſtry of that nation, by the removal of M. de Machault, keeper of the ſeals, from the poſt of ſecretary of ſtate for the marine; and of M. d'Argenſon from that of ſecretary at war. Their diſmiſſion was ſudden and unexpected; nor was any particular reaſon aſſigned for this unexpected alteration. The French king, to ſhow the queen of Hungary how judiciouſly ſhe had acted in forming an alliance with the houſe of Bourbon, raiſed two great armies; the firſt of which, compoſed of 80,000 men, the flower of the French troops, with a large train of artillery, was commanded by M. d'Etrées, a general of great reputation; under whom ſerved M. de Contades, M. Chevert, and the count de St. Germain, all officers of high character. This formidable army paſſed the Rhine early in the ſpring, and marched by Weſtphalia, in order to invade the king of Pruſſia's dominions, in quality of allies to the empreſs-queen, and guardians of the liberties of the empire. But their real view was to invade Hanover, a ſcheme which they knew would make a powerful diverſion of the Britiſh force from the proſecution of the war in other parts of the world, where the ſtrength of France could not be fully exerted, and where their moſt valuable intereſts were at ſtake. They flattered themſelves, moreover, that the ſame blow by which they hoped to cruſh the king of Pruſſia might likewiſe force his Britannick majeſty into ſome conceſſions with regard to America. The other army of the French, commanded by the prince de Soubiſe, was deſigned to ſtrengthen the imperial army of execution, conſiſting of 25,000 men, beſides 6000 Bavarians, and 4000 Wirtembergers. But before theſe troops, under Soubiſe, paſſed the Rhine, they made themſelves maſters of ſeveral places belonging to the king of Pruſſia upon the borders of the Low-Countries[n]; whilſt a detachment from d'Etrées's army ſeiſed upon the town of Embden, and whatever belonged to the ſame monarch in Eaſt-Frieſland.

At the cloſe of the laſt campaign, the king of Pruſſia, having gained a pretty advantage over the imperialiſts under the command of Mareſchal Brown, and incorporated into his own troops a great part of the Saxon army taken priſoners at Pirna, as was obſerved before, retired into winter-quarters until the ſeaſon ſhould permit him to improve theſe advantages. His majeſty and Mareſchal Keith wintered in Saxony, having their cantonments between Pirna and the frontier along the Elbe; and Mareſchal Schwerin, returning into Sileſia, took up his quarters in the country of Glatz. In the mean time, the empreſs-queen, finding the force which ſhe had ſent out againſt the king of Pruſſia was not ſufficient to prevent his deſigns, made the neceſſary requiſitions to her allies for the auxiliaries they had engaged to furniſh. In conſequence of theſe requiſitions, the czarina, true to her engagements, diſpatched above 100,000 of her troops, who began their march in the month of November, and proceeded to the borders of Lithuania, with deſign particularly to invade Ducal Pruſſia, whilſt a ſtrong fleet was equipped in the Baltick, to aid the operations of his numerous army. The Auſtrian army aſſembled in Bohemia amounted to upwards of 80,000 men, commanded by prince Charles of Lorraine and Mareſchal Brown. The Swedes had not yet openly declared themſelves; but it was well known, that though their king was allied in blood and inclination to his Pruſſian majeſty, yet the jealouſy which the ſenate of Sweden entertained of their ſovereign, and the hope of recovering their ancient poſſeſſions in Pomerania, by means of the preſent troubles, together with their old attachment to France, newly cemented by intrigues and ſubſides, would certainly induce them to join in the general confederacy. The duke of Mecklenbourg took the ſame party, and agreed to join the Swediſh army, when it ſhould be aſſembled, with 6000 men. Beſides all theſe preparations againſt the king of Pruſſia, he was, in his quality of elector of Brandenbourg, put under the ban of the empire by the aulic council; declared deprived of all his rights, privileges, and prerogatives; his fiefs were eſcheated into the exchequer of the empire; and all the circles accordingly ordered to furniſh their reſpective contigences for putting this ſentence in execution.

In this dangerous ſituation, thus menaced on all ſides, and ſeemingly on the very brink of inevitable deſtruction, the Pruſſian monarch owed his preſervation to his own courage and activity. The Ruſſians, knowing that the country they were to paſs through in their way to Lithuania would not be able to ſubſiſt their prodigious numbers, had taken care to furniſh themſelves with proviſions for their march, depending upon the reſources they expected to find in Lithuania after their arrival in that country. Theſe proviſions were exhauſted by the time they reached the borders of that province, where they found themſelves ſuddenly and unexpectedly deſtitute of ſubſiſtence, either to return back or to proceed forward. The king of Pruſſia had, with great prudence and foreſight, ſecured plenty to himſelf, and diſtreſs and famine to his enemies, by buying up all the corn and forage of the country which theſe laſt were entering. Notwithſtanding theſe precautions, his Pruſſian majeſty, to guard as much as could be againſt every poſſible event, ſent a great number of gunners and matroſſes from Pomerania to Memel, with three regiments of troops, to re-enforce the garriſon of that place. He viſited all the poſts which his troops poſſeſſed in Sileſia, and gave the neceſſary orders for their ſecurity. He repaired to Neiſs, where he ſettled with Mareſchal Schwerin the general plan of the operations of the approaching campaign. There it was agreed that the Mareſchal's army in Sileſia, which conſiſted of 50,000 men, ſhould have in conſtant view the motions of the royal army, by which its own were to be regulated, that they might both act in concert, as circumſtances ſhould require. At the ſame time, other armies were aſſembled by the king of Pruſſia in Luſatia and Voigtland; 20,000 men were collected at Zwickaw, on the frontiers of Bohemia, towards Egra, under the command of prince Maurice of Anhalt-Deſſau; and 60,000 choſen troops began their march towards Great-Zeidlitz, where their head-quarters were ſettled. In the mean while, the Auſtrian troops began to form on the frontiers of Saxony, where ſome of their detachments appeared, to watch the motions of the Pruſſians, who ſtill continued to purſue their operations with great activity and reſolution. All poſſible care was taken by the Pruſſians at Dreſden to ſecure a retreat, in caſe of a defeat. As only one regiment of Pruſſians could be ſpared to remain there in garriſon, the burghers were diſarmed, their arms depoſited in the arſenal, and a detachment was poſted at Konigſtein, to oblige that fortreſs to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality. All correſpondence with the enemy was ſtrictly prohibited; and it having been diſcovered that the counteſs of Ogilvie, one of the queen's maids of honour, had diſobeyed his majeſty's commands, ſhe was arreſted; but, on the queen's interceſſion, afterwards releaſed. The counteſs of Bruhl, lady of the Saxon prime-miniſter, was alſo arreſted by his Pruſſian majeſty's order; and, on making light of her confinement, and reſolving to ſee company, ſhe was ordered to quit the court, and retire from Saxony. M. Henwin, the French miniſter, was told that his preſence was unneceſſary at Dreſden; and on his replying, that his maſter had commanded him to ſtay, he was again deſired to depart; on which he thought proper to obey. The count de Wackerbath, miniſter of the cabinet, and grand-maſter of the houſehold to the prince royal of Poland, was arreſted, and conducted to Cuſtrin, by the expreſs command of his majeſty. The king of Pruſſia, having thrown two bridges over the Elbe early in the ſpring, ordered the ſeveral diſtricts of the electorate of Saxony to ſupply him with a great number of waggons, each drawn by four horſes. The circle of Miſnia and Leipſick were enjoined to furniſh 400 each, and the other circles in proportion.

While the king of Pruſſia was taking theſe meaſures in Saxony, two ſkirmiſhes happened on the frontiers of Bohemia, between his troops and the Auſtrians. On the 20th of February, a body of 6000 Auſtrians ſurrounded the little town of Hirſchfeld in Upper Luſatia, garriſoned by a battalion of Pruſſian foot. The firſt attac was made at four in the morning, on two redoubts without the gates, each of which was defended by two field pieces: and though the Auſtrians were ſeveral times repulſed, they at laſt made themſelves maſters of one of the redoubts, and carried off the two pieces of cannon. In their retreat they were purſued by the Pruſſians, who fell upon their rear, killed ſome, and took many priſoners: this affair coſt the Auſtrians at leaſt 500 men. About a fortnight after, the prince of Bevern marched out of Zittau, with a body of near 9000 men, in order to deſtroy the remaining ſtrong holds poſſeſſed by the Auſtrians on the frontiers. In this expedition he took the Auſtrian magazine at Friedland in Bohemia, conſiſting of 9000 ſacs of meal, and great ſtore of ammunition; and, after making himſelf maſter of Reichenberg, he returned to Zittau. The van of his troops, conſiſting of 150 huſſars of the regiment of Putkammar, met with a body of 600 Croats, ſuſtained by 200 Auſtrian dragoons of Bathiana, at their entering Bohemia; and immediately fell upon them ſword in hand, killed about 50, took 30 horſes, and made 10 dragoons priſoners. The Pruſſians, it is ſaid, did not loſe a ſingle man on this occaſion; and two ſoldiers only were ſlightly wounded, the Auſtrians having made but a ſlight reſiſtance.

Whatever the conduct of the court of Vienna might have been to the allies of Great-Britain, ſtill, however, proper regard was ſhown to this ſubjects of his crown: for an edict was publiſhed at Florence on the 13th of February, wherein his imperial majeſty, as grand-duke of Tuſcany, declared his intention of obſerving the moſt ſcrupulous neutrality in the then ſituation of affairs. All the ports in that duchy were accordingly enjoined to pay a ſtrict regard to this declaration, in all caſes relating to the French or Engliſh ſhips in the Mediterranean. The good effects of this injunction ſoon appeared; for two prizes taken by the Engliſh having put into Port Ferraro, the captains of two French privateers addreſſed themſelves to the governor, alledging, that they were captures of a pirate, and requeſting that they might be obliged to put to ſea: but the governor prudently replied, that as they came in under Engliſh colours he would protect them; and forbad the privateers, at their peril, to commit any violence. They, however, little regarding the governor's orders, prepared for ſailing, and ſent their boats to cut out one of the prizes. The captain firing at their boats, killed one of their men, which alarming the centinels, notice was ſent to the governor; and he, in conſequence, ordered the two privateers immediately to depart.—The conduct of the Dutch was rather cautious than ſpirited. Whilſt his Pruſſian majeſty was employed on the ſide of Bohemia and Saxony, the French auxilliaries began their march to harraſs his defenceleſs territories in the neighbourhood of the Low-Countries. A free paſſage was demanded of the ſtates-general through Namur and Maeſtricht, for the proviſions, ammunition, and artillery belonging to this new army; and though the Engliſh embaſſador remonſtrated againſt their compliance, and repreſented it as a breach of the neutrality their high-mightineſſes declared they would obſerve, yet, after ſome heſitation, the demand was granted; and their inability to 'prevent the paſſage of the French troops, ſhould it be attempted by force, pleaded in excuſe of their conduct.

Scarce had the French army, commanded by the prince de Soubiſe, ſet foot in the territories of Juliers and Cologn, when they found themſelves in poſſeſſion of the duchy of Cleves and the county of Mark, where all things were left open to them, the Pruſſians, who evacuated their poſts, taking their rout along the river Lippe, in order to join ſome regiments from Magdebourg, who were ſent to facilitate their retreat. The diſtreſſed inhabitants, thus expoſed to the calamities of war from an unprovoked enemy, were inſtantly ordered to furniſh contributions, forage, and proviſions, for the uſe of their invaders; and, what was ſtill more terrifying to them, the partizan Fiſcher, whoſe cruelties, the laſt war, they ſtill remembered with horror, was again let looſe upon them by the inhumanity of the empreſs-queen. Weſel was immediately occupied by the French: Emmerick and Maſeyk ſoon ſhared the ſame fate: and the city of Gueldres was beſieged, the Pruſſians ſeeming reſolved to defend this laſt place; to which end they opened the ſluices, and laid the country under water. Thoſe who retreated, filing off to the north-weſt of Paderborn, entered the county of Ritberg, the property of count Kaunitz Ritberg, great chancellor to the empreſs-queen. After taking his caſtle, in which they found 30 pieces of cannon, they raiſed contributions in the diſtrict, to the amount of 40,000 crowns. As the Pruſſians retired, the French took poſſeſſion of the country they quitted in the name of the empreſs-queen, whoſe commiſſary attended them for that purpoſe. The general rendezvous of theſe troops, under prince Soubiſe, was appointed at Neuſs, in the electorate of Cologn, where a large body of French was aſſembled by the 1ſt of April. The Auſtrians, in their turn, were not idle. Marſhal Brown viſited the fortifications of Brinn and Koninſgratz; reviewed the army of the late prince Picolomini, now under the command of general Serbelloni; and put his own army in march for Koſtlitz on the Elbe, where he propoſed to eſtabliſh his head-quarters.

During the receſs of the armies, while the rigours of winter forced them to ſuſpend their hoſtile operations, and the greateſt preparations were making to open the campaign with all poſſible vigour, count Beſtucheff, great chancellor of Ruſſia, wrote a circular letter to the primate, ſenators, and miniſters of the republic of Poland, ſetting forth, 'that the empreſs of Ruſſia was extremely affected with the king of Poland's diſtreſs, which ſhe thought could not but excite the compaſſion of all other powers, but more eſpecially of his allies: that the fatal conſequences which might reſult from the raſh ſtep taken by the king of Pruſſia, not only with reſpect to the tranquillity of Europe in general, but of each power in particular, and more eſpecially of the neighbouring countries, were ſo evident, that the intereſt and ſafety of the ſeveral princes rendered it abſolutely neceſſary they ſhould make it a common cauſe: not only to obtain proper ſatisfaction for thoſe courts whoſe dominions had been ſo unjuſtly attacked, but likewiſe to preſcribe ſuch bounds to the king of Pruſſia as might ſecure them from any future apprehenſions from ſo enterpriſing and reſtleſs a neighbour: that with this view, the empreſs was determined to aſſiſt the king of Poland with a conſiderable body of troops, which were actually upon their march °, under the command of general Apraxin; and that, as there would be an abſolute neceſſity for their marching through part of the territories of Poland, her imperial majeſty hoped the republic would not fail to facilitate their march as much as poſſible.' She further recommended to the republic, to take ſome ſalutary meaſures for fruſtrating the deſigns of the king of Pruſſia, and reſtoring harmony among themſelves, as the moſt conducive meaſure to theſe good purpoſes. In this, however, the Poles were ſo far from following her advice, that, though ſure of being ſacrificed in this conteſt, which ſide ſoever prevailed, they divided into parties with no leſs zeal than if they had as much to hope from the prevalence of one ſide, as to fear from that of the other. Some of the Palatines were for denying a paſſage to the Ruſſians, and others were for affording them the utmoſt aſſiſtance in their power. With this cauſe of contention others of a more private nature fatally concurred, by means of a miſunderſtanding between the prince Czartoriſki and count Mniſnec. Almoſt every inhabitant of Warſaw was involved in the quarrel; and the violence of theſe factions was ſo great, that ſcarce a night paſſed without bloodſhed, many dead bodies, chiefly Saxons, being found in the ſtreets every morning.

In the mean time, Great-Britain, unſettled in her miniſtry and councils at home, unſucceſsful in her attempts abroad, judging peace, if it could be obtained on juſt and honourable terms, more eligible than a continental war, propoſed ſeveral expedients to the empreſs-queen for reſtoring the tranquillity of Germany; but her anſwer was, 'that, whenever ſhe perceived that the expedients propoſed would indemnify her for the extraordinary expences ſhe had incurred in her own defence, repair the heavy loſſes ſuſtained by her ally the king of Poland, and afford a proper ſecurity for their future ſafety, ſhe would be ready to give the ſame proofs ſhe had always given of her deſire to reſtore peace; but it could not be expected ſhe ſhould liſten to expedients of which the king of Pruſſia was to reap the whole advantage, after having begun the war, and waſted the dominions of a prince, who relied for his ſecurity upon the faith of treaties, and the appearance of a harmony between them.' Upon the receipt of this anſwer, the court of London made ſeveral propoſals to the Czarina, to interpoſe as mediatrix between the courts of Vienna and Berlin, but they were rejected with marks of diſpleaſure and reſentment. When ſir Charles Hanbury Williams, the Britiſh embaſſador, continued to urge his ſollicitations very ſtrongly, and even with ſome hints of menaces, an anſwer was delivered to him by order of the empreſs, purporting, 'that her imperial majeſty was aſtoniſhed at his demand, after he had already been made acquainted with the meaſures ſhe had taken to effect a reconciliation between the courts of Vienna and Berlin. He might eaſily conceive, as matters were then ſituated, that the earneſtneſs with which he now urged the ſame propoſition muſt neceſſarily ſurpriſe her imperial majeſty, as it ſhowed but little regard to her former declaration. The empreſs, therefore, commanded his excellency to be told, that as her intentions contained in her firſt anſwer remained abſolutely invariable, no ulterior propoſitions for a mediation would be liſtened to; and that as for the menaces made uſe of by his excellency, and particularly that the king of Pruſſia himſelf would ſoon attac the Ruſſian army, ſuch threats ſerved only to weaken the embaſſador's propoſals; to confirm ſtill more, were it poſſible, the empreſs in her reſolutions; to juſtify them to the whole world, and to render the king of Pruſſia more blameable.'

The ſeaſon now drawing on in which the troops of the contending powers would be able to take the field, and the alarming progreſs of the Ruſſians being happily ſtopped, his Pruſſian majeſty, whoſe maxim it has always been to keep the ſeat of war as far as poſſible from his own dominions, reſolved to carry it into Bohemia, and there to attac the Auſtrians on all ſides. To this end he ordered his armies in Saxony, Miſnia, Luſatia, and Sileſia to enter Bohemia in four different and oppoſite places, nearly at the ſame time. The firſt of theſe he commanded in perſon, aſſiſted by mareſchal Keith; the ſecond was led by prince Maurice of Anhalt-Deſſau, the third by prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick-Bevern, and the fourth by mareſchal Schwerin. In conſequence of this plan, mareſchal Schwerin's army entered Bohemia on the 18th of April, in five columns, at as many different places. The deſign was ſo well concerted, that the Auſtrians had not the leaſt ſuſpicion of their approach till they were paſt the frontiers, and then they filled the dangerous defile of Gulder-Oelſe with Pandours, to diſpute that paſſage; but they were no ſooner diſcovered than two battalions of Pruſſian grenadiers attacked them with their bayonets fixed, and routed them. The prince of Anhault paſſed the frontiers from Miſnia, and penetrated into Bohemia on the 21ſt of April without any reſiſtance. The prince of Bevern, on the 20th of the ſame month, having marched at the head of a body of the army, which was in Luſatia, from the quarters of cantonment near Zittau, poſſeſſed himſelf immediately of the firſt poſt on the frontier of Bohemia, at Krottau and Graſenſtein, without the loſs of a ſingle man: drove away the enemy the ſame day from Kratzen, and proceeded to Machendorf, near Reichenberg. The ſame morning Putkammer's huſſars, who formed part of a corps, commanded by a colonel and major, routed ſome hundreds of the enemy's cuiraſſiers, poſted before Cohlin, under the conduct of prince Lichtenſtein, took three officers and upwards of 60 horſe priſoners, and ſo diſperſed the reſt, that they were ſcarcely able to rally near Kratzen. Night coming on obliged the troops to remain in the open air till next morning, when, at break of day, the Pruſſians marched in two columns by Habendorf, towards the enemy's army, amounting to 28,000 men, commanded by count Konigſeg, and poſted near Reichenberg. As ſoon as the troops were formed they advanced towards the enemy's cavalry, drawn up in three lines of about 30 ſquadrons. The two wings were ſuſtained by the infantry, which was poſted among felled trees and entrenchments. The Pruſſians immediately cannonaded the enemy's cavalry, who received it with reſolution, having on their right hand a village, and on their left a wood, where they had entrenched themſelves. But the prince of Bevern having cauſed 15 ſquadrons of dragoons of the ſecond line to advance, and the wood on his right to be attacked at the ſame time by the battalions of grenadiers of Kahlden and of Moellendorf, and by the regiment of the prince of Pruſſia, his dragoons, who, by clearing the ground, and poſſeſſing the entrenchment, had their flanks covered, entirely routed the enemy's cavalry. In the mean time colonel Putkammer and major Schenfeld, with their huſſars, though flanked by the enemy's artillery, gave the Auſtrian horſe-grenadiers a very warm reception, whilſt general Leſtewitz, with the left wing of the Pruſſians, attacked the redoubts that covered Reichenberg. Though there were many defiles and riſing grounds to paſs, all occupied by the Auſtrians, yet the regiment of Darmſtadt forced the redoubt, and put to flight and purſued the enemy, after ſome diſcharge of their artillery and ſmall arms, from one eminence to another, for the diſtance of a mile, when they left off the purſuit. The action began at half an hour after ſix, and continued till eleven. About 1000 of the Auſtrians were killed and wounded, among the former were general Porporati and count Hohenfelds, and among the latter prince Lichtenſtein and count Mansfeld. Twenty of their officers, and 400 ſoldiers were taken priſoners, and they alſo loſt three ſtandards. On the ſide of the Pruſſians ſeven ſubalterns and about 100 men were killed, and 16 officers and 150 men wounded. After this battle mareſchal Schwerin joined the prince of Bevern, made himſelf maſter of the greateſt part of the circle of Buntzlau, and took a conſiderable magazine from the Auſtrians, whom he diſlodged. The prince of Anhault-Deſſau, with his corps, drew near the king of Pruſſia's army, then the latter advanced as far as Budin, from whence the Auſtrians, who had an advantageous camp there, retired to Weſtwarn, half way between Budin and Prague; and his Pruſſian majeſty having paſſed the Egra, his army, and that of mareſchal Schwerin, were ſo ſituated as to be able to act jointly.

Theſe advantages were but a prelude to a much more deciſive victory, which the king himſelf gained a few days after. Preparing to enter Bohemia, at a diſtance from any of the corps commanded by his generals, he made a movement as if he intended to march towards Egra. The enemy, deceived by this feint, and imagining he was going to execute ſome deſign, diſtinct from the object of his other armies, detached a body of 20,000 men to obſerve his motions; then he made a ſudden and maſterly movement to the left, by which he cut off all communication between that detachment and the main army of the Auſtrians, which, having been re-enforced by the army of Moravia, by the remains of the corps lately defeated by the duke of Bevern, and by ſeveral regiments of the garriſon of Prague, amounted to near 100,000 men. They were ſtrongly entrenched on the banks of the Moldaw, to the north of Prague, in a camp ſo fortified by every advantage of nature, and every contrivance of art, as to be deemed almoſt impregnable. The left wing of the Auſtrians, thus ſituated, was guarded by the mountains of Ziſcka, and the right extended as far as Herboholi: prince Charles of Lorraine, and mareſchal Brown, who commanded them, ſeemed determined to maintain this advantageous poſt; but the king of Pruſſia overlooked all difficulties. Having thrown ſeveral bridges over the Moldaw on the 5th of May, he paſſed that river in the morning of the 6th, with 30,000 men, leaving the reſt of the army under the command of the prince of Anhault-Deſſau; and being immediately joined by the troops under mareſchal Schwerin and the prince of Bevern, reſolved to attac the enemy on the ſame day. In conſequence of this reſolution, his army filed off on the left by Potſchernitz, and at the ſame time count Brown wheeled to the right, to avoid being flanked. The Pruſſians continued their march to Bichwitz, traverſing ſeveral defiles and moraſſes, which for a little time ſeparated the infantry from the reſt of the army. The foot began the attac too precipitately, and were at firſt repulſed, but they ſoon recovered themſelves. While the king of Pruſſia took the enemy in flank, mareſchal Schwerin advanced to a marſhy ground, which ſuddenly ſtopping his army, threatened to diſconcert the whole plan of operation. In this emergency, he immediately diſmounted, and taking the ſtandard of the regiment in his hand, boldly entered the moraſs, crying out, 'let all brave Pruſſians follow me.' Inſpired by the example of this great commander, now 82 years of age, all the troops preſſed forward, and though he was unfortunately killed by the firſt fire, their ardour abated not till they had totally defeated the enemy. Thus fell mareſchal Schwerin, loaded with years and glory, an officer whoſe ſuperior talents in the military art had been diſplayed in a long courſe of faithful ſervice. In the mean time, the Pruſſian infantry, which had been ſeparated in the march, forming themſelves afreſh, renewed the attac on the enemy's right, and entirely broke it, while their cavalry, after three charges, obliged that of the Auſtrians to retire in great confuſion, the centre being at the ſame time totally routed. The left wing of the Pruſſians then marched immediately towards Michely, and being there joined by the horſe, renewed their attac, while the enemy were retreating haſtily towards Saſzawar. Mean while the troops on the right of the Pruſſian army attacked the remains of the left wing of the Auſtrians, and made themſelves maſters of three batteries. But the behaviour of the infantry in the laſt attac was ſo ſucceſsful, as to leave little room for this part of the cavalry to act. Prince Henry of Pruſſia, and the prince of Bevern, ſignaliſed themſelves on this occaſion in ſtorming two batteries; prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick took the left wing of the Auſtrians in flank, while the king with his left, and a body of cavalry, ſecured the paſſage of the Moldaw. In ſhort, after a very long and obſtinate engagement, and many ſignal examples of valour on both ſides, the Auſtrians were forced to abandon the field of battle, leaving behind 60 pieces of cannon, all their tents, baggage, military cheſt, and, in a word, their whole camp. The weight of the battle fell upon the right wing of the Auſtrians, the remains of which, to the amount of 10 or 12,000 men, fled towards Beneſchau, where they afterwards aſſembled under M. Pretlach, general of horſe. The infantry retired towards Prague, and threw themſelves into that city, with their commanders, prince Charles of Lorraine, and mareſchal Brown, but they were much harraſſed in their retreat by a detachment of the Pruſſians under mareſchal Keith. The Pruſſians took, on this occaſion, 10 ſtandards, and upwards of 4000 priſoners, 30 of whom were officers of rank. Their loſs amounted to about 2500 killed, and about 3000 wounded. Among the former were general d'Amſtel, the prince of Holſtein-Beck, the colonels Goltze and Manſtein, and lieutenant-colonel Roke. Among the latter, the generals Wenterfield, De la Mothe, Feuque, Hautcharmoy, Blankenſee, and Plettenberg. The number of the killed and wounded on the ſide of the Auſtrians was much greater. Among theſe laſt was mareſchal Brown, who received a wound, which, from the chagrin he ſuffered, rather than from its own nature, proved mortal. The day after the battle, colonel Meyer was detached with a battalion of Pruſſian Pandours, and 400 huſſars, to deſtroy a very conſiderable and valuable magazine of the Auſtrians at Pilſen, and this ſervice he performed. He alſo completed the deſtruction of ſeveral others of leſs importance, by the loſs of which, however, all poſſibility of ſubſiſtence was cut off from any ſuccours the Auſtrians might have expected from the empire.

The Pruſſians, following their blow, immediately inveſted Prague on both ſides of the river, the king commanding on one ſide, and mareſchal Keith on the other. In four days the whole city was ſurrounded with lines and entrenchments, by which all communication from without was entirely cut off: prince Charles of Lorraine and mareſchal Brown, the two princes of Saxony, the prince of Modena, the duke d'Aremberg, Count Lacy, and ſeveral other perſons of great diſtinction, were ſhut within the walls, together with above 20,000 of the Auſtrian army, who had taken refuge in Prague after their defeat. Every thing continued quiet on both ſides, ſcarce a cannon ſhot being fired by either for ſome time after this blockade was formed; and in the mean while the Pruſſians made themſelves maſters of Cziſcaberg, an eminence which commands the town, where the Auſtrians had a ſtrong redoubt, continuing likewiſe to ſtrengthen their works. Already they had made a ſally, and taken ſome other ineffectual ſteps to recover this poſt, but a more deciſive ſtroke was neceſſary. Accordingly, a deſign was formed of attacking the Pruſſian army in the night with a body of 12,000 men, to be ſuſtained by all the grenadiers, volunteers, Pandours, and Hungarian infantry. In caſe an impreſſion could be made on the king's lines, it was intended to open a way, ſword in hand, through the camp of the beſiegers, and to eaſe Prague of the multitude of forces locked up uſeleſs within the walls, ſerved only to conſume the proviſions of the garriſon, and haſten the ſurrender of the place. Happily a deſerter gave the prince of Pruſſia intelligence of the enemy's deſign about 11 o'clock at night. Proper meaſures were immediately taken for their reception, and in leſs than a quarter of an hour the whole army was under arms. The deſign was conducted with ſo much ſilence, that though the Pruſſians were warned of it they could diſcover nothing before the enemy had charged their advanced poſts. The attac was begun on the ſide of the little town, againſt mareſchal Keith's camp, and the left wing of the Pruſſian army encamped on the Moldaw. From hence it is probable the Auſtrians propoſed not only to deſtroy the batteries that were raiſing, but to attac the bridges of communication which the Pruſſians threw over the Moldaw, at about a quarter of a German mile above and below Prague, at Branig and Podbaba. The greateſt alarm began about two o'clock, when the enemy hoped to have come ſilently and unexpectedly upon the miners, but they had left work about a quarter of an hour before. At the report of the firſt piece which they fired, the piquet of the third battalion of Pruſſian guards, to the number of 100 men, who marched out of the camp to ſuſtain the body which covered the works, was thrown into ſome confuſion, from the darkneſs of the night, which prevented their diſtinguiſhing the Auſtrian troops from their own. Leutenant Jorke, detached with two platoons to reconniotre the enemy, attempted to diſcover their diſpoſition by kindling a fire, captain Rodig, by the light of this fire, perceived the enemy's ſituation, immediately formed the deſign of falling upon them in the flank, and gave orders to his men to fire in platoons, which they performed, mutually repeating the ſignal given by their commander. The enemy fled with the greater precipitation, as they were ignorant of the weakneſs of the piquet, and as the ſhooting of the Pruſſian ſoldiers made them miſtake it for a numerous body. Many of them deſerted, many took ſhelter in Prague, and many more were driven into the river and drowned. At the ſame time this attac began, a regiment of horſe-grenadiers fell upon a redoubt which the Pruſſians had thrown up, ſupported by the Hungarian infantry: they returned three times to the aſſault, and were as often beat bac by the Pruſſians, whom they found it impoſſible to diſlodge; though prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick's battalion, which guarded this poſt, ſuffered extremely. During this attac the enemy kept an inceſſant fire with their muſquetry upon the whole front of the Pruſſians, from the convent of St. Margaret to the river. At three in the morning the Pruſſians quitted their camp to engage the enemy. The battalion of Pannewitz attacked a building called the Red-houſe, ſituated at the bottom of a declivity before Wellaſtowitz. The Pandours, who had taken poſſeſſion of this houſh, fired upon them inceſſently from all the doors and windows, until they were diſlodged; and the Pruſſian battalions were obliged to ſuſtain the fire both of cannon and muſquetry for above two hours, when the enemy retired to the city, except the Pandours, who again took poſſeſſion of the Red-houſe, which the Pruſſians were forced to abandon, becauſe the artillery of Prague kept a continual fire upon it from the moment it was known to be in their hands. The Auſtrians left behind them many dead and wounded, beſides deſerters, and the Pruſſians, notwithſtanding the loſs of ſeveral officers and private men, made ſome priſoners. Prince Ferdinand, the king of Pruſſia's youngeſt brother had a horſe killed under him, and was ſlightly wounded in the face.

The Pruſſian works being completed, and heavy artillery arrived, four batteries, erected on the banks of the Moldaw, began to play with great fury. Near 300 bombs, beſides an infinity of ignited balls, were thrown into the city in the ſpace of 24 hours. The ſcene was lamentable, houſes, men and horſes wrapped in flames, and reduced to aſhes. The confuſion within, together with the want of proper artillery and ammunition, obliged the Auſtrians to ceaſe firing, and furniſhed his Pruſſian majeſty with all the opportunity he could wiſh of pouring deſtruction upon this unfortunate city. The horrors of war ſeemed to have extinguiſhed the principles of humanity. No regard was paid to the diſtreſs of the inhabitants, the Auſtrians obſtinately maintained poſſeſſion, and the Pruſſians practiſed every ſtratagem, every barbarous refinement that conſtitutes the military art, to oblige them to capitulate. After the conſternation had laſted three days, and conſumed a prodigious number of buildings, the principal inhabitants, burghers, and clergy, perceiving their city on the point of being reduced to a heap of rubbiſh, beſought the commander, in a body, to hearken to terms, but he was deaf to the voice of pity, and, inſtead of being moved with their ſupplications, drove out 12,000 perſons, the leaſt uſeful in defending the city. Theſe, by order of his Pruſſian majeſty, were again forced bac, which ſoon produced ſo great a ſcarcity of proviſion within the walls, that the Auſtrians were reduced to the neceſſity of eating horſe-fleſh, 40 horſes being daily diſtributed to the troops, and the ſame food ſold for 4d. a pound to the inhabitants. However, as there ſtill remained great abundance of corn, they were far from being brought to the laſt extremety. Two vigorous and well-conducted ſallies were made, but they proved unſucceſsful. The only advantage reſulting from them was the perpetual alarm in which they kept the Pruſſian camp, and the vigilance required to guard againſt the attacs of a numerous, reſolute, and deſperate garriſon.

Whatever difficulties might have attended the conqueſt of Prague, certain it is that the affairs of the empreſs-queen were in the moſt critical and deſperate ſituation. Her grand army diſperſed in parties, and flying for ſubſiſtence in ſmall corps; their princes and commanders cooped up in Prague; that capital in imminent danger of being taken, the flouriſhing kingdom of Bohemia ready to fall into the hands of the conqueror, a conſiderable army on the point of ſurrendering priſoners of war; all the queen's hereditary dominions open and expoſed, the whole fertile tract of country from Egra to the Moldaw in actual poſſeſſion of the Pruſſians, the diſtance of the archduchy of Auſtria not very conſiderable, and ſecured only by the Danube; Vienna under the utmoſt apprehenſions of a ſiege, and the imperial family ready to take refuge in Hungary: the Pruſſian forces deemed invincible, and the ſanguine friends of that monarch already ſharing with him, in imagination, the ſpoils of the ancient and illuſtrious houſe of Auſtria. Such was the aſpect of affairs, and ſuch the difficulties to be combated, when Leopold, count Daun, was appointed to the command of the Auſtrian forces, to ſtem the torrent of diſgrace, and turn the fortune of the war. This general, tutored by long experience under the beſt officers of Europe, and the particular favourite of the great Kevenhuller was now, for the firſt time, raiſed to act in chief, at the head of an army, on which depended the fate of Auſtria and the empire. Born of a noble family, he relied ſolely upon his own merit, without ſolliciting court favour; he aſpired after the higheſt preferment, and ſucceeded by mere dint of ſuperior worth. His progreſs from the ſtation of a ſubaltern was ſlow and ſilent: his promotion to the chief command was received with univerſal eſteem and applauſe. Cautious, ſteady, penetrating and ſagacious, he was oppoſed as another Fabius to the mordern Hannibal, to chec the fire and vigour of that monarch by prudent foreſight and wary circumſpection. Arriving at Boemiſchbrod, within a few miles of Prague, the day after the late defeat, he halted to collect the fugitive corps and broken remains of the Auſtrian army, and ſoon drew together a force ſo conſiderable as to attract the notice of his Pruſſian majeſty, who detached the prince of Bevern, with 20 battalions and 30 ſquadrons, to attac him before numbers ſhould render him formidable. Daun was too prudent to give battle with diſpirited troops to an army fluſhed with victory. He retired on the firſt advice that the Pruſſians were advancing, and took poſt at Kolin, where he entrenched himſelf ſtrongly, opened the way for the daily ſupply of recruits ſent to his army, and inſpired the garriſon of Prague with freſh courage, in expectation of being ſoon relieved. Here he kept cloſe within his camp, divided the Pruſſian force, by obliging the king to employ near half his army in watching his deſigns, weakened his efforts againſt Prague, harraſſed the enemy by cutting off their convoys, and reſtored, by degrees, the languiſhing and almoſt deſponding ſpirits of his troops. Perfectly acquainted with the ardour and diſcipline of the Pruſſian forces, with the enterprizing and impetuous diſpoſition of that monarch, and ſenſible that his ſituation would prove irkſome and embarraſſing to the enemy, he improved it to the beſt advantage, ſeemed to foreſee all the conſequences, and directed every meaſure to produce them. Thus he retarded the enemy's operations, and aſſiduouſly avoided precipitating an action until the Pruſſian vigour ſhould be exhauſted, their ſtrength impaired by loſſes and deſertion, the firſt fire and ardour of their genius extinguiſhed by continual fatigue and inceſſant alarms, and until the impreſſion made on his own men, by the late defeat, ſhould, in ſome degree, be effaced. The event juſtified Daun's conduct. His army grew every day more numerous, while his Pruſſian majeſty began to expreſs the utmoſt impatience at the length of the ſiege. When that monarch firſt inveſted Prague, it was on the preſumption that the numerous forces within the walls would, by conſuming all the proviſion, oblige it to ſurrender in a few days, but perceiving that the Auſtrians had ſtill a conſiderable quantity of corn, that count Daun's army was daily increaſing, and would ſoon be powerful enough not only to cope with the detachment under the prince of Bevern, but in a condition to raiſe the ſiege, he determined to give the count battle with one part of his army, while he kept Prague blocked up with the other. The Auſtrians, amounting now to 60,000 men, were deeply entrenched, and defended by a numerous train of artillery, placed on redoubts and batteries erected on the moſt advantageous poſts. Every acceſſible part of the camp was fortified with lines and heavy pieces of battering cannon, and the foot of the hills ſecured by difficult defiles. Yet, ſtrong as this ſituation might appear, formidable as the Auſtrian forces certainly were, his Pruſſian majeſty undertook to diſlodge them with a body of horſe and foot not exceeding 32,000 men.

On the 13th day of June, the king of Pruſſia quitted the camp before Prague, eſcorted by a few battalions and ſquadrons, with which he joined the prince of Bevern at Milkowitz. Mareſchal Keith, it is ſaid, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed this meaſure, and adviſed either raiſing the ſiege entirely, and attacking the Auſtrians, with the united forces of Pruſſia, or poſtponing the attac on the camp at Kolin until his majeſty ſhould either gain poſſeſſion of the city, or ſome attempts ſhould be made to oblige him to quit his poſts. From either meaſure an advantage would have reſulted. With his whole army he might probably have defeated count Daun, or at leaſt have obliged him to retreat. Had he continued within his lines at Prague, the Auſtrian general could not have conſtrained him to raiſe the ſiege without loſing his own advantageous ſituation, and giving battle upon terms nearly equal. But the king elated with ſucceſs, impetuous in his valour, and confident of the ſuperiority of his own troops in point of diſcipline, thought all reſiſtance muſt ſink under the weight of his victorious arm, and yield to that courage which had already ſurmounted ſuch difficulties, diſregarded the mareſchal's ſage counſel, and marched up to the attac undaunted, and even aſſured of ſucceſs. By the eighteenth the two armies were in ſight, and his majeſty found that count Daun had not only fortified his camp with all the heavy cannon of Olmutz, but was ſtrongly re-enforced with troops from Moravia and Auſtria, which had joined him after the king's departure from Prague. He found the Auſtrians drawn up in three lines upon the high grounds between Genlitz and St. John the Baptiſt. Difficult as it was to approach their ſituation, the Pruſſian infantry marched up with firmneſs, while ſhot was poured like hail from the enemy's batteries, and began the attac about three in the afternoon. They drove the Auſtrians with irreſiſtible intrepidity from two eminences ſecured with heavy cannon, and two villages defended by ſeveral battalions; but, in attacking the third eminence, were flanked by the Auſtrian cavalry, by grape-ſhot poured from the batteries; and, after a violent conflict, and prodigious loſs of men, thrown into diſorder. Animated with the king's preſence, they rallied, and returned with double ardour to the charge, but were a ſecond time repulſed. Seven times ſucceſſively did prince Ferdinand renew the attac, performing every duty of a great general and valiant ſoldier, though always with the ſame fortune. The inferiority of the Pruſſian infantry, the diſadvantages of ground, where the cavalry could not act, the advantageous ſituation of the enemy, their numerous artillery, their entrenchments, numbers, and obſtinacy, joined to the ſkill and conduct of their general, all conſpired to defeat the hopes of the Pruſſians, to ſurmount their valour, and oblige them to treat. The king then made a laſt and furious effort, at the head of the cavalry on the enemy's left wing, but with as little ſucceſs as all the former attacs. Every effort was made, and every attempt was productive only of greater loſſes and misfortunes. At laſt, after expoſing his perſon in the moſt perilous ſituations, his Pruſſian majeſty drew off his forces from the field of battle, retiring in ſuch good order, in ſight of the enemy, as prevented a purſuit, or the loſs of his artillery and baggage. Almoſt all the officers on either ſide diſtinguiſhed themſelves; and count Daun, whoſe conduct emulated that of his Pruſſian majeſty, received two ſlight wounds, and had a horſe killed under him. The loſſes of both armies were very conſiderable; on that of the Pruſſians, the killed and wounded amounted to 8000; leſs pernicious, however, to his majeſty's cauſe than the frequent deſertions, and other innumerable ill conſequences that enſued.

When the Pruſſian army arrived at Nimburg, his majeſty, leaving the command with the prince of Bevern, took horſe, and, eſcorted by 12 or 14 huſſars, ſet out for Prague, where he arrived next morning without halting, after having been the whole preceding day on horſebac. Immediately he gave orders for ſending off all his artillery, ammunition, and baggage; theſe were executed with ſo much expedition, that the tents were ſtruc, and the army on their march, before the garriſon were informed of the king's defeat. Thus terminated the battle of Kolin and ſiege of Prague, in which the acknowledged errors of his Pruſſian majeſty were in ſome meaſure atoned by the candour with which he owned his miſtake, both in a letter to the earl Mareſchal [p], and in converſation with ſeveral of his general officers. Moſt people, indeed, imagined the king highly blameable for checking the ardour of his troops to ſtop and lay ſiege to Prague. They thought he ſhould have purſued his conqueſts, over-run Auſtria, Moravia, and all the hereditary dominions, from whom alone the empreſs-queen could draw ſpeedy ſuccours. A body of 20 or 30,000 men would have blocked up Prague, while the remainder of the Pruſſian forces might have obliged the imperial family to retire from Vienna, and effectually prevented count Daun from aſſembling another army. It was univerſally expected he would have bent his march ſtraight to this capital, but he dreaded leaving the numerous army in Prague behind, and it was of great importance to complete the conqueſt of Bohemia. The prince of Pruſſia marched all night with his corps to Nimburg, where he joined the prince of Bevern, and mareſchal Keith retreated next day. Count Brown having died before, of the wounds he received on the 6th of May, prince Charles of Lorraine ſallied out with a large body of the Auſtrians, and attacked the rear of the Pruſſians; but did no further miſchief than killing about 200 of their men. The ſiege of Prague being thus raiſed, the impriſoned Auſtrians received their deliverer, count Daun, with inexpreſſible joy, and their united forces became greatly ſuperior to thoſe of the king of Pruſſia, who was in a ſhort time obliged to evacuate Bohemia, and take refuge in Saxony. The Auſtrians harraſſed him as much as poſſible in his retreat; but their armies, though ſuperior in numbers, were not in a condition, from their late ſufferings, to make any deciſive attempt upon him, as the frontiers of Saxony abound with ſituations eaſily defended.

Having thus deſcribed the progreſs of the Pruſſians in Bohemia, we muſt caſt our eyes on the tranſactions which diſtinguiſhed the campaign in Weſtphalia. To guard againſt the ſtorm which menaced Hanover in particular, orders were tranſmitted thither to recruit the troops that had been ſent bac from England, to augment each company, to remount the cavalry with the utmoſt expedition; not to ſuffer any horſes to be conveyed out of the electorate; to furniſh the magazines in that country with all things neceſſary for 50,000 men. Of theſe 26,000 were to be Hanoverians, and, in conſequence of engagements entered into for that purpoſe, 12,000 Heſſians, 6000 Brunſwickers, 2000 Saxe-Gothans, and 1000 Lunenburghers, to be joined by a conſiderable body of Pruſſians, the whole commanded by his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland. The king of England having publiſhed a manifeſto, dated at Hanover, ſpecifying his motives for taking the field in Weſtphalia, the troops of the confederated ſtates that were to compoſe the allied army, under the name of an army of obſervation, began to aſſemble with all poſſible diligence near Bielefeldt. Thither the generals appointed to command the ſeveral diviſions repaired, to ſettle the plan of operations with their commander, the duke of Cumberland, who, having left London on the 9th of April, arrived on the 16th at Hanover, and from thence repaired to the army, which, having been joined by three Pruſſian regiments that retired from Weſel, conſiſted of 37 battalions and 34 ſquadrons. Of theſe, ſix battalions and ſix ſquadrons were poſted at Bielefeldt, under the command of lieutenant-general baron de Sporcken; ſix battalions, under lieutenant-general de Block, at Hervorden; ſix battalions and four ſquadrons, under major-general Ledebour, between Hervorden and Minden; ſeven battalions and 10 ſquadrons, under lieutenant-general d'Oberg in the neighbourhood of Hamelen; and five battalions and four ſquadrons, under major-general de Hauſs, near Nienburgh. The head-quarters of his royal highneſs were at Bielefeldt.

In the mean time, the French on the Lower Rhine continued filing off inceſſantly. The ſiege of Gueldres was converted into a blockade, occaſioned by the difficulties the enemy found in raiſing batteries; and a party of Hanoverians having paſſed the Weſer, as well to ravage the country of Paderbourn as to reconnoitre the French, carried off ſeveral waggons loaded with wheat and oats, deſtined for the territories of the elector of Cologn. On the other hand, colonel Fiſcher having had an engagement with a ſmall body of Hanoverians, in the county of Tecklenburgh, routed them, and made ſome priſoners. After ſeveral other petty ſkirmiſhes between the French and the Hanoverians, the duke of Cumberland, altered the poſition of his camp, by placing it between Bielefeldt and Hervorden, in hopes of fruſtrating the deſign of the enemy; who, declining to attac him on the ſide of Bracwede, after having reconnoitred his ſituation ſeveral days, made a motion on their left, as if they meant to get between him and the Weſer. This ſtep was no ſooner taken, than, on the 13th of June in the afternoon, having received advice that the enemy had cauſed a large body of troops, followed by a ſecond, to march on his right to Burghotte, he ordered his army to march that evening towards Hervorden; and at the ſame time major-general Hardenberg marched with four battalions of grenadiers, and a regiment of horſe, to re-enforce that poſt. Count Schulenberg covered the left of the march with a battalion of grenadiers, a regiment of horſe, and the light troops of Buckeburgh. The whole army marched in two columns. The right, compoſed of horſe, and followed by two battalions, to cover their paſſage through the encloſures and defiles, paſſed by the right of Bielefeldt; and the left, conſiſting of infantry, marched by the left of the ſame town. The van-guard of the French army attacked the rear-guard of the allies, commanded by major-general Einſiedel, very briſkly, and at firſt put them into ſome confuſion, but they immediately recovered themſelves. This was in the beginning of the night. At break of day the enemy's re-enforcements returned to the charge, but were again repulſed, nor could they once break through lieutenant-colonel Alfeldt's Hanoverian guards, which cloſed the army's march with a detachment of regular troops, and a new-raiſed corps of hunters.

The allies encamped at Cofeldt the 14th, and remained there all the next day, when the enemy's detachments advanced to the gates of Hervorden, and made a feint as if they would attac the town, after having ſummoned it to ſurrender; but they retired without attempting any thing further; and, in the mean time, the troops that were [p] "The imperial grenadiers, (ſays he), are an admirable corps; 100 companies defended a riſing ground, which my beſt infantry could not carry. Ferdinand, who commanded them, returned ſeven times to the charge; but to no purpoſe. At firſt he maſtered a battery, but could not hold it. The enemy had the advantage of a numerous and well-ſerved artillery. It did honour to Lichtenſtein, who had the direction. Only the Pruſſian army can diſpute it with him. My infantry were too few. All my cavalry were preſent, and idle ſpectators, excepting a bold puſh by my houſehold troops, and ſome dragoons. Ferdinand attacked without powder; the enemy, in return, were not ſparing of their's. They had the advantage of a riſing ground, of entrenchments, and of a prodigious artillery. Several of my regiments were repulſed by their muſquetry. Henry performed wonders. I tremble for my worthy brothers: they are too brave. Fortune turned her bac on me this day. I ought to have expected it: ſhe is a female, and I am no gallant. In fact, I ought to have had more infantry.—Succeſs, my dear lord, often occaſions a deſtructive confidence. Twenty-four battalions were not ſufficient to diſlodge 60,000 men from an advantageous poſt. Another time we will do better.——What ſay you of this league, which has only the marquis of Brandenbourg for its object? The great elector would be ſurpriſed to ſee his grandſon at war with the Ruſſians, the Auſtrians, almoſt all Germany and 100,000 French auxiliaries—I know not whether it would be diſgrace in me to ſubmit, but I am ſure there will be no glory in vanquiſhing me."

poſted at Hervorden, and formed the rear-guard, paſſed the Weſer on the ſide of Remen, without any moleſtation, and encamped at Holtzuſen. A body of troops which had been left at Bielefeldt, to cover the duke's retreat, after ſome ſkirmiſhes with the French, rejoined the army in the neighbourhood of Herfort; and a few days after his royal highneſs drew near his bridges on the Weſer, and ſent over his artillery, baggage, and ammunition. At the ſame time ſome detachments paſſed the river on the right, between Minden and Oldendorp, and marked out a new camp advantageouſly ſituated, having the Weſer in front, and the right and left covered with eminences and marſhes. There the army under his royal highneſs re-aſſembled, and the French fixed their head-quarters at Bielefeldt, which the Hanoverians had quitted, leaving in it only part of the magazine, which had been ſet on fire. By this time the French were in ſuch want of forage, that M. d'Etrées himſelf, the princes of the blood, and all the officers without exception, were obliged to ſend bac part of their horſes. However, on the 10th of June their whole army, conſiſting 70 battalions and 40 ſquadrons, with 52 pieces of cannon, beſides a body of cavalry left at Ruremonde for the conveniency of forage, was put in motion. In ſpite of almoſt impaſſable foreſts, famine, and every other obſtacle that could be thrown in their way by a vigilant and experienced general, they at length ſurmounted all difficulties, and advanced into a country abounding with plenty, and unuſed to the ravages of war. It was imagined that the paſſage of the Weſer, which defends Hanover from foreign attacs, would have been vigorouſly oppoſed by the army of the allies: but whether, in the preſent ſituation of affairs, it was thought adviſeable to act only upon the defenſive, and not to begin the attac in a country that was not concerned as a principal in the war, or the duke of Cumberland found himſelf too weak to make head againſt the enemy, is a queſtion we ſhall not pretend to determine. However that may have been, the whole French army paſſed the Weſer on the 10th and 11th of July, without the loſs of a man. The manner of effecting this paſſage is thus related:—— Mareſchal d'Etrées, being informed that his magazines of proviſions were well furniſhed, his ovens eſtabliſhed, and the artillery and pontoons arrived at the deſtined places ordered lieutenant-general Broglio, with 10 battalions, 12 ſquadrons, and 10 pieces of cannon, to march to Enghereu; lieutenant-general M. de Chevert, with 16 battalions, three brigades of carabineers, the royal hunters, and 600 huſſars, to march to Hervorden, and lieutenant-general marquis d'Armentieres, with 12 battalions and 10 ſquadrons, to march to Ulrickhauſen. All theſe troops being arrived in their camp on the 4th of July, halted the 5th. On the 6th, 22 battalions, and 32 ſquadrons, under the command of the duke of Orleans, who was now arrived at the army, marched to Ulrickhauſen, from whence M. d'Armentieres had ſent out early in the morning, with the troops under his command, and by haſty marches got on the 7th, by 11 at night, to Blankenhoven, where he found the boats which had gone from Ahrenſberg. The bridges were built, the connon planted, and the entrenchments at the head of the bridges completed in the night between the 7th and 8th. The mareſchal having ſent away part of his baggage from Bielefeldt on the 6th, went in perſon on the ſeventh at 11 o'clock to Horn, and on the 8th to Braket. On advice that M. d'Armentieres had thrown his bridges acroſs without oppoſition, and was at work on his entrenchments, he went on the 9th to Blankenhoven, to ſee the bridges and entrenchments; and afterwards advanced to examine the firſt poſition he intended for his army, and came down the right ſide of the Weſer to the abbey of Corvey, where he forded the river, with the princes of the blood, and their attendants. On the 10th in the morning he got on horſebac by four o'clock, to ſee the duke of Orlean's diviſion file off, which arrived at Corvey at 10 o'clock; as alſo that of M. d'Armentieres, which arrived at 11, and that of M. Souvré, which arrived at noon. The mareſchal having examined the courſe of the river, cauſed the bridges of pontoons to be laid within gun-ſhot of the abbey, where the viſcount de Turenne paſſed that river in 1673, and where the diviſions under Broglio and Chevert now paſſed it on the 12th and 13th. Theſe two generals being informed of what was to be done upon the Upper-Weſer, attacked Minden, and carried it, whilſt a detachment of French entered the country of Eaſt Frieſland, under the command of marquis d'Auvel: and, after taking poſſeſſion of Lier, marched on the right of the Ems to Embden, the only ſea-port the king of Pruſſia had, which at firſt ſeemed determined to make the defence, but the inhabitants were not agreed upon the methods to be taken for that purpoſe. They, therefore, met to deliberate, but in the mean time, their gates being ſhut, M. d'Auvel cauſed ſome cannon to be brought to beat them down; and the garriſon, compoſed of 400 Pruſſians, not being ſtrong enough to defend the town, the ſoldiers mutinied againſt their officers, whereupon a capitulation was agreed on, and the gates were opened to the French commander, who made his troops enter with a great deal of order, aſſured the magiſtrates that care ſhould be taken to make them obſerve a good diſcipline, and publiſh two ordinances, one for the ſecurity of the religion and commerce of the city, and the other for prohibiting the exportation of corn and forage out of that principality. The inhabitants were, however, obliged to take an oath of allegiance to the French king.

On Sunday the 24th of July, the French, after having laid part of the electorate of Hanover under contribution, marched in three columns, with their artillery, towards the village of Latford, when major-general Fuſtenburg, who commanded the out-poſts in the village, ſent an officer to inform the duke of Cumberland of their approach. His royal highneſs immediately re-enforced thoſe poſts with a body of troops, under the command of lieutenant-general Sporcken: but finding it impoſſible to ſupport the village, as it was commanded by the heights oppoſite to it, which were poſſeſſed by the enemy, and being ſenſible that it would be always in his power to retake it, from its ſituation in a bottom between two hills, he withdrew his poſt from Latford. The French then made two attacs, one at the point of the wood and the other higher up in the ſame wood, oppoſite to the grenadiers commanded by major-general Hardenberg, but they failed in both; and though the fire of their artillery was very hot, they were obliged to retire. The French army encamping on the heights oppoſite to the duke of Cumberland's poſts, the intelligence received, that M. d'Etrées had aſſembled all his troops, and was furniſhed with a very conſiderable train of artillery, left his royal highneſs no doubt of his intending to attac him. He, therefore, reſolved to change his camp for a more advantageous ſituation, by drawing up his army on the eminence between the Weſer and the woods, leaving the Hamelen river on his right, the village of Haſtenbeck in his front, and his left cloſe to the wood, at the point of which his royal highneſs had a battery of 12 pounders and haubitzers. There was a hollow way from the left of the village to the battery, and a moraſs on the other ſide of Haſtenbeck to his right. Major-general Schulenberg, with the hunters, and two battalions of grenadiers, was poſted in the corner of the woods upon the the left of the battery; his royal highneſs ordered the village of Haſtenbeck to be cleared to his front, to prevent its being in the power of the enemy to keep poſſeſſion of it, and the ways by which the allies had a communication with that village during their encampment to be rendered impaſſable. In the evening he withdrew all his out-poſts, and in this poſition the army lay upon their arms all night. On the 25th in the morning the French army marched forward in columns, and began to cannonade the allies very ſeverely, marching and counter-marching continually, and ſeeming to intend three attacs, on the right, the left, and the centre. In the evening their artillery appeared much ſuperior to that of the allies. The army was again ordered to lie all night on their arms; his royal highneſs cauſed a battery at the end of the wood to be repaired, count Schulenberg to be re-enforced with a battalion of grenadiers, and two field pieces of cannon, and that battery to be alſo ſupported by four more battalions of grenadiers, under the command of major-general Hardenberg. He likewiſe cauſed a battery to be erected of twelve and ſix pounders, behind the village of Haſtenbeck, and took all the precautions he could think of to give the enemy a warm reception. As ſoon as it was day-light he mounted on horſebac to reconnoitre the poſition of the enemy, whom he found in the ſame ſituation as the day before. At a little after five a very ſmart cannonading began againſt the battery behind the village, which was ſupported by the Heſſian infantry and cavalry, who ſtood a moſt ſevere fire with ſurpriſing ſteadineſs and reſolution. Between ſeven and eight the firing of ſmall arms began on the left of the allies, when his royal highneſs ordered major-general Behr, with three battalions of Brunſwick, to ſuſtain the grenadiers in the wood, if their aſſiſtance ſhould be wanted. The cannonading continued above ſix hours, during which the troops that were expoſed to it never once abated of their firmneſs. The fire of the ſmall arms on the left increaſing, and the French ſeeming to gain ground, his royal highneſs detached the colonels Darkenhauſen and Bradenbach, with three Hanoverian battalions and ſix ſquadrons, round the wood by Afferde, who, towards the cloſe of the day, drove ſeveral ſquadrons of the enemy bac to their army, without giving them any opportunity to charge. At length the grenadiers in the wood, apprehenſive of being ſurrounded, from the great numbers of the enemy that appeared there, and were marching round on that ſide, though they repulſed every thing that appeared in their front, thought it adviſeable to retire nearer the left of the army, a motion which gave the enemy an opportunity of poſſeſſing themſelves of that battery without oppoſition. Here the hereditary prince of Brunſwick diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the head of a battalion of Wolfenbuttel guards, and another of Hanoverians, who attacked and repulſed, with their bayonets a ſuperior force of the enemy, and retook the battery. But the French being in poſſeſſion of an eminence which commanded and flanked both the lines of the infantry and the battery of the allies, and where they were able to ſupport their attac under the cover of a hill, his royal highneſs, conſidering the ſuperior numbers of the enemy, near double to his, and the impoſſibility of diſlodging them from their poſt, without expoſing his troops too much, ordered a retreat; in conſequence of which his army retired, firſt to Hamelen, where he left a garriſon, then to Nienburg, and afterwards to Hoya; in the neighbourhood of which town, after ſending away all the magazines, ſic, and wounded, he encamped, in order to cover Bremen and Verden, and to preſerve a communication with Stade, to which place the archives, and moſt valuable effects of Hanover had been removed. In this engagement, colonel Bredenback attacked four brigades very ſtrongly poſted, with a battery of 14 pieces of cannon, repulſed and drove them down a precipice, and took all the artillery and ammunition; but preferring the care of his wounded to the glory of carrying away the cannon, he brought off only ſix, nailing up and deſtroying the reſt. The loſs of the allies, in all the ſkirmiſhes, which laſted three days, was 327 men killed 907 wounded, and 220 miſſing or taken priſoners; whilſt that of the French, according to their own accounts, amounted to 1500 men.

The French, being left maſters of the field, ſoon reduced Hamelen, which was far from being well fortified, obliged the garriſon to capitulate, and took out of the town 60 braſs cannon, ſeveral mortars, 40 ovens, part of the equipage of the duke's army, and large quantities of proviſions and ammunition, which they found in it, together with a great many ſic and wounded, who not being included in the capitulation, were made priſoners of war. Whether the court of France had any reaſon to find fault with the conduct of mareſchal d'Etrées, or whether its monarch was blindly guided by the councils of his favourite, the marquiſe de Pompadour, who, deſirous to teſtify her gratitude to the man who had been one of the chief inſtruments of her high promotion, was glad of an opportunity to retrieve his ſhattered fortunes, and at the ſame time to add to her own already immenſe treaſures, we ſhall not pretend to determine; though the event ſeems plainly to ſpeak the laſt. Even at the time no compariſon was made between the military ſkill of the mareſchal d'Etrées, and that of the duke de Richelieu; but, however that may have been, this laſt, who, if he had not ſhone in the character of a ſoldier, excelled all, or at leaſt moſt of his contemporaries in the more refined arts of a courtier, was juſt before the battle we have been ſpeaking of, appointed to ſuperſede the former in the command of the French army in Lower-Saxony, where he arrived on the 6th of Auguſt, with the title of mareſchal of France; and M. d'Etrées immediately reſigned the command.

Immediately after the battle of Haſtenbeck, the French ſent a detachment of 4000 men to lay under contribution the counties of Hanover and Brunſwick Wolfenbuttle, as well as the duchies of Bremen and Verden; and two days after the arrival of this new commander, the duke de Chevreuſe was detached with 2000 men to take poſſeſſion of Hanover itſelf, with the title of governor of that city. He accordingly marched thither; and upon his arrival the Hanoverian garriſon was diſarmed and left at liberty to retire where they pleaſed. About the ſame time M. de Contades, with a detachment from the French army, was ſent to make himſelf maſter of the territories of Heſſe-Caſſel, where he found no oppoſition. He was met at Warberg by that prince's maſter of the horſe, who declared that they were ready to furniſh the French army with all the ſuccours the country could afford; and accordingly the magiſtrates of Caſſel preſented him with the keys as ſoon as he entered their city. Gottingen was ordered by M. d'Armentieres to prepare for him within a limitted time, upon pain of military execution, 4000 pounds of white bread, 2000 buſhels of oats, a greater quantity than could be found in the whole country, 100 loads of hay, and other proviſions.

The duke of Cumberland remained encamped in the neighbourhood of Hoya till the 24th of Auguſt, when, upon advice that the enemy had laid two bridges over the Aller in the night, and had paſſed the river with a large body of troops, he ordered his army to march, to ſecure the important poſt and paſſage of Rotenburg, leſt they ſhould attempt to march round on his left. He encamped that night at Hauſen, having detached lieutenant-general Oberg, with eight battalions and ſix ſquadrons, to Otterſberg, to which place he marched next day, and encamped behind the Wummer, in a very ſtrong ſituation, between Otterſberg and Rothenburg. The French took poſſeſſion of Verden on the 26th of Auguſt, and one of their detachments went on the 29th to Bremen, where the gates were immediately opened to them. The duke of Cumberland, now cloſely preſſed on all ſides, and in danger of having his communication with Stade cut off, which the enemy was endeavouring to effect, by ſeizing upon all the poſts round him, found it neceſſary to decamp again; to abandon Rothenburg, of which the French immediately took poſſeſſion; to retreat to Selſingen, where his head-quarters were, on the 1ſt of September; and from thence on the 3d of the ſame month, to retire under the cannon of Stade. Here it was imagined that his army would have been able to maintain their ground between the Aller and the Elbe, till the ſeverity of the ſeaſon ſhould put an end to the campaign. Accordingly, his royal highneſs, upon his taking this poſition, ſent a detachment of his forces to Buck-Schantz, with ſome artillery, and orders to defend that place to the utmoſt: but as it could not poſſibly have held out many days, and as the French, who now hemmed him in on all ſides, by making themſelves maſters of a little fort at the mouth of the river Zwinga, would have cut off his communication with the Elbe, ſo that four Engliſh men of war then in that river could have been of no ſervice to him, he was forced to accept of a mediation offered by the king of Denmark, by his miniſter the count de Lynar, and to ſign the famous convention of Cloſter-Seven [q], by which 38,000 Hanoverians had laid down their arms, and were diſperſed into different quarters of cantonment.

[q] This remarkable capitulation, which we ſhall give here at full length, on account of diſputes which aroſe ſhortly after concerning what the French called an infraction of it, was to the following effect:

'HIS majeſty the king of Denmark, touched with the diſtreſſes of the countries of Bremen and Verden, to which he has always granted his ſpecial protection; and being deſirous, by preventing thoſe countries from being any longer the theatre of war, to ſpare alſo the effuſion of blood in the armies which are ready to diſpute the poſſeſſion thereof, hath employed his mediation by the miniſtry of the count de Lynar. His royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, general of the army of the allies, on the one part, and his excellency the mareſchal duke de Richelieu, general of the king of France's forces in Germany, on the other, have, in conſideration of the intervention of his Daniſh majeſty, reſpectivly engaged their word of honour to the count de Lynar, to abide by the convention hereafter ſtipulated; and he, the count de Lynar, correſpondently to the magnanimity of the king his maſter's intention, obliges himſelf to procure the guarantee mentioned in the preſent convention; ſo that it ſhall be ſent to him, with his full powers, which there was no time to make out, in the circumſtances which hurried his departure.

Article I. Hoſtilities ſhall ceaſe on both ſides within 24 hours, or ſooner, if poſſible. Orders for this purpoſe ſhall be immediately ſent to the detached corps.

II. The auxiliary troops of the army of the duke of Cumberland, namely thoſe of Heſſe, Brunſwick, Saxe-Gotha, and even thoſe of the count de la Lippe-Buckbourg, ſhall be ſent home: and as it is neceſſary to ſettle particularly their march to their reſpective countries, a general officer of each nation ſhall be ſent from the armies of the allies, with whom all ſhall be ſettled the route of thoſe troops, the diviſions they ſhall march in, the ſubſiſtence on their march, and their paſſports to be granted them by his excellency the duke de Richelieu to go to their own countries, where they ſhall be placed and diſtributed as ſhall be agreed upon between the court of France and their reſpective ſovereigns.

III. His royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland obliges himſelf to paſs the Elbe, with ſuch part of the army as he ſhall not be able to place in the city of Stade: that the part of his forces which ſhall enter into garriſon in the ſaid city, and which it is ſuppoſed may amount to between 4 and 6000 men, ſhall remain there under the guarantee of his majeſty the king of Denmark, without committing any act of hoſtility: nor, on the other hand, ſhall they be expoſed to any from the French troops. In conſequence thereof, commiſſaries, named on each ſide, ſhall agree upon the limits to be fixed round that place, for the conveniency of the garriſon; which limits ſhall not extend beyond half a league or a league from the place, according to the nature of the ground or circumſtances, which ſhall be fairly ſettled by the commiſſaries. The reſt of the Hanoverian army ſhall go and take quarters in the country beyond the Elbe; and to facilitate the march of thoſe troops, his excellency the duke de Richelieu ſhall concert with a general officer ſent from the Hanoverian army the route they ſhall take; obliging himſelf to give the neceſſary paſſports and ſecurity for the free paſſage of them and their baggage to the places of their deſtination; his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland reſerving to himſelf the liberty of negotiating between the

The Hanoverians being now quite ſubdued, and the whole force of the French let looſe againſt the king of Pruſſia by this treaty, mareſchal Richelieu immediately ordered lieutenant-general Berchini to march with all poſſible expedition, with the troops under his command, to join the prince de Soubiſe: the gens-d'armes, and other troops that were in the landgraviate of Heſſe-Caſſel, received the ſame order; and 60 battalions of foot, and the greateſt part of the horſe belonging to the French army, were directed to attac the Pruſſian territories. Mareſchal Richelieu himſelf arrived at Brunſwick on the 15th of September; and having, in a few days after, aſſembled 110 battalions, and 150 ſquadrons, with 100 pieces of cannon, near Wolfenbuttel, he entered the king of Pruſſia's dominions with his army on the 27th, 28th, and 29th of the ſame month, in three columns, which penetrated into Halberſtadt and Bradenburg, plundering the towns, exacting contributions, and committing many enormities, at which their general is ſaid to have connived. In the mean time, the duke of Cumberland returned to England, where he arrived on the 11th of October, and ſhortly after reſigned all his military commands.

Had the allied army, after the battle of Haſtenbeck marched directly to the Leine, as it might eaſily have done, and then taken poſt on the other ſide of Wolfenbuttel, Halberſtadt, and Magdeburg, it might have waited ſecurely under the cannon of the latter place for the junction of the Pruſſian forces; inſtead of which, they injudiciouſly turned off to the Lower Weſer, retiring ſucceſſively from Hamelen to Nienburg, Verden, Rothenburgh, Buxtchude, and laſtly to Stade, where, for want of ſubſiſtence and elbow-room, the troops were all made priſoners of war at large. They made a march of 150 miles to be cooped up in a nook, inſtead of taking the other route, which was only about 100 miles, and would have led them to a place of ſafety. By this unaccountable conduct, the king of Pruſſia was not only deprived of the aſſiſtance of near 40,000 good troops, which, in the cloſe of the compaign, might have put him upon an equality with the French and the army of the empire; but alſo expoſed to, and actually invaded by his numerous enemies on all ſides, inſomuch that his ſituation became now more dangerous than ever; and the fate which ſeemed to have threatened the empreſs a few months before, through his means, was, to all appearance, turned againſt himſelf. His ruin was predicted, nor could human prudence foreſee how he might be extricated from his complicated diſtreſs; for, beſides the invaſion of his territories by the French under the duke de Richelieu, the Ruſſians, who had made for a long time a dilatory march, and ſeemed uncertain of their own reſolutions, all at once quickened their motions, and entered ducal Pruſſia under mareſchal Apraxin and general Fermor, marking their progreſs by every inhumanity that unbridled cruelty, luſt, and rapine can be imagined capable of committing. A large body of Auſtrians entered Sileſia, and penetrated as far as Breſlau: then, turning bac, they laid ſiege to the important fortreſs of Schweidnitz, the key of that country. A ſecond body entered Luſatia, another quarter of the Pruſſian territories, and made themſelves maſters of Zittau. Twenty-two thouſand Swedes penetrated into Pruſſian Pomerania, took the towns of Anclam and Demmin, and laid the whole country under contribution. The army of the empire, re-enforced by that of prince Soubiſe, after many delays, was at laſt in full march to enter Saxony; and this motion left the Auſtrians at liberty to turn the greateſt part of their forces to the reduction of Sileſia. An Auſtrian general, penetrating through Luſatia, paſſed by the Pruſſian armies, and ſuddenly preſenting himſelf before the gates of Berlin, laid the whole country under contribution; and though he retired on the approach of a body of Pruſſians, yet he ſtill found means to interrupt the communication of theſe laſt with Sileſia. The Pruſſians, it is true, exerted themſelves bravely on all ſides, and their enemies fled before them; but whilſt one body was purſuing, another gained upon them in ſome other part. The winter approached, their ſtrength decayed, and their adverſaries multiplied daily. Their king harraſſed, and almoſt ſpent with inceſſant fatigue both of body and of mind, was in a manner excluded from the empire. The greateſt part of his dominions were either taken from him, or laid under contribution, and poſſeſſed by his enemies; who collected the public revenues, fattened on the contributions, and with the riches which they drew from the electorate of Hanover, and other conqueſts, defrayed the expences of the war; and by the convention of Cloſter-Seven he was deprived of his allies, and left without any aſſiſtance whatever, excepting what the Britiſh parliament might think fit to ſupply. How different is this picture from that which the king of Pruſſia exhibited when he took arms to enter Saxony! But, in order to form a clear idea of theſe events, of the ſituation of his Pruſſian majeſty, and of the ſteps he took to defeat the deſigns of his antagoniſts, and extricate himſelf from his great and numerous diſtreſſes, it will be proper now to take a view of the ſeveral tranſactions of his enemies, as well during his ſtay in Bohemia, as from the time of his leaving it, down to that which we are now ſpeaking of.

Whilſt the king of Pruſſia was in Bohemia, the empreſs of Ruſſia ordered notice to be given to all maſters of ſhips, that if any of them were found aſſiſting the Pruſſians, by the tranſportation of troops, artillery, and ammunition, they ſhould be condemned as legal prizes: and her fleet, conſiſting of 15 men of war and frigates, with two bomb ketches, was ſent to bloc up the Pruſſian ports in the Baltic, where it took ſeveral ſhips of that nation, which were employed in carrying proviſions and merchandiſe from one port to another. One of theſe ſhips of war appearing before Memel, a town of Poland, but ſubject to Pruſſia, the commandant ſent an officer to the captain, to know whether he came as a friend or an enemy; to which interrogation the Ruſſian captain replied, that, notwithſtanding the diſpoſitions of the empreſs of both the Ruſſias were ſufficiently known, yet he would further explain them, by declaring that his orders, and thoſe of the other Ruſſian commanders were, in conformity to the laws of war, to ſeize on all the Pruſſian veſſels they met with on their cruiſe. Upon which the commandant of Memel immediately gave orders for pointing the cannon to fire upon all Ruſſian ſhips that ſhould approach that place.

The land-forces of the Ruſſians had now lingered on their march upwards of ſix months; and it was pretty generally doubted, by thoſe who were ſuppoſed to have the beſt intelligence, whether they ever were deſigned really to paſs into the Pruſſian territories, not only on account of their long ſtay on the borders of Lithunia, but alſo becauſe ſevetwo courts, for an extenſion of thoſe quarters. As to the French troops, they ſhall remain in the reſt of the duchies of Bremen and Verden, till the definitive reconciliation of the two ſovereigns.

IV. As the aforeſaid articles are to be executed as ſoon as poſſible, the Hanoverian army, and the corps which are detached from it, particularly that which is at Buck-Schantz, and the neighbourhood, ſhall retire under Stade in the ſpace of 48 hours. The French army ſhall not paſs the river Oſte, in the duchy of Bremen, till the limits be regulated. It ſhall, beſides, keep all the poſts and countries of which it is in poſſeſſion; and, not to retard the regulation of the limits between the armies, commiſſaries ſhall be nominated and ſent on the 10th inſtant to Bremenworden, by his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, and his excellency the mareſchal duke de Richelieu, to regulate, as well the limits to be aſſigned to the French army, as thoſe that are to be obſerved by the garriſon at Stade, according to Art. III.

V. All the aforeſaid articles ſhall be faithfully executed, according to their form and tenor, and under the faith of his majeſty the king of Denmark's guarantee, which the count de Lynar, his miniſter, engage to procure.

Done at the camp at Cloſter-Seven, Sept. 8, 1757.

SEPARATE ARTICLES.

UPON the repreſentation made by the count de Lynar, with a view to explain ſome diſpoſitions made by the preſent covention, the following articles have been added:

I. It is the intention of his excellency the mareſchal duke de Richelieu, that the allied troops of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland ſhall be ſent bac to their reſpective countries, according to the form mentioned in the 2d article; and that as to their ſeparation and diſtribution in the country, it ſhall be regulated between the courts, thoſe troops not being conſidered as priſoners of war.

II. It having been repreſented that the country of Lunenberg cannot accommodate more than fifteen battalions and ſix ſquadrons, and that the city of Stade cannot abſolutely contain the garriſon of ſix thouſand allotted to it, his excellency the mareſchal duke de Richelieu, being preſſed by M. de Lynar, who ſupported this repreſentation by the guarantee of his Daniſh majeſty, gives his conſent, and his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland engages to cauſe fifteen battalions and ſix ſquadrons to paſs the Elbe; and the whole body of hunters, and the remaining ten battalions, and twenty-eight ſquadrons ſhall be placed in the town of Stade, and the places neareſt to it that are within the line, which ſhall be marked by poſts from the mouth of the Liche in the Elbe, to the mouth of the Elmerbeck in the river Oſte; provided always that the ſaid ten battalions and 28 ſquadrons ſhall be quartered there as they are at the time of ſigning this convention, and ſhall not be recruited under any pretext, or augmented in any caſe; and this clauſe is particularly guaranteed by the count de Lynar in the name of his Daniſh majeſty.

III. Upon the repreſentation of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, that the army and the detached corps cannot both retire under Stade in 48 hours, agreeable to the convention, his excellency the mareſchal duke de Richelieu hath ſignified, that he will grant them proper time, provided the corps encamped at Buck-Schantz, as well as the army encamped at Bremenworden, begin their march to retire in 24 hours after ſigning the convention. The time neceſſary for other arrangements, and the execution of the articles concerning the reſpective limits, ſhall be ſettled between lieutenant-general Sporcken, and the marquis de Villemar, firſt lieutenant-general of the king's army.

ral of their Coſſacks had been ſeverely puniſhed for plundering the waggons of ſome Pruſſian peaſants upon the frontiers of Courland, and the damage of the peaſants compenſated with money, though general Apraxin's army was at the ſame time greatly diſtreſſed by the want of proviſions; when, on a ſudden, they quickened their motions, and ſhowed they were in earneſt, determined to accompliſh the ruin of Pruſſia. The firſt act of hoſtility was the attac of Memel, which ſurrendered: and by the articles of capitulation it was agreed, that the garriſon ſhould march out with all the honours of war, after having engaged not to ſerve againſt the empreſs, or any of her allies, for the ſpace of one year.

His Pruſſian majeſty, juſtly forſeeing the great enormities that were to be expected from theſe ſavage enemies, who were unaccuſtomed to make war, except upon nations as barbarous as themſelves, who looked upon war only as an opportunity for plunder, and every country through which they happened to march as their's by right of conqueſt, publiſhed the following declaration:—'It is ſufficiently known, that the king of Pruſſia, after the example of his glorious predeceſſors, has, ever ſince his acceſſion to the crown, laid it down as a maxim to ſeek the friendſhip of the imperial court of Ruſſia, and cultivate it by every method. His Pruſſian majeſty hath had the ſatisfaction to live, for ſeveral ſucceſſive years, in the ſtricteſt harmony with the reigning empreſs; and this happy union would be ſtill ſubſiſting, if evil-minded potentates had not broke it by their ſecret machinations, and carried things to ſuch a height, that the miniſters on both ſides have been recalled, and the correſpondence broken off. However melancholy theſe circumſtances might be for the king, his majeſty was nevertheleſs moſt attentive to prevent any thing that might increaſe the alienation of the Ruſſian court. He hath been particularly careful, during the diſturbances of the war that now unhappily rages, to avoid whatever might involve him in a difference with that court, notwithſtanding the great grievances he hath to alledge againſt it; and that it was publicly known the court of Vienna had at laſt drawn that of Ruſſia into its deſtructive views, and made it ſerve as an inſtrument for favouring the ſchemes of Auſtria. His majeſty hath given the whole world inconteſtible proofs, that he was under an indiſpenſable neceſſity of having recourſe to the meaſures he hath taken againſt the courts of Vienna and Saxony, who forced him by their conduct to take up arms for his defence. Yet, even ſince things have been brought to this extremity, the king hath offered to lay down his arms, if proper ſecurities ſhould be granted to him. His majeſty hath not neglected to expoſe the artifices by which the imperial court of Ruſſia hath been drawn into meaſures ſo oppoſite to the empreſs's ſentiments, and which would excite the utmoſt indignation of that great princeſs, if the truth could be placed before her without diſguiſe. The king did more: he ſuggeſted to her imperial majeſty ſufficient means either to excuſe her not taking any part in the preſent war, or to avoid, upon the juſteſt grounds, the execution of thoſe engagements which the court of Vienna claimed by a manifeſt abuſe of obligations, which they employed to palliate their unlawful views. It wholly depended upon the empreſs of Ruſſia to extinguiſh the flames of the war, without unſheathing the ſword, by purſuing the meaſures ſuggeſted by the king. This conduct would have immortalized her reign throughout all Europe. It would have gained her more laſting glory than can be acquired by the greateſt triumphs. The king finds with regret, that all his precautions and care to maintain peace with the Ruſſian empire are fruitleſs, and that the intrigues of his enemies have prevailed. His majeſty ſees all the conſiderations of friendſhip and good neighbourhood ſet aſide by the imperial court of Ruſſias, a well as the obſervance of its engagements with his majeſty. He ſees that court marching its troops through the territories of a foreign power, and, contrary to the tenor of treaties, in order to attac the king in his dominions: and thus taking part in a war, in which his enemies have involved the Ruſſian empire. In ſuch circumſtances, the king hath no other part to take, but to employ the power which God hath entruſted to him in defending himſelf, protecting his ſubjects, and repelling every unjuſt attac. His majeſty will never loſe ſight of the rules which are obſerved, even in the midſt of war, among civilized nations. But if, contrary to all hope and expectation, theſe rules ſhould be violated by the troops of Ruſſia, if they commit in the king's territories diſorders and exceſſes diſallowed by the laws of arms, his majeſty muſt not be blamed if he makes repriſals in Saxony: and if, inſtead of that good order and rigorous diſcipline which have hitherto been obſerved by his army, avoiding all ſorts of violence, he finds himſelf forced, contrary to his inclination, to ſuffer the provinces and ſubjects of Saxony to be treated in the ſame manner as his own territories ſhall be treated. As to the reſt, the king will ſoon publiſh to the whole world the futility of the reaſons alledged by the imperial court of Ruſſia to juſtify its aggreſſion; and as his majeſty is forced upon making his defence, he has room to hope, with confidence, that the Lord of hoſts will bleſs his righteous arms, that he will diſappoint the unjuſt enterprizes of his enemies, and grant him his powerful aſſiſtance, to enable him to make head againſt them.'

When the king of Pruſſia was put under the ban of the empire, the ſeveral princes who compoſe that body were required, by the decree of the Aulick council, as we obſerved before, to furniſh their reſpective contigences againſt him. Thoſe who feared him looked upon this as a fair opportunity of reducing him; and thoſe who ſtood in awe of the houſe of Auſtria, were, through neceſſity, compelled to ſupport that power which they dreaded. Beſides, they were accuſtomed to the influence of a family, in which the empire had, for a long time, been in a manner hereditary; and were alſo intimidated by the appearance of a confederacy, the moſt formidable, perhaps, that the world had ever ſeen. Yet, notwithſtanding all this, the contingents, both of men and money, were collected ſlowly; the troops were badly compoſed; and many of thoſe, not only of the proteſtant princes, but alſo of the catholicks, ſhowed the utmoſt reluctance to act againſt his Pruſſian majeſty, which, indeed, none of them would have been able to do, had it not been for the aſſiſtance of the French under prince de Soubiſe. The elector-palatine loſt above 1000 men by deſertion. Four thouſand of the troops belonging to the duke of Wertemberg being delivered to the French commiſſary on the 24th of June, were immediately reviewed; but the review was ſcarcely finiſhed, when they began to cry aloud, that they were ſold. Next morning 30 of them deſerted at once, and were ſoon followed by parties of 20 and 30 each, who forced their way through the detachments that guarded the gates of Stutgard, and in the evening the mutiny became general. They fired upon the officers in their barracs, and let the general know, that if he did not immediately withdraw, they would put him to death. Mean while, ſome of the officers having purſued the deſerters, brought bac a part of them priſoners, when the reſt of the ſoldiers declared, that if they were not immediately releaſed, they would ſet fire to the ſtadthouſe and barracs: upon which the priſoners were ſet at liberty late in the evening. Next morning the ſoldiers aſſembled, and having ſeized ſome of the officers, 3 or 400 of them marched out of the town at a time, with the muſic of the regiments playing before them; and in this manner near 3000 of them filed off, and the remainder were afterwards diſcharged.

The king of Pruſſia, upon his leaving Bohemia, after the battle of Kolin, retired towards Saxony, as we obſerved before; and having ſent his heavy artillery and mortars up the Elbe to Dreſden, fixed his camp on the banks of that river, at Leitmeritz, where his main army was ſtrongly entrenched, whilſt mareſchal Keith, with the troops under his command, encamped on the oppoſite ſhore; a free communication being kept open by means of a bridge. At the ſame time detachments were ordered to ſecure the paſſes into Saxony. As this poſition of the king of Pruſſia prevented the Auſtrians from being able to penetrate into Saxony by the way of the Elbe, they moved by ſlow marches, into the circle of Buntzlau, and, at laſt, with a detachment commanded by the duke d'Aremberg and M. Macguire, on the 18th of June fell ſuddenly upon, and took the important poſt at Gabel, ſituated between Boemiſh-Leypa, and Zittau, after an obſtinate defence made by the Pruſſian garriſon, under major-general Putkammar, conſiſting of four battalions, who where obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. The Auſtrians having by this motion gained a march towards Luſatia, upon a corps which had been detached under the command of the prince of Pruſſia to watch them, his Pruſſian majeſty thought proper to leave Leitmeritz on the 20th in the morning, and lay that night at Lickowitz, a village oppoſite to Leitmeritz, of which a battalion of his troops ſtill kept poſſeſſion, while the reſt of his army remained encamped in the plain, before that place. Next morning, at break of day, prince Henry decamped, and made ſo good a diſpoſition for his retreat, that he did not loſe a ſingle man, though he marched in ſight of the whole body of the Auſtrian irregulars. He paſſed the bridge at Leitmeritz, after withdrawing the battalion that was in the town and having burnt the bridge, the whole army united, and made a ſmall movement towards the paſſes of the mountains; the king then lying at Sulowitz, near the field where the battle of Lowoſchutz was fought on the firſt of October the preceding year. The heavy baggage was ſent on in the afternoon, with a proper eſcorte; and in the morning of the 22d the army marched in two columns, and encamped on the high grounds at Luſechitz, a little beyond Lenai, where it halted the 23d. No attac was made upon the rear-guard, though great numbers of Auſtrian huſſars, and other irregulars, had appeared the evening before within connon-ſhot of the Pruſſian camp. On the 23th the army marched to Nellendorf; on the 25th it encamped near Cotta; on the 26th near Pirna, where it halted the next day; and on the 28th it croſſed the river near that place, and entered Luſatia, where, by the end of the month, it encamped at Bautzen.

The king's army made this retreat with all the ſucceſs that could be wiſhed; but the corpſe under the prince of Pruſſia had not the ſame good fortune: for the Auſtrians, immediately after their taking Gabel, ſent a ſtrong detachment againſt Zittau, a trading town in the circle of Upper-Saxony, where the Pruſſians had large magazines, and a garriſon of ſix battalions, and in his ſight, attacked it with uncommon rage. Paying no regard to the inhabitants as being friends or allies, but determined to reduce the place before the king of Pruſſia could have time to march to its relief, they no ſooner arrived before it, than they bombarded and cannonaded it with ſuch fury, that moſt of the garriſon, finding themſelves unable to reſiſt, made their eſcape, and carried off as much as they could of the magazines, leaving only 3 or 400 men in the town, under colonel Diricke, to hold it out as long as poſſible; which he accordingly did, till the whole place was almoſt deſtroyed. The cannonading began on the 23d of July, at 11 in the morning, and laſted till five in the evening. In this ſpace of time 4000 balls, many of them red-hot, were fired into this unfortunate city, with ſo little intermiſſion, that it was ſoon ſet on fire in ſeveral places. In the confuſion which the conflagration produced, the Auſtrians entered the town, and the inhabitants imagined that they had nothing further to fear; and that their friends, the Auſtrians, would aſſiſt them in extinguiſhing the flames, and ſaving the place: but in this particular their expectations were diſappointed. The Pandours and Sclavonians, who ruſhed in with the regular troops, made no diſtinction between the Pruſſians and the inhabitants of Zittau: inſtead of helping to quench the flames, they began to plunder the warehouſes which the fire had not reached; ſo that all the valuable merchandize they contained was either carried off or reduced to aſhes. Upwards of 600 houſes, and almoſt all the public buildings, the cathedrals of St. John and St. James, the orphan-houſe, eight parſonage-houſes, eight ſchools, the town-houſe, and every thing contained in it, the public weigh-houſe, the priſon, the archieves, and all the other documents of the town-council, the plate and other things of value, preſented to the town from time to time by emperors, kings, and other princes and noblemen, were entirely deſtroyed, and more than 400 citizens were killed in this aſſault. Of the whole town there was left ſtanding only 138 houſes, two churches, the council, library, and the ſalt-work. The queen of Poland was ſo affected by this melancholy account, that ſhe is ſaid to have fainted away upon hearing it. As this city belonging to their friend the king of Poland, the Auſtrians thought proper to publiſh an excuſe for their conduct, aſcribing it entirely to the neceſſity they were under, and the obſtinate defence made by the Pruſſian garriſon. But what excuſes can atone for ſuch barbarity?

The corps under the prince of Pruſſia, which had been witneſſes to the deſtruction of this unhappy place, was, by the king's march to Bautzen, fortunately extricated from the danger of being ſurrounded by the Auſtrians, who, upon his majeſty's approach, retired from their poſts on the right. Soon after this event the prince of Pruſſia, finding his health much impaired by the fatigues of the campaign[r], quitted the army, and returned to Berlin. In the mean time, mareſchal Keith, who had been left upon the frontier, to guard the paſſes of the mountains of Bohemia, arrived at Pirna, having been much harraſſed in his march by the enemy's irregular troops, and loſt ſome waggons of proviſions and baggage. After reſting a day at Pirna, he purſued his march through Dreſden with 26 battalions and 40 ſquadrons, and encamped on the right of the Elbe, before the gate of the new city, from whence he joined the king between Bautzen and Gorlitz. The Pruſſian army now re-aſſembled at this place amounted to about 60,000 men, beſides 12 battalions and 10 ſquadrons which remained in the famous camp at Pirna, under the prince of Anhault-Deſſau, to cover Dreſden, ſecure the gorges of the mountains, and chec the incurſions of the Auſtrian irregulars, with whom, as they were continually flying about the ſkirts of the Pruſſian army, as well in their encampments as on their marches, almoſt daily ſkirmiſhes happened, with various ſucceſs. Though ſome of theſe encounters were very bloody, they coſt the Pruſſians much fewer men than they loſt by deſertion ſince the battle of Kolin. The reaſon ſeems obvious:—The Pruſſian army had been recruited in times of peace, from all parts of Germany; and though this way of recruiting may be very proper in ſuch times, yet it cannot be expected to anſwer in a ſtate of actual war, eſpecially an unfortunate war: becauſe the fidelity of ſuch ſoldiers can never be ſo much depended on as that of natives, who ſerve their natural ſovereign from principle, and not merely for pay, and who muſt deſert their country, their parents, and their friends, at the ſame time that they deſert their prince.

It will be proper here to take notice of ſome events, which could not eaſily be mentioned before without breaking through the order we have propoſed to ourſelves in the writing of this hiſtory.—The empreſs-queen, more embittered than ever againſt the king of Pruſſia and his allies, recalled her miniſters, count Coloredo and Monſ. Zohern, from London, towards the beginning of July; and about the ſame time count Kaunitz, great chancellor of the empire, informed mr. Keith, the Britiſh miniſter at Vienna, that the court of London, by the ſuccours it had given, and ſtill continued to give, the king of Pruſſia, as well as by other circumſtances relating to the preſent ſtate of affairs, having broken the ſolemn engagements which united this crown with the houſe of Auſtria, her majeſty the empreſs-queen had thought proper to recall her miniſter from England, and conſequently to break off all correſpondence. Mr Keith, in purſuance of this notice, ſet out from Vienna on the 29th of July; as did alſo mr. Deſrolles, his Britannick majeſty's miniſter at the court of Bruſſels, from this laſt place, about the ſame time. On the 7th of July, general Piſa, commandant of Oſtend, Nieuport, and the maritime ports of Flanders, ſent his adjutant to the Engliſh vice-conſul at Oſtend, at ſix o'clock in the morning to tell him, that by orders from his court all communication with England was broke off; and deſired the vice-conſul to intimate to the packet-boats and Britiſh ſhipping at Oſtend, Bruges, and Nieuport to depart in 24 hours, and not to return into any of the ports of the empreſs-queen till further diſpoſitions ſhould be made. The reaſons alledged by the court of Vienna for debarring the ſubjects of his Britannick majeſty from the uſe of thoſe ports, obtained for the houſe of Auſtria by the arms and treaſures of Great-Britain, were, 'that her imperial majeſty, the empreſs-queen, could not with indifference, ſee England, inſtead of giving the ſuccours due to her by the moſt ſolemn treaties, enter into an alliance with her enemy the king of Pruſſia, and actually afford him all manner of aſſiſtance, aſſembling armies to oppoſe thoſe which the moſt chriſtian king, her ally, had ſent to her aid, and ſuffering privateers to exercie open violence in her roads, under the cannon of her ports and coaſts without giving the leaſt ſatisfaction or anſwer to the complaints made on that account; and the king of Great-Britain himſelf, at the very time ſhe was offering him a neutrality for Hanover, publiſhing by a meſſage to his parliament, that ſhe had formed with the moſt chriſtian king, dangerous deſigns againſt that electorate: therefore, her majeſty, deſirous of providing for the ſecurity of her ports, judged it expedient to give the forementioned orders; and at the ſame time to declare, that ſhe could no longer permit a free communication between her ſubjects and the Engliſh, which had hitherto been founded upon treaties that Great-Britain had without ſcruple, openly violated.'—Notwithſtanding theſe orders, the Engliſh packet-boats, with letters were allowed to paſs as uſual to and from Oſtend; the miniſters of her imperial majeſty wiſely conſidering how good a revenue the poſtage of the Engliſh letters brings in to the poſt-office of the Auſtrian Netherlands. Oſtend and Nieuport, by order of her imperial majeſty, received each of them a French garriſon; the former on the 19th of July, and the latter the next day, under the command of M. de la Motte, upon whoſe arrival the Auſtrian troops evacuated thoſe places; though the empreſs-queen ſtill reſerved to herſelf, in both of them, the full and free exerciſe of all her rights and ſovereignty; to which purpoſe an oath was adminiſtered to the French commandant by her majeſty's miniſter-plenipotentiary for the government of the Low Countries. At the ſame time, their imperial and moſt chriſtian majeſties notified to the magiſtracy of Hamburgh, that they muſt not admit any Engliſh men of war, or tranſports, into their port, on pain of having a French garriſon impoſed on them. The city of Gueldres, which had been blocked up by the French ever ſince the beginning of ſummer, was forced by famine to capitulate on the 24th of Auguſt, and the garriſon marched out with all the honours of war, in order to be conducted to Berlin: but ſo many of them deſerted, that when they paſſed by Cologn, the whole garriſon conſiſted only of the commandant, and 47 men. By the ſurrender of this place the whole country lay open to the French and their allies quite up to Magdebourg; and the empreſs-queen immediately received 200,000 crowns from the revenues of Cleves and la Marcke alone.

[r] This was the reaſon that was publicly aſſigned for his quitting the army: but a much more probable one, which was only whiſpered, ſeems to have been, that this prince, than whom none ever was more remarkable for humanity and the ſocial virtues, diſliking the violent proceedings of the king his brother, could not refrain from expoſtulating with him on that ſubject: upon which his majeſty, with an air of great diſapprobation, told him 'that the air of Berlin would be better for him than that of the camp.' The prince accordingly retired to Berlin, where he died ſoon after; grief and concern for the welfare of his brother, and for the ſteps taken by him, having no ſmall ſhare in his death.

To return to the affairs more immediately relating to the king of Pruſſia. The advanced poſts of the prince of Anhault-Deſſau at Pirna were attacked on the 10th of Auguſt by a body of huſſars, and other irregular troops of the Auſtrians; but the Pruſſians ſoon obliged them to retire, with the loſs of ſeveral men and two pieces of cannon. On the 19th of the ſame month, early in the morning, a great number of Auſtrian Pandours ſurrounded a little town called Gotliebe, in which a Pruſſian garriſon was quartered, with a deſign to take it by ſurpriſe. The Pandours attacked it on all ſides, and in the beginning killed 23 Pruſſians, and wounded many; but the Pruſſians having rallied, repulſed the aſſailants with great loſs. Theſe, however, were but a ſort of preludes to much more deciſive actions which happened ſoon after. Sileſia, which had hitherto been undiſturbed this year, began now to feel the effects of war. Baron Jahnus, an Auſtrian colonel, entering that country with only an handful of men, made himſelf maſter of Hirſchbergh, Waldenberg, Gotteſburg, Frankenſtein, and Landſhut. They were, indeed, but open places, and he was repulſed in an attempt upon Strigau. On the ſide of Franconia the army of the empire was aſſembling with all ſpeed, under the prince of Saxe-Hildburghauſen; the French were marching a ſecond army from their interior provinces into Alſac, in order to join the imperialiſts: the firſt diviſion of their troops had already entered the empire, and were advanced as far as Hanau. The Swedes were now preparing, with the utmoſt expedition, to ſend a numerous army into Pomerania; and the Ruſſians, who, ſince the taking of Memel, had not done the king of Pruſſia much damage, beſides that of obliging him to keep an army in Pruſſia to oppoſe them, and interrupting the trade of Konigſberg by their ſquadrons, were again advancing with haſty ſtrides towards Pruſſia, marking their ſteps with horrid deſolation. Field-mareſchal Lehwald, who had been left in Pruſſia, with an army of 30,000 men, to guard that kingdom during the abſence of his maſter, was encamped near Velau, when the Ruſſians, to the number of 80,000 after taking Memel, advanced againſt the territories of the Pruſſian king, whoſe ſituation now drew upon him the attention of all Europe. In the night between the 7th and 8th of Auguſt, colonel Malaahowſki, one of mareſchal Lehwald's officers, marched to reconnoitre the poſition of the enemy, when a ſkirmiſh happened. which laſted near two hours, between his advanced ranks and a Ruſſian detachment, three times ſtronger than the Pruſſians. The Ruſſians were repulſed, and fled into the woods, after having 50 men killed, and a great number wounded. The Pruſſians loſt but one man, and had 14 wounded.

Several other little ſkirmiſhes happened between ſtraggling parties of the two armies; and the Ruſſians went on pillaging and laying waſte every thing before them, till at length the two armies having approached one another in Bradenburgh-Pruſſia, mareſchal Lehwald, finding it impoſſible to ſpare detachments from ſo ſmall a number as his was, compared to that of the enemy, to cover the wretched inhabitants from the outrages committed on them by the Ruſſian Coſſacks, and other barbarians belonging to them, judged it abſolutely neceſſary to attac their main army, and accordingly, notwithſtanding his great diſadvantage in almoſt every reſpect, he reſolved to hazard a battle on the 30th of Auguſt. The Ruſſians, conſiſting, as we before obſerved, of 80,000 regulars, under the command of mareſchal Apraxin, avoiding the open field, were entrenched in a moſt advantageous camp near Norkitten, in Pruſſia. Their army was compoſed of four lines, each of which was guarded by an entrenchment, and the whole was defended by 200 pieces of cannon, batteries being placed upon all the eminences. Mareſchal Lehwald's army ſcarcely amounted to 30,000 men. The action began at five in the morning, and was carried on with ſo much vigour, that the Pruſſians entirely broke the whole firſt line of the enemy, and forced all their batteries. The prince of Holſtein-Gottorp, brother to the king of Sweden, at the head of his regiment of dragoons, routed the Ruſſian cavalry, and afterwards fell upon a regiment of grenadiers, which was cut to pieces; but when the Pruſſians came to the ſecond entrenchment, mareſchal Lehwald, ſeeing that he could not attempt to carry it without expoſing his army too much, took the reſolution to retire. The Pruſſians returned to their former camp at Velau, and the Ruſſians remained in their preſent ſituation. The loſs of the Pruſſians little exceeding 2000 killed and wounded, was immediately replaced out of the diſciplined militia. The Ruſſians loſt a much greater number. General Lapuchin was wounded and taken priſoner, with a colonel of the Ruſſian artillery, but the former was ſent bac on his parole. The Pruſſian army had, at firſt, made themſelves maſters of about 80 pieces of cannon, but were afterwards obliged to abandon them, with 11 of their own, for want of carriages. Three Ruſſian generals were killed; but the Pruſſians loſt no general or officer of diſtinction, of which rank count Dohna was the only one that was wounded.

After this engagement, mareſchal Lehwald changed the poſition of his army, by drawing towards Peterſwald, and the Ruſſians, after remaining quite inactive till the 30th of September, on a ſudden, to the great ſurpriſe of every one retreated out of Pruſſia, with ſuch precipitation, that they left all their ſic and wounded behind them, to the amount of 15 or 16,000 men, together with 80 pieces of cannon, and a conſiderable part of their military ſtores. Mareſchal Apraxin maſked his deſign by advancing all his irregulars towards the Pruſſian army; ſo that mareſchal Lehwald was not informed of it till the third day, when he detached prince George of Holſtein with 10,000 horſe to purſue them; but with little hopes of coming up with them, as they made forced marches, in order to be the ſooner in their own country. However, the Pruſſians took ſome of them priſoners, and many ſtragglers were killed by the country people in their flight towards Tilſit, which they abandoned, though they ſtill kept Memel, and ſhortly after added ſome new fortifications to that place. They made their retreat in two columns, one of which directed its courſe towards Memel; whilſt the other took the neareſt way through the bailiwic of Abſternen, and threw bridges over the river Jura. Both columns burnt every village they paſſed through without diſtinction. The Pruſſians were obliged to deſiſt from the purſuit of theſe barbarians, becauſe the bridges thrown over the river Memel had been deſtroyed by the violence of the ſtream. The Ruſſian army ſuffered greatly for want of bread, as all the countries were ruined through which it paſſed, ſo that they could procure no ſort of ſubſiſtence but herbage and rye bread. All the roads were ſtrewed with dead bodies of men and horſes. The real cauſe of this ſudden retreat is as great a myſtery as the reaſon of their ſtopping ſo long the year before on the borders of Lithuania: though the occaſion of it is ſaid to have been the illneſs of the czarina, who was ſeized with a kind of apoplectic fit, and had made ſome new regulation in caſe of a vacancy of the throne, which rendered it expedient that the regular forces ſhould be at hand, to ſupport the meaſures taken by the government.

The king of Pruſſia, after remaining for ſome time encamped between Bautzen and Goerlitz, removed his headquarters to Bernſtedel; and on the 15th of Auguſt his army came in ſight of the Auſtrian camp, and within cannonſhot of it: upon which the Auſtrians ſtruc their tents, and drew up in order of battle before their camp. The king formed his army over againſt them, and immediately went to reconnoitre the ground between the armies; but, as it was then late, he defered the more exact examination of that circumſtance till the next day. The two armies continued under arms all night. Next morning, at break of day, the king found the Auſtrians encamped with their right at the river Weiſle; the reſt of their army extended along a riſing ground, at the foot of a mountain covered with wood, which protected their left, and before their front, at the bottom of the hill on which they were drawn up, was a ſmall brook, paſſable only in three places, and for no more than four or five men a-breaſt. Towards the left of their army was an opening, where three or four battalions might have marched in front: but behind it they had placed three lines of infantry, and on a hill which flanked this opening, within muſket-ſhot, were placed 4000 foot, with 40 or 50 pieces of cannon; ſo that, in reality, this was the ſtrongeſt part of their camp. The king left nothing undone to bring the Auſtrians to a battle; but finding them abſolutely bent on avoiding it, after lying four days before them, he and his army returned to their camp at Bernſtedel. They were followed by ſome of the enemy's huſſars and pandours, who, however, had not the ſatisfaction to take the ſmalleſt booty in this retreat. The Auſtrian army, which thus declined engaging, was, by their own account, 130,000 ſtrong, more than double the number of the king of Pruſſia, who, the day he returned to Bernſtedel, after he had retired about 2000 yards, again drew up his army in line of battle, and remained ſo upwards of an hour, but not a man ſtirred from the Auſtrian camp. The army of the empire, commanded by the prince of Saxe-Hildburghauſen, and that of the French under the prince de Soubiſe, making together about 50,000 men, half of which were French, had by this time joined, and advanced as far as Erfurth in Saxony; upon which his Pruſſian majeſty, finding that all his endeavours could not bring the Auſtrians to an engagement, ſet out from Luſatia, accompanied by mareſchal Keith, with 16 battalions and 40 ſquadrons of his troops, and arrived at Dreſden on the 29th of Auguſt, leaving the reſt of the army in a ſtrong camp, under the prince of Bevern. With this detachment, which by the junction of ſeveral bodies of troops, amounted about 40,000 men, he made a quic march, by the way of Leipſig, towards Erfurth, to give battle to the united army of the French and the empire. But by the time he arrived at Erfurth, which was on the 14th of September, the enemy had retreated towards Gotha; and upon his further approach, they retired to Eyeſenach, where they entrenched themſelves in a very ſtrong camp. His majeſty's head-quarters were at Kirſchlaben, near Erfurth. While the two armies were thus ſituated, major-general Seydlitz, who occupied the town of Gotha, being informed on the 19th, that a large body of the enemy was coming towards him, and that it conſiſted of two regiments of Auſtrian huſſars, one regiment of French huſſars, and a detachment made up of French grenadiers, troops of the army of the empire, and a great number of Croats and Pandours, retired and poſted himſelf at ſome diſtance. The enemy immediately took poſſeſſion of the town and caſtle; but general Seydelitz, having been re-enforced, attacked the enemy with ſuch vigour, that he ſoon obliged them to obandon their new conqueſt, and to retire with great precipitation; a report having been ſpread, that the Pruſſian army was advancing againſt them, with the king himſelf in perſon. The Pruſſian huſſars took a conſiderable booty on this occaſion, and general Sepdelitz ſent priſoners to the camp one lieutenant-colonel, three majors, four lieutenants, and 62 ſoldiers of the enemy, who had alſo about 130 killed. After this action his Pruſſian majeſty advanced near Eyeſenach, with a deſign to attac the combined army; but they were ſo ſtrongly entrenched that he found it impracticable. His proviſions falling ſhort, he was obliged to retire towards Erfurth, and ſoon after to Numburgh on the river Sala; whereupon the combined army marched, and again took poſſeſſion of Gotha, Erfurth, and Weimar: which laſt place, however, they ſoon after quitted.

Upon the king of Pruſſia's leaving Bernſtedel, the Auſtrians took poſſeſſion of it on the 6th of September, and made priſoners a Pruſſian battalion which had been left there. The next day fifteen thouſand Auſtrians attacked two battalions of general Winterfields's troops, being part of the prince of Bevern's army, who were poſted on a high ground on the other ſide of the Neiſs, near Hennerſdorff, in the neighbourhood of Goerlitz; and, after being repulſed ſeveral times, at laſt made themſelves maſters of the eminence. The loſs, in this action, was conſiderable on both ſides, but greateſt on that of the Pruſſians, not ſo much by the number of their ſlain, which ſcarcely exceeded that of the Auſtrians, as by the death of their brave general Winterfield, who, as he was leading up ſuccours to the battalions that were engaged, received a ſhot from a cannon, of which he died the night following. The generals Nadaſti and Clerici, count d'Arberg, colonel Elrickhauſen, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction, were wounded, and the young count of Groeſbeck and the marquis d'Aſque killed, on the ſide of the Auſtrians, who took ſix pieces of the Pruſſian cannon, ſix pair of their colours, and made general Kemeke, the count d'Anhalt, and ſome other officers, priſoners. After this ſkirmiſh, the prince of Bevern, with the Pruſſian army under his command, retreated from Goerlitz to Rothenberg, then paſſed the Queiſs at Sygerſdoff, from whence he marched to Buntzlau, in Sileſia, and on the firſt of October reached Breſlau, without ſuffering any loſs, though the numerous army of the Auſtrians followed him for ſome days. Upon his arrival there, he choſe a very ſtrong camp on the other ſide of the Oder, in order to cover the city of Breſlau, to the fortifications of which he immediately added ſeveral new works. Though neither ſide had any very ſignal advantage in this engagement, more than that the Auſtrians remained maſters of the field, yet great rejoicings were made at Vienna on account of it. The death of general Winterfield was, indeed, an irreparable loſs to his Pruſſian majeſty, who received at the ſame time the news of this misfortune, and of the Swedes having now actually begun hoſtilities in Pomerania.

A body of the French, who, let looſe againſt the king of Pruſſia by the ever-memorable and ſhameful convention of Cloſter-Seven, had entered the territories of Halberſtadt and Magdeburg, were worſted at Eglen by a party of ſix hundred men, under the command of count Horn, whom prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick had detached from a body of troops with which his Pruſſian majeſty had ſent him to defend thoſe countries. The Pruſſians took priſoners the count of Luſignan, colonel, eighteen other French officers, and four hundred ſoldiers, and made themſelves maſters of a conſiderable booty in baggage, &c. with the loſs of only two men; and, moreover, a French officer and forty men were made priſoners at Halberſtadt. Upon this check the French evacuated the country of Halberſtadt, for a little while, but returning again on the 29th of September, with a conſiderable re-enforcement from mareſchal Richlieu's army, which he now could eaſily ſpare, prince Ferdinand was obliged to retire to Winſleben, near the city of Magleburg. The dangers which had been hitherto kept at a diſtance from the Pruſſian dominions, by the ſurpriſing activity of their king, now drew near and menaced them on all ſides. Mareſchal Richlieu, with eighty battalions and an hundred ſquadrons, entered the country of Halberſtadt, and levied immenſe contributions; whilſt the allied army of the French and Imperialiſts, being joined by 6000 men under general Laudohn, who had juſt defeated a regiment of Pruſſian cavalry near Erfurth, marched to Weiſſenfels, a city in the very centre of Thuringia. The Swedes had actually taken ſome towns in Pomerania, and were advancing to beſiege Stetin, and the Auſtrians, who had made themſelves maſters of Lignitz, and a conſiderable part of Sileſia, had now laid ſiege to Schweidnitz, and were preparing to paſs the Oder, in order to attac the prince of Bevern in his camp near Breſlau. In the mean time, they made frequent, and always deſtructive incurſions into Brandenburgh; to oppoſe which his Pruſſian majeſty ordered detachments from all his regiments in thoſe parts to join the militia of the country, and ſent the prince of Anhalt Deſſau from Leipzig, with a body of 10,000 men, to guard Berlin, whilſt he himſelf marched with the troops under his command to Interbeck, on the frontier of the Lower-Luſatia, to be the more at hand to cover Bradenburgh, and preſerve the communication with Sileſia.

While theſe precautions were taking, general Haddick, with 15 or 16,000 Auſtrians, entered Bradenburgh on the 16th of October, and the next day arrived before Berlin, of which city he demanded a contribution of 600,000 crowns, but contented himſelf with 210,000. The Auſtrians plaged two of the ſuburbs, but before they could do any further miſchief they were obliged to retire in great haſte, at the approach of the prince of Anhalt Deſſau, whoſe vanguard entered the city in the evening of their departure. This alarm, however, obliged the queen and the royal family of Pruſſia to remove to Magdeburgh on the 23d, and the moſt valuable records were ſent to the fort of Spandau, at the conflux of the Havel and the Sphre. On the other hand, the unfortunate inhabitants of Leipzig now felt moſt ſeverely the cruel effects of the power of their new maſter. The Pruſſian commandant in that city had, by order of his king, demanded of them 300,000 crowns, a ſum far greater than it was in their power to raiſe. This truth they repreſented, but in vain. The ſhort time allowed them to furniſh their contigents being expired, and all their efforts to comply with this demand having proved ineffectual, they were ſubjected to the rigours of military execution; in conſequence of which their houſes were occupied by the ſoldiery, who ſeized upon the beſt apartments, and lived at diſcretion; but the ſum demanded could not be found. Such was the ſituation of this diſtreſſed city, when, on the 15th of October, an expreſs arrived, with advice that his Pruſſian majeſty would ſoon be there; and accordingly he arrived a few minutes after, attended by his life-guards. At the ſame time, a rumour was ſpread that the city would be delivered up to pillage, which threw the inhabitants into the utmoſt conſternation. Their fears, however, in that reſpect were ſoon abated, by his majeſty's declaring that he was willing to ſpare the place, upon condition that half the ſum required ſhould be immediately paid. All that could be done was to collect among the merchants, traders, and others, 50,000 crowns; bills of Exchange were drawn upon Amſterdam and London for 70,000 crowns, and hoſtages were given, by way of ſecurity for the payment of 30,000 more within a time which was agreed on. But ſtill, notwithſtanding this, the military execution was continued, even with greater rigour than before, and all the comfort the wretched inhabitants could obtain was, that it ſhould ceaſe whenever advice ſhould be received that their bills were accepted.

The king of Pruſſia had tried ſeveral times to bring the combined army under the princes of Saxe-Hilburghauſen and Soubiſe to an engagement upon fair ground; but finding them bent on declining it, notwithſtanding the ſuperiority of their numbers, he had recourſe to one of thoſe ſtrokes in war, by which a general is better ſeen than by the gaining of a victory. He made a feint, ſoon after the beginning of October, as if he intended nothing more than to ſecure his own dominions, and march his army into winter-quarters bac to Berlin, leaving mareſchal Keith, with only 7 or 8000 men, to defend Leipzig. Upon this the enemy took courage, paſſed the Sala, and having marched up to the city, ſummoned the mareſchal to ſurrender, to which he anſwered, That the king, his maſter, had ordered him to defend the place to the laſt extremity, and he would obey his orders. The enemy thought of beſieging the city; but, before they could prepare any one implement for that purpoſe, they were alarmed by the approach of the king of Pruſſia, who judging that his feint would probably induce them to take the ſtep they did, had, by previous and private orders, collected together all his diſtant detachments, ſome of which were twenty leagues aſunder, and was advancing, by long marches, to Leipzig; upon notice of which the enemy repaſſed the Sala. The Pruſſian army was re-aſſembled on the 27th of October, and remained at Leipzig the 28th and 29th, when every body expected a battle would be fought in the plains of Lutzen. On the 30th the king drew nigh that place, and on the 31ſt, in his way through Weiſſenfels and Mereſbourg, he made 500 men priſoners of war. The combined army had repaſſed the Sala at Weiſſenfels, Mereſbourg, and Halle, where they broke down the bridges, but theſe were ſoon repaired, and the whole Pruſſian army, amounting to no more than 20,000 men, having paſſed that river, through theſe towns, in each of which they left a battalion, joined again on the 3d of November, in the evening, over-againſt the enemy, whoſe forces conſiſted of 40,000 French, and 25,000 imperialiſts. On the 5th about 9 o'clock in the morning, the Pruſſians received intelligence that the enemy were every where in motion. They likewiſe heard the drums beating the march, and ſo near were the two armies to each other, plainly perceived from their camp, that their whole infantry, which had drawn nearer upon the riſing grounds over-againſt them, was filing off towards their right. No certain judgment could, however, yet be formed of the enemy's real deſign, and as they were in want of bread, it was thought probable that they intended to repaſs the Unſtrut; but it was ſoon perceived that their ſeveral motions were contradictory to each other. At the ſame time that ſome of their infantry were filing off towards their right, a large body of cavalry wheeled round towards their left, directing its march all along to the riſing grounds with which the whole Pruſſian camp, that lay in a bottom between the villages of Rederow and Roſbach, was ſurrounded, within the reach of large cannon. Soon after that, the cavalry were ſeen to halt, and afterwards to fall bac to the right; though ſome of them ſtill remained where they were, whilſt the reſt marched bac. About two in the afternoon the doubts of the Pruſſians were cleared up; it plainly appearing then that the enemy intended to attac them, and that their diſpoſitions were made with a view to ſurround them, and to open the action by attacking them in the rear. A body of reſerve was poſted over againſt Rederow, to fall upon their routed troops, in caſe they ſhould be defeated, and to prevent their retiring to Mereſburgh, the only retreat which could then have been left them. In this ſituation the king of Pruſſia reſolved to attac them. His majeſty had determined to make the attac with one wing only, and the diſpoſition of the enemy made it neceſſary that it ſhould be the left wing. The very inſtant the battle was going to begin, his majeſty ordered the general who commanded the right wing to decline engaging, to take a proper poſition in conſequence thereof, and, above all, to prevent his being ſurrounded. All the cavalry of the right wing of the Pruſſians, except two or three ſquadrons, had already marched to the left at full gallop; and being arrived at the place aſſigned them, they formed over-againſt that of the enemy. They then moved on immediately, the enemy's advanced to meet them, and the charge was very fierce, ſeveral regiments of the French coming on with great reſolution. The advantage, however, was entirely on the ſide of the Pruſſians. The enemy's cavalry being routed, were purſued for a conſiderable time with great ſpirit, but having afterwards reached an eminence, which gave them an opportunity of rallying, the Pruſſian cavalry fell upon them afreſh, and gave them ſo total a defeat, that they fled in the utmoſt diſorder. This happened at four in the afternoon. Whilſt the cavalry of the Pruſſians charged, their infantry opened. The enemy cannonaded them briſkly during this interval, and did ſome execution, but the Pruſſian artillery was not idle. After this cannonading had continued on both ſides a full quarter of an hour, without the leaſt intermiſſion, the fire of the infantry began. The enemy could not ſtand it, nor reſiſt the valour of the Pruſſian foot, who gallantly marched up to their batteries. The batteries were carried one after another, and the enemy were forced to give away, which they did in great confuſion. As the left wing of the Pruſſians advanced, the right changed its poſition, and having ſoon met with a ſmall riſing ground, they availed themſelves of it, by planting it with 16 pieces of heavy artillery. The fire from thence was partly pointed at the enemy's right, to increaſe the diſorder there, and took their left wing in front, which was exceſſively galled thereby. At five the victory was decided, the cannonading ceaſed, and the enemy fled on all ſides. They were purſued as long as there was any light to diſtinguiſh them, and it may be ſaid, that night alone was the preſervation of this army, which had been ſo formidable in the morning. They took the benefit of the darkneſs to hurry into Fryburgh, and there to repaſs the Unſtrut, which they did on the morning of the 6th, after a whole night's march. The king of Pruſſia ſet out early in the morning to purſue them with all his cavalry, ſupported by four battalions of grenadiers, the infantry following them in two columns. The enemy paſſed the Unſtrut at Fryburgh, when the Pruſſians arrived on its banks, and as they had burnt the bridge, it became neceſſary to make another, which, however, was ſoon done. The cavalry paſſed firſt, but could not come up with the enemy till five in the evening, upon the hills of Eckerſberg. It was then too late to force them there, for which reaſon the king thought proper to canton his army in the neareſt villages, and to be ſatisfied with the ſucceſs his huſſars had in taking near 300 baggage waggons, and every thing they contained. The whole loſs of the Pruſſians, in this important engagement, did not exceed 500 men killed and wounded. Among the former was general Meincke, and among the latter prince Henry and general Seydelitz. The enemy loſt 64 pieces of cannon, a great many ſtandards and colours, near 3000 men killed on the field of battle, and upwards of 8000 taken priſoners, among whom were ſeveral generals, and other officers of diſtinction. Three hundred waggons were ſent to Leipzig, laden with wounded French and Swiſs. Upon the approach of the Pruſſians towards Eckereſberg, the enemy retreated with great precipitation; and, after marching all night, arrived the next day at Erfurth, in the utmoſt want of every neceſſary of life, not having had a morſel of bread for two days, during which they had been obliged to live upon turnips, radiſhes, and other roots, which they dug out of the earth. The French, under the duke de Richelieu, were preparing to go into winter-quarters; but upon the news of this defeat of the combined army, they again put themſelves in motion, and a large detachment of them advanced as far as Duderſtadt, to favour the retreat of their countrymen under the prince de Soubiſe, who, with great precipitancy, made the beſt of their way from Erfurth to the county of Hohenſtein, and from thence bent their march towards Halberſtadt. Of the remains of the imperial army, which was now almoſt entirely diſperſed, whole bodies deſerted, and went over to the king of Pruſſia, ſoon after this battle.

Whilſt his Pruſſian majeſty was thus ſucceſsful againſt the French and imperialiſts, the Auſtrians, who had carefully avoided coming to an open engagement with him, gained ground a-pace in Sileſia. A detachment of their army, under the command of count Nadaſti, had already inveſted Schweidnitz, and opened the trenches before it on the 26th of October. The Pruſſian garriſon, commanded by general de la Motte Fouquet, determined to defend the place as long as poſſible; and accordingly on the 30th they made a ſally, in which they killed, wounded, and took priſoners, 800 of the beſiegers, and did ſome damage to their works; but on the 6th of November the Auſtrians began to cannonade the city furiouſly, and on the 11th made themſelves maſters of the ramparts by aſſault. The garriſon, however, having taken care, during the ſiege, to throw up a ſtrong entrenchment in the market-place, retreated thither, and held out till the next day, when they ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war. After the reduction of this place, general Nadaſti, leaving in it a ſufficient garriſon, marched with the remainder of his troops, and joined the main army of the Auſtrians, under the command of prince Charles of Lorrain and mareſchal Daun, who, whilſt he was buſied in the ſiege of Schweidnitz, had inveſted Breſlau on the left of the Oder; the prince of Bevern defending it on the right, where he was ſtrongly encamped, with his little army, under the cannon of the city. The whole army of the Auſtrians being now re-aſſembled, and intelligence having being brought, not only of the king of Pruſſia's late victory near Leipzig, but alſo that he was advancing to the relief of the prince of Bevern, it was reſolved immediately to attac the laſt in his entrenchments. Accordingly, on the 22d of November, about nine in the morning, the Auſtrians began a moſt furious diſcharge of their cannon, 40 of which were 24 pounders, and this continued without ceaſing till one, when it was ſucceeded by a ſevere fire of their ſmall arms, which laſted till five in the evening. The Pruſſians, with undaunted reſolution, ſtood two of the moſt violent attacs that were ever made, but at the third, overpowered by numbers, and aſſailed on both ſides, they began to loſe ground, and were forced to retire from one entrenchment to another. In this extremity, night coming on, the Pruſſian generals fearing their entrenchments would be intirely forced, and that they ſhould then be totally defeated, thought proper to retreat. The prince of Bevern, with the greateſt part of the army, retired to an eminence on the banks of the Oder, whilſt the reſt of the troops threw themſelves into Breſlau, which they might have defended, in all probability, till the king had come up to its relief. But, on the 24th, their commander in chief, the prince of Bevern, going to reconnoitre the enemy, with only a ſingle groom to attend him, fell in among a party of Croats, who took him priſoner[s]. His army, thus deprived of their general, retreated northward that night, leaving in Breſlau only four battalions, who, the next day, ſurrendered the place by capitulation, one of the articles of which was, that they ſhould not ſerve againſt the empreſs, or her allies, for two years. All the magazines, cheſts, artillery, &c. remained in the hands of the Auſtrians. The garriſon marched out with all military honours, conducted by general Leſwitz, governor of Breſlau. Though the Auſtrians ſung Te Deum for this victory, they owned that ſuch another would put an end to their army, for it coſt them the lives of 12,000 men, a number almoſt equal to the whole of the Pruſſian army before the battle. They had four almoſt inacceſſible entrenchments to force, planted thic with cannon, which fired cartridge-ſhot from nine in the morning till the evening, and the Pruſſians, when attacked, were never once put into the leaſt confuſion. Among the ſlain, on the ſide of the Auſtrians were general Wurben, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction. The loſs of the Pruſſians did not much exceeed 3000 men, in killed, wounded, and priſoners, of which laſt there were about 1600. Their general Kleiſt was found dead on the field of battle.

The king of Pruſſia, who, like Cæſar, thought nothing was done while any thing was left undone, ſtayed no longer at Roſbach than till the routed forces of the French and imperialiſts, whom he had defeated there on the 5th of November, were totally diſperſed. Then he marched directly with the greateſt part of his army for Sileſia, and on the 24th of that month arrived at Naumburgh on the Queiſs, a little river which runs into the Bobber, having in his rout detached mareſchal Keith, with the reſt of his army, to clear Saxony from all the Auſtrian parties, and then to make an irruption into Bohemia, a ſervice which he performed ſo effectually as to raiſe large contributions in the circles of Satz and Leitmeritz, and even to give an alarm to Prague itſelf. His majeſty reſerved for himſelf on 15,000 men, with whom he advanced, with his uſual rapidity, to Barchwitz, where, notwithſtanding all that had happened at Schweidnitz, and at Breſlau, he was joined by 24,000 more; part of them troops which he had ordered from Saxony, part of the remains of the army lately commanded by the prince of Bevern, and part of the late garriſon of Schweidnitz, which had found means to eſcape from the Auſtrians, and accidently joined their king upon his march[t]. With this force, though greatly inferior in number to that of the enemy, he reſolved to attac the Auſtrians, who were entrenched at Liſſa, near Breſlau. On the 4th of December he ſeized upon their ovens at Neumarck, and upon a conſiderable magazine, guarded by two regiments of Croats, who retired to a riſing ground, where his majeſty ordered his huſſars to ſurround them, and ſent a trumpet to ſummon them to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. Upon their refuſal, the huſſars of Ziethen fell upon them ſabre in hand, and ſome hundreds of them having been cut in pieces, the reſt threw down their arms, begging for quarter on their knees. After this ſeizure, and after having diſtributed to his army the bread prepared for his enemies, he began again the next morning his march towards Liſſa. General Ziethen, who led the van-guard of light-horſe, about ſeven in the morning fell in with a body of Auſtrian huſſars, and three regiments of Saxon dragoons, which were the very beſt cavalry the enemy had left after the battle of the 22d. They had been detached by the Auſtrians, in order to retard the king's march, and to conceal their own, till their batteries ſhould be completed; for, as they held the ſmall number of the Pruſſians in contempt, their intention was to have met the king two German miles from their entrenchments. The Auſtrian cavaly having been vigorouſly repulſed to a conſiderable diſtance, general Ziethen perceived that their whole army was forming. He immediately acquainted the king with what he had diſcovered, and his majeſty, after having himſelf obſerved the diſpoſition of the enemy, made his own with that ſagacity and diſpatch for which he has always been remarkable. The action began by attacking a battery of 40 pieces of large cannon, which covered the right wing of the enemy. The two battalions of guards, with the regiments of the Margrave Charles and of Itzenplitz, marched up, amidſt a moſt terrible fire, to the very mouths of the cannon, with their bayonets ſcrewed. In this attac the Pruſſians ſuſtained their greateſt loſs, though the battery was carried as ſoon almoſt as they could reach it: then the enemy's artillery, now turned againſt themſelves, played furiouſly upon them with their own powder. From that inſtant the two wings and the centre of the Pruſſians continued to drive the enemy before them, advancing all the time with that firm and regular pace for which they have always been renowned, without ever halting or giving way. The ground which the Auſtrians occupied was very advantageous, and every circumſtance that could render it more ſo had been improved to the utmoſt by the diligence and ſkill of count Daun, who remembering his former ſucceſs, was emboldened to enter the liſts again with his royal antagoniſt. The Pruſſians, however, no way terrified by the enemy's ſituation, [s] We are told, that he miſtook theſe Croats for Pruſſian huſſars. But ſome of the circumſtances of this myſterious affair was interpreted into a premeditated deſign in the prince to be taken priſoner. It cannot otherwiſe be ſuppoſed that a man of his rank, a prince, a commander in chief, ſhould officiouſly undertake the always dangerous taſk of reconnoitring the enemy, with ſo ſlight an attendance as only one man, and that but a groom, even if he had judged it neceſſary to ſee things with his own eyes. Some ſecret diſſatisfaction hitherto unknown to us, may poſſibly have been the cauſe of his taking this ſtep; or, which ſeems ſtill more probable, he might be aſhamed, or, perhaps, even afraid, to ſee the king his maſter, after having ſo judiciouſly abandoned the defence of Breſlau, by quitting his lines, which, it is aſſerted his Puſſian majeſty had ſent him expreſs orders not to quit on any account whatever, for that he would certainly be with him by the 5th of December, in which we ſhall find he kept his word.

[t] Whilſt the Auſtrians were conducting them to priſon, on their rout they chanced to hear of the victory their maſter had gained at Roſbach. Animated by theſe tidings, they unanimouſly roſe upon the eſcort that guarded them, which, happening not to be very ſtrong, they entirely diſperſed. Thus freed, they marched on, not very certain of their way, in hopes to join ſome corps of the Pruſſian troops, their countrymen. The ſame fortune which freed them led them directly to the army commanded by the king himſelf, which was haſtening to their relief, as well as to that of the prince of Bevern. This unexpected meeting was equally pleaſing to both, the priſoners not having heard any thing of his majeſty's march; and at the ſame time, this lucky incident, whilſt it added a conſiderable ſtrength to the army, added likewiſe to its confidence, for the ſlighteſt occurrence is conſtrued into an omen, by an army at the eve of an engagement.

nor their numbers, went calmly and dreadfully forward. It was almoſt impoſſible, in the beginning, for the Pruſſian cavalry to act, on account of the impediments of fallen trees, which the enemy had cut down and laid in the field of battle, to retard their approach; but a judicious diſpoſition which the king made overcame that diſadvantage. When he firſt formed his army, he had placed four battalions behind the cavalry of his right wing, foreſeeing that general Nadaſti, who was placed with a corps of reſerve on the enemy's left, deſigned to take him in flank. It happened as he had foreſeen, this general's horſe attacked the king's right wing with great fury: but he was received with ſo ſevere a fire from the four battalions, that he was obliged to retire in diſorder. The enemy gave way on all ſides, but at ſome diſtance recovered themſelves, and rallied three times, animated by their officers, and by the ſuperiority of their numbers. Every time they made a ſtand, the Pruſſians attacked them with redoubled vigour, and with ſucceſs equal to their bravery. Towards night, the enemy ſtill retreating, fell into diſorder. Their two wings fled in confuſion; one of them cloſely preſſed by the king, retired towards Breſlau, and took ſhelter under the cannon of that city; the other, purſued by the greateſt part of the light cavalry, took their flight towards Canth and Schweidnitz. Six thouſand Auſtrians fell in this engagement, and the Pruſſians, who had only 500 men killed, and 2300 wounded, made upwards of 10,000 of the enemy priſoners, among whom were 291 officers. They alſo took 116 cannon, 51 colours and ſtandards, and 4000 waggons of ammunition and baggage. The conſequences that followed this victory declared its importance. Future ages will read with aſtoniſhment, that the ſame prince, who but a few months before ſeemed on the verge of inevitable ruin, merely by dint of his own abilities, without the aſſiſtance of any friend whatever, with troops perpetually harraſſed by long and painful marches, and by continual ſkirmiſhes and battles, not only retrieved his affairs, which almoſt every one except himſelf thought paſt redreſs; but in the midſt of winter, in countries where it was judged next to impoſſible for any troops to keep the field at that ſeaſon, conquered the united force of France and the empire at Roſbach on the 5th of November, and on the ſame day of the very next month, with a great part of the ſame army, was at Liſſa, where he again triumphed over all the power of the houſe of Auſtria. Purſuing his advantage, he immediately inveſted Breſlau, and within two days after this great victory every thing was in readineſs to beſiege it in form. His troops, fluſhed with ſucceſs, were at firſt for ſtorming it, but the king knowing the ſtrength of the garriſon, which conſiſted of upwards of 13,000 men, and conſidering both the fatigues which his own ſoldiers had lately undergone, and the fatal conſequences that might enſue, ſhould they fail of ſucceſs in this attempt, ordered the approaches to be carried on in the uſual form. His commands were obeyed, and Breſlau ſurrendered to him on the 20th of December in the morning. The garriſon, of which 10,000 bore arms, and between 3 and 4000 lay ſic or wounded, were made priſoners of war. Fourteen of theſe priſoners were officers of high rank. The military cheſt, a vaſt treaſure, with 80 pieces of cannon, fell into the hands of the victors, who loſt only about 20 men in their approaches. During the ſiege, a magazine of powder was ſet on fire by a bomb, which occaſioned great confuſion among the beſieged, and damaged one of the baſtions. The ſtrong fortreſs of Schweidnitz ſtill remained in the enemy's poſſeſſion, defended by a garriſon ſo numerous, that it might be compared to a ſmall army, and whilſt that continued ſo, the king of Pruſſia's victories in Sileſia were of no deciſive effect. For this reaſon, though it was now the dead of winter, and the ſoldiers ſtood in need of repoſe, his majeſty reſolved, if poſſible, to become maſter of that place before the end of the year; but as a cloſe ſiege was impracticable, a blockade was formed, as ſtrictly as the rigour of the ſeaſon would permit[u]. It was not, however, till the beginning of the enſuing campaign that this place was taken. The Pruſſians opened their trenches before it on the 3d of April, 1758, and erected two large batteries, which kept a continual fire upon the town. The artillery of the beſiegers conſiſted of 300 pieces of cannon, of different dimenſions, and 80 mortars; an amazing artillery, and ſuch as we never heard of in former campaigns. On the night of the 14th, the Pruſſians carried one of the chief works by aſſult, and lodged themſelves therein: the commandant capitulated the next day, with the garriſon, which was now greatly reduced in number, being not half of what it amounted to at the beginning of the blockade. Thus, all the parts of Sileſia which the king of Pruſſia had loſt by one unfortunate blow fell again into his poſſeſſion; and his affairs, which but a few months before ſeemed irretrievable, were now re-eſtabliſhed upon a firmer baſis than ever. The Pruſſian parties not only repoſſeſſed themſelves of thoſe parts of Sileſia which belonged to their king, but penetrated into the Auſtrian diviſion, reduced Jagerndorf, Troppau, Tretchen, and ſeveral other places, and left the empreſs-queen ſcarce any footing in that country, in which, a few days before, ſhe reckoned her dominion perfectly eſtabliſhed.

The Swedes, after many debates between their king and ſenate, had at length reſolved upon an open declaration againſt the king of Pruſſia, and, in conſequence of that reſolution, ſent ſo many troops into Pomerania, that, by the end of Auguſt, their army in that country amounted to 25,000 men. Their firſt act of hoſtility was the ſeizure of Anclam and Demmin, two towns that lay in the way to Stetin, againſt which their principal deſign was levelled. But before they proceeded farther, general Hamilton, their commander, by way of juſtifying the conduct of his maſter, publiſhed a declaration, ſetting forth, 'That the king of Sweden, as guarantee to the treaty of Weſtphalia, could not help ſending his troops into the upper part of the duchy of Pomerania belonging to the king of Pruſſia; and that, therefore, all the officers appointed to receive the public revenue in that country muſt pay what money they had in their hands to him, who was commiſſioned to receive it for his Swediſh majeſty: that, moreover, an exact account was required, within eight days, of the revenues of the country; but that no more than ordinary contributions would be demanded of the inhabitants, who might reſt aſſured that the Swediſh troops ſhould obſerve the ſtricteſt diſcipline.' After this declaration they attacked the little fortreſs of Penemunde, upon the river Pene, and on the 23d of September, after a ſiege of nine days, obliged the garriſon, which conſiſted only of militia, to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. This alternative the commanding officer choſe, rather than engage not to ſerve for two years, obſerving, that ſuch an engagement was inconſiſtent with his honour, whilſt his prince had ſo much occaſion for his ſervice; and the Swediſh general, touched with this noble way of thinking, was, on his part, ſo generous as to give him his liberty. On the other hand, general Manteuffel, who commanded the Pruſſian forces then in Pomerania, amounting to 12,000 men, with whom he was encamped before Stetin, to cover that place, publiſhed in anſwer to this a declaration, enjoining the inhabitants of Pomerania to remain faithful to the king of Pruſſia, their lawful ſovereign, under pain of incurring his juſt indignation, and abſolutely forbidding them to pay any regard to the Swediſh manifeſto.

In the mean time, mareſchal Lehwald, immediately after the battle of Norkitten, when the Ruſſians began their retreat, detached prince George of Holſtein-Gottorp, with a conſiderable body of forces, to the relief of Pomerania; and, ſhortly after, the Ruſſian forces having totally evacuated every part of Pruſſia, except Memel, and moſt of them being actually gone into winter-quarters, he himſelf followed, with an additional re-enforcement of 16,000 men. Upon his approach, the Swedes, who were then encamped at Ferdinandſhoff, and had begun to fill up the harbour of Swinnemunde, by way of previous preparation for the ſiege of Stetin, retired with ſuch precipitation, that they did not allow themſelves time to draw off a little garriſon they had at Wollin, conſiſting of 210 men, who were made priſoners of war. Demmin was cannonaded by the Pruſſians on the 29th of December; and the Swedes having loſt one officer and 40 men, deſired to capitulate. As, in order to eaſe the troops, it was not thought proper to continue the ſiege in ſo ſharp a ſeaſon, their requeſt was granted, and they had leave to retire with two pieces of cannon. The Pruſſians took poſſeſſion of the town on the 2d day of January, after the Swedes had, on the 30th of December, likewiſe given up Anclam, where the conquerors took 150 priſoners, and found a conſiderable magazine of proviſions and ammunition. Mareſchal Lehwald then paſſed the Pene, entered Swediſh Pomerania, and reduced Gutzkow, Loitz, Tripſus, and Nebringen. At the ſame time, lieutenant-general Schorlemmer paſſed with his corps from the iſle of Wollin into the iſle of Uſedom, and from thence to Wolgaſt, the Swedes having abandoned this town, as well as Schwine-

[u] Such was the rigour of the ſeaſon, that ſome hundreds of the ſentinels dropped down dead on their ſeveral poſts, unable to ſuſtain the ſeverity of the cold. The Germans lie under the general reproach of paying very little regard to the lives of their ſoldiers, and indeed this practice of winter-campaigns in ſuch a cold country beſpeaks very little regard to the dictates of humanity.

munde, and the fort of Pennemunde. The prince of Holſtein advanced as far as Grimm and Grieffswalde, and the Swedes, loſing one town after another, till they had nothing left in Pomerania but the port of Stralſund, continued retreating till they had reached this laſt place. The French party in Sweden, to comfort the people, called this retreat, or rather flight, going into winter-quarters. The Pruſſian huſſars were not idle wherever they penetrated; for, beſides plundering and pillaging, they raiſed a contribution of 160,000 crowns in Swediſh Pomerania. The Mecklenburghers, who had joined the Swedes with 6000 of their troops, now found cauſe to repent of their forwardneſs, being left quite expoſed to the reſentment of the victors, who chaſtiſed them with the moſt ſevere exactions. The army of the Swedes, though they did not fight a battle, was, by ſickneſs, deſertion, and other accidents, reduced to half the number it conſiſted of when they took the field. The landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, ſoon after his territories were invaded by the French, in conſequence of their advantage in the affair of Haſtenbeck, had applied to the king of Sweden, as one of the guarantees of the treaty of Weſtphalia, deſiring him to employ his good offices with the court of France, to obtain a more favourable treatment for his dominions: but his Swediſh majeſty, by the advice of the ſenate, thought proper to refuſe complying with this requeſt, alledging, that as the crown of Sweden was one of the principal guarantees of the treaty of Weſtphalia, it would be highly improper to take ſuch a ſtep, in favour of a prince who had not only broke the laws and conſtitutions of the empire, in refuſing to furniſh his contingent, but had even aſſiſted with his troops a power known to be its declared enemy. The Aulic council too, ſeeing, or pretending to ſee, the behaviour of the landgrave in the ſame light, iſſued a decree againſt his ſerene highneſs towards the end of this year.

The court of Great-Britain, juſtly diſpleaſed with the Dutch, on account of the extreme facility with which they had granted the French a free paſſage through Namur and Maeſtricht for their proviſions, ammunition, and artillery, in the beginning of this campaign, had very properly remonſtrated againſt that ſtep, before it was abſolutely reſolved on, or at leaſt declared to be ſo: but in vain; a puſillanimous anſwer being all the ſatisfaction that was obtained. The tameneſs and indifference with which the ſtates-general had ſince ſeen Oſtend and Nieuport put into the hands of the French drew upon their high mightineſſes a further remonſtrance, which was delivered to them on the 28th of November of this year by colonel Yorke, his Britannic majeſty's plenipotentiary at the Hague, in the following terms, well calculated to awaken in them a due ſenſe of their own danger, as well as to evince the injuſtice of the proceedings of the houſe of Auſtria:—"Conſidering the critical ſituation which Europe has been in during the courſe of this year, in conſequence of meaſures concerted to embroil all Europe, the king of Great-Britain was willing to flatter himſelf that the courts of Vienna and Verſailles, out of regard to the circumſpect conduct obſerved by your high mightineſſes, would have at leaſt informed you of the changes they have thought proper to make in the Auſtrian Netherlands. It was with the utmoſt ſurpriſe the king heard, that, without any previous conſent of your's, and almoſt without giving you any notice, the court of Vienna had thought proper to put the towns of Oſtend and Nieuport into the hands of the French troops, and to withdraw her own, as well as her artillery and ſtores, whilſt France continues to ſend thither a formidable quantity of both. The conduct of the court of Vienna towards his majeſty is indeed ſo unmerited and ſo extraordinary, that it is difficult to find words to expreſs it: but whatever fallacious pretexts ſhe may have made uſe of to palliate her behaviour towards England, it doth not appear that they can be extended ſo far as to excuſe the infringement, in concert with France, of the moſt ſolemn treaties between her and your high mightineſſes. The king never doubted that your high mightineſſes would have made proper repreſentations to the two courts newly allied, to demonſtrate the injuſtice of ſuch a proceeding, and the danger that might afterwards reſult from it. Your high mightineſſes will have perceived that your ſilence on the firſt ſtep encouraged the two courts, newly allied, to attempt others; and who can ſay where they will ſtop? The pretext at firſt was, the need which the empreſs-queen ſtood in of the troops for the war kindled in the empire, and the neceſſity of providing for the ſafety of thoſe important places, and afterwards of their imaginary danger from England. But, high and mighty lords, it is but too evident that the two powers, who have taken theſe meaſures in concert, have other projects in view, and have made new regulations with regard to that country, which cannot but alarm the neighbouring ſtates. The late demand made to your high mightineſſes, of a paſſage for a large train of warlike implements through ſome of the barrier towns, in order to be ſent to Oſtend and Nieuport, could not fail to awaken the king's attention. The ſincere friendſhip, and parity of intereſts, of Great-Britain and Holland require that they ſhould no longer keep ſilence, leſt, in the iſſue, it ſhould be conſidered as a tacit conſent, and as a relinquiſhment of all our rights. The king commands me, therefore, to recall to your high mightineſſes the two-fold right you have acquired to keep the Auſtrian Netherlands under the government of the houſe of Auſtria; and that no other has a title to make the leaſt alteration therein, without the conſent of your high mightineſſes; unleſs the new allies have reſolved to ſet aſide all prior treaties, and to diſpoſe at pleaſure of every thing that may ſuit their private intereſt. In the treaty between your high mightineſſes and the crown of France, ſigned at Utrecht on the 11th of April, 1713, in the fifteenth article, are theſe words: 'It is alſo agreed, that no province, fort, town, or city of the ſaid Netherlands, or of thoſe which are given up by his catholic majeſty, ſhall ever be ceded, transferred, or given, or ſhall ever devolve to the crown of France, or any prince or princeſs of the houſe or line of France, either by virtue of any gift, exchange, marriage-contract, ſucceſſion by will, or by any other title whatever, to the power and authority of the moſt chriſtian king, or of any prince or princeſs of the houſe or line of France.' In the barrier-treaty theſe very ſtipulations are repeated in the firſt article: 'His imperial and catholic majeſty promiſes and engages, that no province, city, town, fortreſs, or territory of the ſaid country ſhall be ceded, transferred, given, or devolve to the crown of France, or to any other but the ſucceſſor of the German dominions of the houſe of Auſtria, either by donation, ſale, exchange, marriage-contract, heritage, teſtamentary ſucceſſion, nor under any other pretext whatſoever; ſo that no province, town, fortreſs, or territory of the ſaid Netherlands ſhall ever be ſubject to any other prince, but to the ſucceſſor of the ſtates of the houſe of Auſtria alone, excepting what has been yielded by the preſent treaty to the ſaid lords the ſtates-general.' A bare reading of theſe two articles is ſufficient to evince all that I have juſt repreſented to your high mightineſſes: and whatever pretext the courts of Vienna and Verſailles may alledge, to cover the infraction of theſe treaties, the thing remains nevertheleſs evident, whilſt theſe two courts are unable to prove that the towns of Oſtend and Nieuport are not actually in the power of France. If their deſigns are juſt, or agreeable to thoſe treaties, they will doubtleſs not ſcruple, in the leaſt, to make your high mightineſſes eaſy on that head, by openly explaining themſelves to a quiet and pacific neighbour, and by giving you indiſputable proofs of their intentions to fulfil the ſtipulations of the ſaid two treaties, with regard to the Netherlands. The king hath ſo much confidence in the good ſenſe, prudence, and friendſhip of your high mightineſſes, that he makes not the leaſt doubt of your taking the moſt efficacious meaſures to clear up an affair of ſuch importance; and of your being pleaſed, in concert with his majeſty, to watch over the fate of a country, whoſe ſituation and independence have, for more than a century, been regarded as one of the principal ſupports of your liberty and commerce." It does not appear that this remonſtrance had the deſired effect upon the ſtates-general, who were apprehenſive of embroiling themſelves with an enemy ſo remarkably alert in taking all advantages. The truth is, they were not only unprepared for a rupture with France, but extremely unwilling to forego the commercial profits which they derived from their neutrality.

The king of Pruſſia, about this period, began to harbour a ſuſpicion that certain other powers longed eagerly to enjoy the ſame reſpite from the dangers and inconveniences of war, and that he ran the riſque of being abandoned by his ſole patron and ally, who ſeemed greatly alarmed at his defeat in Bohemia, and deſirous of detaching himſelf from a connexion which might be productive of the moſt diſagreeable conſequences to his continental intereſt. Stimulated by this opinion, his Pruſſian majeſty is ſaid to have written an expoſtulatory letter[x] to the king of Great-Britain, in which he very plainly taxes that monarch with having inſti-

[x] The letter, which was written in French, we have tranſlated, for the reader's ſatisfaction.

"I am informed that the deſign of a treaty of neutrality for the electorate of Hanover is not yet laid aſide. It is impoſſible that your majeſty can have ſo little fortitude and conſtancy, as to be diſpirited by a ſmall reverſe of fortune? Are affairs ſo ruinous, that they cannot be repaired? I hope your gated him to commence hoſtilities; and inſiſts upon his remembering the engagements by which he was ſo ſolemnly bound. From the ſtrain of this letter, and the Pruſſian's declaration to the Britiſh miniſter when he firſt ſet out for Saxony, importing, that he was going to fight the king of England's battles, a nation was generally conceived that thoſe two powers had agreed to certain private pacta or conventions, the particulars of which have not yet tranſpired. Certain it is, a declaration was delivered to the Pruſſian reſident at London, which appears to have been calculated as an anſwer to the letter. In that paper the king of Great-Britain declared, that the overtures made by his majeſty's electoral miniſters in Germany, touching the checs received on the continent, ſhould have no influence on his majeſty as king: that he ſaw in the ſame light as before the pernicious effects of the union between the courts of Vienna and Verſailles, threatening a ſubverſion of the whole ſyſtem of public liberty, and of the independence of the European powers: that he conſidered as a fatal conſequence of this dangerous connexion the ceſſion made by the court of Vienna of the ports in the Netherlands to France, in ſuch a critical ſituation, and contrary to the faith of the moſt ſolemn treaties: that, whatever might be the ſucceſs of his arms, his majeſty was determined to act in conſtant concert with the king of Pruſſia in employing the moſt efficacious means to fruſtrate the unjuſt and oppreſſive deſigns of their common enemies. He concluded with aſſuring the king of Pruſſia that the Britiſh crown would continue to fulfil, with the greateſt punctuality, its engagements with his Pruſſian majeſty, and to ſupport him with firmneſs and vigour. Such a repreſentation could not fail of being agreeable to a prince, who, at this juncture, ſtood in need of an extraordinary cordial. He knew he could ſecurely depend not only on the good faith of an Engliſh miniſtry, but alſo on the good plight of the Britiſh nation, which like an indulgent nurſe hath always preſented the nipple to her meagre German allies. Thoſe, however, who pretended to conſider and canvas events without prejudice and prepoſſeſſion, could not help owing their ſurpriſe, at hearing an alliance ſtigmatiſed as pernicious to the ſyſtem of public liberty, and ſubverſive of the independence of the European powers, as they remembered that this alliance was the effect of neceſſity, to which the houſe of Auſtria was reduced, for its own preſervation; reduced, as its friends and partiſans affirm, by thoſe very potentates that now reproached her with theſe connexions,

His Britannick majeſty was reſolved that the king of Pruſſia ſhould have no cauſe to complain of his indifference, whatever reaſons he had to exclaim againſt the convention of Cloſter-Seven, which he did not ſcruple to condemn as a very ſcandalous capitulation, as much as he diſapproved of the conduct, in conſequence of which near 40,000 men were ſo ſhamefully diſarmed, and loſt to his cauſe. Thoſe ſtipulations alſo met with a very unfavourable reception in England, where the motions of the allied army in their retreat before the enemy were very freely cenſured, and ſome great names expoſed to the ridicule and contempt of the public. This event, ſo ſingular in itſelf, and ſo important in its conſequences, attracted the attention of the privy-council, where it is ſaid to have been canvaſſed with great warmth and animoſity of altercation. The general complained that he was reſtricted by peremptory orders from the regency of Hanover; and they were reported to have uſed recriminations in their defence. In all probability, every circumſtance of the diſpute was not explained to the ſatisfaction of all parties, inaſmuch as that great commander quitted the harveſt of military glory, and, like another Cincinnatus, retired to his plough. The convention of Cloſter-Seven was equally diſagreeable to the courts of London and Verſailles. The former ſaw the electorate of Hanover left, by this capitulation, at the mercy of the enemy, who had taken poſſeſſion of the whole country, ſeized the revenues, exacted contributions, and changed the whole form of government, in the name of his moſt chriſtian majeſty: while the French army, which had been employed in oppoſing the Hanoverians, was now at liberty to throw their additional force into the ſcale againſt the king of Pruſſia, who, at that period, ſeemed to totter on the verge of deſtruction. On the other hand, the French miniſtry thought their general had granted too favourable terms to a body of forces, whom he had cooped up in ſuch a manner, that, in a little time, they muſt have ſurrendered at diſcretion. They, therefore, determined either to provoke the Hanoverians by ill-uſage to an infraction of the treaty, or, ſhould that be found impracticable, renounce it as an imperfect convention, eſtabliſhed without proper authority. Both expedients were uſed without reſerve. They were no ſooner informed of the capitulation, than they refuſed to acknowledge its validity, except on condition that the Hanoverian troops ſhould formally engage to deſiſt from all ſervice againſt France and her allies during the preſent war, and be diſarmed on their return to their own country. At the ſame time her general, who commanded in the electorate, exhauſted the country, by levying exorbitant contributions, and connived at ſuch outrages as degraded his own dignity, and reflected diſgrace on the character of his nation. The court of London, to make a merit of neceſſity, affected to conſider the conventional act as a proviſional armiſtice, to pave the way for a negotiation that might terminate in a general peace, and propoſals were offered for that purpoſe: but the French miniſtry kept aloof, and ſeemed reſolved that the electorate of Hanover ſhould be annexed to their king's dominions. At leaſt, they were bent upon keeping it as a precious depoſitum, which, in the plan of a general pacification, they imagined, would counterbalance any advantage that Great-Britain might obtain in other parts of the world. Had they been allowed to keep this depoſit, the kingdom of Great Britain would have ſaved about 20 millions of money, together with the lives of her beſt ſoldiers; and Weſtphalia would have continued to enjoy all the bleſſings of ſecurity and peace. But the king of England's tenderneſs for Hanover was one of the chief ſources of the misfortunes which befell that electorate. He could not bear the thoughts of ſeeing it, even for a ſeaſon, in the hands of the enemy; and his own ſentiments in this particular were re-enforced by the preſſing remonſtrances of the Pruſſian monarch, whom, at this juncture, he thought it dangerous to diſoblige. Actuated by theſe motives, he was pleaſed to ſee the articles of the convention ſo palpably contravened, becauſe the violation unbound his hands, and enabled him, conſiſtently with good faith, to take effectual ſteps for the aſſiſtance of his ally, and the recovery of his own dominions. He therefore, in quality of elector of Brunſwick-Lunenbourg, publiſhed a declaration, obſerving, 'That his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland had, on his part, honeſtly fulfilled all the conditions of the convention, but the duke de Richelieu demanded that the troops ſhould enter into an engagement ſpecified above, and lay down their arms; although it was expreſly ſtipulated in the convention that they ſhould not be regarded as priſoners of war, under which quality alone they could be diſarmed: that the French court pretended to treat the convention as a military regulation only; and, indeed, it was originally nothing more, but as they had expreſly diſowned its validity, and a negotiation had been actually begun for diſarming the auxiliaries, upon certain conditions, though the French general would never anſwer categorically, but waited always for freſh inſtructions from Verſailles, the nature of that act was totally changed, and what was at firſt an agreement between general and general was now become a matter of ſtate between the two courts of London and Verſailles: that, however hard the conditions of the convention appeared to be for the troops of Hanover, his Britannick majeſty would have acquieſced in them, had not the French glaringly diſcovered their deſign of totally ruining his army, and his dominions; and, by the moſt outrageous conduct, freed his Britannick majeſty from every obligation under which he had been laid by the convention: that in the midſt of the armiſtice the moſt open hoſtilities had been committed; the caſtle of Schartzfels had been forcibly ſeized and pillaged, and the garriſon made priſoners of war: the priſoners made by the French before the convention had not been reſtored, according to an expreſs article ſtipulated between the generals, though it had been fulfilled on the part of the electorate, by the immediate releaſe of the French priſoners; the bailies of thoſe diſtricts from which the French troops were excluded by mutual agreement had been ſummoned, on pain of military execution, to appear before the French commiſſary, and compelled to deliver into his hands the public revenue: the French had appropriated to themſelves part of thoſe magazines which, by expreſs agreement, were deſtined for the uſe of the electoral troops; and they had ſeized the houſes, revenue, and corn belonging to the king of Eng-majeſty will conſider the ſtep you have made me hazard, and remember that you are the ſole cauſe of theſe misfortunes that now impend over my head. I ſhould never have abandoned the alliance of France, but for your flattering aſſurances. I do not now repent of the treaty I have concluded with your majeſty; but I expect you will not ingloriouſly leave me at the mercy of my enemies, after having brought upon me all the force of Europe. I depend upon your adhering to your repeated engagements of the twenty-ſixth of laſt month, and that you will liſten to no treaty in which I am not comprehended."

land in the city of Bremen, in violation of their engagement to conſider that city as a place abſolutely free and neutral. He took notice that they had proceeded to menaces unheard of among civilized people, of burning, ſacking, and deſtroying every thing that fell in their way, ſhould the leaſt heſitation be made in executing the convention according to their interpretation.'—Such were the profeſſed conſiderations that determined his Britannick majeſty to renounce the agreement which they had violated, and have recourſe to arms for the relief of his ſubjects and allies. It was in conſequence of this determination that he conferred the command of his electoral army on prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick brother to the duke of that name, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Pruſſian army by his great military talents, and was, by blood and inclination, as well as intereſt, ſuppoſed warmly attached to his Britannick majeſty. The truth is, the king of Pruſſia recommended him to this command, becauſe he knew he could depend upon his concurring with all his meaſures, in conducting the operations of the Britiſh army. The duke de Richelieu was no ſooner informed of theſe particulars, than he ſent a letter to prince Ferdinand, ſpecifying, 'That although for ſome days he had perceived the Hanoverian troops in motion, in order to form themſelves into a body, he could not imagine the object of theſe movements was to infringe the convention of neutrality which had been eſtabliſhed between the duke of Cumberland and himſelf, as French general; that he was blinded ſo far by his confidence in the good faith of the elector of Hanover, who had ſigned that convention, as to believe the troops were aſſembled for no other purpoſe than to be diſtributed into winter-quarters, which had been aſſigned them by the agreement; but his eyes were at laſt opened, by repeated advices which he had received from all quarters, importing, that the Hanoverians intended to infringe thoſe articles which ought to be ſacred and inviolable: he affirmed, the king his maſter was ſtill willing to give freſh proofs of his moderation, and his deſire to ſpare the effuſion of human blood: with that view he declared to his ſerene highneſs, in the name of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, that he perſiſted in his reſolution of fulfilling exactly all the points of the convention, provided they ſhould be equally obſerved by the Hanoverian army; but he could not help appriſing his ſerene highneſs that if this army ſhould take any equivocal ſtep, and, ſtill more, ſhould it commit any act of hoſtility, he would then puſh matters to the laſt extremity, looking upon himſelf as authoriſed ſo to do by the rules of war: that he would ſet fire to all palaces, houſes, and gardens; ſac all the towns and villages, without ſparing the moſt inconſiderable cottage, and ſubject the country to all the horrors of war and devaſtation. He conjured his ſerene highneſs to reflect on theſe particulars, and begged he would not lay him under the neceſſity of taking ſteps ſo contrary to his own perſonal character, as well as to the natural humanity of the French nation.' To this letter, which was ſeconded by the count de Lynar the Daniſh embaſſador, who had meditated the convention, prince Ferdinand returned a very laconic anſwers, intimating, that he would give the duke de Richelieu his anſwer in perſon at the head of his army. At this particular juncture, the French general was diſpoſed to abide by the original articles of the convention, rather than draw upon himſelf the hoſtilities of an army which he knew to be brave, reſolute and well appointed, and which he ſaw at preſent animated with an eager deſire of wiping out the diſgrace they had ſuſtained by the capitulation, as well as of relieving their country from the grievous oppreſſion under which it groaned.

About the latter end of November the Hanoverian army was wholly aſſembled at Stade, under the auſpices of prince Ferdinand, who reſolved, without delay, to drive the French from the electorate, whither they now began their march. Part of the enemy's rear, conſiſting of 2000 men, was, in their march bac to Zell, attacked in the bailiwick of Ebſtorff, and entirely defeated by general Schuylenbourg: and, in a few days after this action, another happened upon the river Aller, between two conſiderable bodies of each army, in which the Hanoverians, commanded by general Zaſtrow, remained maſters of the field. Theſe petty advantages ſerved to encourage the allies, and put themſelves in poſſeſſion of Lunenbourg, Zell, and part of the Brunſwick dominions, which the enemy were obliged to abandon. The operations of prince Ferdinand, however, were retarded by the reſolution and obſtinate perſeverance of the French officer who commanded the garriſon of Harbourg. When the Hanoverian troops made themſelves maſters of the town, he retired into the caſtle, which he held out againſt a conſiderable detachment of the allied army, by whom it was inveſted; at length, however, the fortifications being entirely demoliſhed, he ſurrendered upon capitulation. On the 6th day of December prince Ferdinand began his march towards Zell, where the French army had taken poſt, under the command of the duke de Richelieu, who, at the approach of the Hanoverians, called in his advanced parties, abandoned ſeveral magazines, burned all the farm-houſes and buildings belonging to the ſheep-walks of his Britannick majeſty, without paying the leaſt regard to the repreſentations made by prince Ferdinand on this ſubject; reduced the ſuburbs of Zell to aſhes, after having allowed his men to plunder the houſes, and even ſet fire to the Orphan-hoſpital, in which a great number of helpleſs children are ſaid to have periſhed. One cannot, without horror, reflect upon ſuch brutal acts of inhumanity. The French troops on divers occaſions, and in different parts of the empire, acted tragedies of the ſame nature, which are not eaſily reconcileable to the character of a nation famed for ſentiment and civility. The Hanoverians having advanced within a league of Zell, the two armies began to cannonade each other; the French troops poſted on the right of the Aller burned their magazines, and retired into the town, where they were ſo ſtrongly entrenched, that prince Ferdinand could not attempt the river, the paſſes of which were ſtrongly guarded by the enemy. At the ſame time, his troops were expoſed to great hardſhips from the ſeverity of the weather; he, therefore, retreated to Ultzen and Lunenbourg, where his army was put into winter-quarters, and executed ſeveral ſmall enterprizes by detachment, while the French general fixed his head-quarters in the city of Hanover, his cantonments extending as far as Zell, in the neighbourhood of which many ſharp ſkirmiſhes were fought from the out-parties with various ſucceſs. Their imperial majeſties were no ſooner appriſed of theſe tranſactions, which they conſidered as infractions of the convention, than they ſent an intimation to the baron de Steinberg, miniſter from the king of Great-Britain as elector of Hanover, that he ſhould appear no more at court, or confer with their miniſters; and that his reſiding at Vienna, as he might eaſily conceive, could not be very agreeable: in conſequence of which meſſage he retired, after having obtained the neceſſary paſſports for his departure. The chagrin occaſioned at the court of Vienna by the Hanoverian army's having recourſe to their arms again was, in ſome meaſure, alleviated by the certain tidings received from Peterſburgh, that the czarina had ſigned her acceſſion in form to the treaty between the courts of Vienna, Verſailles, and Stockholm.

In cloſing our account of this year's tranſactions on the continent, we may obſerve, that on the 16th day of November the queen of Poland died at Berlin of an apoplexy, ſuppoſed to be occaſioned by the ſhoc ſhe received on hearing that the French were totally defeated at Roſbach. She was a lady of exemplary virtue and piety, whoſe conſtitution had been broke by grief and anxiety conceived from the diſtreſs of her own family, as well as from the miſery to which ſhe ſaw her people expoſed. With reſpect to the European powers that were not actually engaged as principals in the war, they ſeemed induſtriouſly to avoid every ſtep that might be conſtrued a deviation from the moſt ſcrupulous neutrality. The ſtates-general proceeded with great circumſpection, in the middle courſe between two powerful neighbours, equally jealous and formidable; and the king of Spain was gratified for his forbearance with a convention ſettled between him and the belligerent powers, implying, that his ſubjects ſhould purſue their commerce at ſea without moleſtation, provided they ſhould not tranſport those articles of merchandiſe which were deemed contraband by all nations.—The operations at ſea, during the courſe of this year, either in Europe or America, were far from being deciſive or important. The commerce of Great-Britain ſuſtained conſiderable damage from the activity and ſucceſs of French privateers, of which a great number had been equipped in the iſlands of Martinique and Guadaloupe. The Greenwich ſhip of war, mounted with 50 guns, and a frigate of 20, fell into the hands of the enemy, together with a very conſiderable number of trading veſſels. On the other hand, the Engliſh cruiſers and privateers acquitted themſelves with equal vigilance and valour. The Duc d'Acquitaine, a large ſhip of 50 guns, was taken in the month of June by two Britiſh ſhips of war, after a ſevere engagement; and, about the ſame time, the Aquilon, of nearly the ſame force, was driven on ſhore and deſtroyed near Breſt by the Antelope, one of the Britiſh cruizers. A French frigate of 26 guns, called the Eumeraude, was taken in the channel, after a warm engagement, by an Engliſh ſhip of inferior force, under the command of captain Gilchriſt, a gallant and alert officer, who, in the ſequel, ſignalized himſelf on divers occaſions, by very extraordinary acts of valour. All the ſea-officers ſeemed to be animated with a noble emulation to diſtinguiſh themſelves in the ſervice of their country, and the ſpirit deſcended even to the captains of privateers, who, inſtead of imitating the former commanders of that claſs, in avoiding ſhips of force, and centering their whole attention in advantageous prizes, now encountered the armed ſhips of the enemy, and fought with the moſt obſtinate valour in the purſuit of national glory.

Perhaps hiſtory cannot afford a more remarkable inſtance of deſperate courage than that which was exerted in December of the preceding year, by the officers and crew of an Engliſh privateer, called the Terrible, under the command of captain William Death, equipped with 26 carriage guns, and manned with two hundred ſailors. On the 23d day of the month he engaged and made prize of a large French ſhip from St. Domingo, after an obſtinate battle, in which he loſt his own brother and 16 ſeamen: then he ſecured with 40 men his prize, which contained a valuable cargo, and directed his courſe to England, but in a few days he had the misfortune to fall in with the Vengeance, a privateer of St. Maloes, carrying 36 large cannon, with a complement of three hundred and ſixty men. Their firſt ſtep was to attac the prize, which was eaſily re-taken; then the two ſhips bore down upon the Terrible, whoſe main-maſt was ſhot away by the firſt broadſide. Notwithſtanding this diſaſter, the Terrible maintained ſuch a furious engagement againſt both as can hardly be paralleled in the annals of Britain. The French commander and his ſecond were killed, with two-thirds of his company; but the gallant captain Death, with the greater part of his officers, and almoſt his whole crew, having met with the ſame fate, his ſhip was boarded by the enemy, who found no more than 26 perſons alive, 16 of whom were mutilated by the loſs of leg or arm, and the other ten grievouſly wounded. The ſhip itſelf was ſo ſhattered, that it could ſcarce be kept above water, and the whole exhibited a ſcene of blood, horror, and deſolation. The victor itſelf lay like a wrec on the ſurface; and in this condition made ſhift, with great difficulty, to tow the Terrible [x] into St. Maloes, where ſhe was not beheld without aſtoniſhment and terror. This adventure was no ſooner known in England, than a liberal ſubſcription was raiſed for the ſupport of Death's widow, and that part of the crew which ſurvived the engagement. In this, and every ſea-rencounter that happened within the preſent year, the ſuperiority in ſkill and reſolution was aſcertained to the Britiſh mariners; for even when they fought againſt great odds, their courage was generally crowned with ſucceſs. In the month of November, captain Lockhart, a young gentleman, who had already rendered himſelf a terror to the enemy as commander of a ſmall frigate, now added conſiderable to his reputation, by reducing the Melampe, a French privateer of Bayonne, greatly ſuperior to his own ſhip in number of men and weight of metal. This exploit was ſeconded by another of the ſame nature, in his conqueſt of another French adventurer, called the Counteſs of Gramont; and a third large privateer of Bayonne was taken by captain Saumarez, commander of the Antelope. In a word, the narrow ſeas were ſo well guarded, that in a little time ſcarce a French ſhip durſt appear in the Engliſh channel, which the Britiſh traders navigated without moleſtation.

On the firſt day of December, the king of Great-Britain opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, which ſeemed calculated to prepare the nation for the expence of maintaining a new war on the continent of Europe. His majeſty graciouſly declared, That it would have given him a moſt ſenſible pleaſure to acquaint them, at the opening of the ſeſſion, that his ſucceſs in carrying on the war had been equal to the juſtice of his cauſe, and the extent and vigour of the meaſures formed for that purpoſe. He expreſſed the firmeſt confidence, that the ſpirit and bravery of the nation, ſo renowned in all times, which had formerly ſurmounted ſo many difficulties, were not to be abated by a few diſappointments, which, he truſted, might be retreved by the bleſſing of God, and the zeal and ardour of his parliament for his majeſty's honour and the advantage of their country. He ſaid it was his determined reſolution to apply his utmoſt efforts for the ſecurity of his kingdoms, and for the recovery and protection of the poſſeſſions and rights of his crown and ſubjects in America, and elſewhere, as well by the ſtrongeſt exertion of his naval force, as by all other methods. He ſignified, that another great object which he had at heart, was the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, and the liberties of Europe; and, in that view, to encourage and adhere to his allies. For this cauſe, he aſſured them, he would decline no inconveniences, and in this cauſe he earneſtly ſollicited their hearty concurrence and vigorous aſſiſtance. He obſerved, that the late ſignal ſucceſs in Germany had given a happy turn to affairs, which it was incumbent on them to improve; and that, in ſuch a critical conjuncture, the eyes of all Europe were upon them. He particularly recommended to them, that his good brother and ally the king of Pruſſia might be ſupported in ſuch a manner as is magnanimity and active zeal for the common cauſe appeared to deſerve. To the commons he expreſſed his concern that the large ſupplies they had already granted did not produce all the good fruits they had reaſon to expect; but he had ſo great reliance on their wiſdom, as not to doubt of their perſeverance. He only deſired ſuch ſupplies as ſhould be neceſſary for the public ſervice, and told them they might depend upon it, that the beſt and moſt faithful œconomy ſhould be uſed. He took notice of that ſpirit of diſorder which had ſhown itſelf among the common people in ſome parts of the kingdom, he laid injunctions upon them to uſe their endeavours for diſcouraging and ſuppreſſing ſuch abuſes, and for maintaining the laws and lawful authority. He concluded with obſerving, that nothing would ſo effectually conduce to the defence of all that was dear to the nation, as well as to the reducing their enemies to reaſon, as union and harmony among themſelves. The time was when every paragraph of this harangue, which the reader will perceive is not remarkable for its elegance and propriety, would have been canvaſſed and impugned by the country party in the houſe of commons. They would have imputed the bad ſucceſs of the war to the diſcretion of the miniſtry, in taking prepoſterous meaſures, and appointing commanders unequal to the ſervice. They would have enquired in what manner the proteſtant religion was endangered; and, if it was, how it could be preſerved or promoted by adhering to allies, who, without provocation, had well nigh ruined the firſt and principal proteſtant country of the empire. They would have ſtarted doubts with reſpect to the late ſignal ſucceſs in Germany, and hinted, that it would only ſerve to protract the burthen of a continental war. They would have owned that the eyes of all Europe were upon them, and drawn this conſequence, that it therefore behoved them to act with the more delicacy and caution in diſcharge of the ſacred truſt repoſed in them by their conſtituents: a truſt which their conſciences would not allow to be faithfully diſcharged, ſhould they ruſh precipitately into the deſtructive meaſures of a raſh and prodigal miniſtry, ſquander away the wealth of the nation, and add to the grievous incumbrances under which it groaned, in ſupport of connexions and alliances that were equally foreign to her conſideration, and pernicious to her intereſt. They would have inveſtigated that cauſe which was ſo warmly recommended for ſupport, and pretended to diſcover that it was a cauſe in which Great-Britain ought to have had no concern, becauſe it produced a certainty of loſs without the leaſt proſpect of advantage. They would have varied eſſentially in their opinions of the neceſſary ſupplies, from the ſentiments of thoſe who prepared the eſtimates, and even declared ſome doubts about the œconomy to be uſed in managing the national expence; finally, they would have repreſented the impoſſibility of union between the two parties, one of which ſeemed bent upon reducing the other to beggary and contempt. Such was the ſtrain that uſed to flow from an oppoſition, ſaid to conſiſt of diſloyalty and diſappointed ambition. But that malignant ſpirit was now happily extinguiſhed. The voice of the ſovereign was adored as the oracle of a divinity, and thoſe happy days were now approaching that ſaw the commons of England pour their treaſures, in ſupport of a German prince, with ſuch a generous hand, that poſterity will be amazed at their liberality.

[1758] To the ſpeech of his majeſty the houſe of lords returned an addreſs, in ſuch terms of complacency as had long diſtinguiſhed that illuſtrious aſſembly. The commons expreſſed their approbation and confidence with equal ardour, and not one objection was made to the form or nature of the addreſs, though one gentleman, equally independent in his mind and fortune, took exceptions to ſome of the meaſures which had been lately purſued. Their complaiſance was more ſubſtantially ſpecified in the reſolutions of the houſe, as ſoon as the two great committees of ſupply were appointed. They granted for the ſea ſervice of the enſuing year 60,000 men, including 14,845 marines, and the ſtanding army, comprehending 4000 invalids, was fixed at 53,777 effective men, commiſſion and non-commiſſion officers included. For the maintenance of theſe forces, by ſea and land, the charge of guards and garriſons at home and abroad, the expence of the ordnance, and in order to make good the ſum which had been iſſued by his majeſty's orders, in purſuance of the addreſs from the commons, they now allotted 4,22,807l. 7s. 3d. They unanimouſly granted as a preſent ſupply in the then critical exigency, towards enabling his majeſty to maintain and keep together the army formed laſt year in his electoral dominions, and then again put in motion, and actually employed againſt the common enemy, in concert with the king of Pruſſia, the ſum of 100,000l. for the ordinary of the navy, including half-pay to the ſea officers, they allowed 224,421l. 5s. 8d. towards the building and ſupporting of the three hoſpitals for ſeamen at Goſport, Plymouth, and Greenwich 30,000l. for the reduced officers of the land forces and marines, penſions to the widows of officers, and other ſuch military contingencies, 40,926l. 17s. 11d. towards building, rebuilding, and repairs of his majeſty's ſhips for the enſuing year, the ſum of 200,000l. for defraying the charge of 2120 horſe, and 9900 infantry, together with the general and ſtaff officers, the officers of the hoſpital and the train of artillery, being the troops of the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel in the pay of Great-Britain, for 60 days, together with the ſubſidy for the ſaid time, purſuant to treaty, they aſſigned 38,360l. 19s. and 10¾d. To the Foundling-hoſpital, they gave 40,000l. for the maintenance and education of deſerted young children, as well as for the reception of all ſuch as ſhould be preſented under a certain age, to be limited by the governors and guardians of that charity. 300,000l. were given towards diſcharging the debt of the navy, and 284,802l. for making up the deficiency of the grants for the ſervice of the preceding year. The landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel was, moreover, gratified with the further ſum of 203,536l. 4s. 9½d. for the maintenance of his forces, and the remainder of his ſubſidy. They granted 67,000l. for enabling his majeſty to make good his engagements with the king of Pruſſia, purſuant to a convention lately concluded with that potentate. For defraying the charge of 38,000 men of the troops of Hanover, Wolfenbuttel, Saxe-Gotha, and the count of Buckebourg, together with that of general and ſtaff-officers actually employed againſt the common enemy, in concert with the king of Pruſſia, from the 28th day of November in the laſt, to the 24th of December in the preſent year inclusive, to be iſſued in advance every two months, they allotted the ſum of 463,084l. 6s. 10d. and furthermore they granted 386,915l. 13s. 2d. to defray the charges of forage, bread-waggons, train of artillery, proviſions, wood, ſtraw, and all other extraordinary expences, contingencies, and loſſes whatſoever, incurred, or to be incurred, on account of his majeſty's army, conſiſting of 38,000 men, actually employed againſt the common enemy, in concert with the king of Pruſſia, from November laſt to next December inclusive. For the extraordinary expences of the land-forces, and other ſervices, incurred in the courſe of the laſt year, and not provided for by parliament, they allowed 145,454l. 15s. 0¼d. They provided 800,000l. to enable his majeſty to defray the like ſum raiſed in purſuance of an act made in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, and charged upon the firſt aids and ſupplies to be granted in the current ſeſſion. 26,000l. were beſtowed on the out-penſioners of Chelſea-hoſpital; above 20,000l. for the expence of maintaining the colonies of Nova-Scotia and Georgia; for re-imburſing to the province of Maſſachuſet's-Bay, and the colony of Connecticut, their expence in furniſhing proviſions and ſtores to the troops raiſed by them, for his majeſty's ſervice, in the campaign of the year 1756, the ſum of 41,117l. 17s. 6½d. to be applied towards the re-building of London-bridge, carrying on the works for fortifying and ſecuring the harbour of Milford, and repairing the pariſh-church of St. Margaret, in Weſtminſter, they allotted 29,000l. The Eaſt-India company were indulged with 20,000l. upon account, towards enabling them to defray the expence of a military force in their ſettlements, to be maintained by them in lieu of the battalion of his majeſty's forces withdrawn from thoſe ſettlements: the ſum of 10,000l. was given, as uſual, for maintaining and ſupporting the Britiſh forts and ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa; and 11,450l. were granted as an augmentation to the ſalaries of the judges in the ſuperior courts of judicature. They likewiſe provided 100,000l. for defraying the charge of pay and clothing to the militia, and advanced 800,000l. to enable his majeſty to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred or to be incurred for the ſervice of the current year; and to take all ſuch meaſures as might be neceſſary to diſappoint or defeat any enterprizes or deſigns of his enemies, as the exigency of his affairs might require. The whole ſupplies of this ſeſſion amounted to the enormous ſum of 10,486,457l. 0s. 1d. Nothing could ſo plainly demonſtrate the implicit confidence which the parliament, at this juncture, repoſed in the ſovereign and the miniſtry, as their conduct in granting ſuch liberal ſupplies, great part of which were beſtowed in favour of our German allies, whom the Britiſh nation thus generouſly paid for fighting their own battles. Beſides the ſum of 1,861,897l. 4s. 8d. expreſly aſſigned for the ſupport of theſe continental connections, a ſum conſiderably exceeding the whole of the revenue raiſed in the reign of Charles II. and what part of the ſum granted to the king for extraordinary expences might be applied to the ſame uſe, the article might not improperly be ſwelled with the vaſt expence incurred by expeditions to the coaſt of France, the chief, if not ſole deſign of which ſeemed to be a diverſion in favour of the nation's allies in Germany, by preventing France from ſending ſuch numerous armies into that country as it could have ſpared, had not its ſea-coaſts required a conſiderable body of forces for its defence againſt the attempts of the Engliſh. Indeed the partiſans of the miniſtry were at great pains to ſuggeſt and inculcate a belief, that the war in Germany was chiefly ſupported as a neceſſary diverſion in favour of Great-Britain and her plantations, which would have been expoſed to inſult and invaſion, had not the enemy's forces been otherwiſe employed. But the abſurdity of this nation will at once appear to thoſe who conſider, that by this time Great-Britain was ſole miſtreſs of the ſea; that the navy of France was almoſt ruined, and her commerce on the ocean quite extinguiſhed; that ſhe could not, with the leaſt proſpect of ſucceſs, hazard any expedition of conſequence againſt Great-Britain, or any part of her dominions, while the ocean was covered with ſuch powerful navies belonging to that nation; and that if one-third part of the money annually ingulfed in the German vortex, had been employed in augmenting the naval forces of England, and thoſe forces properly exerted, not a ſingle cruizer would have been able to ſtir from the harbours of France; all her colonies in the Weſt-Indies would have fallen an eaſy prey to the arms of Great-Britain; and thus cut off from the reſources of commerce, ſhe muſt have been content to embrace ſuch terms of peace as the victor ſhould have thought proper to preſcribe.

The funds eſtabliſhed by the committee of ways and means, in order to realiſe thoſe articles of ſupply, conſiſted of the malt-tax, the land-tax at 4s. in the pound, ſums remaining in the exchequer produced from the ſinking-fund, 4,500,000l. to be raiſed by annuities, at 3l. 10s. per cent. per ann. and 500,000l. by a lottery, attended with annuities redeemable by parliament, after the rate of 3l. per cent. per ann. theſe ſeveral annuities to be transferrable at the Bank of England, and charged upon a fund to be eſtabliſhed in this ſeſſion of parliament for payment thereof, and for which the ſinking-fund ſhould be a collateral ſecurity[v]—1,606,076l. 5s. 1¾d. iſſued and applied out of ſuch monies as ſhould or might ariſe from the ſurpluſſes, exceſſes, and other revenues compoſing the ſinking-fund—a tax of 1s.

[v] It was enacted, That every perſon ſubſcribing for 500l. ſhould be entitled to 450l. in annuities, and 50l. in lottery tickets, and ſo in proportion for a greater or leſſer ſum; that the lottery ſhould conſiſt of tickets of the value of 10l. each, in a proportion not exceeding 8 blanks to a prize; the blanks to be of the value of 6l. each, the blanks and prizes to bear an intereſt after the rate of 3l. per cent. to commence from the 1ſt day of January, in the year 1759; and that the ſum of 4,500,000l. to be raiſed by annuities, ſhould bear an intereſt after the rate of 3l. 10s. per cent. from the 5th day of July, in the preſent year, which annuities ſhould ſtand reduced to 3l. per cent. after the expiration of 24 years, and afterwards be redeemable in the whole, or in part, by ſums not leſs than 500,000l. at one time, ſix months notice having been firſt given of ſuch payments reſpectively; that any ſubſcriber might, on or before the 29th day of April, make a depoſit of 10l. per cent. on ſuch ſum as he ſhould chooſe to ſubſcribe towards raiſing theſe five millions, with the caſhiers of the Bank, as a ſecurity for his future payments on the days appointed for that purpoſe; that the ſeveral ſums ſo received by the caſhiers ſhould be paid into the receipt of the exchequer, to be applied from time to time to ſuch ſervices as ſhould then have been voted by the houſe of commons in this ſeſſion of parliament, and not otherwiſe: that any ſubſcriber paying the whole or any part of his ſubſcription previous to the days appointed for the reſpective payments ſhould be allowed a diſcount, at the rate of three per cent. from the days of ſuch reſpective payments to the reſpective times on which ſuch payments were directed to be made, and that all perſons who ſhould make their full payments on the ſaid lottery ſhould receive their tickets as ſoon as they could be conveniently made out.

in the pound to be annually paid from all ſalaries, fees, and perquiſites of offices and employments in Great-Britain, and from all penſions and other gratuities payable out of any revenues belonging to his majeſty in Great-Britain, exceeding the yearly value of 100l.—an impoſition of one ſhilling annually upon every dwelling-houſe inhabited within the kingdom of Great-Britain, over and above all other duties already chargeable upon them, to commence from the 5th day of April—an additional tax of ſix-pence yearly for every window or light in every dwelling-houſe inhabited in Britain which ſhall contain fifteen windows or upwards; a continuation of certain acts near expiring, with reſpect to the duties payable on foreign ſail-cloth imported into Great-Britain, the exportation of Britiſh gun-powder, the ſecuring and encouraging the trade of his majeſty's ſugar colonies in America, and the empowering the importers and proprietors of ſpirits from the Britiſh ſugar plantations to land them before payment of the duties of exciſe, and to lodge them in warehouſes at their own expence—an annual tax of 40s. for a licence to be taken out by every perſon trading in, ſelling, or vending gold or ſilver plate, in lieu of the duty of ſix-pence per ounce on all ſilver plate, made or wrought, or which ought to be touched, aſſayed, or marked in this kingdom, which duty now ceaſed and determined—a ceſſation of all draw-bacs payable on the exportation of ſilver plate—a law prohibiting all perſons from ſelling, by retail, any ſweet or made wines, without having firſt procured a licence for that purpoſe—and a loan by exchequer bills for 800,000l. to be charged on the firſt aids to be granted in the next ſeſſion of parliament. Theſe proviſions amounted to the ſum of 11,79,722l. 6s. 10d. exceeding the grants in the ſum of 593,265l. 6s. 9d. ſo that the nation had reaſon to hope that this ſurplus of above half a million would prevent any demand for deficiencies in the next ſeſſion. By theſe copious grants of a houſe of commons, whoſe complaiſance knew no bounds, the national debt was, at this juncture, ſwelled to the aſtoniſhing ſum of 87,367,210l. 19s. 10¾d. a load that would have cruſhed the national credit of any other ſtate in Chriſtendom.

The liberality of the parliament was like the roc in the wilderneſs, which flowed with the welcome ſtream when touched by the rod of Moſes. The preſent ſupply which the commons granted for the ſubſiſtence of the Hanoverian army was, in purſuance of a meſſage from his majeſty, communicated to the houſe by mr. ſecretary Pitt, ſignifying, That the king had ordered his electoral army to be put again in motion, that it might act with vigour againſt the common enemy, in concert with his good brother and ally, the king of Pruſſia; that the exhauſted and ruined ſtate of the electorate having rendered it incapable of maintaining that army, until the further neceſſary charge thereof, as well as the more particular meaſures then concerting for the effectual ſupport of his Pruſſian majeſty, could be laid before the houſe, the king, relying on the conſtant zeal of his faithful commons for the ſupport of the proteſtant religion, and of the liberties of Europe againſt the dangerous deſigns of France and her confederates, found himſelf, in the mean time, under the abſolute neceſſity of recommending to the houſe the ſpeedy conſideration of ſuch a preſent ſupply as might enable his majeſty, in this critical conjuncture, to ſubſiſt and keep together the ſaid army. This addreſs was no ſooner recited by the ſpeaker, than it was unanimouſly referred to the committee of ſupply, who gratified his majeſty's wiſh with an immediate reſolution; and, conſidering their generous diſpoſition, doubtleſs the ſame compliance would have appeared, even though no mention had been made of the proteſtant religion, which, to men of ordinary penetration, appeared to have no natural concern in the preſent diſpute between the belligerent powers, although former miniſters had often violently introduced it into meſſages and ſpeeches from the throne, in order to dazzle the eyes of the populace, even while they inſulted the underſtanding of thoſe who were capable of exerciſing their own reaſon. This pretext was worn ſo threadbare, that, among the ſenſible part of mankind, it could no longer be uſed without incurring contempt and ridicule. In order to perſuade mankind that the proteſtant religion was in danger, it would have been neceſſary to ſpecify the deſigns that were formed againſt it, as well as the nature of the conſpiracy, and to deſcend to particulars, properly authenticated. In that caſe, great part of Europe would have been juſtly alarmed. The ſtates-general of the United-Provinces, who have made ſuch glorious and indefatigable efforts in ſupport of the proteſtant religion, would ſurely have lent an helping hand towards its preſervation. The Danes would not have ſtood tamely neutral, and ſeen the religion they profeſs expoſed to the rage of ſuch a powerful confederacy. It is not to be imagined that the Swedes, who have ſo zealouſly maintained the purity of the proteſtant faith, would now join an aſſociation whoſe aim was the ruin of that religion. It is not credible that even the Hungarians, who profeſs the ſame faith, and other proteſtant ſtates of the empire, would enter ſo heartily into the intereſts of thoſe who were bent upon its deſtruction; or that the Ruſſians would contribute to the aggrandiſement of the catholic faith and diſcipline, ſo oppoſite to that of the Greek church, which they eſpouſe. As, therefore, no particular of ſuch a deſign was explained, no act of oppreſſion towards any proteſtant ſtate or ſociety pointed out, except thoſe that were exerciſed by the proteſtants themſelves; and as the court of Vienna repeatedly diſavowed any ſuch deſign, in the moſt ſolemn manner, the unprejudiced part of mankind will be apt to conclude that the cry of religion was uſed, as in former times, to arouſe, alarm, and inflame; nor did the artifice prove altogether unſucceſsful. Notwithſtanding the luke-warmth of the age in matters of religion, it produced conſiderable effect among the fanatic ſectaries that ſwarm through the kingdom of England. The leaders of thoſe blind enthuſiaſts, either actuated by the ſpirit of deluſion, or deſirous of recommending themſelves to the protection of the higher powers, immediately ſeized the hint, expatiating vehemently on the danger that impended over God's people; and exerting all their faculties to impreſs the belief of a religious war, which never fails to exaſperate and impel the minds of men to ſuch deeds of cruelty and revenge as muſt diſcredit all religion, and even diſgrace humanity. The ſignal truſt and confidence which the parliament of England repoſed in the king, at this juncture, was in nothing more conſpicuous than in leaving to the crown the unlimited application of the ſum granted for augmenting the ſalaries of the judges. In the rain of king William, when the act of ſettlement was paſſed, the parliament, jealous of the influence which the crown might acquire over the judges, provided, by an expreſs clauſe of that act, that the commiſſions of the judges ſhould ſubſiſt quam diu ſe bene geſſerint, and that their ſalaries ſhould be eſtabliſhed: but now we find a ſum of money granted for the augmentation of their ſalaries, and the crown veſted with a diſcretionary power to proportion and apply this augmentation; a ſtretch of complaiſance, which, how ſafe ſoever it may appear during the reign of a prince famed for integrity and moderation, will perhaps one day be conſidered as a very dangerous acceſſion to the prerogative.

So fully perſuaded were the miniſtry that the commons would chearfully enable them to pay what ſubſidies they might promiſe to their German allies, that on the 11th of April they concluded a new treaty of convention with his Pruſſian majeſty, which, that it might have the firmer conſiſtence, and the greater authority, was, on the part of Great-Britain, tranſacted and ſigned by almoſt all the privy-counſellors who had any ſhare in the adminiſtration[z]. This treaty, which was ſigned at Weſtminſter, imported, 'That the contracting powers having mutually reſolved to continue their efforts for the reciprocal defence and ſecurity, for the recovery of their poſſeſſions, the protection of their allies, and the ſupport of the liberties of the Germanick body, his Britannick majeſty had, from theſe conſiderations, determined to grant to his Pruſſian majeſty an immediate ſuccour in money, as being the moſt ready and the moſt efficacious, and their majeſties having judged it proper that thereupon a convention ſhould be made, for declaring and fixing their intentions upon this head, they had nominated and authoriſed their reſpective miniſters, who after having communicated their full powers to one another, agreed to the following ſtipulations:—The king of Great-Britain engaged to pay in the city of London, to ſuch perſon as ſhould be authoriſed to receive it by his Pruſſian majeſty, the ſum of four millions of German crowns, amounting to 670,000l. ſterling, to be paid at once, and in one whole ſum, immediately after the exchange of ratifications, upon being demanded by his Pruſſian majeſty. This prince, on his part, obliged himſelf to apply that ſum to the maintaining and augmenting his forces, which ſhould act in the beſt manner for the good of the common cauſe, and for the purpoſe of reciprocal defence and mutual ſecurity, propoſed by their ſaid majeſties. Moreover, the high contracting parties engaged not to conclude any treaty of peace, truce, or neutrality, nor any other ſort of convention or agreement, with the powers engaged in the preſent war, but in concert and by mutual agreement, wherein both ſhould be nominally comprehended. Finally, it was ſtipulated that this convention ſhould be ratified, and the ratifications exchanged on both ſides, within the term of ſix weeks, to be computed from the day of ſigning this preſent convention, or ſooner, if poſſible.

All the reſolutions to which the committee of ways and means agreed were executed by bills, or clauſes in bills, which afterwards received the royal ſanction. The militia ſtill continued to be an object of parliamentary care and attention: but the inſtitution was not yet heartily embraced, becauſe ſeemingly diſcountenanced by the remnant of the whole miniſtry, which ſtill maintained a capital place in the late coalition, and indeed almoſt wholy engroſſed the diſtribution of penſions and places. The commons having preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, with reſpect to the harbour of Milford-haven, a book of plans and eſtimates for fortifying that harbour was laid before the houſe, and a committee appointed to examine the particulars. They were of opinion that the mouth of the harbour was too wide to admit of any fortification, or effectual defence; but that the paſſage called Nailand-point, lying higher than Hubberſtone-road, might be fortified, ſo as to afford ſafe riding and protection to the trade and navy of Great-Britain: that, if it ſhould be thought proper hereafter to eſtabliſh a yard and doc for building and equipping fleets at Milford, no place could, from the ſituation, nature, ſoil, and a general concurrence of all neceſſary local circumſtances, be more fitted for ſuch a deſign; that if a proper uſe were made of this valuable though long-neglected harbour, the diſtreſsful delays, too often embarraſſing and diſappointing the nation in her naval operations, might be in a great meaſure happily removed, to the infinate relief and enlargement of the kingdom in the means of improving its naval force; the neceſſary progreſs and free execution of which was now ſo unhappily and frequently reſtrained and fruſtrated, by the want of a harbour like that of Milford-haven, framed by nature with ſuch local advantages. This report appeared to be ſo well ſupported by evidence, that a bill was framed, and paſſed into an act, for granting 10,000l. towards carrying on the works for fortifying and ſecuring the harbour of Milford in the county of Pembroke. Other laws of national conſequence were enacted, in the courſe of this ſeſſion, with little or no oppoſition. On the very firſt day of their ſitting, the commons received a petition from the mayor, magiſtrates, merchants, and inhabitants of Liverpool, complaining of the high price of wheat, and other grain; expreſſing their apprehenſion that it would continue to riſe, unleſs the time for the importation of foreign corn duty free ſhould be prolonged, or ſome other ſalutary meaſure taken by parliament, to prevent dealers from engroſſing corn; ſubmitting to the wiſdom of the houſe a total prohibition of diſtilling and exporting grain while the high price ſhould continue; praying they would take the premiſes in conſideration, and grant a ſeaſonable relief to the petitioners, by a continuance of a free importation, and taking ſuch other effectual means to reduce the growing price of corn as to them ſhould ſeem neceſſary and expedient. This being an urgent caſe, that equally intereſted the humanity of the legiſlature and the manufactures of the kingdom, it was deliberated upon, and diſcuſſed with remarkable diſpatch. In a few days a bill was prepared, paſſed through both houſes, and enacted into a law, continuing till the 24th day of December, in the preſent year, three acts of laſt ſeſſion; for prohibiting the exportation of corn; for prohibiting the diſtillation of ſpirits; and for allowing the importation of corn duty free. A ſecond law was eſtabliſhed, regulating the price and aſſize of bread, and ſubjecting to ſevere penalties thoſe who ſhould be concerned in its adulteration. In conſequence of certain reſolutions taken in a committee of the whole houſe, a bill was preſented for prohibiting the payment of the bounty upon the exportation of corn, unleſs ſold at a lower price than is allowed in an act paſſed in the firſt year of the reign of William and Mary; but this bill, after having been read a ſecond time, and committed, was neglected, and proved abortive.

In conſequence of a motion made by mr. Grenville, a humane bill was prepared and brought in for the encouragement of ſeamen employed in the royal navy, eſtabliſhing a regular method for the punctual, frequent, and certain payment of their wages; enabling them more eaſily and readily to remit money for the ſupport of their wives and families, and preventing the frauds and abuſes attending ſuch payments. This bill, having paſſed the lower-houſe, engaged in a very particular manner the attention of the lords, who, by divers meſſages to the houſe of commons, deſired the attendance of ſeveral members. Theſe meſſages being taken into conſideration, ſeveral precedents were recited; a debate aroſe about their formality, and the houſe unanimouſly reſolved that a meſſage ſhould be ſent to the lords, acquainting them that the houſe of commons not being ſufficiently informed by their meſſages upon what grounds, or for what purpoſes, their lordſhips deſired the houſe would give leave to ſuch of their members as were named in the ſaid meſſages to attend the houſe of lords, in order to be examined upon the ſecond reading of the bill; the commons hoped their lordſhips would make them acquainted with their intention. The lords, in anſwer to this intimation, gave the commons to underſtand, that they deſired the attendance of the members mentioned in their meſſages, that they might be examined as witneſſes upon the ſecond reading of the bill. This explanation being deemed ſatisfactory, the members attended the houſe of lords, where they were carefully and fully examined, as perſons converſant in ſea-affairs, touching the inconveniences which had formerly attended the ſea-ſervice, as well as the remedies now propoſed: and the bill having paſſed through their houſe, though not without warm oppoſition, was enacted into a law by his majeſty's aſſent. The militia-act, as it paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion, being found upon trial defective, mr. Townſhend moved for leave to bring in a new bill, to explain, amend, and enforce it: this was accordingly allowed, prepared, and paſſed into a law; though it did not ſeem altogether free from material objections, ſome of which were of an alarming nature. The power veſted by law in the crown over the militia is even more independent than that which it exerciſes over the ſtanding army: for this laſt expires at the end of the year, if not continued by a new act of parliament; whereas the militia is ſubjected to the power of the crown for the term of five years, during which it may be called out into actual ſervice without conſent of parliament, and conſequently employed for ſiniſter purpoſes. A commiſſion-officer in the militia may be detained, as ſubject to the articles of war, until the crown ſhall allow the militia to return to their reſpective pariſhes; and thus engaged, he is liable to death as a mutineer, or deſerter, ſhould he refuſe to appear in arms, and fight in ſupport of the worſt meaſures of the worſt miniſter. Several merchants, and manufacturers of ſilk, offered a petition, repreſenting, that in conſequence of the act paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion, allowing the importation of fine organize Italian thrown ſilk till the 1ſt day of December in the year 1757, they had given orders to their correſpondents abroad to ſend large quantities of ſuch ſilk through Germany to Hamburgh and Holland, which in the common courſe of things might probably have arrived in London before the act expired, if their carriage had not been protracted by the great rains and inundations in Italy and Germany, in the months of Auguſt and September laſt, which rendered the roads for many weeks impaſſable: that from unlucky accidents on ſhore, and ſtorms and contrary winds after the ſilk was ſhipped, it could not poſſibly arrive within the time limited by the act; and unleſs it ſhould be admitted to an entry, they, the petitioners, would be great ſufferers, the manufactures greatly prejudiced, and the good end and purpoſe of the act in a great meaſure fruſtrated: they, therefore prayed leave to bring in a bill for allowing the introduction of all ſuch fine Italian organized ſilk as ſhould appear to have been ſhipped in Holland and Hamburgh for London, on or before the 1ſt day of December. The petition being referred to a committee, which reported that theſe allegations were true, the houſe complied with their requeſt, and the bill having paſſed was enacted into a law in the uſual form. A ſpeedy paſſage was likewiſe granted to the mutiny bill, and the other annual meaſure for regulating the marine forces, which contained nothing new or extraordinary. A committee being appointed to enquire what laws were already expired, or near expiring, they performed this difficult taſk with indefatigable patience and perſeverance; and in purſuance of their reſolutions, three bills were prepared and paſſed into laws, continuing ſome acts for a certain time, and rendering others perpetual[a].

[a] Among thoſe rendered perpetual, we find an act of the 13th and 14th of Charles II. for preventing theft and rapine. An act of the 9th of George I. for puniſhing perſons going armed in diſguiſe. A clauſe in the act of the 6th of George II. to prevent the breaking down the bank of any river; and

The lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled, having drawn up a petition to the houſe of commons, alledging that the toll upon loaded veſſels, or other craft, paſſing through the arches of London-Bridge, granted by a former act, paſſed in the year 1750, for improving, widening, and enlarging the paſſage both under and over the ſaid bridge, was altogether precarious, and inſufficient to defray the expence, including that of a temporary wooden bridge already erected; and praying that a bill might be prepared, for explaining and rendering that act effectual; a committee was appointed to examine the contents, and a bill brought in according to their requeſt. This, however, was oppoſed by a petition from ſeveral perſons, owners of barges, and other craft navigating the river Thames, who affirmed, that if the bill ſhould paſs into a law as it then ſtood, it would be extremely injurious to the petitioners in particular, and to the public in general. Theſe were heard by their counſel before the committee, but no report was yet given, when the temporary bridge was reduced to aſhes. Then the mayor, aldermen, and commons of London preſented another petition, alledging, that, in purſuance of the powers veſted in them by act of parliament, they had already demoliſhed a good number of the houſes on London-Bridge, and directed the reſt that were ſtanding to be taken down with all convenient expedition, that two of the arches might be laid into one for the improvement of the navigation; that they had, at a very great expence, erected a temporary wooden bridge, to preſerve a public paſſage to and from the city, until the great arch could be finiſhed, which temporary bridge being conſumed by fire, they muſt rebuild it with the greateſt expedition, at a further and conſiderable expence; that the ſum neceſſary for carrying on and completing this great and uſeful work, including the rebuilding of the ſaid temporary bridge, was eſtimated at 80,000l. and as the improving, widening, and enlarging London-Bridge was calculated for the general good of the public, for the advancement of trade and commerce, and for making the navigation upon the river Thames more ſafe and ſecure; they, therefore prayed the houſe to take the premiſes into conſideration. This petition being recommended by his majeſty to the conſideration of the houſe, was referred to the committee of ſupply, and produced the reſolution of granting 15,000l. towards the rebuilding of London-Bridge. A bill was prepared, under the title of an act to improve, widen, and enlarge the paſſage over and through London-Bridge, enforcing the payment of the toll impoſed upon loaded veſſels, which had been found extremely burthenſome to trade; but this incumbrance was prevented by another petition of ſeveral merchants, tradeſmen, and other inhabitants of the borough of Southwark, taking notice of the 15,000l. granted towards the repair of London-Bridge, and, as they were informed, intended to make the ſame bridge free for all his majeſty's ſubjects; they ſaid they hoped to partake of this public bounty; but afterwards hearing that the bill then depending was confined to the tolls formerly granted for repairing the ſaid bridge, they repreſented the hardſhips which they and all traders would continue to labour under; they alledged, that the ſurveyors and workmen then employed upon this work had diſcovered the true principles on which the bridge was built; that the foundation of the piers conſiſted of hard durable ſtone, well cemented together, and now as ſtrong and firm as when firſt built; that when the bridge ſhould be finiſhed, great ſavings would be made in keeping it in repair, from the ſums formerly expended, on a miſtaken opinion, that the foundation was of wood: that there were very conſiderable eſtates appointed ſolely for the repairs of the bridge, which, they apprehended, would be ſufficient to maintain it without any toll: or if they ſhould not be thought adequate to that purpoſe, they hoped the deficiency would not be made up by a toll upon trade and commerce, but rather by an impoſition on coaches, chariots, chaiſes, and ſaddle-horſes. This remonſtrance made no impreſſion on the houſe. The bill being, on a motion of ſir John Philips, read a third time, paſſed through both houſes, and obtained the royal aſſent.

The intereſt of the manufactures was alſo conſulted in an act encouraging the growth of madder, a plant eſſentially neceſſary in dying and printing callicoes, which may be raiſed in England without the leaſt inconvenience. It was judged, upon enquiry, that the moſt effectual means to encourage the growth of this commodity would be to aſcertain the tithe of it, and a bill was brought in for that purpoſe. The rate of the tithe was eſtabliſhed at 5s. an acre; and it was enacted, that this law ſhould continue in force for fourteen years, and to the end of the next ſeſſion of parliament; but wherefore this encouragement was made temporary it is not eaſy to determine. The laws relating to the poor, though equally numerous and oppreſſive to the ſubject, having been found defective, a new clauſe, relating to the ſettlement of ſervants and apprentices, was now added to an act paſſed in the 20th year of the preſent reign, intituled, 'An act for the better adjuſting and more eaſy recovery of the wages of certain ſervants, and of certain apprentices.' No country in the univerſe can produce ſo many laws made in behalf of the poor as thoſe that are daily accumulating in England: in no other country is there ſo much money raiſed for their ſupport, by private charity, as well as public taxation; yet this, as much as any country, ſwarms with vagrant beggars, and teems with objects of miſery and diſtreſs; a ſure ſign either of miſconduct in the legiſlature, or of ſhameful relaxation in the executive part of the civil adminiſtration.—The ſcenes of corruption, perjury, riot, and intemperance which every election for a member of parliament had lately produced were now grown ſo infamouſly open and intolerable, and the right of voting was rendered ſo obſcure and perplexed by the pretentions and proceedings of all the candidates for Oxfordſhire in the laſt election, that the fundamentals of the conſtitution ſeemed to ſhake, and the very eſſence of parliaments to be in danger. Actuated by theſe appehenſions, ſir John Philips, a gentleman of Wales, who had long diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the oppoſition, by his courage and independent ſpirit, moved for leave to bring in a bill that ſhould obviate any doubts which might ariſe concerning the electors of knights of the ſhire to ſerve in parliament for England, and further regulate the proceedings of ſuch elections. He was accordingly permitted to bring in ſuch a bill, in conjunction with mr. Townſhend, mr. Cornwall, and lords North and Carysford; and in the uſual courſe, the bill being prepared, was enacted into a law, under the title of, 'An act for further explaining the laws touching the electors of knights of the ſhire to ſerve in parliament for that part of Great-Britain called England.' The preamble ſpecified, That though, by an act paſſed in the 18th year of the preſent reign, it was provided, that no perſon might vote at the election of a knight or knights of a ſhire within England and Wales, without having a freehold eſtate, in the county for which he votes, of the clear yearly value of 40s. over and above all rents and charges, payable out of or in reſpect to the ſame; nevertheleſs, certain perſons, who hold their eſtates by copy of court-roll, pretend to a right of voting, and have, at certain times, preſumed to vote at ſuch elections: this act, therefore, ordained, that from and after the 29th day of June, in the preſent year, no perſon who holds his eſtate by copy of court-roll ſhould be entitled thereby to vote at the election of any knight or knights of a ſhire within England or Wales; but every ſuch vote ſhould be void, and the perſon ſo voting ſhould forfeit 50l. to any candidate for whom ſuch vote ſhould not have been given, and who ſhould firſt ſue for the ſame, to be recovered with full coſts, by action of debt, in any court of judicature. [b]. So far the act, thus procured, may be attended with ſalutary conſequences: but, in all probability, the intention of its firſt another clauſe in the ſaid act, to prevent the treacherous cutting of hop-binds. Several clauſes in an act of the 10th of George II. for puniſhing perſons ſetting on fire any mine, &c. The tempory part of the act of 20th of George II. for taking away the hereditary juriſdictions of Scotland, relating to the power of appealing to circuit courts. Thoſe continued were, I. An act of the 12th of George II. for granting liberty to carry ſugars, &c. until the 29th day of September, in the year, 1764, and to the end of the next ſeſſion of parliament. II. An act of the 5th of George II. to prevent frauds by bankrupts, &c. for the ſame period. III. An act of the 8th of George II. for encouraging the importation of naval ſtores, &c. for the ſame period. IV. An act of the 19th of George II. for preventing frauds in the admeaſurement of coals, &c. until June 24, 1759; and to this was added, a perpetual clauſe for preventing the ſtealing or deſtroying of madder roots. V. An act of the 9th of George II. for encouraging the manufacture of Britiſh ſail-cloth until the 29th of September, 1764. VI. An act of the 4th of George II. granting an allowance upon Britiſh-made gun-powder, for the ſame period. VII. An act of the 6th of George II. for encouraging the trade of the ſugar colonies, until the 29th of September, 1761. And VIII. ſo much of the act of the 15th and 16th of Geo. II. to empower the importers of rum, &c. as relates to landing it before the payment of duties, until the 29th of September, 1764.

[b] For the more eaſy recovery of this forfeit, it was enacted, That the plaintiff in ſuch action might only ſet forth, in the declaration or bill, that the defendants was indebted to him in the ſum of 50l. alledging the offence for which the ſuit ſhould brought, and that the defendant had acted contrary to this act, without mentioning the writ of ſummons to parliament, or the return thereof; and, upon trial of any iſſue, the plaintiff ſhould not be obliged to prove the writ of ſummons to parliament, or the return thereof, or any warrant or authority to the ſheriff upon any ſuch writ: that every ſuch action ſhould be commenced within nine months after the fact committed; and that, if the plaintiff ſhould diſcontinue his action, or be nonſuited, or have judgment given againſt him, the defendant ſhould recover treble coſts.

movers and patrons was not fully anſwered; inaſmuch as no proviſion was made for putting a ſtop to that ſpirit of licence, drunkenneſs, and debauchery, which prevails at almoſt every election, and has a very pernicious effect upon the morals of the people.

Among the bills that miſcarried in the courſe of this ſeſſion, ſome turned on points of great conſequenee to the community. Lord Barrington, mr. Thomas Gore, and mr. Charles Townſhend, were ordered by the houſe to prepare a bill for the ſpeedy and effectual recruiting his majeſty's land-forces and marines, which was no more than a tranſcript of the temporary act paſſed in the preceding ſeſſion under the ſame title; but the majority were averſe to its being continued for another year, as it was attended with ſome prejudice to the liberty of the ſubject. Objections of the ſame nature might have been as juſtly ſtarted againſt another bill, for the more effectually manning of his majeſty's navy, for preventing deſertion, and for the relief and encouragement of ſeamen belonging to ſhips and veſſels in the ſervice of the merchants. The purport of this project was to eſtabliſh regiſters or muſter-rolls of all ſeamen, fiſhermen, lightermen, and watermen; obliging ſhipmaſters to leave liſts of their reſpective crews at offices, maintained for that purpoſe, that a certain number of them might be choſen by lot for his majeſty's ſervice, in any caſe of emergency. This expedient, however, was rejected, as an unneceſſary and ineffectual incumberance on commerce, which would hamper navigation, and in a little time diminiſh the number of ſeamen, of conſequence act diametrically oppoſite to the purpoſe for which it was contrived.—Numberleſs frauds having been committed, and inceſſant law-ſuits produced, by private and clandeſtine conveyances, a motion was made, and leave given, to form a bill for the public regiſtering of all deeds, conveyances, wills, and other incumberances, that might affect any honours, manors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, within the kingdom of England, wherein public regiſters were not already appointed by act of parliament; but this meaſure, ſo neceſſary to the aſcertainment and poſſeſſion of property, met with a violent oppoſition; and was finally dropped, as ſome people imagine, through the influence of thoſe who, perhaps, had particular reaſons for countenancing the preſent myſterious forms of conveyancing. Such a bill muſt alſo have been diſagreeable and mortifying to the pride of thoſe landholders whoſe eſtates were incumbered, becauſe in ſuch a regiſter, every mortgage under which they laboured would be exactly known.—The next object to which the houſe converted its attention, was a bill explaining and amending a late act for eſtabliſhing a fiſh-market in the city of Weſtminſter, and preventing ſcandalous monopolies of a few engroſſing fiſh-mongers, who impoſed exorbitant prices on their fiſh, and in this particular branch of traffic gave law to above 600,000 of their fellow-citizens. Abundance of pains was taken to render this bill effectual, for putting an end to ſuch flagrant impoſition. Enquiries were made, petitions read, counſel heard, and alterations propoſed: at length the bill, having paſſed through the lower-houſe, was conveyed to the lords, among whom it was ſuffered to expire, on pretence that there was not time ſufficient to deliberate maturely on the ſubject.

The occaſion that produced the next bill which miſcarried we ſhall explain, as an incident equally extraordinary and intereſting. By an act paſſed in the preceding ſeſſion, for recruiting his majeſty's land-forces and marines, we have already obſerved, that the commiſſioners thereby appointed were veſted with a power of judging ultimately whether the perſons brought before them were ſuch, as ought, by the rules preſcribed in the act, to be impreſſed into the ſervice; for it was expreſly provided, that no perſon, ſo impreſſed by thoſe commiſſioners, ſhould be taken out of his majeſty's ſervice by any proceſs, other than for ſome criminal accuſation. During the receſs of parliament, a gentleman having being impreſſed before the commiſſioners, and confined in the Savoy, his friends made application for a habeas-corpus, which produced ſome heſitation, and indeed an inſurmountable difficulty; for, according to the writ of habeas-corpus, paſſed in the reign of Charles II. this privilege relates only to perſons committed for criminal matters, and the gentleman did not ſtand in that predicament. Before the queſtion could be determined he was diſcharged, in conſequence of an application to the ſecretary at war; but the nature of the caſe plainly pointed out a defect in the act, ſeeming of the moſt dangerous conſequence to the liberty of the ſubject. In order to remedy this defect, a bill for giving a more ſpeedy relief to the ſubject, upon the writ of habeas-corpus, was prepared, and preſented to the houſe of commons, which formed itſelf into a committee, and made ſeveral amendments. It imported, that the ſeveral proviſions made in the aforeſaid act, paſſed in the reign of Charles II. for the awarding of writs of habeas-corpus, in caſes of commitment or detainer, for any criminal or ſuppoſed criminal matter, ſhould, in like manner, extend to all caſes where any perſon, not being committed or detained for any criminal or ſuppoſed criminal matter, ſhould be confined, or reſtrained of his or her liberty, under any colour or pretence whatſoever; that, upon oath made by ſuch perſon ſo confined or reſtrained, or by any other on his or her behalf, of any actual confinement or reſtraint, and that ſuch confinement or reſtraint, to the beſt of the knowledge and belief of the perſon ſo applying, was not by virtue of any commitment, or detainer for any criminal or ſuppoſed criminal matter, an habeas-corpus directed to the perſon or perſons ſo confining or reſtraining the party, as aforeſaid, ſhould be awarded and granted, in the ſame manner as is directed, and under the ſame penalties as are provided by the ſaid act, in the caſe of perſons committed and detained for any criminal or ſuppoſed criminal matter: that the perſon or perſons before whom the party ſo confined or reſtrained ſhould be brought, by virtue of an habeas-corpus granted in the vacation-time, under the authority of this act, might and ſhould, within three days after the return made, proceed to examine into the facts contained in ſuch return, and into the cauſe of ſuch confinement and reſtraint; and thereupon either diſcharge, or bail, or remand the parties ſo brought, as the caſe ſhould require, and as to juſtice ſhould appertain. The reſt of the bill related to the return of the writ in three days, and the penalties incurred by thoſe who ſhould neglect or refuſe to make the due return, or to comply with any other clauſe of this regulation. The commons ſeemed hearty in rearing up this additional buttreſs to the liberty of their fellow-ſubjects, and paſſed the bill with the moſt laudable alacrity: but in the houſe of lords ſuch a great number of objections was ſtarted, that it ſunk at the ſecond reading, and the judges were ordered to prepare a bill for the ſame purpoſe, to be laid before that houſe in the next ſeſſion.

His majeſty having recommended the care of the Foundling-Hoſpital to the houſe of commons, which chearfully granted 40,000l. for the ſupport of that charity, the growing annual expence of it appeared worthy of further conſideration, and leave was granted to bring in a bill, for obliging all the pariſhes of England and Wales to keep regiſters of all their deaths, births, and marriages, that from theſe a fund might be raiſed towards the ſupport of the ſaid hoſpital. The bill was accordingly prepared by a committee appointed for the purpoſe; but before the houſe could take the report into conſideration the parliament was prorogued. The proprietors of the privateer called the Antigallican, which had taken a rich French ſhip homeward-bound from China, and carried her into Cadiz, where the Spaniſh government had wreſted her by violence from the captors, and delivered her to the French owners, now preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, complaining of this interpoſition as an act of partiality and injuſtice; repreſented the great expence at which the privateer had been equipped, the legality of the capture, the loſs and hardſhips which they the petitioners had ſuſtained, and imploring ſuch relief as the houſe ſhould think requiſite. Though theſe allegations were ſupported by a ſpecies of evidence that ſeemed ſtrong and convincing, and it might be thought incumbent on the parliament to vindicate the honour of the nation when thus inſulted by a foreign power, the houſe, upon this occaſion, treated the petition with the moſt mortifying neglect, either giving little credit to the aſſertions it contained, or unwilling to take any ſtep which might at this juncture embroil the nation with the court of Spain on ſuch a frivolous ſubject. True it is, the Spaniſh government alledged, in their own juſtification, that the prize was taken under the guns of Corunna, inſomuch that the ſhot fired by the privateer entered that place, and damaged ſome houſes: but this allegation was never properly ſuſtained, and the prize was certainly condemned as legal by the court of admiralty at Gibraltar.

As we have already given a detail of the trial of ſir John Mordaunt, it will be unneceſſary to recapitulate any circumſtances of that affair, except ſuch as relate to its connexions with the proceedings of parliament. In the beginning of this ſeſſion, lord Barrington, as ſecretary at war, informed the houſe, by his majeſty's command, that lieutenant-general ſir John Mordaunt, a member of that houſe, was in arreſt for diſobedience of his majeſty's orders while, employed on the late expedition to the coaſt of France.

The commons immediately reſolved, That an addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, returning him the thanks of this houſe for his gracious meſſage of that day, in the communication he had been pleaſed to make of the reaſon for putting lieutenant-general ſir John Mordaunt in arreſt. Among the various objects of commerce that employed the attention of the houſe, one of the moſt conſiderable was the trade to the coaſt of Africa, for the protection of which an annual ſum had been granted for ſome years, to be expended in the maintenance and repairs of caſtles and factories. While a committee was employed in peruſing the accounts relating to the ſum granted in the preceding ſeſſion for this purpoſe, a petition from the committee of the African company, recommended in a meſſage from his majeſty, was preſented to the houſe, ſoliciting further aſſiſtance for the enſuing year. In the mean time, a remonſtrance was offered by certain planters and merchants, intereſted in and trading to the Britiſh ſugar colonies in America, alledging, that the price of negroes was greatly advanced ſince the forts and ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa had been under the direction of the committee of the company of merchants trading to that coaſt; a circumſtance that greatly diſtreſſed and alarmed the petitioners, prevented the cultivation of the Britiſh colonies, and was a great detriment to the trade and navigation of the kingdom: that this misfortune, they believed, was in ſome meaſure owing to the ruinous ſtate and condition of the forts and ſettlements: that, in their opinion, the moſt effectual method for maintaining the intereſt of that trade on a reſpectable footing, next to that of an incorporated joint-ſtoc company, would be putting thoſe forts and ſettlements under the ſole direction of the commiſſioners for trade and plantations: that the preſervation or ruin of the American ſugar colonies went hand in hand with that of the ſlave trade to Africa: that, by an act paſſed in the year 1750, for extending and improving this trade, the Britiſh ſubjects were debarred from lodging their ſlaves and merchandize in the forts and ſettlements on the coaſt: they, therefore, prayed that this part of the act might be repealed; that all commanders of Britiſh and American veſſels, free merchants, and all other his majeſty's ſubjects, who were ſettled, or might at any time thereafter ſettle in Africa, ſhould have free liberty, from ſun-riſe to ſun-ſet, to enter the forts and ſettlements, and to depoſit their goods and merchandize in the warehouſes thereunto belonging; to ſecure their ſlaves or other purchaſes without paying any conſideration for the ſame; but the ſlaves to be victualled at the proper coſt and charge of their reſpective owners. The houſe having taken this petition into conſideration, enquired into the proceedings of the company, and reviſed the act for extending and improving the trade to Africa, reſolved, That the committee of the African company had faithfully diſcharged the truſt repoſed in them, and granted 10,000l. for maintaining the Britiſh forts and ſettlements in that part of the world. The enemy were perfectly well acquainted with the weakneſs of the Britiſh caſtles on the coaſt of Africa; and had they known as well how to execute with ſpirit, as to plan with ſagacity, the attempt which, in the courſe of the preceding year, they made upon the principal Britiſh fort in Guinea would have ſucceeded, and all the other ſettlements would have fallen into their hands without oppoſition [e].

The longeſt and warmeſt debate which was maintained in the courſe of this ſeſſion aroſe from a motion for leave to bring in a bill for ſhortening the term and duration of future parliaments; a meaſure truely patriotical, againſt which no ſubſtantial argument could be produced, although the motion was rejected by the majority, on pretence, that, whilſt the nation was engaged in ſuch a dangerous an expenſive war, it would be improper to think of introducing ſuch an alteration in the form of government. Reaſons of equal ſtrength and ſolidity will never be wanting to the patrons and miniſters of corruption and venality. The alteration propoſed was nothing leſs than removing and annulling an encroachment which had been on the conſtitution; it might have been effected without the leaſt pang or convulſion, to the general ſatisfaction of the nation: far from being unreaſonable at this juncture, it would have enhanced the national reputation abroad, and rendered the war more formidable to the enemies of Great-Britain, by convincing them that it was ſupported by a miniſtry and parliament, who ſtood upon ſuch good terms with the people. Indeed, a quic ſucceſſion of parliaments might have diſconcerted, and perhaps expelled that ſpirit of confidence and generoſity which now ſo remarkably eſpouſed and gratified the ſovereign's predilection for the intereſt of Hanover. Other committees were eſtabliſhed, to enquire into the expence incurred by new lines and fortifications raiſed at Gibraltar; to examine the original ſtandards of weights and meaſures uſed in England; conſider the laws relating to them, and report their obſervations, together with their opinion of the moſt effectual means for aſcertaining and enforcing uniform ſtandards to be uſed for the future. The commons were perfectly ſatisfied with the new works which had been raiſed at Gibraltar; and with reſpect to the weights and meaſures, the committee agreed to certain reſolutions, but no further progreſs was made in this enquiry, except an order for printing theſe reſolutions, with the appendix: however, as the boxes containing the ſtandards were ordered to be locked up by the clerk of the houſe, in all probability their intention was to proceed on this ſubject in ſome future ſeſſion. On the 9th day of June ſundry bills received the royal aſſent by commiſſion, his majeſty being indiſpoſed; and on the 20th day of the ſame month, the lords commiſſioners cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to both houſes, expreſſing his majeſty's deep ſenſe of their loyalty and good affection, demonſtrated in their late proceedings, in their zeal for his honour and intereſt in all parts, in their earneſtneſs to ſurmount every difficulty, in their ardour to maintain the war with the utmoſt vigour; proofs which muſt convince mankind that the ancient ſpirit of the Britiſh nation ſtill ſubſiſted in its full force. They were given to underſtand that the king had taken all ſuch meaſures as appeared the moſt conducive to the accompliſhment of their public-ſpirited views and wiſhes; that with their aſſiſtance, crowned by the bleſſing of God upon the conduct and bravery of the combined army, his majeſty had been enabled, not only to deliver his dominions in Germany from the oppreſſions and devaſtation of the French, but alſo to puſh his advantages on this ſide the Rhine; that he had cemented the union between him and his good brother the king of Pruſſia, by new engagements; that the Britiſh fleets and armies were now actually employed in ſuch expeditions as appeared likely to annoy the enemy in the moſt ſenſible manner, and to promote the welfare and proſperity of theſe kingdoms; in particular, to preſerve the Britiſh rights and poſſeſſions in America, and to make France feel, in thoſe parts, the real ſtrength and importance of Great-Britain. The commons were thanked for the ample ſupplies which they had ſo freely and unanimouſly given, and aſſured on the part of his majeſty that they ſhould be managed with the moſt frugal œconomy. They were deſired, in conſequence of the king's earneſt recommendation, to promote harmony and good agreement amongſt his faithful ſubjects; to make the people acquainted with the rectitude and purity of his intentions and meaſures, and to exert themſelves in maintaining the peace and good order of the country, by enforcing obedience to the laws and lawful authority.

Never, ſurely, had any ſovereign more reaſons to be pleaſed with the conduct of his miniſters, and the ſpirit of his people. The whole nation repoſed the moſt unbound confidence in the courage and diſcretion, as well as the integrity of the miniſter, who ſeemed eager upon proſecuting the war with ſuch vigour and activity as appearing almoſt unexampled in the annals of Great-Britain. New levies were made, new ſhips put into commiſſion, freſh expeditions undertaken, and freſh conqueſts projected. Such was the credit of the adminiſtration, that people ſubſcribed to the government loans with ſurprſing eagerneſs. An unuſual ſpirit of enterprize and reſolution ſeemed to inſpire all the individuals that conſtituted the army and navy; and the paſſion for military fame diffuſed itſelf through all ranks in the civil department of life, even to the very dregs of the populace; ſuch a remarkable change from indolence to activity from indifference to zeal, from timorous caution to fearleſs execution, was effected by the influence and example of an intelligent and intrepid miniſter, who, chagrined at the inactivity and diſgraces of the preceding campaign, [e] Robert Hunter Morris repreſented, in a petition to the houſe, that as no ſalt was made in the Britiſh colonies in America, they were obliged to depend upon a precarious ſupply of commodity from foreigners; he, therefore, offered to undertake the making of marine-ſalt at a moderate price in one of thoſe colonies, at his own riſque and charge, provided he could be ſecured in the enjoyment of the profits which the work might produce, for ſuch a term of years as might ſeem to the houſe a proper and adequate compenſation for ſo great an undertaking. The petition was ordered to lie upon the table, afterwards read and referred to a committee, which however made no report.—A circumſtance not eaſily accounted for, unleſs we ſuppoſe the houſe of commons were of opinion that ſuch an enterprize might contribute towards rendering our colonies too independent of their mother-country. Equally unaccountable was the miſcarriage of another bill, brought in for regulating the manner of licenſing ale-houſes, which was read for the firſt time: but when a motion was made for a ſecond reading, the queſtion was put, and it paſſed in the negative.

had, on a very ſolemn occaſion, lately declared his belief that there was a determined reſolution, both in the naval and military commanders, againſt any vigorous exertion of the national power in the ſervice of the country. He affirmed, that though his majeſty appeared ready to embrace every meaſure propoſed by his miniſters for the honour and intereſt of his Britiſh dominions, yet ſcarce a man could be found with whom the execution of any one plan in which there was the leaſt appearance of any danger could with confidence be truſted. He particulariſed the inactivity of one general in North-America, from whoſe abilities and perſonal bravery the nation had conceived great expectations: he complained, that this noble commander had expreſſed the moſt contemptuous diſregard for the civil power, from which he derived his authority, by neglecting to tranſmit, for a conſiderable length of time, any other advice of his proceedings but what appeared on a written ſcrap of paper: he obſerved, that with a force by land and ſea greater than ever the nation had heretofore maintained, with a king and miniſtry ardently deſirous of redeeming her glory, ſuccouring her allies, and promoting her true intereſt, a ſhameful diſlike to the ſervice every where prevailed, and few ſeemed affected with any other zeal than that of aſpiring to the higheſt poſts, and graſping the largeſt ſalaries. The cenſure levelled at the commander in America was founded on miſtake: the inactivity of that noble lord was not more diſappointing to the miniſtry than diſagreeable to his own inclination. He uſed his utmoſt endeavours to anſwer the expectations of the public, but his hands were effectually tied by an abſolute impoſſibility of ſucceſs, and his conduct ſtood juſtified in the eyes of his ſovereign. A particular and accurate detail of his proceedings he tranſmitted through a canal, which he imagined would have directly conveyed it to the foot of the throne; but the packet was ſaid to have been purpoſely intercepted and ſuppreſſed. Perhaps he was not altogether excuſeable for having correſponded ſo ſlightly with the ſecretary of ſtate; but he was ſaid to have gone abroad in full perſuaſion that the miniſtry would be changed, and therefore his aſſiduities were principally directed to the great perſonage, who, in that caſe, would have ſuperintended and directed all the operations of the army. All ſorts of military preparations in founderies, docs, arſenals, raiſing and exerciſing troops, and victualling tranſports, were now carried on with ſuch diligence and diſpatch as ſeemed to promiſe an exertion that would ſoon obliterate the diſagreeable remembrance of paſt diſgrace. The beginning of the year was, however, a litttle clouded by a general concern for the death of his majeſty's third daughter, the princeſs Caroline, a lady of the moſt exemplary virtue and amiable character, who died at the age of 45, ſincerely regretted as a pattern of unaffected piety, and unbounded benevolence.

The Britiſh cruiſers kept the ſea during all the ſeverity of winter, in order to protect the commerce of the kingdom, and annoy that of the enemy. They exerted themſelves with ſuch activity, and their vigilence was attended with ſuch ſucceſs, that a great number of prizes was taken, and the trade of France almoſt totally extinguiſhed. A very gallant exploit was achieved by one captain Bray, commander of the Adventure, a ſmall armed veſſel in the government's ſervice: falling in with the Machault, a large privateer of Dunkirk, near Dungenneſs, he ran her a-board, faſtened her boltſprit to his capſtan, and after a warm engagement compelled her commander to ſubmit. A French frigate of 36 guns was taken by captain Parker, in a new fire-ſhip of inferior force. Divers privateers of the enemy were ſunk, burned, or taken, and a great number of merchant-ſhips fell into the hands of the Engliſh. Nor was the ſucceſs of the Britiſh ſhips of war confined to the Engliſh channel. At this period the board of admiralty received information from admiral Cotes, in Jamaica, of an action which happened off the iſland of Hiſpaniola, in the month of October of the preceding year, between three Engliſh ſhips of war and a French ſquadron. Captain Forreſt, an officer of diſtinguiſhed merit in the ſervice, had, in the ſhip Auguſta, ſailed from Port-Royal in Jamaica, accompanied by the Dreadnought and Edinburgh, under the command of the captains Suckling and Langdon. He was ordered to cruiſe off Cape-François, and this ſervice he literally performed in the face of the French ſquadron under Kerſin, lately arrived at that place from the coaſt of Africa. This commander, piqued at ſeeing himſelf thus inſulted by an inferior armament, reſolved to come forth and give them battle; and that he might either take them, or at leaſt drive them out of the ſeas, ſo as to afford a free paſſage to a great number of merchant-ſhips then lying at the Cape, bound for Europe, he took every precaution which he thought neceſſary, to inſure ſucceſs. He re-enforced his ſquadron with ſome ſtore-ſhips, mounted with guns and armed for the occaſion, and ſupplied the deficiency in his complements, by taking on board ſeamen from the merchant-ſhips, and ſoldiers from the garriſon. Thus prepared, he weighed anchor, and ſtood out to ſea, having under his command four large ſhips of the line, and three ſtout frigates. They were no ſooner perceived advancing, than captain Forreſt held a ſhort council with his two captains. 'Gentlemen (ſaid he) you know our own ſtrength, and ſee that of the enemy; ſhall we give them battle?' They replying in the affirmative, he added, 'Then fight them we will; there is no time to be loſt; return to your ſhips, and get them ready for engaging.' After this laconic conſultation among theſe three gallant officers, they bore down upon the French ſquadron without further heſitation, and between three and four in the afternoon the action began with great impetuoſity. The enemy exerted themſelves with uncommon ſpirit, conſcious that their honour was peculiarly at ſtake, and that they fought in ſight, as it were, of their own coaſt, which was lined with people, expecting to ſee them return in triumph. But, notwithſtanding all their endeavours, their commodore, after having ſuſtained a ſevere engagement, that laſted two hours and a half, found his ſhip in ſuch a ſhattered condition, that he made ſignal for one of his frigates to come and tow him out of the line. His example was followed by the reſt of his ſquadron, which, by this aſſiſtance, with the favour of the land breeze and the approach of night, made ſhift to accompliſh their eſcape from the three Britiſh ſhips, which were too much diſabled in their maſts and rigging to proſecute their victory. One of the French ſquadron was rendered altogether unſerviceable for action: their loſs in men amounted to 300 killed, and as many wounded; whereas that of the Engliſh did not much exceed one-third of this number. Nevertheleſs, they were ſo much damaged, that, being unable to keep the ſea, they returned to Jamaica, and the French commodore ſeized the opportunity of ſailing with a great convoy for Europe. The courage of captain Forreſt was not more conſpicuous in his engagement with the French ſquadron near Cape-François, than his conduct and ſagacity in a ſubſequent adventure near Port-au-Prince, a French harbour, ſituated at the bottom of a bay on the weſtern part of Hiſpaniola, behind the ſmall iſland of Gonave. After M. de Kerſin had taken his departure from Cape-François for Europe, admiral Cotes, beating up to windward from Port-Royal in Jamaica with three ſhips of the line, received intelligence that there was a French fleet at Port-au-Prince, ready to ſail on their return to Europe: captain Forreſt then preſented the admiral with a plan for an attac on this place, and urged it earneſtly. This, however, was declined, and captain Forreſt directed to cruiſe off the iſland Gonave for two days only, the admiral enjoining him to return at the expiration of the time, and rejoin the ſquadron at Cape-Nicholas. Accordingly, captain Forreſt, in the Auguſta, proceeded up the bay, between the iſland Gonave and Hiſpaniola, with a view to execute a plan which he had himſelf projected. Next day in the afternoon, though he perceived too ſloops, he forebore chaſing, that he might not riſque a diſcovery; for the ſame purpoſe he hoiſted Dutch colours, and diſguiſed his ſhip with tarpaulins. At five in the afternoon he diſcovered ſeven ſail of ſhips ſteering to the weſtward, and hauled from them, to avoid ſuſpicion; but at the approach of night gave chaſe with all the ſail he could carry. About ten he perceived two ſail, one of which fired a gun, and the other made the beſt of her way for Leoganne, another harbour in the bay. At this period captain Forreſt reckoned eight ſail to leeward, near another part called Petit Goave; coming up with the ſhip which had fired the gun, ſhe ſubmitted without oppoſition, after he had hailed, and told her captain what he was, produced two of his largeſt cannon, and threatened to ſink her if he ſhould give the leaſt alarm. He forthwith ſhifted the priſoners from this prize, and placed on board of her 35 of his own crew, with orders to ſtand for Petit Goava and intercept any of the fleet that might attempt to reach that harbour. Then he made ſail after the reſt, and in the dawn of the morning, finding himſelf in the middle of their fleet, he began to fire at them all in turns, as he could bring his guns to bear; they returned the fire for ſome time; at length the Marguerite, the Solide, and the Theodore ſtruc their colours. Theſe being ſecured, were afterwards uſed in taking the Maurice, Le Grand, and La Flore; the Brilliant alſo ſubmitted, and the Mars made ſail, in hopes of eſcaping, but the Auguſta coming up with ſier about noon, ſhe likewiſe fell into the hands of the victor. Thus, by a well-conducted ſtratagem, a whole fleet of nine ſail were taken by a ſingle ſhip, in the neighbourhood of four or five harbours, in any one of which they would have found immediate ſhelter and ſecurity. The prizes, which happened to be richly laden, were ſafely conveyed to Jamaica, and there ſold at public auction, for the benefit of the captors, who may ſafely challenge hiſtory to produce ſuch another inſtance of ſucceſs.

The miniſtry having determined to make vigorous efforts againſt the enemy in North-America, admiral Boſcawen was veſted with the command of the fleet deſtined for that ſervice, and ſailed from St. Helen's on the 19th day of February, when the Invincible, of 74 guns, one of the beſt ſhips that conſtituted his ſuadron, ran a-ground, and periſhed; but her men, ſtores, and artillery were ſaved. In the courſe of the ſucceeding month, ſir Edward Hawke ſteered into the Bay of Biſcay with another ſquadron, in order to intercept any ſupplies from France deſigned for Cape-Breton or Canada; and about the ſame time, the town of Embden, belonging to his Pruſſian majeſty, which had fallen into the hands of the enemy, was ſuddenly retrieved by the conduct of commodore Holmes, ſtationed on that coaſt, who ſent up two of his ſmall ſhips to anchor in the river between Knok and the city. The garriſon, amounting to three thouſand ſeven hundred men, finding themſelves thus cut off from all communication with the country below, abandoned the place with great precipitation, and ſome of their baggage being ſent off by water, was taken by the boats which the commodore armed for that purpoſe. It was in the ſame month that the admiralty received advice of another advantage by ſea, which had been gained by admiral Oſborne, while he cruiſed between Cape de Gatt and Carthagena on the coaſt of Spain. On the 28th day of March he fell in with a French ſquadron, commanded by the marquis du Queſne, conſiſting of four ſhips, namely, the Foudroyant, of 80 guns, the Orphée, of 64, the Oriflamme, of 50, and Pleiade frigate, of 24, in their paſſage from Toulon to re-enforce M. de la Clue, who had for ſome time been blocked up by admiral Oſborne in the harbour of Carthagena. The enemy no ſooner perceived the Engliſh ſquadron than they diſperſed, and ſteered different courſes: then mr. Oſborne detached divers ſhips in purſuit of each, while he himſelf, with the body of his fleet, ſtood off for the bay of Carthagena, to watch the motions of the French ſquadron which lay there at anchor. About ſeven in the evening, the Orphée, having on board 500 men, ſtruc to captain Storr, in the Revenge, who loſt the calf of one leg in the engagement, during which he was ſuſtained by the ſhips Berwick and Preſton. The Monmouth, of 64 guns, commanded by captain Gardener, engaged the Foudroyant, one of the largeſt ſhips in the French navy, mounted with 80 cannon, and containing 800 men, under the direction of the marquis du Queſne. The action was maintained with great fury on both ſides, and the gallant captain Gardener loſt his life; nevertheleſs, the fight was continued with unabating vigour by his lieutenant, mr. Carkett, and the Foudroyant diſabled in ſuch a manner, that her commander ſtruc, as ſoon as the other Engliſh ſhips, the Swiftſure and the Hampton-Court, appeared. This mortifying ſtep, however, he did not take until he ſaw his ſhip like a wrec upon the water, and the decs covered with carnage. The Oriflamme was driven on ſhore under the caſtle of Aiglos, by the ſhips Montague and Monarque, commanded by captain Rowley and Montague, who could not complete their deſtruction without violating the neutrality of Spain. As for the Pleiade frigate, ſhe made her eſcape by being a prime ſailer. This was a ſevere ſtroke upon the enemy, who not only loſt two of their capital ſhips, but ſaw them added to the navy of Great-Britain, and the diſaſter was followed cloſe by another, which they could not help feeling with equal ſenſibility of mortification and chagrin. In the beginning of April, ſir Edward Hawke, ſteering with his ſquadron into Baſque-road, on the coaſt of Poictou, diſcovered, off the Iſle of Aix, a French fleet at anchor, conſiſting of five ſhips of the line, with ſix frigates, and 40 tranſports, having on board 3000 troops, and a large quantity of ſtores and proviſions, intended as a ſupply for their ſettlements in North-America. They no ſooner ſaw the Engliſh admiral advancing, than they began to ſlip their cables, and fly in the utmoſt confuſion. Some of them eſcaped by ſea, but the greater number ran into ſhoal water, where they could not be purſued; and next morning they appeared a-ground, lying on their broadſides. Sir Edward Hawke, who had rode all night at anchor abreaſt of the Iſle of Aix, furniſhed the ſhips Intrepid and Medway with truſty pilots, and ſent them farther in when the flood began to make, with orders to ſound a-head, that he might know whether there was any poſſibility of attacking the enemy, but the want of a ſufficient depth of water rendered the ſcheme impracticable. In the mean time, the French threw over-board their cannon, ſtores, and ballaſt; and boats and launches from Rochefort were employed in carrying out warps, to drag their ſhips through the ſoft mud, as ſoon as they ſhould be water-borne by the flowing-tide. By theſe means their large ſhips of war, and many of their tranſports, eſcaped into the river Charente; but their loading was loſt, and the end of their equipment totally defeated. Another convoy of merchant-ſhips, under the protection of three frigates, ſir Edward Hawke, a few days before, had chaſed into the harbour of St. Martin's, in the Iſle of Rhé, where they ſtill remained, waiting an opportunity for hazarding a ſecond departure: a third, conſiſting of twelve ſail, bound from Bourdeaux to Quebeck, under convoy of a frigate and armed veſſel, was encountered at ſea by one Britiſh ſhip of the line and two fire-ſhips, which took the frigate and armed veſſel, and two of the convoy afterwards met with the ſame fate; but this advantage was over-balanced by the loſs of captain James Hume, commander of the Pluto fire-ſhip, a brave accompliſhed officer, who, in an unequal combat with the enemy, refuſed to quit the dec even when he was diſabled, and fell glorioufly, covered with wounds, exhorting the people, with his lateſt breath, to continue the engagement while the ſhip could ſwim, and acquit themſelves with honour in the ſervice of their country.

On the 29th day of May the Raiſonable, a French ſhip of the line, mounted with 64 cannon, having on board 630 men, commanded by the prince de Mombazon chevalier de Rohan, was in her paſſage from Port l'Orient to Breſt, attacked by captain Dennis, in the Dorſetſhire, of 74 guns, and taken after an obſtinate engagement, in which 160 men of the prince's compliment were killed or wounded, and he ſuſtained great damage in his hull, ſails, and rigging. Theſe ſucceſſes were moreover chequered by the tidings of a lamentable diſaſter that befell the ſhip Prince George, of 80 guns, commanded by rear-admiral Broderick, in his paſſage to the Mediterranean. On the 13th day of April, between one and two in the afternoon, a dreadful fire broke out in the fore part of the ſhip, and raged with ſuch fury, that notwithſtanding all the efforts of the officers and men for ſeveral hours, the flames increaſed, and the ſhip being conſumed to the water's edge, the remnant ſunk about ſix o'clock in the evening. The horror and conſternation of ſuch a ſcene are not eaſily deſcribed. When all endeavours proved fruitleſs, and no hope of preſerving the ſhip remained, the barge was hoiſted out for the preſervation of the admiral, who entered it accordingly; but all diſtinction of perſons being now aboliſhed, the ſeamen ruſhed into it in ſuch crowds, that in a few moments it overſet. The admiral, foreſeeing that this would be the caſe, ſtripped off his clothes, and committing himſelf to the mercy of the waves, was ſaved by the boat of a merchant-ſhip, after he had ſuſtained himſelf in the ſea a full hour by ſwimming. Captain Payton, who was the ſecond in command, remained upon the quarter-dec as long as it was poſſible to keep that ſtation, and then deſcending by the ſtern ladder, had the good fortune to be taken into a boat belonging to the Alderney ſloop. The hull of the ſhip, maſts, and rigging, were now in a blaze, burſting tremendous in ſeveral parts through horrid clouds of ſmoak; nothing was heard but the crackling of the flames, mingled with the diſmal cries of terror and diſtraction; nothing was ſeen but acts of phrenzy and deſperation. The miſerable wretches, affrighted at the horrors of ſuch a conflagration, ſought a fate leſs dreadful, by plunging into the ſea, and about 300 men were preſerved by the boats belonging to ſome ſhips that accompanied the admiral in his voyage, but 500 periſhed in the ocean.

The king of Great-Britain being determined to renew his attempt upon the coaſt of France, ordered a very formidable armament to be equipped for that purpoſe. Two powerful ſquadrons by ſea were deſtined for the ſervices of this expedition, the firſt, conſiſting of eleven great ſhips, was commanded by lord Anſon and ſir Edward Hawke: the other, compoſed of four ſhips of the line, ſeven frigates, ſix ſloops, two fire-ſhips, two bombs, ten cutters, twenty tenders, ten ſtore-ſhips, and one hundred tranſports, put under the direction of commodore Howe, who had ſignalized himſelf by his gallantry and conduct in the courſe of the laſt fruitleſs expedition. The plan of a deſcent upon France having been adopted by the miniſtry, a body of troops, confiſting of ſixteen regiments, nine troops of light-horſe, and 6000 marines, was aſſembled for the execution of this deſign, and embarked under the command of the duke of Marlborough; a nobleman, who, though he did not inherit all the military genius of his grandfather, yet far excelled him in the amiable and ſocial qualities of the heart: he was brave beyond all queſtion, generous to profuſion, and good-natured to exceſs. On this occaſion, he was aſſiſted by the councils of lord George Sackville, ſecond in command, ſon to the duke of Dorſet; an officer of experience and reputation, who had, in the civil departments of government, exhibited proofs of extraordinary genius and uncommon application. The troops, having been encamped for ſome time upon the Iſle of Wight, were embarked in the latter end of May, and the two fleets ſailed in the beginning of June for the coaſt of Bretagne, leaving the people of England fluſhed with the gayeſt hopes of victory and conqueſt. The two fleets parted at ſea: lord Anſon, with his ſquadron, proceeded to the bay of Biſcay, in order to watch the motions of the enemy's ſhips, and harraſs their navigation; while commodore Howe, with the land-forces, ſteered directly towards St. Maloes, a ſtrong place of conſiderable commerce, ſituated on the coaſt of Bretagne, againſt which the purpoſed invaſion ſeemed to be chiefly intended. The town, however, was found too well fortified, both by art and nature, to admit of an attempt by ſea with any proſpect of ſucceſs; and, therefore, it was reſolved to make a deſcent in the neighbourhood. After the fleet had been, by contrary winds, detained ſeveral days in ſight of the French coaſt, it arrived in the bay of Cancalle, about two leagues to the eaſtward of St. Maloes, and mr. Howe having ſilenced a ſmall battery which the enemy had occaſionally raiſed upon the beach, the troops were landed, without further oppoſition, on the 6th day of June. The duke of Marlborough immediately began his march towards St. Servan, with a view to deſtroy ſuch ſhipping and magazines as might be in any acceſſible parts of the river; and this ſcheme was executed with ſucceſs. A great quantity of naval ſtores, two ſhips of war, ſeveral privateers, and about fourſcore veſſels of different ſorts, were ſet on fire and reduced to aſhes, almoſt under the cannon of the place, which, however, they could not pretend to beſiege in form. His grace having received repeated advices that the enemy were buſily employed in aſſembling forces to march againſt him, returned to Cancalle, where mr. Howe had made ſuch a maſterly diſpoſition of the boats and tranſports, that the re-embarkation of the troops was performed with ſurpriſing eaſe and expedition. The forces, while they remained on ſhore, were reſtrained from all outrages by the moſt ſevere diſcipline; and the French houſes, which their inhabitants had abandoned, were left untouched. Immediately after their landing, the duke of Marlborough, as commander in chief, publiſhed and diſtributed a manifeſto, addreſſed to the people of Bretagne, giving them to underſtand, that his deſcent upon the coaſt was not effected with a deſign to make war on the inhabitants of the open country, except ſuch as ſhould be found in arms, or otherwiſe oppoſing the operations of his Britannick majeſty: that all who were willing to continue in peaceable poſſeſſion of their effects, might remain unmoleſted in their reſpective dwellings, and follow their uſual occupations; that, beſides the cuſtoms and taxes they uſed to pay to their own king, nothing ſhould be required of them but what was abſolutely neceſſary for the ſubſiſtence of the army; and that, for all proviſions brought in, they ſhould be paid in ready money. He concluded this notice with declaring, that if, notwithſtanding theſe aſſurances of protection, they ſhould carry off their effects and proviſions, and abandon the places of their habitation, he would treat them as enemies, and deſtroy their houſes with fire and ſword. To the magiſtracy of St. Maloes he likewiſe ſent a letter, importing, that as all the inhabitants of the towns and villages between Dinant, Rennes, and Doll, now in his poſſeſſion, had deſerted their habitations, probably to avoid the payment of the uſual contributions; and he being informed that the magiſtrates had compelled the people of the country to retire into the town of St. Maloes, he now gave them notice, that if they did not immediately ſend them bac to their houſes, and come themſelves to his head-quarters, to ſettle the contributions, he ſhould think himſelf obliged to proceed to military execution. Theſe threats, however, were not put in force, although the magiſtrates of St. Maloes did not think proper ito comply with his injunction. But it was found altogether mpoſſible to prevent irregularities among troops that were naturally licentious. Some houſes were pillaged, and not without acts of barbarity: but the offenders were brought to immediate juſtice; and it muſt be owned, as an inconteſtable proof of the general's humanity, that in deſtroying the magazines of the enemy at St. Servan, which may be termed the ſuburbs of St. Maloes, he ordered one ſmall ſtore-houſe to be ſpared, becauſe it could not be ſet on fire without endangering the whole diſtrict. The Britiſh forces being re-embarked, including about five hundred light-horſe, which had been diſciplined and carried over with a view to ſcour the country, the fleet was detained by contrary winds in the bay of Cancalle for ſeveral days, during which a deſign ſeems to have been formed for attacking Granville, which had been reconnoitred by ſome of the engineers: but, in conſequence of their report, the ſcheme was laid aſide, and the fleet ſtood out to ſea, where it was expoſed to ſome rough weather. In a few days, the wind blowing in a northern direction, they ſteered again towards the French coaſt, and ran in with the land near Havre-de-Grace, where the flat-bottomed boats, provided for landing, were hoiſted out, and a ſecond diſembarkation expected. But the wind blowing violently towards the evening, the boats were re-ſhipped, and the fleet obliged to quit the land, in order to avoid the dangers of a lee-ſhore. Next day, the weather being more moderate, they returned to the ſame ſtation, and orders were given to prepare for a deſcent; but the duke of Marlborough having taken a view of the coaſt in an open cutter, accompanied by commodore Howe, thought proper to wave the attempt. Their next ſtep was to bear away before the wind for Cherbourg, in the neighbourhood of which place the fleet came to anchor. Here ſome of the tranſports received the fire of ſix different batteries; and a conſiderable body of troops appeared in arms to diſpute the landing; nevertheleſs, the general reſolved that the forts Querqueville, l'Hommet, and Gallet ſhould be attacked in the night by the firſt regiment of guards. The ſoldiers were actually diſtributed in the flat-bottomed boats, and every preparation made for this enterprize, when the wind began to blow with ſuch violence, that the troops could not be landed without the moſt imminent danger and difficulty, nor properly ſuſtained in caſe of a repulſe, even if the diſembarkation could have been effected. This attempt, therefore, was laid aſide, but at the ſame time a reſolution taken to ſtand in towards the ſhore with the whole fleet, to cover a general landing. A diſpoſition was made accordingly, but the ſtorm increaſing, the tranſports ran foul of each other, and the ſhips were expoſed to all the perils of a lee-ſhore, for the gale blew directly upon the coaſt; beſides, the proviſions began to fail, and the hay for the horſes was almoſt conſumed. Theſe concurring reaſons induced the commanders to poſtpone the diſembarkation to a more favourable opportunity. The fleet ſtood out to ſea, the tempeſt abated, they ſteered for the Iſle of Wight, and next day anchored at St. Helen's. Such was the iſſue of an enterprize achieved with conſiderable ſucceſs, if we conſider the damage done to the enemy's ſhipping, and the other objects which the miniſtry had in view; namely, to ſecure the navigation of the channel, and make a diverſion in favour of German allies, by alarming the French king, and obliging him to employ a great number of troops to defend his coaſt from inſult and invaſion: but whether ſuch a mighty armament was neceſſary for the accompliſhment of theſe petty aims, and whether the ſame armament might not have been employed in executing ſchemes of infinitely greater advantage to the nation, we ſhall leave to the judicious reader's own reflexion.

The deſigns upon the coaſt of France, though interrupted by tempeſtuous weather, were not as yet laid aſide for the whole ſeaſon: but, in the mean time, the troops were diſembarked on the Iſle of Wight; and one brigade marched to the northward, to join a body of troops with which the government reſolved to augment the army of the allies in Germany, commanded by prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick. The duke of Marlborough and lord George Sackville being appointed to conduct this Britiſh corps upon the continent, the command of the marine expeditions devolved to lieutenant-general Bligh, an old experienced officer, who had ſerved with reputation; and his royal highneſs prince Edward, aftewards created duke of York, entered as a volunteer with commodore Howe, in order to learn the rudiments of the ſea ſervice. The remainder of the troops being reembarked, and every thing prepared for the ſecond expedition, the fleet ſailed from St. Helen's on the firſt of Auguſt; and after a tedious paſſage from calms and contrary winds, anchored on the 7th in the bay of Cherbourg. By this time the enemy had entrenched themſelves within a line, extending from the fort Ecœur eville, which ſtands about two miles to the weſtward of Cherbourg, along the coaſt for the ſpace of four miles, fortified with ſeveral batteries at proper diſtances. Behind this retrenchment a body of horſe and infantry appeared in red and blue uniforms; but as they did not advance to the open beach, the leſs riſque was run in landing the Britiſh forces. At firſt a bomb-ketch had been ſent to anchor near the town, and throw ſome ſhells into the place, as a feint to amuſe the enemy, and deceive them with regard to the place of diſembarkation, while the general had determined to land about a league to the weſtward of Querqueville, the moſt weſtern fort in the bay. The other bomb-ketches, being poſted along ſhore, did conſiderable execution upon the entrenchments, not only by throwing ſhells in the uſual way, but alſo by uſing ball-mortars, filled with great quantities of balls, which may be thrown to a great diſtance, and, by ſcattering as they fly, do abundance of miſchief. While theſe ketches fired without ceaſing, the grenadiers and guards were rowed regularly aſhore in the flat bottomed boats, and, landing without oppoſition, inſtantly formed on a ſmall open portion of the beach, with a natural breaſt-work in their front, having on the other ſide a hollow way, and a village riſing beyond it with a ſudden aſcent: on the left, the ground was interſected by hedges, and covered with orchards, and from this quarter the enemy advanced in order. The Britiſh troops immediately quitted the breaſt-work, in order to meet them half-way, and a ſtraggling fire began; but the French edging to the left, took poſſeſſion of the hill, from whence they piqueered with the advanced poſts of the Engliſh. In the mean time, the reſt of the infantry were diſembarked, and the enemy at night retired. As the light troops were not yet landed, general Bligh encamped that night at the village of Erville, on a piece of ground that did not extend above 400 paces; ſo that the tents were pitched in a crowded and irregular manner. Next morning, the general having received intelligence that no parties of the enemy were ſeen moving on the hill, or in the plain, and that fort Querqueville was entirely abandoned, made a diſpoſition for marching in two columns to Cherbourg. An advanced party took immediate poſſeſſion of Querqueville; and the lines and batteries along the ſhore were now deſerted by the enemy. The Britiſh forces marching behind St. Aulne, Ecœurdeville, Hommet, and la Galet, found the town of Cherbourg likewiſe abandoned, and the gates being open, entered it without oppoſition. The citizens, encouraged by a manifeſto containing a promiſe of protection, which had been publiſhed and diſtributed, in order to quiet their apprehenſions, received their new gueſts with a good grace, overwhelming them with civilities, for which they met with a very ungrateful return; for as the bulk of the army was not regularly encamped and ſuperintended, the ſoldiers were at liberty to indulge themſelves in riot and licentiouſneſs. All night long they ravaged the adjacent country without reſtraint; and as no guards had been regularly placed in the ſtreets and avenues of Cherbourg, to prevent diſorders, the town itſelf was not exempted from pillage and brutality. Theſe outrages, however, were no ſooner known, than the general took immediate ſteps for putting a ſtop to them for the preſent, and preventing all irregularities for the future. Next morning the place being reconnoitred, he determined to deſtroy, without delay, all the forts and the baſon; and the execution of this deſign was left to the engineers, aſſiſted by the officers of the fleet and artillery. Great ſums of money had been expended upon the harbour and baſon of Cherbourg, which at one time was conſidered by the French court as an object of great importance, from its ſituation reſpecting the river Seine, as well as the oppoſite coaſt of England; but as the works were left unfiniſhed, in all appearence the plan had grown into diſreputation. The enemy had raiſed ſeveral unconnected batteries along the bay, but the town itſelf was quite open and defenſeleſs. While the engineers were employed in demoliſhing the works, the light-horſe ſcoured the country, and detachments were every day ſent out towards Walloign, at the diſtance of four leagues from Cherbourg, where the enemy were encamped, and every hour received re-enforcements. Several ſkirmiſhes were fought by the out-parties of each army, in one of which capt. Lindſay, a gallant young officer, who had been very inſtrumental in training the light horſe, was mortally wounded. The harbour and baſon of Cherbourg being deſtroyed, together with all the forts in the neighbourhood, and about twenty pieces of braſs cannon ſecured on board the Engliſh ſhips, a contribution, amounting to about 3000l. ſterling, was exacted upon the town, and a plan of re-embarkation, concerted, as it appeared from the reports of peaſants and deſerters that the enemy were already increaſed to a formidable number. A ſlight entrenchment being raiſed, ſufficient to defend the laſt diviſion that ſhould be re-embarked, the ſtores and artillery were ſhipped, and the light-horſes conveyed on board their reſpective tranſports, by means of platforms laid in the flat-bottomed veſſels. On the 16th day of Auguſt, at three o'clock in the morning, the forces marched from Cherbourg down to the beach, and re-embarked at Fort-Galet, without the leaſt diſturbance from the enemy.

This ſervice being happily performed, the fleet ſet ſail for the coaſt of England, and anchored in the road of Weymouth, under the high land of Portland. In two days it weighed and ſtood again to the ſouthward; but was obliged, by contrary winds, to return to the ſame riding. The ſecond effort, however, was more effectual. The fleet with ſome difficulty kept the ſea, and ſteering to the French coaſt, came to anchor in the bay of St. Lunaire, two leagues to the weſtward of St. Maloes, againſt which it was determined to make another attempt. The ſloops and ketches being ranged along ſhore to cover the diſembarkation, the troops landed on a fair open beach, and a detachment of grenadiers was ſent to the harbour of St. Briac, above the town of St. Malo, where they deſtroyed about 15 ſmall veſſels: but St. Maloes itſelf being properly ſurveyed, appeared to be above inſult, either from the land forces or the ſhipping. The mouth of the river that forms its baſon extends above two miles in breadth at its narroweſt part, ſo as to be out of the reach of land-batteries, and the entrance is defended by ſuch forts and batteries as the ſhips of war could not pretend to ſilence, conſidering the difficult navigation of the channels beſides 50 pieces of large cannon planted on theſe forts and batteries, the enemy had mounted 40 on the weſt ſide of the town; and the baſon was, moreover, ſtrengthened by ſeven frigates or armed veſſels, whoſe guns might have been brought to bear upon any batteries that could be raiſed on ſhore, as well as upon ſhips entering by the uſual channel. For theſe ſubſtantial reaſons the deſign againſt St. Maloes was dropped; but the general being unwilling to re-embark without having taken ſome ſtep for the further annoyance of the enemy, reſolved to penetrate into the country, conducting his motions, however, ſo as to be near the fleet, which had, by this time, quitted the bay of St. Lunaire, where it could not ride with any ſafety, and anchored in the bay of St. Cas, about three leagues to the weſtward.

On Friday the 8th of September, general Bligh, with his little army, began his march for Guildo, at the diſtance of nine miles, which he reached in the evening: next day he croſſed a little gut or inlet of the ſea, at low water, and his troops being incommoded by the peaſants, who fired at them from hedges and houſes, he ſent a prieſt with a meſſage, intimating, that if they would not deſiſt, he would reduce their houſes to aſhes. No regard being paid to this intimation, the houſes were actually ſet on fire as ſoon as the troops had formed their camp about two miles on the other ſide of the inlet. Next morning he proceeded to the village of Martignon, where, after ſome ſmart ſkirmiſhing, the French piquets appeared, drawn up in order, to the number of two battalions; but having ſuſtained a few ſhot from the Engliſh field-pieces, and ſeeing the grenadiers advance, they ſuddenly diſperſed. General Bligh continuing his rout through the village, encamped in the open ground, about three miles from the bay of St. Cas, which was this day reconnoitred for re-embarkation: for he now received undoubted intelligence, that the duke d'Aiguillon had advanced from Breſt to Lambale, within ſix miles of the Engliſh camp, at the head of 12 regular battalions, 6 ſquadrons, 2 regiments of militia, 8 mortars, and 10 pieces of cannon. The bay of St. Cas was covered by an entrenchment which the enemy had thrown up, to prevent or oppoſe any diſembarkation; and on the outſide of this work there was a range of ſand-hills extending along ſhore, which could have ſerved as a cover to the enemy, from whence they might have annoyed the troops in re-embarking: for this reaſon a propoſal was made to the general, that the forces ſhould be re-embarked from a fair open beach on the left, between St. Cas and Guildo; but this advice was rejected, and, indeed, the ſubſequent operations of the army ſavoured ſtrong of blind ſecurity and raſh preſumption. Had the troops decamped in the night without noiſe, in all probability they would have arrived at the beach before the French had received the leaſt intelligence of their motion; and, in that caſe, the whole army, conſiſting of about 6000 men, might have been re-embarked without the leaſt interruption: but, inſtead of this cautious manner of proceeding, the drums were beaten at two o'clock in the morning, as if with intention to give notice to the enemy, who forthwith repeated the ſame ſignal. The troops were in motion before three, and though the length of the march did not exceed three miles, the halts and interruptions were ſo numerous and frequent, that they did not arrive on the beach of St. Cas till nine. Then the embarkation was begun, and might have been happily finiſhed, had the tranſports lain near the ſhore, and received the men as faſt as the boats could have conveyed them on board, without diſtinction; but many ſhips rode at a conſiderable diſtance, and every boat carried the men on board the reſpective tranſports to which they belonged; a punctilio of diſpoſition by which a great deal of time was unneceſſarily conſumed. The ſmall ſhips and bomb-ketches were brought near the ſhore, to cover the re-embarkation; and a conſiderable number of ſea-officers were ſtationed on the beach, to ſuperintend the boats' crews, and regulate the ſervice; but, notwithſtanding all their attention and authority, ſome of the boats were otherwiſe em loyed than in conveying the unhappy ſoldiers. Had all the cutters and ſmall craft belonging to the fleet been properly occupied in this ſervice, the diſgrace and diſaſter of the day would ſcarce have happened. The Britiſh forces had ſkirmiſhed a little on the march, but no conſiderable body of the enemy appeared until the embarkation was begun; then they took poſſeſſion of an eminence by a wind-mill, and forthwith opened a battery of ten cannon and eight mortars, from whence they fired with conſiderable effect upon the ſoldiers on the beach, and on the boats in their paſſage. They afterwards began to march down the hill, partly covered by a hollow way on their left, with deſign to gain a wood, where they might form and extend themſelves along the front of the Engliſh, and advance againſt them under ſhelter of the ſand-hills; but in their deſcent they ſuffered extremely from the cannon and mortars of the ſhipping, which made great havoc, and threw them into confuſion. Their line of march down the hill was ſtaggered, and for ſome time continued in ſuſpence; then they turned off to one ſide, extended themſelves along a hill to their left, and advanced in a hollow way, from whence they ſuddenly ruſhed out to the attac. Though the greater part of the Britiſh troops were already embarked, the rear-guard, conſiſting of all the grenadiers, and half of the firſt regiment of guards, remained on the ſhore, to the number of 1500, under the command of major-general Dury. This officer, ſeeing the French advance, ordered his troops to form in grand diviſions, and march from behind the bank that covered them, in order to charge the enemy before they could be formed on the plain. Had this ſtep been taken when it was firſt ſuggeſted to mr. Dury, before the French were diſengaged from the hollow way, perhaps it might have ſo far ſucceeded as to diſconcert and throw them into confuſion: but by this time they had extended themſelves into a very formidable front, and no hope remained of being able to withſtand ſuch a ſuperior number. Inſtead of attempting to fight againſt ſuch odds in an open field of battle, they might have retreated along the beach to a roc on the left, in which progreſs their right flank would have been ſecured by the entrenchment; and the enemy could not have purſued them along the ſhore, without being expoſed to ſuch a fire from the ſhipping, as in all probability they could not have ſuſtained.

This ſcheme was likewiſe propoſed to mr. Dury; but he ſeemed to be actuated by a ſpirit of infatuation. The Engliſh line being drawn up in uneven ground, began the action with an unregular fire from right to left, which the enemy returned; but their uſual fortitude and reſolution ſeemed to forſake them on this occaſion. They ſaw themſelves in danger of being ſurrounded, and cut in pieces; their officers dropped on every ſide; and all hope of retreat was now intercepted. In this cruel dilemma their ſpirits failed; they were ſeized with a panic; they faultered, they broke, and in leſs than five minutes after the engagement began they fled in the utmoſt confuſion, purſued by the enemy, who no ſooner ſaw them give way than they fell in among them with their bayonets fixed, and made a great carnage. General Dury being dangerouſly wounded, ran into the ſea, where he periſhed; and this was the fate of a great number, officers as well as ſoldiers. Many ſwam towards the boats and veſſels, which were ordered to give them all manner of aſſiſtance; but by far the greater number were either butchered on the beach, or drowned in the water: a ſmall body, however, inſtead of throwing themſelves into the ſea, retired to the roc on the left, where they made a ſtand, until they had exhauſted their ammunition, and then ſurrendered at diſcretion. The havoc was moreover increaſed by the ſhot and ſhells diſcharged from the battery which the enemy had raiſed on the hill. The ſlaughter would not have been ſo great, had not the French ſoldiers been exaſperated by the fire from the frigates, which was ſtill maintained even after the Engliſh troops were routed: but this was no ſooner ſilenced by a ſignal from the commodore, than the enemy exhibited a noble example of moderation and humanity, in granting immediate quarter and protection to the vanquiſhed. About 1000 choſen men of the Engliſh army were killed and taken priſoners on this occaſion: nor was the advantage cheaply purchaſed by the French troops, among whom the ſhot and ſhells from the frigates and ketches had done great execution. The clemency of the victors was the more remarkable, as the Britiſh troops in this expedition had been ſhamefully guilty of marauding, pillaging, burning, and other exceſſes. War is ſo dreadful in itſelf, and ſo ſevere in its conſequences, that the exerciſe of generoſity and compaſſion, by which its horrors are mitigated, ought ever to be applauded, encouraged, and imitated. We ought alſo to uſe our beſt endeavours to deſerve this treatment at the hands of a civilized enemy. Let us be humane in our turn to thoſe whom the fate of war hath ſubjected to our power; let us, in proſecuting our military operations, maintain the moſt rigid diſcipline among the troops, and religiouſly abſtain from all acts of violence and oppreſſion. Thus, a laudable emulation will undoubtedly enſue, and the powers at war vie with each other in humanity and politeneſs. In other reſpects, the commander of an invading armament will always find his account in being well with the common people of the country in which the deſcent is made. By civil treatment and ſeaſonable gratifications, they will be encouraged to bring into the camp regular ſupplies of proviſions and refreſhment; they will mingle with the ſoldiers, and even form friendſhips among them; ſerve as guides, meſſengers, and interpreters; let out their cattle for hire as draft-horſes; work in their own perſons as day-labourers; diſcover proper fords, bridges, roads, paſſes, and defiles; and, if artfully managed, communicate many uſeful hints of intelligence. If great care and circumſpection be not exerted in maintaining diſcipline, and bridling the licentious diſpoſition of the ſoldiers, ſuch invaſions will be productive of nothing but miſcarriage and diſgrace: for this, at beſt, is but a piratical way of carrying on war: and the troops engaged in it are, in ſome meaſure, debauched by the nature of the ſervice. They are crowded together in tranſports, where the minute particulars of military order cannot be obſerved, even though the good of the ſervice greatly depends upon a due obſervance of theſe forms. The ſoldiers grow negligent, and inattentive to cleanneſs and the exterior ornament of dreſs: they become ſlovenly, ſlothful, and altogether unfit for a return of duty: they are tumbled about occaſionly in ſhips and boats, landed and re-embarked in a tumultuous manner, under a divided and diſorderly command: they are accuſtomed to retire at the firſt report of an approaching enemy, and to take ſhelter on another element; nay, their ſmall pillaging parties are often obliged to fly before unarmed peaſants. Their duty on ſuch occaſions is the moſt unmanly part of a ſoldier's office; namely, to ruin, ravage, and deſtroy. They ſoon yield to the temptation of pillage, and are habituated to rapine: they give looſe to intemperance, riot, and intoxication; commit a thouſand exceſſes; and, when the enemy appears, run on board the ſhips with their booty. Thus the dignity of the ſervice is debaſed: they loſe all ſenſe of honour, and of ſhame: they are no longer reſtricted by military laws, nor over-awed by the authority of officers: in a word, they degenerate into a ſpecies of lawleſs buccaneers. From ſuch a total relaxation of morals and diſcipline, what can enſue but riot, confuſion, diſhonour, and defeat? All the advantage that can be expected from theſe ſudden ſtarts of invaſion will ſcarce over-balance the evils we have mentioned, together with the extraordinary expence of equipping armaments of this nature. True it is, theſe deſcents oblige the French king to employ a conſiderable number of his troops for the defence of his maritime places: they ſerve to ruin the trade of his ſubjects, protect the navigation of Great-Britain, and ſecure its coaſt from invaſion; but theſe purpoſes might be as effectually anſwered, at a much ſmaller expence, by the ſhipping alone. Should it be judged expedient, however, to proſecute this deſultory kind of war, the commanders employed in it will do well to conſider, that a deſcent ought never to be hazarded in an enemy's country, without having taken proper precautions to ſecure a retreat; and the ſevereſt diſcipline ought to be preſerved during all the operations of his campaign; that a general ought never to diſembark but upon a well-concerted plan, nor commence his military tranſactions without ſome immediate point or object in view; that a re-embarkation ought never to be attempted, except from a clear open beach, where the approaches of an enemy may be ſeen, and the troops covered by the fire of their ſhipping. Thoſe who preſumed to reflect upon the particulars of this laſt expedition owned themſelves at a loſs to account for the conduct of the general, in remaining on ſhore after the deſign upon St. Maloes was laid aſide; in penetrating ſo far into the country, without any viſible object; neglecting the repeated intelligence which he received; communicating by beat of drum his midnight motions to an enemy of double his force; loitering near ſeven hours in a march of three miles; and, laſtly, attempting the re-embarkation of the troops at a place where no proper meaſures had been taken for their cover and defence. After the action of St. Cas, ſome civilities, by meſſage, paſſed between the duke d'Aiguillon and the Engliſh commanders, who were favoured with a liſt of the priſoners, including four ſea-captains; and aſſured that the wounded ſhould receive all poſſible comfort and aſſiſtance. Theſe matters being adjuſted, commodore Howe returned with the fleet to Spithead, and the ſoldiers were diſembarked.

The ſucceſs of the attempt upon Cherbourg had elevated the people to a degree of childiſh triumph; and the government thought proper to indulge this petulant ſpirit of exultation, by expoſing 21 pieces of French cannon in Hyde-park, from whence they were drawn in proceſſion to the Tower, amidſt the acclamations of the populace. From this pinnacle of elation and pride they were precipitated to the abyſs of deſpondence or dejection, by the account of the miſcarriage at St. Cas, which buoyed up the ſpirits of the French in the ſame proportion. The people of that nation began to ſtand in need of ſome ſuch cordial after the loſſes they had ſuſtained, and the miniſtry of Verſailles did not fail to make the moſt of this advantage; they publiſhed a pompous narrative of the battle at St. Cas, and magnified into a mighty victory the puny chec which they had given to the rear-guard of an inconſiderable detachment. The people received it with implicit belief, becauſe it was agreeable to their paſſions, and congratulated themſelves upon their ſucceſs in hyperboles, dictated by that vivacity ſo peculiar to the French nation. Indeed, theſe are artifices which the miniſters of every nation find it neceſſary to uſe at certain conjunctures, in governing the turbulent and capricious multitude. After the misfortune at St. Cas, nothing further was attempted by that armament; nor was any enterprize of importance achieved by the Britiſh ſhips in Europe during the courſe of this ſummer. The cruizers, however, ſtill continued active and alert. Captain Hervey, in the ſhip Monmouth, deſtroyed a French ſhip of forty guns in the iſland of Malta; an exploit of which the Malteſe loudly complained, as a violation of their neutrality. About 20 ſail of ſmall French veſſels were driven aſhore on the rocs of Bretagne, by ſome cruizers belonging to the fleet commanded by lord Anſon, after a ſmart engagement with two frigates, under whoſe convoy they ſailed. In the month of November the Belliqueux, a French ſhip of war, mounted with 64 guns, having, by miſtake, run up St. George's channel, and anchored in Lundy-road, captain Saumarez, of the Antelope, then lying in King-road, immediately weighed and went in queſt of her, according to the advice he had received. When he appeared, the French captain heaved up his anchor, and made a ſhow of preparing for an engagement; but ſoon hauled down his colours, and without firing a ſhot ſurrendered, with a complement of 417 men, to a ſhip of inferior force, both in number of hands and weight of metal.—By this time the Engliſh privateers ſwarmed to ſuch a degree in the channel, that ſcarce a French veſſel durſt quit the harbour, and conſequently there was little or no booty to be obtained. In this dearth of legal prizes, ſome of the adventurers were tempted to commit acts of piracy, and actually rifled the ſhips of neutral nations. A Dutch veſſel, having on board the baggage and domeſtics belonging to the marquis de Pignatelli, embaſſador from the court of Spain to the king of Denmark, was boarded three times ſucceſſively by the crews of three different privateers, who forced the hatches, rummaged the hold, broke open and rifled the trunks and boxes of the embaſſador, inſulted and even cruelly bruiſed his officers, ſtripped his domeſtics, and carried off his effects, together with letters of credit, and a bill of exchange. Complaints of theſe outrages being made to the court of London, the lords of the admiralty promiſed, in the Gazette, a reward of 500l. without deduction, to any perſon who ſhould diſcover the offenders concerned in theſe acts of piracy. Some of them were detected accordingly, and brought to condign puniſhment.

The Dutch had for ſome time carried on a very conſiderable traffic, not only in taking the fair advantages of their neutrality, but alſo in ſupplying the French with naval ſtores, and tranſporting the produce of the French ſugar-colonies to Europe, as carriers hired by the proprietors. The Engliſh government, incenſed at this unfair commerce, proſecuted with ſuch flagrant partiality for their enemies, iſſued orders for the cruizers to arreſt all ſhips of neutral powers that ſhould have French property on board; and theſe orders were executed with rigour and ſeverity. A great number of Dutch ſhips were taken, and condemned as legal prizes, both in England and Jamaica: ſometimes the owners met with hard meaſure, and ſome crews were treated with inſolence and barbarity. The ſubjects of the United-Provinces raiſed a loud clamour againſt the Engliſh, for having by theſe captures violated the law of nations, and the particular treaty of commerce ſubſiſting between Great-Britain and the republic. Remonſtrances were made to the Engliſh miniſtry, who expoſtulated in their turn with the deputies of the ſtates-general; and the two nations were enflamed againſt each other with the moſt bitter animoſity. The Britiſh reſident at the Hague, in a conference with the ſtates, repreſented, that the king his maſter could not hope to ſee peace ſpeedily re-eſtabliſhed, if the neutral princes ſhould aſſume a right of carrying on the trade of his enemies: that he expected from their known juſtice, and the alliance by which they were ſo nearly connected with his ſubjects, they would honeſtly abandon this fraudulent commerce, and agree that naval ſtores ſhould be comprehended in the claſs of contraband commodities. He anſwered ſome articles of the complaints they had made with an appearance of candour and moderation; declared his majſty's abhorrence of the violences which had been committed upon the ſubjects of the United Provinces; explained the ſteps which had been taken by the Engliſh government to bring the offenders to juſtice, as well as to prevent ſuch outrages for the future; and aſſured them, that his Britannick majeſty had nothing more at heart than to renew and maintain, in full force, the mutual confidence and friendſhip by which the maritime powers of England and Holland had been ſo long united.

Theſe profeſſions of eſteem and affection were not ſufficient to quiet the minds and appeaſe the reſentment of the Dutch merchants; and the French party, which was both numerous and powerful, employed all their art and influence to exaſperate their paſſions, and widen the breach between the two nations. The court of Verſailles, did not fail to ſeize this opportunity of inſinuation: while, on one hand, their miniſters and emiſſaries in Holland exaggerated the indignities and injuries which the ſtates had ſuſtained from the inſolence and rapacity of the Engliſh; they, on the other hand, flattered and cajoled them with little advantages in trade, and formal profeſſions of reſpect. Such was the memorial delivered by the count d'Affry, intimating that the empreſs-queen being under an abſolute neceſſity of employing all her forces to defend her hereditary dominions in Germany, ſhe had been obliged to withdraw her troops from Oſtend and Nieuport; and applied to the French king, as her ally neareſt at hand, to garriſon theſe two places, which, however, ſhould be reſtored at the peace, or ſooner, ſhould her imperial majeſty think proper. The ſpirit of the Dutch merchants at this juncture, and their ſentiments with reſpect to England, appeared with very high colouring in a memorial to the ſtates-general, ſubſcribed by 269 traders, compoſed and preſented with equal ſecreſy and circumſpection. In this famous remonſtrance they complained, that the violences and unjuſt depredations committed by the Engliſh ſhips of war and privateers on the veſſels and effects of them and their fellow-ſubjects were not only continued, but daily multiplied; and cruelty and exceſs carried to ſuch a pitch of wanton barbarity, that the petitioners were forced to implore the aſſiſtance of their high-mightineſſes to protect, in the moſt efficacious manner, the commerce and navigation, which were the two ſinews of the republic. For this neceſſary purpoſe they offered to contribute each his contingent, and to arm at their own charge; and other propoſitions were made for an immediate augmentation of the marine. While this party induſtriouſly exerted all their power and credit to effect a rupture with England, the princeſs Gouvernante employed all her intereſt and addreſs to divert them from this object, and alarm them with reſpect to the power and deſigns of France; againſt which ſhe earneſtly exhorted them to augment their military forces by land, that they might be prepared to defend themſelves againſt all invaſion. At the ſame time, ſhe ſpared no pains to adjuſt the differences between her huſband's country and her father's kingdom; and, without doubt, her healing councils were of great efficacy in preventing matters from coming to a very dangerous extremity.

The whole ſtrength of Great-Britain during this campaign was not exhauſted in petty deſcents upon the coaſt of France. The continent of America was the great theatre on which her chief vigour was diſplayed; nor did ſhe fail to exert herſelf in ſucceſsful efforts againſt the French ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa. The whole gum trade, from Cape-Blanco to the river Gambia, an extent of 500 miles, had been engroſſed by the French, who built Fort-Louis within the mouth of the Senegal, extending their factories near 300 leagues up that river, and on the ſame coaſt had fortified the iſland of Goree, in which they maintained a conſiderable garriſon. The gum-ſenega, of which a great quantity is uſed by the manufacturers of England, being wholly in the hands of the enemy, the Engliſh dealers were obliged to buy it at ſecond hand from the Dutch, who purchaſed it of the French, and exacted an exorbitant price for that commodity. This conſideration forwarded the plan for annexing the country to the poſſeſſion of Great-Britain. The project was firſt conceived by mr. Thomas Cumming, a ſenſible quaker, who, as a private merchant, had made a voyage to Portenderrick, an adjoining part of the coaſt, and contracted a perſonal acquaintance with Amir, the Mooriſh king of Legibelli[d]. He found this African prince well diſpoſed towards the ſubjects of Great-Britain, whom he publicly preferred to all other Europeans, and ſo exaſperated againſt the French, that he declared he ſhould never be eaſy till they were exterminated from the river Senegal. At that very time he had commenced hoſtilities againſt them, and earneſtly deſired that the king of England would ſend out an armament to reduce Fort-Louis and Goree, with ſome ſhips of force to protect the traders. In that caſe, he promiſed to join his Britannick majeſty's forces, and grant an excluſive trade to his ſubjects. Mr Cumming, not only perceived the advantages that would reſult from ſuch an excluſive privilege with regard to the gum, but foreſaw many other important conſequences of an extenſive trade in a country, which, over and above the gum-ſenega, contains many valuable articles, ſuch as gold-duſt, elephants-teeth, hides, cotton, bees-wax, ſlaves, oſtrich-feathers, indigo, ambergris, and civet. Elevated with the proſpect of an acquiſition ſo valuable to his country, this honeſt quaker was equally minute and indefatigable in his enquiries touching the commerce of the coaſt, as well as the ſtrength and ſituation of the French ſettlements on the river Senegal; and, at his return to England, actually formed the plan of an expedition for the conqueſt of Fort-Louis. This was preſented to the board of trade, by whom it was approved, after a ſevere examination; but it required the patriotic zeal and invincible perſeverance of Cumming to ſurmount a variety of obſtacles before it was adopted by the miniſtry; and even then it was not executed in its full extent. He was abridged of one large ſhip, and in lieu of 600 land-forces, to be drafted from different regiments, which he in vain demanded, firſt from the duke of Cumberland, and afterwards from lord Ligonier, the lords of the admiralty allotted 200 marines only for this ſervice. After repeated ſollicitations he, in the year 1757, obtained an order, that the two annual ſhips bound to the coaſt of Guinea ſhould be joined by a ſloop and two buſſes, and make an attempt upon the French ſettlement in the river Senegal. Theſe ſhips, however, were detained by contrary winds until the ſeaſon was too far advanced to admit a probability of ſucceſs, and therefore the deſign was poſtponed. In the beginning of the preſent year, mr. Cumming being re-enforced with the intereſt of a conſiderable merchant in the city, to whom he had communicated the plan, renewed his application to the miniſtry, and they reſolved to hazard the enterprize. A ſmall ſquadron was equipped for this expedition, under the command of captain Marſh, having on board a body of marines, commanded by major Maſon, with a detachment of artillery, ten pieces of cannon, eight mortars, and a conſiderable quantity of warlike ſtores and ammunition. Captain Walker was appointed engineer; and mr. Cumming was concerned as a principal director and promoter of the expedition[e]. This little armament ſailed in the beginning of March; and in their paſſage touched at the iſland of Teneriff, where, while the ſhips ſupplied themſelves with wine and water, mr. Cumming proceeded in the Swan ſloop to Portenderrick, being charged with a letter of credence to his old friend the king of that country, who had favoured him in his laſt viſit with an excluſive trade on that coaſt, by a formal charter, written in the Arrabick language. This prince was now up the country, engaged in a war with his neighbours, called the Diable-Moors[f]; and the queen-dowager, who remained at Portenderrick, gave mr. Cumming to underſtand, that ſhe could not at preſent ſpare any troops to join the Engliſh in their expedition againſt Senegal: but ſhe aſſured him, that ſhould the French be exterminated, ſhe and her ſubjects would go thither and ſettle. In the mean time, one of the chiefs, called prince Amir, diſpatched a meſſenger to the king, with advice of their arrival and deſign. He declared that he would, with all poſſible diligence, aſſemble 300 warriors to join the Engliſh troops, and that, in his opinion, the king would re-enforce them with a detachment from his army. By this time captain Marſh, with the reſt of the armament, had arrived at Portenderrick, and fearing that the enemy might receive intimation of his deſign, reſolved to proceed on the expedition, without waiting for the promiſed auxiliaries. On the 22d day of April he weighed anchor, and next day at four o'clock, diſcovered the French flag flying upon Fort-Louis, ſituated in the midſt of a pretty conſiderable town, which exhibited a very agreeable appearance. The commodore having made prize of a Dutch ſhip richly laden with gum, which lay at anchor without the bar, came to an anchor in Senegal-road, at the mouth of the river: and here he perceived ſeveral armed ſloops which the enemy had detached to defend the paſſage of the bar, which is extremely dangerous. All the boats were employed in conveying the ſtores into the ſmall craft, while three of the ſloops continued exchanging fire over a narrow tongue of land with the veſſels of the enemy, conſiſting of one brig and ſix armed ſloops, mounted with great guns and ſwivels. At length, the channel being diſcovered, and the wind, which generally blows down the river, chopping about, captain Millar, of the London buſs, ſeiſed that opportunity; and paſſing the bar with a flowing ſheet, dropped anchor on the inſide, where he lay till night, expoſed to the whole fire of the enemy. Next day he was joined by the other ſmall veſſels, and a regular engagement enſued. This was warmly maintained on both ſides, until the buſſes and one dogger running a-ground, immediately bulged, and were filled with water. Then the troops they contained took to their boats and with ſome difficulty reached the ſhore, where they formed in a body, and were ſoon joined by their companions from the other veſſels; ſo that now the whole amounted to 390 marines, beſides the detachment of artillery. As they laid their account with being attacked by the natives, who lined the ſhore at ſome diſtance, ſeemingly determined to oppoſe the deſcent, they forthwith threw up an entrenchment, and began to diſembark the ſtores, great part of which lay under water. While they were employed in raiſing this occaſional defence, the negroes came in great numbers and ſubmitted; and on the ſucceeding day they were re-enforced by 350 ſeamen, who paſſed the bar in ſloops, with their enſigns and colours flying.

They had made no further progreſs in their operations, when two French deputies arrived at the intrenchment, with propoſals for a capitulation from the governor of Fort-Louis. After ſome heſitation, captain Marſh and major Maſon agreed, that all the white people belonging to the French company at Senegal ſhould be ſafely conducted to France in an Engliſh veſſel, without being deprived of their private effects, provided all the merchandiſe and uncoined treaſure ſhould be delivered up to the victors; and that all the forts ſtore-houſes, veſſels, arms, proviſions, and every article belonging to the company in that river ſhould be put into the hands of the Engliſh immediaetly after the capitulation could be ſigned. They promiſed that the free natives living at Fort-Louis ſhould remain in quiet poſſeſſion of their effects, and in the free exerciſe of their religion; and that all negroes, mulattoes, and others, who could prove themſelves free, ſhould have it in their option either to remain in the place, or remove to any part of the country [i]. The captains Campbell and Walker were immediately ſent up the river with a flag of truce, to ſee the articles ſigned and executed; but they were ſo retarded by the rapidity of the ſtream, that they did not approach the fort till three in the morning. As ſoon as the day broke they hoiſted their flag, and rowed up towards a battery on a point of the iſland, where they lay upon their oars very near a full hour, beating the chamade; but no notice taken of their approach. This reſerve appearing myſterious, they retired down the river to their intrenchment, where they underſtood that the negroes on the iſland were in arms, and had locked up the French in Fort-Louis, reſolving to defend the place to the laſt extremity, unleſs they ſhould be included in the capitulation. This intelligence was communicated in a ſecond letter from the governor who likewiſe informed the Engliſh commander, that unleſs the French director-general ſhould be permitted to remain with the natives, as a a ſureity for that article of the capitulation in which they were concerned, they would allow themſelves to be cut in pieces rather than ſubmit. This requeſt being granted, the Engliſh forces began their march to Fort-Louis, accompanied by a number of long boats, in which the artillery and ſtores had been embarked. The French ſeeing them advance immediately ſtruc their flag; and major Maſon took poſſeſſion of the caſtle, where he found ninety-two pieces of cannon, with treaſure and merchandize to a conſiderable value. The corporation and burghers of the town of Senegal ſubmitted, and ſwore allegiance to his Britannick majeſty: the neighbouring princes, attended by numerous retinues, viſited the commander, and concluded treaties with the Engliſh nation, and the king of Portenderrick, or Legibelli ſent an embaſſador from his camp to major Maſon, with preſents, compliments of congratulation, and aſſurances of friendſhip. The number of free independent negroes and mulattoes ſettled at Senegal, amounted to three thouſand, and many of theſe enjoyed ſlaves and poſſeſſions of their own. The two French factories of Podore and Galam, the latter ſituated nine hundred miles farther up the river, were included in the capitulation; ſo that Great-Britain, almoſt without ſtriking a blow, found herſelf poſſeſſed of a conqueſt, from which, with proper management, ſhe may derive inconceivable riches. This important acquiſition was in a great meaſure, if not entirely owing to the ſagacity, zeal, and indefatigable efforts of mr. Cumming, who not only formed the plan and ſollicited the armament, but alſo attended the execution of it in perſon, at the hazard of his life, and to the interruption of his private concerns.

[e] On this occaſion mr. Cumming may ſeem to have acted directly contrary to the tenets of his religious profeſſion; but he ever declared to the miniſtry that he was fully perſuaded his ſchemes might be accompliſhed without the effuſion of human blood; and that if he thought otherwiſe, he would by no means have concerned himſelf about them. He alſo deſired, let the conſequence be what it might, his brethren ſhould not be chargeable with what was his own ſingle act.—If it was the firſt military ſcheme of any quaker, let it be remembered it was alſo the firſt ſucceſsful expedition of this war, and one of the firſt that ever was carried on according to the pacific ſyſtem of the quakers, without the loſs of a drop of blood on either ſide.

Fort-Louis being ſecured with an Engliſh garriſon, and ſome armed veſſels left to guard the paſſage of the bar, at the mouth of the river, the great ſhips proceeded to make an attempt upon the iſland of Goree, which lies at the diſtance of thirty leagues from Senegal. There the French company had conſiderable magazines and warehouſes, and lodged the negro ſlaves until they could be ſhipped for the Weſt-Indies. If the additional force which mr. Cumming propoſed for the conqueſt of this iſland had been added to the armament, in all probability the iſland would have been reduced, and in that caſe, the nation would have ſaved the conſiderable expence of a ſubſequent expedition againſt it, under the conduct of commodore Keppel. At preſent, the ſhips by which Goree was attacked were found unequal to the attempt, and the expedition miſcaried accordingly, though the miſcarriage was attended with little or no damage to the aſſailants.

Scenes of ſtill greater importance were acted in North-America, where, excluſive of the fleet and marines, the government had aſſembled about 50,000 men, including 22,000 regular troops. The earl of Loudoun having returned to England, the chief command in America devolved on major-general Abercrombie; but as the objects of operation were various, the forces were divided into three detached bodies, under as many different commanders. About 12,000 were deſtined to undertake the ſiege of Louiſbourg, on the iſland of Cape-Breton. The general himſelf reſerved near 16,000 for the reduction of Crown-point, a fort ſituated on lake Champlain: 8000, under the conduct of brigadier-general Forbes, were allotted for the conqueſt of Fort du Queſne, which ſtood a great way to the ſouthward, near the river Ohio; and a conſiderable garriſon was left at Annapolis, in Nova-Scotia. The reduction of Louiſbourg and the iſland of Cape-Breton being an object of immediate conſideration, was undertaken with all poſſible diſpatch. Major-general Amherſt being joined by admiral Boſcawen, with the fleet and forces from England, the whole armament, conſiſting of 157 ſail, took their departure from the harbour of Halifax, in Nova-Scotia, on the 28th of May, and on the 2d of June part of the tranſports anchored in the bay of Gabarus, about ſeven miles to the weſtward of Louiſbourg. The garriſon of this place, commanded by the chevalier Drucour, conſiſted of 2500 regular troops, 300 militia, formed of the burghers, and towards the end of the ſiege they were re-enforced by 350 Canadians, including 60 Indians. The harbour was ſecured by ſix ſhips of the line [k], and five frigates, three of which the enemy ſunk acroſs the harbour's mouth, in order to render it inacceſſible to the Engliſh ſhipping. The fortifications were in bad repair, many parts of them crumbling down the covered way, and ſeveral baſtions expoſed in ſuch a manner as to be enfiladed by the beſiegers, and no part of the town ſecure from the effects of cannonading and bombardment. The governor had taken all the precautions in his power to prevent a landing, by eſtabliſhing a chain of poſts, that extended two leagues and a half along the moſt inacceſſible parts of the beach: entrenchments were thrown up, and batteries erected; but there were ſome intermediate places which could not be properly ſecured, and in one of theſe the Engliſh troops were diſembarked. The diſpoſition being made for landing, a detachment, in ſeveral ſloops, under convoy, paſſed by the mouth of the harbour towards Lorembec, in order to draw the enemy's attention that way, while the landing ſhould really be effected on the other ſide of the town. On the 8th day of June, the troops being aſſembled in the boats before day-break, in three diviſions, ſeveral ſloops and frigates, that were ſtationed along ſhore in the bay of Gabarus, began to ſcour the beach with their ſhot; and after the fire had continued about a quarter of an hour, the boats, containing the diviſion on the left, were rowed towards the ſhore, under the command of brigadier-general Wolfe, an accompliſhed officer, who, in the ſequel, diſplayed very extraordinary proofs of military genius. At the ſame time the two other diviſions, on the right and in the centre, commanded by the brigadiers Whitmore and Laurence, made a ſhow of landing, in order to divide and diſtract the enemy. Notwithſtanding an impetuous ſurf, by which many boats were overſet, and a very ſevere fire of cannon and muſketry from the enemy's batteries, which did conſiderable execution, brigadier Wolfe purſued his point with admirable courage and deliberation. The ſoldiers leaped into the water with the moſt eager alacrity, and, gaining the ſhore, attacked the enemy in ſuch a manner, that in a few minutes they abandoned their works and artillery, and fled in the utmoſt confuſion. The other diviſions landed alſo, but not without an obſtinate oppoſition; and the ſtores, with the artillery, being brought on ſhore, the town of Louiſbourg was formally inveſted. The difficulty of landing ſtores and implements in boiſterous weather, and the nature of the ground, which, being marſhy, was unfit for the conveyance of heavy cannon, retarded the operations of the ſiege. Mr Amherſt made his approaches with great circumſpection, ſecuring his camp with redoubts and epaulements from any attacs of Canadians, of which he imagined there was a conſiderable body behind him on the iſland, as well as from the fire of the French ſhipping in the harbour, which would otherwiſe have annoyed him extremely in his advances.

The governor of Louiſbourg having deſtroyed the grand battery, which was detached from the body of the place, and recalled his out-poſts, prepared for making a vigorous defence. A very ſevere fire, well directed, was maintained againſt the beſiegers and their works, from the town, the iſland battery, and the ſhips in the harbour; and divers ſallies were made, though without much effect. In the mean time brigadier Wolfe, with a ſtrong detachment, had marched round the north-eaſt part of the harbour, and taken poſſeſſion of the lighthouſe-point, where he erected ſeveral batteries againſt the ſhips and the iſland fortification,

[i] The victors, however, committed a very great miſtake in allowing them to carry off their books and accounts, the peruſal of which would have been of infinite ſervice to the Engliſh merchants, by informing them of the commodities, their value, the proper ſeaſons, and methods of proſecuting the trade.

[k] The Prudent, of ſeventy-four guns; the Entreprenant, of ſeventy-four guns; the Capricieux, Celebre, and Bienfaiſant, of ſixty-four guns each; the Apollo of fifty guns; the Chevre, Biche, Fidelle, Diana, and Echo frigates.

which laſt was ſoon ſilenced. On the 19th day of June the Echo, a French frigate, was taken by the Engliſh cruizers, after having eſcaped from the harbour: from the officers on board of this ſhip the admiral learned that Bizarre, another frigate, had ſailed from thence on the day of the diſembarkation, and the Comete had ſucceſsfully followed her example. Beſides the regular approaches to the town, conducted by the engineers under the immediate command and inſpection of general Amherſt, divers batteries were raiſed by the detached corps under brigadier Wolfe, who exerted himſelf with amazing activity, and grievouſly incommoded the enemy, both of the town and the ſhipping. On the 21ſt day of July the three great ſhips, the Entreprenant, Capricieux, and Celebre, were ſet on fire by a bomb-ſhell, and burnt to aſhes, ſo that none remained but the Prudent and Bienfaiſant, which the admiral undertook to deſtroy. For this purpoſe, in the night between the 25th and 26th days of the month, the boats of the ſquadron were in two diviſions detached into the harbour, under the command of two young captains, Laforey and Balfour. They accordingly penetrated, in the dark, through a terrible fire of cannon and muſquetry, and boarded the enemy ſword in hand. The Prudent, being a-ground, was ſet on fire, and deſtroyed, but the Bienfaiſant was towed out of the harbour, in triumph. In the proſecution of the ſiege, the admiral and general co-operated with remarkable harmony; the former cheafully aſſiſting the latter with cannon and other implements; with detachments of marines to maintain poſts on ſhore, with parties of ſeamen to act as pioneers, and concur in working the guns and mortars. The fire of the town was managed with equal ſkill and activity, and kept up with great perſeverance; until, at length, their ſhipping being all taken or deſtroyed, the caſerns[g] ruined in the two principal baſtions, 40 out of 52 pieces of cannon diſmounted, broke, or rendered unſerviceable, and divers practicable breaches effected, the governor, in a letter to mr. Amherſt, propoſed a capitulation on the ſame articles that were granted to the Engliſh at Port-Mahon. In anſwer to this propoſal he was given to underſtand, that he and his garriſon muſt ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war, otherwiſe he might next morning expect a general aſſault by the ſhipping under admiral Boſcawen. The chevalier Drucour, piqued at the ſeverity of theſe terms, replied, that he would, rather than comply with them, ſtand an aſſault; but the commiſſary-general, and intendant of the colony, preſented a petition from the traders and inhabitants of the place, in conſequence of which he ſubmitted. On the 27th day of July three companies of grenadiers, commanded by major Farquhar, took poſſeſſion of the weſtern gate; and brigadier Whitmore was detached into the town, to ſee the garriſon lay down their arms, and deliver up their colours on the eſplanade, and to poſt the neceſſary guards on the ſtores, magazines, and ramparts. Thus, at the expence of about 400 men killed and wounded, the Engliſh obtained poſſeſſion of the important iſland of Cape-Breton, and the ſtrong town of Louiſbourg, in which the victors found 221 pieces of cannon, with 18 mortars, and a conſiderable quantity of ſtores and ammunition. The merchants and inhabitants were ſent to France in Engliſh bottoms, but the garriſon, together with the ſea officers, marines, and mariners, amounting in all to 5637 priſoners, were tranſported to England. The loſs of Louiſbourg was the more ſeverely felt by the French king, as it had been attended with the deſtruction of ſo many conſiderable ſhips and frigates. The particulars of this tranſaction were immediately brought to England, in a veſſel diſpatched for that purpoſe, with captain Amherſt, brother to the commander, who was alſo entruſted with eleven pair of colours taken at Louiſbourg: theſe were, by his majeſty's order, carried in pompous parade, eſcorded by detachments of horſe and foot guards, with kettle drums and trumpets, from the palace of Kenſington to St. Paul's cathedral, where they were depoſited as trophies, under a diſcharge of cannon, and other noiſy expreſſions of triumph and exultation. Indeed, the public rejoicings for the conqueſt of Louiſbourg where diffuſed through every part of the Britiſh dominions, and addreſſes of congratulation were preſented to the king by a great number of flouriſhing towns and corporations.

After the reduction of Cape-Breton, ſome ſhips where detached, with a body of troops under the command of lieutenant colonel lord Rollo, to take poſſeſſion of the iſland of St. John, which alſo lies in the gulf of St. Laurence, and, by its fertility in corn and cattle, had ſince the beginning of the war ſupplied Quebeck with conſiderable quantities of proviſion. It was likewiſe the aſylum to which the French neutrals of Annapolis fled for ſhelter from the Engliſh government; and the retreat from whence they and the Indians uſed to make their ſudden irruptions into Nova-Scotia, where they perpetrated the moſt inhuman barbarities on the defenſeleſs ſubjects of Great-Britain. The number of inhabitants amounted to 4100, who ſubmitted, and brought in their arms: then lord Rollo took poſſeſſion of the governor's quarters, where he found ſeveral ſcalps of Engliſmen, whom the ſavages had aſſaſſinated, in conſequence of the encouragement they received from their French patrons and allies, who gratified them with a certain premium for every ſcalp they produced. The iſland was ſtocked with above 10,000 head of blac cattle, and ſome of the farmers raiſed each 1200 buſhels of corn annually for the market of Quebeck.

The joy and ſatisfaction ariſing from the conqueſt of Louiſbourg and St. John was not a little checked by the diſaſter which befel the main body of the Britiſh forces in America, under the immediate conduct of general Abercrombie, who, as we have already obſerved, had propoſed the reduction of the French forts on the lakes George and Champlain, as the chief objects of his enterprize, with a view to ſecure the frontier of the Britiſh colonies, and open a paſſage for the future conqueſt of Canada. In the beginning of July his forces, amounting to near 7000 regular troops, and 10,000 provincials, embarked on the lake George, in the neighbourhood of lake Champlain, on board of 900 batteaus, and 135 whale-boats, with proviſion, artillery, and ammunition; ſeveral pieces of cannon being mounted on rafts to cover the purpoſed landing, which was next day effected without oppoſition. The general's deſign was to inveſt Ticonderoga, a fort ſituated on a tongue of land, extending between lake George and a narrow gut that communicates with lake Champlain. This fortification was, on three ſides, ſurrounded with water, and in front nature had ſecured it with a moraſs. The Engliſh troops being diſembarked, were immediately formed into three columns, and began their march to the enemy's advanced poſt, conſiſting of one battalion, encamped behind a breaſt-work of logs, which they now abandoned with precipitation, after having ſet them on fire, and burned their tents and implements. The Britiſh forces continued their march in the ſame order; but the rout lying through a thic wood that did not admit of any regular progreſſion or paſſage, and the guides proving extremely ignorant, the troops were bewildered, and the columns broken by falling in one upon another. Lord Howe being advanced at the head of the right centre column, encountered a French detachment who had likwiſe loſt their way in the retreat from the advanced poſt, and a warm ſkirmiſh enſuing, the enemy were routed with conſiderable loſs, a good number were killed, and 148 were taken priſoners, including five officers. This petty advantage was dearly bought with the loſs of lord Howe, who fell in the beginning of the action, unſpeakably regretted as a young nobleman of the moſt promiſing talents, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a peculiar manner by his courage, activity, and rigid obſervation of military diſcipline, and had acquired the eſteem and affection of the ſoldiery by his generoſity, ſweetneſs of manners, and engaging addreſs. The general perceiving the troops were greatly fatigued and diſordered from want of reſt and refreſhment, thought it adviſeable to march bac to the landing-place, which they reached about eight in the morning. Then he detached lieutenant-colonel Bradſtreet, with one regular regiment, ſix companies of the royal Americans, with the batteau-men, and a body of rangers, to take poſſeſſion of a ſaw-mill in the neighbourhood of Ticonderoga, which the enemy had abandoned. This poſt being ſecured, the general advanced again towards Ticonderoga, where he underſtood from the priſoners the enemy had aſſembled eight battalions, with a body of Canadians and Indians, amounting in all to 6000. Theſe, they ſaid, being encamped before the fort, were employed in making a formidable entrenchment, were they intended to wait for a re-enforcement of 3000 men, who had been detached under the command of M. de Levi, to make a diverſion on the ſide of the Mohawk river[h]; but upon intelligence of mr. Abercrombie's approach, were now recalled for the defenſe of Ticonderoga. This information determined the Engliſh general to ſtrike, if poſſible, ſome deciſive ſtroke before the junction could be effected. He, therefore, early next morning ſent his engineer acroſs the river on the oppoſite ſide of the fort, to reconnoitre the enemy's entrenchments, and he reported, that the works being ſtill unfiniſhed, might be attempted with a good proſpect of ſucceſs. A diſpoſition was made accordingly for the attac, and after proper guards had been left at the ſaw-mill and the landing-place, the whole army was put in motion. They advanced with great alacrity towards the entrenchment, which, however, they found altogether impracticable. The breaſt-work was raiſed eight feet high, and the ground before it covered with an abattis, or felled trees, with their boughs pointing outwards, and projecting in ſuch a manner as to render the entrenchment almoſt inacceſſible. Notwithſtanding theſe diſcouraging difficulties, the Britiſh troops marched up to the aſſault with an undaunted reſolution, and ſuſtained a terrible fire without flinching. They endeavoured to cut their way through theſe embarraſſments with their ſwords, and ſome of them even mounted the parapet; but the enemy were ſo well covered, that they could deliberately direct their fire without the leaſt danger to themſelves: the carnage was therefore conſiderable, and the troops began to fall into confuſion, after ſeveral repeated attacs, which laſted above four hours, under the moſt diſadvantageous circumſtances. The general, by this time, ſaw plainly that no hope of ſucceſs remained; and, in order to prevent a total defeat, took meaſures for the retreat of the army, which retired unmoleſted to their former camp, with the loſs of about 1800 killed or wounded, including a great number of officers. Every corps of regular troops behaved, on this unfortunate occaſion, with remarkable intrepidity, but the greateſt loſs was ſuſtained by lord John Murray's Highland regiment, of which above one-half of the private men, and 25 officers, were either ſlain upon the ſpot, or deſperately wounded. Mr Abercrombie, unwilling to ſtay in the neighbourhood of the enemy with forces which had received ſuch a diſpiriting chec, retired to his batteaus, and re-embarking the troops, returned to the camp at Lake-George, from whence he had taken his departure. Cenſure, which always attends miſcarriage, did not ſpare the character of this commander; his attac was condemned as raſh, and his retreat as puſillanimous. In ſuch caſes, allowance muſt be made for the peviſhneſs of diſappointment, and the clamour of connexion. How far mr. Abercrombie acquitted himſelf in the duty of a general we ſhall not pretend to determine; but if he could depend upon the courage and diſcipline of his forces, he ſurely had nothing to fear, after the action, from the attempts of the enemy, to whom he would have been ſuperior in number, even though they had been joined by the expected re-enforcement: he might, therefore, have remained on the ſpot, in order to execute ſome other enterprize when he ſhould be re-enforced in his turn; for general Amherſt no ſooner heard of his diſaſter than he returned with the troops from Cape-Breton, to New-England, after having left a ſtrong garriſon in Louiſbourg. At the head of ſix regiments he began his march to Albany, about the middle of September, in order to join the forces on the lake, that they might undertake ſome other ſervice before the ſeaſon ſhould be exhauſted.

[g] It may not he amiſs to obſerve, that a cavalier, which admiral Knowles had built at an enormous expence to the nation, while Louiſbourg remained in the hands of the Engliſh in the laſt war, was in the courſe of this ſiege, entirely demoliſhed by two or three ſhots from one of the Britiſh batteries; ſo admirably had this piece of fortification been contrived and executed, under the eye of that profound engineer.

[h] This officer intended to have made an irruption through the paſs of Oneida on the Mohawks river, but was recalled before he could execute his deſign. General Abercombie afterwards ſent thither brigadier Stanwix, with a conſiderable body of Provincials: and this important paſs was ſecured by a fort built at that juncture.

In the mean time, general Abercrombie had detached lieutenant-colonel Bradſtreet, with a body of 3000 men, chiefly Provincials, to execute a plan which this officer had formed againſt Cadariqui, or Fort-Frontenac, ſituated on the north ſide of the river St. Laurence, juſt where it takes its origin from the Lake-Ontario. To the ſide of this lake he penetrated with his detachment, and embarking in ſome ſloops and batteaux, provided for the purpoſe, landing within a mile of Fort-Frontenac, the garriſon of which conſiſting of 110 men, with a few Indians, immediately ſurrendered at diſcretion. Conſidering the importance of this poſt, which, in a great meaſure, commanded the mouth of the river St. Laurence, and ſerved as a magazine to the more ſouthern caſtles, the French general was inexcuſable for leaving it in ſuch a defenceleſs condition. The fortification itſelf was inconſiderable and ill contrived; nevertheleſs, it contained 60 pieces of cannon, 16 ſmall mortars, with an immenſe quantity of merchandize and proviſions, depoſited for the uſe of the French forces detached againſt brigadier Forbes, their weſtern garriſons, and Indian allies, as well as for the ſubſiſtence of the corps commanded by M. de Levi, on his enterprize againſt the Mohawk river. Mr Bradſtreet not only reduced the fort without bloodſhed, but alſo made himſelf maſter of all the enemy's ſhipping on the lake, amounting to nine armed veſſels, ſome of which carried 18 guns. Two of theſe mr. Bradſtreet conveyed to Oſwego, whither he returned with his troops, after he had deſtroyed Fort-Frontenac, with all the artillery, ſtores, proviſions, and merchandize which it contained. In conſequence of this exploit, the French troops to the ſouthward were expoſed to the hazard of ſtarving; but it is not eaſy to conceive the general's reaſon for giving orders to abandon and deſtroy a fort, which, if properly ſtrengthened and ſuſtained, might have rendered the Engliſh maſters of the Lake-Ontario, and grievouſly harraſſed the enemy, both in their commerce, and expeditions to the weſtward. Indeed, great part of the Indian trade centered at Frontenac, to which place the Indians annually repaired from all parts of America, ſome of them at the diſtance of a 1000 miles, and here exchanged their furs for European commodities. So much did the French traders excel the Engliſh in the art of conciliating the affection of thoſe ſavage tribes, that great part of them, in their yearly progreſs to this remote market, actually paſſed by the Britiſh ſettlements of Albany, in New-York, where they might have been ſupplied with what article they wanted much more cheap than they could purchaſe them at Frontenac or Montreal: nay, the French traders uſed to furniſh themſelves with theſe very commodities from the merchants of New-York, and found this traffic much more profitable than that of procuring the ſame articles from France, loaded with the expence of a tedious and dangerous navigation, from the ſea to the ſource of the river St. Laurence.

In all probability, the deſtruction of Frontenac facilitated the expedition againſt Fort du Queſne, entruſted to the conduct of brigadier Forbes, who, with his little army, began his march in the beginning of July from Philadelphia for the river Ohio, a prodigious tract of country very little known, deſtitute of military roads, incumbered with mountains, moraſſes, and woods, that were almoſt impenetrable. It was not without incredible exertion of induſtry that he procured proviſions and carriages for this expedition, formed new roads, extended ſcouting parties, ſecured camps, and ſurmounted many other difficulties in the courſe of his tedious march, during which he was alſo harraſſed by ſmall detachments of the enemy's Indians. Having penetrated with the main body as far as Ray's-Town, at the diſtance of 90 miles from Fort du Queſne, and advanced colonel Bouquet, with 2000 men, about 50 miles farther, to a place called Lyal-Henning, this officer detached major Grant, at the head of 800 men, to reconnoitre the fort and its outworks. The enemy perceiving him approach, ſent a body of troops againſt him, ſufficient to ſurround his whole detachment: a very ſevere action began, which the Engliſh maintained with their uſual courage for three hours, againſt cruel odds, but at length, being overpowered by numbers, they were obliged to give way, and retired in diſorder to Lyal-Henning, with the loſs of about 300 men killed or taken, including major Grant, who was carried priſoner to Fort du Queſne, and 19 officers. Notwithſtanding this mortifying chec, brigadier Forbes advanced with the army, reſolved to proſecute his operations with vigour; but the enemy, dreading the proſpect of a ſiege, diſmantled and abandoned the fort, and retired down the river Ohio, to their ſettlements on the Miſſiſſippi. They quitted the fort on the 24th day of November, and next day it was poſſeſſed by the Britiſh forces. As for the Indians of this country, they ſeemed heartily to renounce their connexions with France, and be perfectly reconciled to the government of his Britannick majeſty. Brigadier Forbes having repaired the fort, changed its name from Du Queſne to Pittſburgh, ſecured it with a garriſon of provincials, and concluded treaties of friendſhip and alliance with the Indian tribes. Then he marched bac to Philadelphia, and in his retreat built a bloc-houſe, near Lyal-Henning, for the defence of Pennſylvania; but he himſelf did not long ſurvive theſe tranſactions, his conſtitution having been exhauſted by the incredible fatigues of the ſervice. Thus have we given a particular detail of all the remarkable operations by which this campaign was diſtinguiſhed on the continent of America: the reader will be convinced that, notwithſtanding the defeat at Ticonderoga, and the diſaſter of the advanced party in the neighbourhood of Fort du Queſne, the arms of Great-Britain acquired many important advantages; and, indeed, paved the way for the reduction of Quebeck, and conqueſt of all Canada. In the mean time, the admirals Boſcawen and Hardy, having left a conſiderable ſquadron at Halifax, in Nova-Scotia, returned with four ſhips of the line to England, where they arrived in the beginning of November, after having given chaſe to ſix large French ſhips, which they deſcried to the weſtward of Scilly, but could not overtake or bring to an engagement.

The conqueſt of the French ſettlements in the river Senegal being deemed imperfect and incomplete, whilſt France ſtill kept poſſeſſion of the iſland of Goree, the miniſtry of Great-Britain reſolved to crown the campaign in Africa with the reduction of that fortreſs. For this purpoſe commodore Keppel, brother to the earl of Albemarle, was veſted with the command of a ſquadron, conſiſting of four ſhips of the line, ſeveral frigates, two bomb-ketches, and ſome tranſports, having on board 700 men of the regular troops, commanded by colonel Worge, and embarked in the harbour of Cork in Ireland, from whence this whole armament took their departure on the 11th day of November. After a tempeſtuous paſſage, in which they touched at the iſle of Teneriffe, they arrived at Goree in the latter end of December, and the commodore made a diſpoſition for attacking this iſland, which was remarkably ſtrong by nature but very indifferently fortified. Goree is a ſmall barren iſland, extending about three quarters of a mile in length, of a triangular form; and on the ſouth-weſt ſide riſing into a rocky hill, on which the paltry fort of St. Michael is ſituated. There is another, ſtill more inconſiderable, called St. Francis, towards the other extremity of the iſland; and ſeveral batteries were raiſed around its ſweep, mounted with about 100 pieces of cannon, and four mortars. The French governor, M. de St. Jean, had great plenty of ammunition, and his garriſon amounted to about 300 men, excluſive of as many negroe inhabitants. The flat-bottomed boats, for diſembarking the troops, being hoiſted out, and diſpoſed along ſide of the different tranſports, the commodore ſtationed his ſhips on the weſt ſide of the iſland, and the engagement began with a ſhell from one of the ketches. This was a ſignal for the great ſhips, which poured in their broadſides without intermiſſion, and the fire was returned with equal vivacity from all the batteries of the iſland. In the courſe of the action the cannonading from the ſhips became ſo ſevere and terrible, that the French garriſon deſerted their quarters, in ſpite of all the efforts of the governor, who acquitted himſelf like a man of honour; but he was obliged to ſtrike his colours, and ſurrender at diſcretion, after a ſhort but warm diſpute, in which the loſs of the Britiſh commodore did not exceed 100 men killed and wounded. The ſucceſs of the day was the more extraordinary, as the French garriſon had not loſt a man, except one negro killed by the burſting of a bomb-ſhell, and the number of their wounded was very inconſiderable. While the attac laſted, the oppoſite ſhore of the continent was lined with a concourſe of negroes, aſſembled to view the combat, who expreſſed their ſentiments and ſurprize in loud clamour and uncouth geſticulations, and ſeemed to be impreſſed with awe and aſtoniſhment at the power and execution of the Britiſh ſquadron. The French colours being ſtruc, as a ſignal of ſubmiſſion, the commodore ſent a detachment of marines on ſhore, who diſarmed the garriſon, and hoiſted the Britiſh flag upon the caſtle of St. Michael. In the mean time, the governor and the reſt of the priſoners were ſecured among the ſhipping. Thus the important iſland of Goree fell into the hands of the Engliſh, together with two trading veſſels that chanced to be at anchor in the road, and ſtores, money, and merchandize to the value of 20,000l. Part of the troops being left in garriſon at Goree, under the command of major Newton, together with three ſloops for his ſervice, the ſquadron being watered and refreſhed from the continent, that part of which is governed by one of the Jalof kings, and the priſoners, with their baggage, being diſmiſſed in three cartel ſhips to France, the commodore ſet ſail for Senegal, and re-enforced Fort-Louis with the reſt of the troops, under colonel Worge, who was at this juncture favoured with a viſit by the king of Legibelli: but very little pains were taken to diſmiſs this potentate in good humour, or maintain the diſpoſition he profeſſed to favour the commerce of Great-Britain. True it is, he was deſirous of engaging the Engliſh in his quarrels with ſome neighbouring nations; and ſuch engagements were cautiouſly and politically avoided, becauſe it was the intereſt of Great-Britain to be upon good terms with every African prince who could promote and extend the commerce of her ſubjects.

Commodore Keppel having reduced Goree, and re-enforced the garriſon of Senegal, returned to England, where all his ſhips arrived, after a very tempeſtuous voyage, in which the ſquadron had been diſperſed. This expedition, however ſucceſsful in the main, was attended with one misfortune, the loſs of the Lichfield ſhip of war, commanded by captain Barton, which, together with one tranſport and a bomb-tender, was wrecked on the coaſt of Barbary, about nine leagues to the northward of Saffy, in the dominions of Morocco: 130 men, including ſeveral officers, periſhed on this occaſion; but the captain and the reſt of the company, to the number of 220, made ſhift to reach the ſhore, where they ran the riſque of ſtarving, and were cruelly uſed by the natives, although a treaty of peace at that time ſubſiſted between Great-Britain and Morocco; nay, they were even enſlaved by the emperor, who detained them in captivity until they were ranſomed by the Britiſh government: ſo little dependence can be placed on the faith of ſuch barbarian princes, with whom it is even a diſgrace for any civilized nation to be in alliance, whatever commercial advantages may ariſe from the connexion.

The incidents of the war that happened in the Weſt-Indies, during theſe occurrences, may be reduced to a ſmall compaſs. Nothing extraordinary was achieved in the neighbourhood of Jamaica, where admiral Coates commanded a ſmall ſquadron, from which he detached cruizers occaſionally for the protection of the Britiſh commerce; and at Antigua the trade was effectually ſecured by the vigilance of captain Tyrrel, whoſe courage and activity were equal to his conduct and circumſpection. In the month of march, this gentleman, with his own ſhip the Buckingham, and the Cambridge, another of the line, demoliſhed a fort on the iſland of Martinique, and deſtroyed four privateers riding under its protection; but his valour appeared much more conſpicuous in a ſubſequent engagement, which happened in the month of November. Being detached on a cruize in his own ſhip, the Buckingham, by commodore Moore, who commanded at the Leeward iſlands, he fell in with the Weazel ſloop, commanded by captain Boles, between the iſlands of Montſerrat and Guadaloupe, and immediately diſcovered a fleet of 19 ſail, under convoy of a French ſhip of war carrying 74 cannon, and two large frigates. Captain Tyrrel immediately gave chaſe with all the ſail he could carry, and the Weazle running cloſe to the enemy, received a whole broadſide from the large ſhip, which, however, ſhe ſuſtained without much damage: nevertheleſs, mr. Tyrrel ordered her commander to keep aloof, as he could not be ſuppoſed able to bear the ſhoc of large metal, and he himſelf prepared for the engagement. The enemy's large ſhip, the Floriſſant, though of much greater force than the Buckingham, inſtead of lying-to for his comming up, made a running fight with her ſtern-chaſe, while the two frigates annoyed him in his courſe, ſometimes raking him fore and aft, and ſometimes lying on his quarter. At length he came along-ſide of the Floriſſant, within piſtol-ſhot, and poured in a whole broadſide, which did conſiderable execution. The ſalutation was returned with equal vivacity, and a furious engagement enſued. Captain Tyrrel was wounded in the face, and loſt three fingers of his right hand; ſo that, being entirely diſabled, he was obliged to delegate the command of the ſhip to his firſt lieutenant, mr. Marſhal, who continued the battle with great gallantry until he loſt his life: then the charge devolved to the ſecond lieutenant, who acquitted himſelf with equal honour, and ſuſtained a deſperate fight againſt three ſhips of the enemy. The officer and crew of the Buckingham exerted themſelves with equal vigour and deliberation, and captain Troy, who commanded a detachment of marines on the poop, plied his ſmall arms ſo effectually, as to drive the French from their quarters. At length confuſion, terrour, and uproar prevailing on board the Floriſſant, her firing ceaſed, and her colours were hauled down about twilight; but her commander, perceiving that the Buckingham was too much damaged in her rigging to purſue with any hope of ſucceſs, ordered all his ſails to be ſet, and fled in the dark with his two conſorts. Nothing but this circumſtance could have prevented a Britiſh ſhip of 65 guns, indifferently manned in reſpect to number, from taking a French ſhip of the line, mounted with 74 pieces of cannon, provided with 700 men, and aſſiſted by two large frigates, one of 38 guns, and the other wanting two of this number. The loſs of the Buckingham, in this action, did not exceed 20 men killed and wounded; whereas the number of the ſlain on board the Floriſſant did not fall ſhort of 180, and that of her wounded is ſaid to have exceeded 300. She was ſo diſabled in her hull, that ſhe could hardly be kept a float until ſhe reached Martinique, where ſhe was repaired; and the largeſt frigate, together with the loſs of 40 men, received ſuch damage, as to be for ſome time quite unſerviceable.

In the Eaſt-Indies the tranſactions of the war were chequered with a variety of ſucceſs; but, on the whole, the deſigns of the enemy were entirely defeated. The French commander, M. de Buſſy, had, in the year 1756, quarrelled with Salabatzing, viceroy of Decan, becauſe this laſt would not put him in poſſeſſion of the fortreſs of Golconda. In the courſe of the next year, while the Engliſh forces were employed in Bengal, M. de Buſſy made himſelf maſter of the Britiſh factories of Ingeram, Bandermalanka, and Vizagapatam, and the reduction of this laſt left the enemy in poſſeſſion of the whole coaſt of Coromandel, from Ganjam to Maſſulapatam. While a body of the Engliſh company's forces, under captain Caillaud, endeavoured to reduce the important fortreſs and town of Madura, the French, under M. D'Anteuil, inveſted Trichinopoly, Caillaud no ſooner received intelligence of the danger to which this place was expoſed, than he haſtened to its relief, and obliged the enemy to abandon the ſiege. Then he returned to Madura, and, after an unſucceſsful aſſault made himſelf maſter of it by capitulation. During theſe tranſactions, colonel Forde made an attempt upon the fort of Nelloure, a ſtrong place, at the diſtance of 24 miles from Madras, but miſcarried; and this was alſo the fate of an expedition againſt Wandewaſh, undertaken by colonel Aldercron. The firſt was repulſed in ſtorming the place, the other was anticipated by the French army, which marched from Ponticherry to the relief of the garriſon. The French king had ſent a conſiderable re-enforcement to the Eaſt-Indies, under the command of general Lally, an officer of Iriſh extraction, together with ſuch a number of ſhips as rendered the ſquadron of M. d'Apché ſuperior to that of admiral Pococke, who had ſucceeded admiral Watſon, lately deceaſed, in the command of the Engliſh ſquadron ſtationed on the coaſt of Coromandel, which, in the beginning of this year, was re-enforced from England with ſeveral ſhips, under the direction of commodore Stevens. Immediately after this junction, which was effected in the road of Madras on the 24th day of March, admiral Pococke, who had already ſignalized himſelf by his courage, vigilance, and conduct, ſailed to windward, with a view to intercept the French ſquadron, of which he had received intelligence. In two days he deſcried in the road of Fort St. David the enemy's fleet, conſiſting of nine ſhips, which immediately ſtood out to ſea, and formed the line of battle a-head. The admiral took the ſame precaution, and bearing down upon M. d'Apché, the eagagement began about three in the afternoon. The French commodore, having ſuſtained a warm action for about two hours, bore away with his whole fleet, and being joined by two ſhips, formed a line of battle again to leeward. admiral Pococke's own ſhip, and ſome others, being greatly damaged in their maſts and rigging, two of his captains having miſbehaved in the action, and night coming on, he did not think it adviceable to purſue them with all the ſail he could carry; but, nevertheleſs, he followed them at a proper diſtance, ſtanding to the ſouth-weſt, in order to maintain the weather-gage, in caſe he ſhould be able to renew the action in the morning. In this expectation, however, he was diſappointed; the enemy ſhowed no lights, nor made any ſignals that could be obſerved; and in the morning not the leaſt veſtige of them appeared. Mr Pococke, on the ſuppoſition that they had weathered him in the night, endeavoured to work up after them to windward, but finding he loſt ground conſiderably, he dropped anchor about three leagues to the northward of Sadras, and received intelligence from the chief of that ſettlement, that one of the largeſt French ſhips, having been diſabled in the engagement, was run aſhore to the ſouthward of Alemparve, where their whole ſquadron lay at anchor. Such was the iſſue of the firſt action between the Engliſh and French ſquadrons in the Eaſt-Indies, which, over and above the loſs of a capital ſhip, is ſaid to have coſt the enemy about 500 men, whereas the Britiſh admiral did not loſe one-fifth part of that number. Being diſſatisfied with the behaviour of three captains, he, on his return to Madras, appointed a court-martial to enquire into their conduct; two were diſmiſſed from the ſervice, and the third was ſentenced to loſe one year's rank as a poſt-captain.

In the mean time mr. Lally had diſembarked his troops at Ponticherry, and taking the field, immediately inveſted the fort of St. David, while the ſquadron blocked it up by ſea. Two Engliſh ſhips being at anchor in the road when the enemy arrived, their captains ſeeing no poſſibility of eſcaping, ran them on ſhore, ſet them on fire, and retired with their men into the fortreſs, which however, was in a few days ſurrendered. A much more reſolute defence was expected from the courage and conduct of major Polier, who commanded the garriſon. When he arrived at Madras he was ſubjected to a court of enquiry, which acquitted him of cowardice, but were of opinion that the place might have held out much longer, and that the terms on which it ſurrendered were ſhameful, as the enemy were not even maſters of the outward covered way, as they had made no breach, and had a wet ditch to fill up and paſs, before the town could have been properly aſſaulted. Polier, in order to wipe off this diſgrace, deſired to ſerve as a volunteer, with colonel Draper, and was mortally wounded in a ſally at the ſiege of Madras. Admiral Pococke having, to the beſt of his power, repaired his ſhattered ſhips, ſet ſail again on the 10th of May, in order to attempt the relief of fort St. David's; but, notwithſtanding his utmoſt endeavours, he could not reach it in time to be of any ſervice. On the 30th day of the month he came in ſight of Pondicherry, from whence the French ſquadron ſtood away early next morning, nor was it in his power to come up with them, though he made all poſſible efforts for that purpoſe. Then receiving intelligence that fort St. David's was ſurrendered to the enemy, he returned again to Madras, in order to refreſh his ſquadron. On the 25th day of July, he ſailed a third time in queſt of M. d'Apché, and, in two days perceived his ſquadron, conſiſting of eight ſhips of the line and a frigate, at anchor in the road of Pondicherry. They no ſooner deſcried him advancing than they ſtood out to ſea as before, and he continued to chaſe, in hopes of bringing them to an engagement; but all his endeavours proved fruitleſs till the 3d day of Auguſt, when having obtained the weather-gage, he bore down upon them in order of battle. The engagement began with great impetuoſity on both ſides, but in little more than ten minutes M. d'Apché ſet his fore-ſail, and bore away, his whole ſquadron, following his example, and maintaining a running fight in a very irregular line. The Britiſh admiral then hoiſted the ſignal for a general chaſe, which the enemy perceiving, thought proper to cut away their boats, and croud with all the ſail they could carry. They eſcaped by favour of the night into the road of Pondicherry, and mr. Pococke anchored with his ſquadron off Carical, a French ſettlement, having thus obtained an undiſputed victory, with the loſs of 30 men killed, and 116 wounded, including commodore Stevens and captain Martin, though their wounds were not dangerous. The number of killed and wounded on board the French ſquadron amounted, according to report, to 540; and their fleet was ſo much damaged, that in the beginning of September their commodore ſailed for the iſland of Bourbon, in the ſame latitude with Madagaſcar, in order to refit; thus leaving the command and ſovereignty of the Indian ſeas to the Engliſh admiral, whoſe fleet, from the beginning of this campaign, had been much inferior to the French ſquadron in number of ſhips and men, as well as in weight of metal.

Mr Lally having reduced Cuddalore and fort St. David's[1], reſolved to extort a ſum of money from the king of Tanjour, on pretence that, in the laſt war, he had granted an obligation to the French governor for a certain ſum, which had never been paid. Lally accordingly marched with a body of 3000 men into the dominions of Tanjour, and demanded 72 lac of rupees. This extravagant demand being rejected, he plundered Nagare, a trading town on the ſea-coaſt, and afterwards inveſted the capital: but after he had proſecuted the ſiege until a breach was made, his proviſions and ammunition beginning to fail, ſeveral vigorous ſallies being made by the forces of the king of Tanjour, and the place well defended by European gunners, ſent from the Engliſh garriſon at Trichinopoly, he found himſelf obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and retreat with precipitation, leaving his cannon behind. He arrived at Carical about the middle of Auguſt, and from thence retired to Pondicherry towards the end of September. He afterwards cantoned his troops in the province of Arcot, entered the city without oppoſition, and began to make preparations for the ſiege of Madras, which ſhall be recorded among the incidents of the ſucceeding year. In the mean time, the land-forces belonging to the Eaſt-India company were ſo much out-numbered by the re-enforcements which arrived with mr. Lally, that they could not pretend to keep the field, but were obliged to remain on the defenſive, and provide as well as they could for the ſecurity of fort St. George, and the other ſettlements in that part of India.

Having particulariſed the events of the war which diſtinguiſhed this year in America, Africa, and Aſia, thoſe remote ſcenes in which the intereſt of Great-Britain was immediately antimately concerned, it now remains to record the incidents of the military operations in Germany, ſupported by Britiſh ſubſidies, and enforced by Britiſh troops, to favour the abominable deſigns of an ally, from whoſe ſolitary friendſhip the Britiſh nation can never reap any ſolid benefit; and to defend a foreign elector, in whoſe behalf ſhe had already laviſhed an immenſity of treaſure. Notwithſtanding the bloodſhed and ravages which had ſignalized the former campaign, the mutual loſſes of the belligerent powers, the incredible expence of money, the difficulty of recruiting armies thinned by ſword and diſtemper, the ſcarcity of forage and proviſion, the diſtreſſes of Saxony in particular, and the calamities of war, which deſolated the greateſt part of the empire, no propoſition of peace was hinted by either of the parties concerned, but the powers at variance ſeemed to be exaſperated againſt each other with the moſt implacable reſentment. Jarring intereſts were harmoniſed, old prejudices rooted up, inveterate jealouſies aſſuaged, and even inconſiſtencies reconciled, in connecting the confederacy which was now formed and eſtabliſhed againſt the king of Pruſſia; and, on the other hand, the king of Great-Britain ſeemed determined to employ the whole power and influence of his crown in ſupporting this monarch. Yet the members of the grand confederacy were differently actuated by diſagreeing motives, which, in the ſequel, operated for the preſervation of his Pruſſian majeſty, by preventing the full exertion of their united ſtrength. The empreſs-queen, over and above her deſire of retrieving Sileſia, which was her primary aim, gave way to the ſuggeſtions of perſonal hatred and revenge, to the gratification of which ſhe may be ſaid to have ſacrificed, in ſome meaſure, the intereſts of her family, as well as the repoſe of the empire, by admitting the natural enemies of her houſe into the Auſtrian Netherlands, and inviting them to invade the dominions of her co-eſtates with a formidable army. France, true to her old political maxims, wiſhed to ſee the houſe of Auſtria weakened by the diviſions in the empire, which ſhe accordingly fomented: for this reaſon it could not be her intereſt to effect the ruin of the houſe of Bradenburgh; and, therefore, ſhe had, no doubt, ſet bounds to the proſecution of her ſchemes in concert with the court of Vienna; but her deſigns againſt Hanover amounted to abſolute conqueſt: in purſuance of theſe, ſhe ſent an army of 120,000 men acroſs the Rhine, inſtead of 24,000, which ſhe had engaged to furniſh by the original treaty with the empreſs-queen of Hungary, who is ſaid to have ſhared in the ſpoils of the electorate. The czarina, by co-operating with the houſes of Bourbon and Auſtria, gratified her perſonal diſguſt towards the Pruſſian monarch, augmented her finances by conſiderable ſubſidies from both, and perhaps amuſed herſelf with the hope of obtaining an eſtabliſhment in the German empire; but whether ſhe wavered in her own ſentiments, or her miniſtry fluctuaetd between the promiſes of France and the preſents of Great-Britain, certain it is, her forces had not acted with vigour in Pomerania; and her general Apraxin, inſtead of proſecuting his advantage, had retreated immediately after the Pruſſians miſcarried in their attac. He was indeed diſgraced, and tried for having thus retired without orders: but in all probability this trial was no other than a farce, acted to amuſe the other confederates, while the empreſs of Ruſſia gained time to deliberate upon the offers that were made, and determine with regard to the advantages or diſadvantages that might accrue to her from perſevering in the engagements which ſhe had contracted. As for the Swedes, although they had been inſtigated to hoſtilities againſt Pruſſia by the intrigues of France, and flattered with hopes of retrieving Pomerania, they proſecuted the war in ſuch a diſpirited and ineffectual manner, as plainly proved that either the antient valour of that people was extinct, or that the nation was not heartily engaged in the quarrel.

[1] Cuddalore was in ſuch a defenceleſs condition, that it could make no reſiſtance; and there being no place in fort St. David's bomb-proof, nor any proviſions or freſh water, the garriſon ſurrendered in 12 days, on capitulation, after having ſuſtained a ſevere bombardment.

When the Ruſſian general Apraxin retreated from Pomerania, mareſchal Lehwald, who commanded the Pruſſians in that country, was left at liberty to turn his arms againſt the Swedes, and accordingly drove them before him almoſt without oppoſition. By the beginning of January they had evacuated all Pruſſian Pomerania, and Lehwald invaded their dominions in his turn. He, in a little time, made himſelf maſter of all Swediſh Pomerania, except Stralſund and the iſle of Rugen, and poſſeſſed himſelf of ſeveral magazines which the enemy had erected. The Auſtrian army, after their defeat at Breſlau, had retired into Bohemia, where they were cantoned, the head-quarters being fixed at Koningſgratz. The king of Pruſſia having cleared all his part of Sileſia, except the town of Schweidnitz, which he circumſcribed with a blockade, ſent detachments from his army cantoned in the neighbourhood of Breſlau, to penetrate into the Auſtrian or ſouthern part of Sileſia, where they ſurprized Troppau and Jaggernſdorf, while he himſelf remained at Breſlau, entertaining his officers with concerts of muſic. Not that he ſuffered theſe amuſements to divert his attention from ſubjects of greater importance. He laid Swediſh Pomerania under contribution, and made a freſh demand of 500,000 crowns, from the electorate of Saxony. Having received intimation that the duke of Mecklenbourg was employed in providing magazines for the French army, he detached a body of troops into that country, who not only ſecured the magazines, but levied conſiderable contributions; and the duke retired to Lubeck, attended by the French miniſter. The ſtates of Saxony having proved a little dilatory in obeying his Pruſſian majeſty's injunction, received a ſecond intimation, importing, that they ſhould levy and deliver, within a certain time, 18,000 recruits for his army, pay into the hands of his commiſſary one year's revenue of the electorate in advance; and Leipzick was taxed with an extraordinary ſubſidy of 800,000 crowns, on pain of military execution. The ſtates were immediately convoked at Leipzick, in order to deliberate on theſe demands; and the city being unable to pay ſuch a conſiderable ſum, the Pruſſian troops began to put their monarch's threats in execution. He juſtified theſe proceedings, by declaring that the enemy had practiſed the ſame violence and oppreſſion on the territories of his allies; but how the practice of his declared enemies, in countries which they had invaded and ſubdued in the common courſe of war, ſhould juſtify him in pillaging and oppreſſing a people, with whom neither he nor his allies were at war, it is not eaſy to conceive. As little can we reconcile this conduct to the character of a prince, aſſuming the title of protector of the proteſtant religion, which is the eſtabliſhed faith among thoſe very Saxons who were ſubjected to ſuch grievous impoſitions; impoſitions the more grievous and unmerited, as they had never taken any ſhare in the preſent war, but cautiouſly avoided every ſtep that might be conſtrued into provocation, ſince the king of Pruſſia declared they might depend upon his protection.

Before we proceed to enumerate the events of the campaign, it may be neceſſary to inform the reader, that the forces brought into the field by the empreſs-queen of Hungary, and the ſtates of the empire, the czarina, the king of France and Sweden, fell very little ſhort of 300,000 men; and all theſe were deſtined to act againſt the king of Pruſſia and the elector of Hanover. In oppoſition to this formidable confederacy, his Pruſſian majeſty was, by the ſubſidy from England, the ſpoils of Saxony, and the revenues of Bradenbourg, enabled to maintain an army of 140,000 men; while the elector of Hanover aſſembled a body of 60,000 men, compoſed of his own electoral troops, with the auxiliary mercenaries of Heſſe-Caſſel, Buckebourg, Saxegotha, and Brunſwick-Wolfenbuttel, all of them maintained by the pay of Great-Britain. At this juncture, indeed, there was no other fund for their ſubſiſtence, as the countries of Hanover and Heſſe were poſſeſſed by the enemy, and in the former the government was entirely changed.

In the month of December in the preceding year, a farmer of the revenues from Paris arrived at Hanover, where he eſtabliſhed his office, in order to act by virtue of powers from one John Faidy, to whom the French king granted the direction, receipt, and adminiſtration of all the duties and revenues of the electorate. This director was, by a decree of the council of ſtate, empowered to receive the revenues, not only of Hanover, but alſo of all other countries that ſhould be ſubjected to his moſt chriſtian majeſty in the courſe of the campaign; to remove the receivers who had been employed in any part of the direction, receipt, and adminiſtration of the duties and revenues of Hanover, and appoint others in their room. The French king, by the ſame decree, ordained, that all perſons who had been entruſted under the preceding government with titles, papers, accounts, regiſters, or eſtimates, relating to the adminiſtration of the revenues ſhould communicate them to John Faidy, or his attornies; that the magiſtrates of the town, diſtricts, and commonalties, as well as thoſe who directed the adminiſtration of particular ſtates and provinces, ſhould deliver to the ſaid John Faidy, or his attornies, the produce of ſix years of the duties and revenues belonging to the ſaid towns, diſtricts, and provinces, reckoning from the firſt of January in the year 1751, together with an authentic account of the ſums they had paid during that term to the preceding ſovereign, and of the charges neceſſarily incurred. It appears from the nature of this decree, which was
